The king slowly mounted, in weariness and sorrow, and the officer did the same. The king spurred on, and the lieutenant followed. At the bridge, Louis turned one last time. The officer, patient as a god who has eternity before and after him, still hoped for a return of willpower. But to no avail. Louis rode up the street that led to the château and entered the gate as seven o'clock sounded. Once the king had returned to his chamber, and the musketeer had seen, as he saw everything, a corner of the curtain twitch in the cardinal's window, he uttered a great sigh, like a man freed from heavy shackles, and said quietly to himself, "Now then, old soldier, it's finally over!"

After a few minutes of silence, the king called his attending gentleman. "I'm not at home to anyone until two o'clock," he said. "Do you understand, Sir?"

"Sire," replied the gentleman, "someone has already asked to see you."

"Who?"

"Your Lieutenant of Musketeers."

"The one who accompanied me?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Ah!" said the king. "Very well, show him in."

The officer entered. The king gestured to dismiss his gentleman and his valet. Louis watched until they'd closed the door behind them, and when the tapestry had fallen back into place, he said, "Your presence reminds me, Sir, that I'd forgotten to warn you to maintain absolute discretion about this morning's events."

"Oh, Sire! Why should Your Majesty bother to give me such a warning? It seems he doesn't know me."

"Yes, Sir, that's true. I know that you're discreet but as I hadn't been specific..."

The officer bowed. "Your Majesty has nothing more to tell me?" he asked.

"No, Sir. You may withdraw."

"May I request permission not to do so until I've spoken with the king, Sire?"

"What do you have to say to me? Explain yourself, Sir."

"Sire, it's a matter of little importance to you but of great importance to me. Forgive me for bringing it up but if it's not urgent and necessary I'd not bother, I'd just disappear, silent and meek as always."

"Disappear? What are you talking about?"

"To be brief, Sire," said the officer, "I come to ask for my discharge from Your Majesty's service."

The king started but the officer was as stolid as a statue. "Your discharge from me, Sir?" said the king. "And for how long, if you please?"

"For good, Sire."

"You would quit my service, Sir?" said Louis, unable to conceal his surprise.

"I'm afraid so, Sire."

"Impossible."

"And yet there it is, Sire. I'm getting old; I've been in harness for thirty-five years, and my shoulders are stooping. It's time to give way to younger men. I'm not suited to this new reign, I still have one foot in the old one. Everything nowadays is strange to me, it takes me by surprise and makes me dizzy. In short, I have the honour to ask Your Majesty for my discharge."

"Sir," said the king, looking at the officer, who was wearing his soldier's buff coat with an ease that would have been the envy of a younger man, "you've got more strength and stamina than I have."

"Oh!" shrugged the officer, smiling in false modesty. "Your Majesty says that because I have a pretty good eye, my moustache is still black, I stand straight and sit my horse well but Sire, that's all vanity, mere illusion, smoke and mirrors! I may look young but inside I'm old, and within six months I'm sure I'll be a broken down, gouty invalid. And so, Sire..."

"Sir," interrupted the king, "don't you remember what you told me yesterday? You stood right there and told me you were the healthiest man in France, a stranger to fatigue who could stand at your post night and day. Did you say that, or didn't you? Recall your words, Sir."

The officer sighed. "Sire," he said, "old age is vain, and old men must be forgiven for boasting beyond their abilities. I may very well have said that, Sire but the fact is that I'm exhausted and ask to be retired."

"Sir," said the king, with a majestic gesture toward the officer, "you're not giving me your real reasons. You want to leave my service, I see that but you're hiding your true motives."

"Sire, believe me..."

"I believe what I see, Sir, and what I see is an energetic and vigorous man, sharp and quick-minded, possibly the best soldier in France, a man who can in no way persuade me that he's in need of a change."

"Ah, Sire!" said the lieutenant, with an edge of bitterness. "Such praise! Truly, Your Majesty confounds me. Energetic, vigorous, sharp, and quick, the best soldier in the army! Your Majesty exaggerates what merit I have to the point where I hardly recognise myself. If I were vain enough to believe even half of Your Majesty's words, I'd think I was a vital, even indispensable man. I'd say that such a servant, endowed with such shining qualities, must be a treasure beyond price. However, I must say, Sire, that for all my life until today, I've been appreciated, in my opinion, at well below my value. So, I repeat, Your Majesty must be exaggerating."

The king frowned, for he felt the officer's bitter speech verged on insolence. "Come, Sir," he said, "let's get to the point. If you're dissatisfied with my service, say so. No evasions, now – answer me boldly and frankly. I want to hear you."

The officer, who had been turning his hat in his hands in agitation, looked up at these words. "Oh, Sire!" he said. "That puts me more at ease. Since the question is put so frankly, I'll respond with the same frankness. To speak the truth is a good thing, because it relieves the burden on one's heart, and because it happens so rarely. I will therefore tell my king the truth, while begging him to excuse the bluntness of an old soldier."

Louis now looked at his officer with unconcealed anxiety and made an agitated gesture. "Well, then, speak," he said, "for I'm impatient to hear these truths you have to tell me."

The officer tossed his hat on a table, and his expression, always martial and intelligent, took on a strange new character of solemnity and even grandeur. "Sire," he said, "I resign the service of the king because I'm dissatisfied. The valet, at his work, can respectfully approach his master as I do, give him a report on his labours, turn in his tools, account for any funds expended, and say, 'Master, my day is done, please pay me and send me on my way.'"

"Sir!" cried the king, purple with anger.

"Oh, Sire," replied the officer, bowing and bending his knee, "never was a servant more respectful than I am now before Your Majesty; only, you ordered me to tell the truth. Now that I've begun, it must all come out, even if you command me to silence."

And such resolution was displayed in the lines on the officer's face that Louis XIV had no need to urge him to continue, he continued on his own, while the king regarded him with curiosity mixed with admiration. "Sire, for nearly thirty-five years, as I said, I've served the royal house of France. Few people have worn out as many swords in this service as I have, Sire, and they were good swords too.

At first, I was a child, ignorant of anything but courage but the king your father thought he saw in me a man. I was a man, Sire, when Cardinal Richelieu, who never doubted it, thought he saw in me an enemy. Sire, you could read the story of that battle between the ant and the lion, from first to last, in your family's secret archives. If you ever feel so inclined, Sire, you should do so; the story is worth the trouble, if I dare say so myself. You'll read how the lion, harassed, worn out, panting, finally called for quarter, and to do him justice, he gave as well as he got. Oh, those were brave times, Sire, of glorious battles, like an epic of Tasso or Ariosto! The heroic works of that age that no one now would believe, were to us a daily routine. For five years running I was a hero every day, or so some worthy folk have told me, and believe me, Sire, five years of heroism is no small thing! But I believe what I was told by those worthy folk, for they knew whereof they spoke; they were Gentlemen de Richelieu, de Buckingham, de Beaufort, and de Retz, the latter a past master of street fighting! As did King Louis XIII, and even the queen, your august mother, who said to me one day, 'Thank you,' though I dare not think of the service I had the honour to render her. Excuse me, Sire, for speaking so boldly but what I've had the honour to recount to Your Majesty is, as I said, history."

The king gnawed at his lip and threw himself angrily into an armchair. "I've upset Your Majesty," said the lieutenant. "Well, Sire, that's how the truth is! It's a harsh bedfellow, bristling with iron, hurtful to those who hear it, and sometimes to those who speak it."

"No, Sir," the king said. "I invited you to speak, so speak."

"After the service of the king and the cardinal, Sire, came the service of the regency. I fought well in the unrest of the Fronde, though perhaps less well than formerly. But people were growing smaller, and my opponents were lesser men than before. Nevertheless, I led Your Majesty's Musketeers on some dangerous missions in my time with the company. "They were good times while they lasted! I was Sir de Mazarin's favourite: lieutenant, here! Lieutenant, there! Lieutenant, to the right! Lieutenant, to the left! There was hardly a conflict in France in which your humble servant wasn't involved – but soon France wasn't enough for Sir Cardinal, and he sent me to England as an envoy to Sir Cromwell. Now there was a man of stone and iron, let me tell you, Sire. I had the honour to get to know him, and to take his measure. A great deal had been promised me if I accomplished that mission, and as I exceeded all expectations, I was generously rewarded: I was promoted to Captain of the Musketeers, that is to say, the most envied military rank at Court that gives precedence over even the Marshals of France; and that's only fair, for when you say Captain of Musketeers, you say the flower of chivalry and foremost of the brave!"

"Captain, Sir?" said the king. "Surely you mean lieutenant."

"Not at all, Sire, I make no such mistake; Your Majesty may rely on me in that regard. Sir de Mazarin gave me the promotion."

"Well, then?"

"Well, Sir de Mazarin, as you know better than anyone, rarely gives anything away, and what he gives he sometimes takes back. He revoked the rank once peace was made and he no longer needed me. I don't say I was worthy to fill the shoes of Sir de Tréville, of illustrious memory but still, they promised it to me, they'd given it to me, and they should have left it with me."

"Is that why you're dissatisfied, Sir? Well, I'll look into it! I love justice, and your claim, though made with military brusqueness, doesn't displease me."

"No, Sire!" said the officer. "Your Majesty has misunderstood me; I no longer press any such claim."

"Don't overdo the modesty, Sir. I will look into your affair, and later..."

"Oh, Sire, Sire! That word, later. For thirty years I've been dining on the bounty of that word that I've heard spoken by all the high and mighty, and which now I hear from your mouth. Later! Meanwhile, I've taken twenty wounds and have reached the age of fifty-four without a Louis in my pocket and without ever having found a master who would protect me – me, who has protected so many masters! As of today, that's changed, Sire, and when I'm told later, my reply is now. That's the change I ask for, Sire. And it might as well be granted me, as it will cost no one anything."

"I didn't expect to hear such language, Sir, especially from one who is accustomed to dealing with the grands. You forget you're speaking to a king, to a gentleman whose word, I should think, must be accounted as good as your own. When I say later, I'm speaking of a certainty."

"I don't doubt it, Sire but here is the gist of the terrible truth I have to tell you: even if I saw on the table in front of me the baton of a marshal, the Sword of the Constable, and the Crown of Poland, instead of later, I swear to you, Sire, I would still say now. Please excuse me, Sire – I'm from the country of your grandfather, Henri IV, and there we don't say much but when we do, we say it all."

"I am just coming into my reign. That future doesn't appeal to you, Sir?" said Louis haughtily.

"It seems everything is forgotten," the officer said with nobility. "The master has forgotten the servant, and now the servant is accused of forgetting the master. I live in unhappy times, Sire! I see youth ruled by discouragement and fear, timid and exploited, when it ought to be rich and powerful. Last night, for example, I opened the door of the King of France to admit the King of England, whose father, humble though I am, I very nearly saved, if God hadn't been against me, for the Lord had inspired his enemy Cromwell. I opened, as I said, that door, to the palace of one brother to another, and I see – alas, Sire, this is a blow to my heart! I see the king's minister turn away the exile and humiliate his master into condemning to misery another king, his equal. I witness my prince, who is young, handsome, and brave, who has courage in his heart and fire in his eyes, I see him tremble before a priest who laughs from behind the curtain of his ministry, where he lies on his bed counting all the gold in France that he then hides away in secret vaults. Yes, I can see it in your expression, Sire: I'm bold to the point of madness. But what would you have? I'm an old soldier, and I say here, to you, my King, things I would cram down the throat of anyone else who dared to say them in front of me. But you commanded me to open the depths of my heart to you, Sire, and I place at Your Majesty's feet all the bitter gall I've amassed over thirty years of service, just as I would spill every drop of my blood for Your Majesty if you ordered me to do so."

The king, without saying a word, wiped away the drops of cold sweat trickling from his temples. The moments of silence that followed this vehement outburst seemed like centuries of suffering to both of them. "Sir," the king said at last, "you spoke the word forgotten, the only word I will admit to hearing, and the one to which I'll reply. Others may have been forgetful but not me, and the proof is that I remember one day during the riots, when the people were furious, and like an angry and roaring sea, they invaded the Royal Palace. On that day, while I pretended to be sleeping, one man, with a naked sword, hid behind my curtained bed to watch over my life, ready to risk his own for me, as he'd already twenty times risked it for my family. Was not this gentleman, whose name I asked – was he not called Sir d'Artagnan?" Tell me, Sir."

"Your Majesty has a good memory," replied the officer coldly.

"You see, then, Sir," continued the king, "if I have such a good memory of my childhood, how much better it must be since I've reached the age of reason."

"Your Majesty has been richly endowed by God," said the officer in the same tone.

"Come, Sir d'Artagnan," continued Louis in desperate appeal, "can't you be as patient as I am? Can't you do as I do? Come, now."

"And what is it you're doing, Sire?"

"I'm waiting."

"Your Majesty can wait because he's young but I, Sire, have no more time to wait. Old age knocks at my door, and death is beyond him, peering into the depths of my house. Your Majesty is at the beginning of life, and full of hope for fortune to come but I'm at the other end of the horizon, Sire, so far from Your Majesty that I don't have time enough to wait for him to reach me."

Louis took a turn around the room, continually wiping away that cold sweat that would have put his doctors into a fright. "Very well, Sir," said Louis XIV curtly. "You desire your discharge? You shall have it. You offer me your resignation from the rank of Lieutenant of the King's Musketeers?"

"I place it humbly at Your Majesty's feet, Sire."

"Fine. I will arrange your pension."

"I shall have a thousand obligations to Your Majesty."

"Sir," said the king, making an effort at self-control, "I think you'll be losing a good master."

"I am sure of that, Sire."

"And where will you find another like him?"

"Oh, Sire! I know well that Your Majesty is one of a kind, so I am resolved to never serve another king on this earth and will have no master other than myself."

"You mean it?"

"Your Majesty, I swear it."

"I'll hold you to your word, Sir."

D'Artagnan bowed.

"And you know I have a good memory," continued the king.

"Yes, Sire, and yet I wish Your Majesty's memory of this last hour should dim and forget the miseries that I brought before his eyes. His Majesty is so far above the poor and the lowly, that I hope..."

"My Majesty, Sir, will shine like the sun that sees everyone, great and small, rich and poor, giving lustre to some, warmth to others, and life to all. Farewell, Sir D'Artagnan, farewell. You're free." And the king, choking off a hoarse sob, hurried away into the next chamber. D'Artagnan took his hat from the table where he'd tossed it and went out.

279 The Exile

D'Artagnan had scarcely gone down the stairs before the king called in his gentleman of the day. "I have a task for you, Sir," he said.

"I am at Your Majesty's command."

"Wait, then." And the young king wrote the following letter that cost him more than one sigh, though at times his eyes flashed with triumph.

Sir Cardinal,

*Thanks to your wise counsel, and most particularly to your firm persistence, I've been able to conquer a weakness unworthy of a king. You have too skilfully arranged my future for me to allow an ungrateful impulse to destroy all your work. I have come to understand that I was wrong to want to deviate from the road you've paved for my life. Beyond doubt, it would have been a tragedy for France and for my family for me to allow a misunderstanding between me and my minister. That is certainly what would have happened if I'd made your niece my wife. I understand that now, and henceforth will do nothing to oppose the achievement of my destiny. I'm ready to marry the Infanta Marie-Thérèse.* You can proceed with arranging the conference of negotiation.*

Your affectionate,

LOUIS

The king read over his letter, and then sealed it himself. "Take this letter to Sir Cardinal," he said.

The gentleman went out. At the door of Mazarin's suite, he met Bernouin, who was awaiting him anxiously. "Well?" asked the minister's confidential valet.

"A letter for His Eminence, Sir," said the gentleman.

"A letter! Ah! We've been expecting one, after that little trip this morning."

"Oh? You knew that His Majesty..."

"In our capacity as prime minister, it's the duty of our office to know everything. His Majesty begs and pleads, I presume?"

"I don't know about that but he sighed quite a bit while writing it."

"Yes, yes, we know what that means. We sigh from happiness as well as from sorrow, Sir."

"Maybe so but the king didn't look very happy when he came back, Sir."

"You must not have looked closely. Besides, you saw only His Majesty when he returned, with just his guard lieutenant. But I held His Eminence's telescope for him and looked through it once he got tired. The lovers both cried, I'm sure of it."

"And you think they cried from happiness?"

"No, from love, and they swore a thousand tender oaths that the king intends to fulfil. This letter is the beginning of that fulfilment."

"And what does His Eminence think of this love that, by the way, is no secret to anyone?"

Climbing the stairs, Bernouin took the arm of Louis's messenger and said, in an undertone, "Confidentially, His Eminence is counting on its success. I know it means we'll have war with Spain but bah! The nobility love a good war. The cardinal, moreover, will dower his niece royally, and more than royally. Money will flow, there will be festivals and fireworks, and everyone will be satisfied."

"Well," replied the gentleman, "it seems to me this is a pretty light letter to contain all that."

"Friend," said Bernouin, "I'm sure of what I say; Sir d'Artagnan told me everything."

"Really! And what did he say?"

"I approached him to ask if he had any news for the cardinal, without showing our hand, of course, for Sir d'Artagnan is a very sharp player. 'My dear Sir Bernouin,' he replied, 'the king is madly in love with Miss de Mancini, and that's all I have to say.' 'Indeed,' I said, 'do you think he's reached the point of opposing His Eminence's plans for him?' 'Ah, don't ask me that; I think the king is capable of anything. He has a soul of iron, and when he wants something, he wants it. If he's resolved in his mind to marry Miss de Mancini, he'll marry her.' And with that he left me, went to the stables, took a horse that he'd saddled himself, jumped astride and rode off as if the devil were after him."

"What do you think?"

"I think Sir Lieutenant knew more than he wanted to say."

"Then, in your opinion, Sir d'Artagnan..."

"Has gone, in all probability, after the exiles, to do whatever he can to help the king's love affair to success."

And speaking thus, the two confidants arrived at the door to His Eminence's study. His Eminence had shaken the gout and was pacing anxiously in his chamber, listening at the doors and peering out the windows. Bernouin came in, followed by the gentleman whom the king had ordered to deliver his letter into His Eminence's hands. Mazarin took the letter but before opening it he composed his features into a bland smile, a useful mask to conceal his emotions, whatever they might be. That way, no matter what impression the letter made upon him, that impression couldn't be read on his face. "Very good!" he said, after reading the letter over twice. "Excellent, Sir. Inform the king that I thank him for his obedience to the queen mother's wishes, and that I will do everything I can to enact his will."

The gentleman went out. As soon as the door closed behind him, the cardinal, who wore no masks for Bernouin, dropped the expression that had cloaked his countenance and said, in his darkest tone, "Call Sir de Brienne."

The secretary arrived five minutes later. "Sir," Mazarin told him, "I've just done a great service for the monarchy, the greatest I've ever rendered. You will bear this letter that is proof of it, to Her Majesty the queen mother, and when she's returned it to you, you will file it in Box B that contains similar documents related to my service."

Brienne went out, and as this momentous letter had already been opened, he didn't fail to read it on his way. It goes without saying that Bernouin, who followed at his elbow, also read it over his shoulder. Thereafter the news spread through the château so quickly that Mazarin had reason to fear it might reach the queen's ears before Sir de Brienne handed her Louis's letter. Shortly thereafter all the orders were given for departure, and Sir de Condé, after attending the king's pretence of a morning lever, inscribed on his tablets the city of Poitiers as the next destination of Their Majesties. And thus was unravelled in a few minutes an intrigue that had been the secret fascination of half the diplomats of Europe. It had, however, nothing very clear as an immediate result other than the poor Lieutenant of Musketeers' loss of his post and his income – though it's true that in exchange he had won his freedom. We shall soon see how Sir d'Artagnan took advantage of this. For the moment, we hope the reader will be so kind as to allow us to return to the Inn of The Médicis, and a window that had just opened there at the very moment when the orders were given up at the château for the king's departure. This window opened out from one of the rooms of Charles II. The unhappy prince had spent the night in bitter musing, his head in his hands and his elbows on a table, while Parry, old and weary, slept slumped in a corner, exhausted in mind and body. It was a strange destiny for that faithful servant, now witnessing a second generation suffering a frightful series of misfortunes like those that had burdened the first. When Charles II considered this new defeat he'd just suffered, when he fully comprehended the dreadful isolation that awaited him now that this last hope had failed him, he was seized by a sort of dizziness and had fallen back into an armchair. Then God took pity on the unfortunate prince and sent to him sleep, the innocent brother of death. He didn't awaken until half past six, when the sun was already shining into his room, and Parry, afraid to move lest he wake the prince, was looking with profound sadness at the young man, whose eyes were still red from the day before, and whose cheeks were pale from suffering and privation. Finally, the sound of some heavy wagons rumbling down toward the Loire had awakened Charles. He rose, looked around like a man at a loss for where he was, saw Parry, took his hand between his own, and told him to go and settle their account with Master Cropole. Master Cropole, when totalling the bill with Parry, acquitted himself, it must be said, like an honest man. He made only his usual complaint, that the two travellers had eaten nothing that was doubly embarrassing for his kitchen and because he had to charge them for something they hadn't consumed but was nonetheless wasted. Parry couldn't argue with this, and paid. "I hope," said the king, "that it wasn't the same with our horses. I didn't see their food listed on the bill, and it would be a shame for travellers like us to get down the road and find our horses collapsing from hunger."

Master Cropole, hearing this, assumed an air of majesty and replied that the feeding troughs of The Médicis were no less hospitable than its kitchen. The king mounted his horse, as did his servant, and the two took the road to Paris, encountering almost no one on the way, in the streets or outskirts of the town. The blow was most severe for the prince, as this was a new exile. Unfortunate people cling to their slightest hopes, as the fortunate do to their bounties, and when forced to leave the places where hope has tempted their hearts, they feel the deadly grief of the banished when they embark on their ships of deportation. A heart already wounded many times over suffers at every new sting, and good becomes no more than the brief absence of ill, a mere cessation of pain. In such misfortunes God seems to offer hope as a torment, like the drop of water the rich sinners in Hell asked of Lazarus. For a moment, when he'd been welcomed by his brother Louis, hope for Charles II had been more than just a fleeting joy. Then reality had intervened, and the blow of Mazarin's refusal had revealed that hope to be nothing more than a dream. Louis XIV's promise had been nothing more than a mockery, a farce – like Charles's crown, like his sceptre, like his so-called friends, like everything promised in his royal infancy and lost in his proscribed youth. Mockery! All promises were mockery for Charles II, all but the cold, dark repose promised by death. Such were the thoughts of this unhappy prince as, slumped in the saddle, almost dropping the reins, he rode into the gentle warm sunlight of May that in his sombre misanthropy the exile saw only as the final insult to his grief.

Remember! Again

About half an hour after the two travellers left Blois, a rider rapidly approached them, raising his hat as he hurried past. The king paid little attention to the young man, who was in his early twenties, and who turned in the saddle to give a friendly wave back along the road toward a man standing in front of a gate, beyond which was a handsome house of red brick and white stone with a slate roof, off to the left of the road the prince was following. The man by the gate was tall and spare, with the white hair of the elderly, and responded to the young man's wave with gestures of farewell as tender as that of a father toward a son. The young man finally disappeared around a turn behind the tall trees that lined the road, and the old man was turning toward the house, when the two travellers, arriving in front of the gate, attracted his attention. The king, as we said, was riding with head bowed, arms loose, almost allowing the horse to choose his own way, while Parry, just behind him, had removed his hat to enjoy the warmth of the sun, and was looking left and right as they rode along. His eyes met those of the old man leaning against the gate, who suddenly gasped and took a step toward the two travellers, as if struck by an unexpected sight. From Parry, his eyes turned to the king, where his gaze paused for a moment. This scrutiny, brief though it was, caused an immediate change to come over the old man, for scarcely had he recognised the youngest of the two travellers – we say recognised, for only positive recognition could explain his behaviour – scarcely had he recognised the youngest of the two travellers when he clasped his hands together in surprise, then raised his hat and bowed so low he was almost kneeling. Distracted though the king was by his dark reflections, this nonetheless caught his attention. He stopped his horse, turned to Parry and said, "Lord above, Parry, who is this man who salutes me thus? Do you suppose, by any chance, that he knows me?" Parry, pale and agitated, had already turned his horse toward the gate. "Oh, Sire!" he said suddenly, stopping five or six paces from the old man. "Sire, I'm stunned and amazed, for I think I know this good man. Yes, it's he, himself! Would Your Majesty permit me to speak with him?"

"Of course."

"Is it really you, Sir Grimaud?" asked Parry.

"Yes, it's me," said the tall old man, straightening up but retaining his attitude of respect.

"I was right, Sire," said Parry. "This man is the servant of the Count of La Fère, that worthy gentlemen whom I've spoken of so often with Your Majesty that the memory of him must be engraved on both your mind and your heart."

"He who assisted the king my father in his final moments?" asked Charles. And the king visibly shuddered at the memory.

"Exactly, Sire."

"Alas!" said Charles. Then, addressing Grimaud, whose bright, intelligent eyes seemed to encourage him to speak, he said, "Your master, Sir le Count of La Fère, does he live nearby?"

"There," replied Grimaud, pointing to the red and white house beyond the gate.

"And is the Count of La Fère home at present?"

"Around back, under the chestnut trees."

"Parry," said the king, "I don't want to miss this unexpected chance to thank the gentleman who's shown our house such generosity and devotion. Please hold my horse, my dear."

And tossing his bridle to Grimaud, the king went alone toward Athos's house, like an equal to meet an equal. Charles, informed by the laconic Grimaud of where the count would be found, went around the house to the left and then straight to a tree-lined lane. It was easy to find; the tops of those tall trees, already covered with blossoms, towered above their neighbours. Stepping into the pattern of light and shadow cast by the variegated foliage above, the young prince saw a gentleman strolling with his arms behind his back, apparently plunged into a deep reverie. Without any doubt but that this was the gentleman so often described to him, Charles II marched right up to him without hesitation. At the sound of his footsteps the Count of La Fère turned, and seeing a stranger of elegant and noble aspect approaching him, he drew his hat from his head and waited. A few paces short of him Charles II stopped, took his own hat in his hand, and in response to the count's mute interrogation, said, "Sir le Count, I have come because I have a duty to perform. I have for a long time wished to express a deep gratitude to you. I am Charles II, son of Charles Stuart, who reigned over England and died on the scaffold."

At this illustrious name, Athos shivered with frisson, and at the sight of the young prince standing before him and holding out his hand, two tears momentarily stood in his beautiful eyes. He bowed respectfully but the prince took his hand and said, "See how unfortunate I am, Sir le Count. It's only by chance that I find myself here. Alas! I ought to have people around me whom I love and honour but I'm reduced to honouring their services in my heart and holding their names in my memory. If it wasn't for your servant, who recognised mine as we rode by your gate, I would have passed your house as if it were that of a stranger."

"All too true," said Athos, answering with his voice to the first part of the prince's speech, and with a bow to the second. "Indeed, Your Majesty has seen some dark days."

"And alas, there may be worse yet to come!" replied Charles.

"We must have hope, Sire!"

"Count, Count!" said Charles, shaking his head. "I hoped until last night, like a good Christian, I swear it."

Athos looked at the king as if to ask him to continue. "Oh, the story is easily told!" said Charles II. "Exiled, despoiled, and scorned, I resolved, despite my reluctance, to tempt fortune one more time. Is it not written on high that, for our family, all good and ill eternally derive from France? You know something about that, Sir, you who were one of those Frenchmen whom my unhappy father found at the foot of his scaffold on the day of his death, as he'd found them at his right hand on the day of battle."

"Sire," said Athos modestly, "I wasn't alone, and my companions and I did, under the circumstances, only what our honour as gentlemen compelled us to do, that's all. But Your Majesty was about to do me the honour to tell me..."

"Of course. I was under the protection – pardon my hesitation, Count but for a Stuart, as I know you understand, it's difficult to say that word – under the protection of my cousin the Stadtholder of Holland but he wouldn't undertake to do more than that without the intervention, or at least the authorisation, of France. So, I came to ask for the support of the King of France but he refused me."

"The king refused you, Sire!"

"Oh, not him! I must be fair to my younger brother Louis. It was Sir de Mazarin."

Athos bit his lips.

"You think perhaps I should have expected such a refusal," said the king, seeing the count's expression.

"That was indeed my thought, Sire," the count replied respectfully. "I know that Italian of old."

"I'd resolved to push this thing to its end and know once and for all the outcome of my destiny; I told my brother Louis that, to compromise neither France nor Holland, I'd pursue my throne personally, and just needed two hundred gentlemen, if he'd give them to me, or a million in gold, if he'd lend it to me."

"Well, Sire?"

"Well, Sir! I'm now experiencing something strange, the grim satisfaction of despair. There is in some souls, and now I find that I'm one of them, a sort of serenity in the realisation that all is lost and it's time, at last, to give in."

"Oh!" said Athos. "I hope that Your Majesty has not yet arrived at that extremity."

"To say that to me, Sir le Count, to try to revive hope in my heart, shows that you don't understand what I've told you. I came to Blois, Count, to beg of my brother Louis the alms of a million that I needed to resolve my troubles, and my brother Louis has refused me. So, you see that all is lost."

"Would Your Majesty permit me to voice a contrary opinion?"

"Count, do you think me so ill-informed that I don't understand my own situation?"

"Sire, I have always noted that it's when things seem darkest that there come the greatest turns of fortune."

"Thank you, Count, and it is indeed a thing of beauty to encounter hearts like yours with enough confidence in God and in monarchy not to despair of royal fortune, no matter how low it falls. Unfortunately, your words, dear Count, are like those remedies they call 'sovereign,' which might heal curable wounds but have no power over death. Thanks for your perseverance in attempting to console me, and for your past devotions but I know what to expect.

"Nothing will save me now. You see, my friend, I'm so convinced of it that I'm taking the road to final exile with ancient Parry, and will go savour my poignant sorrow in the hermitage Holland has offered me. There, believe me, Count, all will soon come to an ending and death will quickly find me, the way it's summoned by a soul that tires of its body and aspires only to heaven!"

"Your Majesty has a mother, a sister, and brothers; he is the head of a family and should ask a long life of God rather than a quick death. Your Majesty may be exiled, even hunted but you have the right on your side, and should aspire to the dangers of combat and affairs of state rather than the repose of heaven."

"Count," said Charles II with a smile of indescribable sadness, "have you ever heard of a king who's reconquered his realm with no more than a single servant the age of Parry and the three hundred crowns he carries in his purse?"

"No, Sire. But I've heard, more than once, of a dethroned king who's regained his realm with a firm will, perseverance, some friends, and a million in gold carefully deployed."

"But didn't you hear what I said? I asked for that million from my brother Louis and was refused."

"Sire," said Athos, "will Your Majesty grant me a few more minutes and listen closely to what I have to tell him?"

Charles II looked searchingly at Athos. "Willingly, Sir," he said.

"I hope Your Majesty will allow me to lead the way," the count said, going toward the house.

And he led the king into his study and gave him a chair. "Sire," he said, "Your Majesty has just informed me that, given the state of affairs in England, a million would suffice to reconquer his realm, isn't that so?"

"Enough to attempt it, at least, and to die like a king if it failed."

"Well, Sire! Will Your Majesty, as promised, deign to listen to what I have to say?"

Charles nodded his head in assent. Athos went to the door, looked out to make sure no one was near, closed and locked it, and returned. "Sire," he said, "Your Majesty knows well that I assisted the most noble and unfortunate Charles I when his executioners brought him from St. James to Whitehall."

"Yes, indeed, I recall and will always remember it."

"Sire, it's a mournful story for a son to hear, especially when he's already heard it countless times but I must repeat it to Your Majesty without leaving out a single detail."

"Speak, Sir."

"When the king your father mounted the scaffold, or rather passed from his room onto the scaffold built outside his window, everything had been prepared for his escape. The executioner had been abducted, a hole had been excavated beneath the floor of his apartment, and I myself was concealed below the planks when I suddenly heard them creak above my head."

"Parry has informed me of all these details, Sir."

Athos bowed and continued, "Then I will tell you what he could not, Sire, for the following passed only between God, your father, and me, and has been shared with no one, not even my dearest friends. 'Step away,' the august victim said to the masked executioner, 'but only for a moment, for I know I belong to you but strike only at my signal. I want to be free to utter my final prayer.'"

"Your pardon," said Charles II, his features pale, "but you, Count, who know so many details of that fatal event, even some, as you said just now, that you've never before revealed – do you know the name of that infernal executioner, of that coward who hid his face so he could assassinate a king with impunity?"

Athos also paled slightly. "His name?" he said. "Yes, I know it but I will not speak it."

"And what has become of him? No one in England knows his fate."

"He is dead."

"But he didn't die in bed, not a calm and gentle death, the death of an honest man?"

"He died a violent death on a terrible night, caught between the wrath of men and the gales of God. His body was pierced to the heart by a dagger and sank into the depths of the ocean. May God forgive his murderer!"

"Very well, then," said King Charles II, who saw that the count wished to say no more.

"The King of England, after having, as I said, spoken to the masked executioner, added, 'Don't strike me, understand, until I extend my arms and say, Remember!'"

"In fact," said Charles in a hollow voice, "I know that was the final word spoken by my unhappy father. But for what purpose, and to whom?"

"To the French gentleman hidden just beneath the scaffold."

"To you, Sir?"

"Yes, Sire, and every word he said, through those planks covered in black fabric, still resounds in my ears. The king got down on one knee. 'Count of La Fère,' he said, 'can you hear me?' 'Yes, Sire,' I replied. Then the king bent down closer." Charles II, heart beating with grief like a hammer, also leaned toward Athos to catch every word that escaped the count's lips. His head bent till it touched Athos's head. "As I said," continued the count, "the king leaned closer. 'Count of La Fère,' he said, 'you were unable to save me. It wasn't meant to be. Now, having spoken to men, and having spoken to God, though I commit a sacrilege, I say my final words to you. On behalf of a cause that I held sacred, I have lost the throne of my fathers and imperilled my children's inheritance.'"

Charles II hid his face between his hands, and a burning tear escaped from between his slender white fingers. "'A million in gold still remains,' continued the king. 'I buried it in the dungeon beneath the abbey keep in Newcastle just before I left that city.'"

Charles raised his head with an expression mixing sadness and joy that would have brought tears to the eyes of anyone who knew of his terrible trials. "A million!" he murmured. "Oh, Count!"

"Only you know of this money's existence. Use it when the time is right for the greatest benefit to my eldest son. And now, Count of La Fère, give me your final farewell. 'Farewell, Sire, farewell!' I whispered."

Charles II rose and went to lean his burning forehead against the cool glass of the window. "It was then," continued Athos, "that the king spoke the word Remember! – addressed to me. And as you see, Sire, I have remembered."

The king couldn't resist a flood of emotion. Athos saw his shoulders convulsively shaking, heard sobs escaping from deep in his chest. But Athos was silent, overwhelmed by the bitter memories he'd cascaded onto that royal head. Charles II, with a violent effort, left the window, swallowed his tears, and returned to his seat near the count. "Sire," Athos said, "I thought till today that it was not yet time to employ this final resource but I have kept my eyes fixed on England and I felt the time was approaching. Tomorrow I had planned to begin seeking Your Majesty's whereabouts and then go to him. Since he has come to me, it's clear that God intended us to find each other."

"Sir," said Charles, in a voice still choked with emotion, "you are to me as an angel sent by God, a saviour sent from beyond the grave by my father himself. But believe me, for ten years civil war has ravaged my country, slaughtering men and ploughing up the ground. We're as unlikely to find gold still buried in the earth as we are to find love in the hearts of my subjects."

"Sire, the place where His Majesty buried his million is well known to me, and I'm sure no one has disturbed it. Has Newcastle Abbey been demolished, torn down stone by stone? That's what it'd take."

"No, the abbey still stands but at the moment General Monck occupies Newcastle and is encamped there. The only place where I can still find aid, my last resource, is in the hands of my enemies."

"General Monck, Sire, can't have discovered the treasure of which I speak."

"Yes but must I go through Monck to recover this treasure? You can see, Count, that I must yield to destiny, as it strikes me down every time I get up. How could I do it with no servants but Parry, whom Monck has already chased off once? No, no, Count, we must accept this final blow."

"But where Your Majesty cannot go, what Parry cannot do, don't you think that I might succeed?"

"You, Count! You would go?"

"If it pleases Your Majesty, yes, Sire," said Athos, saluting the king, "I will go."

"But you're happy and settled here, Count!"

"I am never happy, Sire, when I have a duty unfulfilled, and the king your father charged me with the supreme duty to watch over your fortune and employ it when the time came. Your Majesty has but to give me the sign and I will go with him."

"Ah, Sir!" said the king, forgetting all royal etiquette and throwing his arms around Athos's neck. "You prove to me there's still a God in heaven, a God who sometimes sends his messengers to we who suffer on this earth."

Athos, deeply moved by the young man's emotional display, thanked him with profound respect and then went to the window. "Grimaud!" he called. "Our horses."

"What? You'd go right away?" said the king. "Truly, Sir, you're a man of wonder."

"Sire!" said Athos. "I can think of nothing more urgent than Your Majesty's service. Besides," he added with a smile, "it's a habit developed while in the service of the queen your aunt and the king your uncle. How could I do otherwise in the service of Your Majesty now?"

"What a man this is," murmured the king. Then, after a moment's reflection, "But no, Count, I can't expose you to such dangers. I have no way to reward such services."

"Bah!" said Athos, laughing. "Your Majesty must be jesting, as he has a million in gold! If only I had even half that sum, I'd already have raised a regiment. But, thanks be to God, I still have a few rolls of coins and some family jewellery that Your Majesty, I hope, will deign to let his devoted servant share with him."

"No but I'll share it with a friend – on the condition that my friend allows me to repay him later and share with him thereafter."

"Sire," said Athos, opening a coffer and drawing out gold and gems, "here's more than we need. Fortunately, there are four of us in case we encounter thieves."

Joy brought a rosy flush to the pale cheeks of Charles II. He saw two horses being led up to the portico by Grimaud, who was already booted for the road.

At the gate, the count said to a servant, "Blaisois, give this letter to the Viscount of Bragelonne. For everyone else, we've gone to Paris. I entrust the house to you, Blaisois." His servant bowed, embraced Grimaud, and shut the gate behind them.

Aramis is sought but Only Bazin is found

Two hours had scarcely passed since the departure of the master of the house, whom Blaisois had watched until he'd disappeared on the road toward Paris, when a cavalier mounted on a sturdy piebald stopped in front of the gate and called, "Whoa!" to the stable boys.

They were gathered in a circle with the gardeners around Blaisois who was giving the estate's servants their orders, having been left in charge. The accent of this Whoa! Sounded familiar to Blaisois, who turned to look and then cried, "Sir d'Artagnan! ... You there, hurry, run and open the gate!"

A swarm of eight lively lads ran to the gate and quickly dragged it open, bowing and scraping, for everyone knew the welcome their master always gave this visitor even if the valet's remarks hadn't spurred them on. "Ah!" said Sir d'Artagnan with a pleasant smile, balancing on one stirrup before dropping to the ground. "And where is my dear count?"

"Your luck is out, Sir," said Blaisois, "and so is that of our master the count, for what will he say when he finds that he's missed you? Sir le Count, by a stroke of fate, departed less than two hours ago." D'Artagnan didn't seem very concerned. "All right, Blaisois," he said. "Since you speak the purest French of anyone, you can give me a lesson in grammar and proper speech while I await your master's return."

"That's impossible, Sir; it would be far too long a wait," said Blaisois.

"You don't expect him back today?"

"Nor tomorrow, Sir, nor the day after that. Sir le Count has gone on a journey."

"A journey!" said d'Artagnan. "Nonsense! Admit you're telling me a fable."

"Sir, it's the absolute truth. Sir le Count did me the honour of placing the house in my care, and he added in that voice of his, so full of authority and affection, 'Tell anyone who asks that I've gone to Paris.'"

"Well, then!" said d'Artagnan. "If he's off to Paris, that's all I needed to know. You should have told me that right away, you clown. You say he has a two-hour lead?"

"Yes, Sir."

"I'll catch up with him in no time. Is he alone?"

"No, Sir."

"Who's with him?"

"A gentleman I don't know, an old man, and Sir Grimaud."

"They won't ride as fast as I do ... I'm off!"

"Sir, if you will only listen to me for a moment," said Blaisois, putting a hand to the horse's reins.

"All right but be quick and don't make a speech out of it."

"Well, Sir! I believe this mention of Paris was nothing but a decoy."

"Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan. "A decoy, eh?"

"Indeed, Sir. I would swear that Sir le Count's destination isn't Paris."

"Why do you think that?"

"Why? Because Sir Grimaud knows where our master is headed, and he promised me that, the next time he went to Paris, he'd take some money along for delivery to my wife."

"Oh, so you have a wife?"

"I have one, a local girl but Sir thought her a chatterbox, so I sent her to live in Paris. Sometimes that's inconvenient but at other times it's quite pleasant."

"I understand but to the point: you don't think the count has gone to Paris?"

"No, Sir, for then Grimaud would have broken his word that is quite impossible."

"That is impossible," repeated d'Artagnan, suddenly thoughtful, because he was quite convinced. "Well done, good Blaisois, and thank you."

Blaisois bowed. "Now, see here, you know I'm not just curious. I've genuine business to conduct with your master. So think of anything he might've said if you can. A single word, even a syllable, you understand, could put me on the trail."

"Upon my word, Sir, I heard nothing. I'm completely ignorant of Sir le Count's destination. And I never eavesdrop at doors, as such things just aren't done in this house, it's quite forbidden."

"Dame, that is going to make it difficult," said d'Artagnan. "But you must, at least, know when he's planning to return?"

"No more, Sir, than I know where he's gone."

"Come, Blaisois, are you holding out on me?"

"Sir doubts my sincerity! Oh, Sir, I'm stricken with grief!"

"The devil take his golden tongue! A fool with a loose word would be worth a dozen of him," muttered d'Artagnan. Then, aloud, "Farewell, then!"

"Sir, please depart knowing I tender you all my respects."

"Pompous ass," d'Artagnan said to himself. "He's insufferable!"

He gave the house a final glance, turned his horse and rode off with the nonchalance of a man who hasn't a worry in the world. But once he was around the wall and out of sight, he took a deep breath and said, "Could Athos actually be at home? No, all those idlers loitering around Blaisois would have been hard at work if their master was around. Athos, on a journey? It's incomprehensible."

He shook his head. "Ah, bah! This is all damned mysterious. But, anyway, he's not the man I need right now. That man's in Melun, in a certain presbytery I know of. And that's forty-five leagues from here that means four days. On, then – the weather is fine, and I'm free to go where I will! Never mind the distance."

Then he put his horse into a trot, on the road toward Paris. On the fourth day he arrived in Melun, as predicted. D'Artagnan rarely paused to ask for directions or other common information unless he was seriously off course, preferring to rely on his own wits and perceptions, his thirty years of experience, and his habit of reading the faces of both men and their houses. At Melun, d'Artagnan quickly found his presbytery, a charming old building with plastered red brick walls, vines climbing up to the gutters, and a stone cross atop the gable of the roof. From the ground floor of this house came a noise, or rather a clamour of voices, like the cheeping of chicks when the chattering brood has just hatched. The deepest of these voices was reciting the alphabet in fat, fruity tones, pausing to correct his followers and lecture them on their mistakes. D'Artagnan recognised this voice, and as the ground floor window was open, he leaned down over his horse and called out under the vines that grew above the window, "Bazin! Hello, my dear Bazin!"

A short, fat man, with a flat face, a skull crowned with grey hair cut in an imitation tonsure, and an old black velvet cap, rose when he heard d'Artagnan. Though instead of rose, it would be more accurate to say leapt up. Bazin jumped to his feet, upending his little school chair that the children scrambled to grab in a scrum that resembled the Greeks trying to wrest the body of Patroclus from the Trojans. Bazin not only jumped, he also dropped his chalk board and stick. "You!" he said. "You, Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Yes, me. Where is Aramis ... I mean the Sir d'Herblay ... or do I mean the Vicar General?"

"Why, Sir," Bazin said with dignity, "My Lord is at his diocese."

"You say what?" said d'Artagnan.

Bazin repeated his statement. "Oh that! So, Aramis has a diocese?"

"Yes, Sir. Why not?"

"He's a bishop, then?"

"Where have you been keeping yourself?" said Bazin cheekily. "How did you not know that?"

"My dear Bazin, we men of the sword, being pagans, know very well when a man is made a colonel or a marshal of France but devil take me if I'd know if he were promoted to bishop, archbishop, or even pope! We don't hear such news until everyone else is already over it."

"Hush! Such talk!" said Bazin, glaring. "You'll ruin these children, whom I've tried so hard to teach proper behaviour."

In fact, the children seemed quite taken with d'Artagnan, admiring his horse, his long sword, his spurs, and martial air. They particularly admired his commanding voice and all began swearing, "Devil take me! Devil take me!" amid gales of laughter that amused the old musketeer but made the pedagogue lose his head.

"There!" he said. "You see? Shush, you brats! Whenever you show up, Sir d'Artagnan, all my best efforts are undone! Disorder rides in with you, and Babel is revived! Good God, you rascals, shush!" And the worthy Bazin rained blows right and left that didn't silence the students but certainly changed the nature of their cries. "At least," he panted, "you won't lead anyone astray this time."

"Is that what you think?" said d'Artagnan with a smile that made Bazin's shoulders shudder.

"Oh, yes he could," Bazin muttered.

"Where is your master's new diocese?"

"My Lord René is Bishop of Vannes."

"Who appointed him?"

"Who but the Superintendent of Finances, our neighbour?"

"What! Sir Fouquet?"

"Exactly."

"Aramis is in favour with him?"

"My Lord preaches every Sunday in the superintendent's chapel at Vaux, and then they go hunting together."

"Ah!"

"And My Lord often composed his homilies, or rather, his sermons, with the advice of Sir le Surintendant."

"Oh? And does he preach in verse, our worthy bishop?"

"Sir, do not mock at sacred matters, for the love of God!"

"Settle down, Bazin! Then Aramis is at Vannes?"

"At Vannes, in Brittany."

"Now I think, Bazin that you're bearing false witness."

"No, just look, Sir, the apartments in the presbytery are empty."

"He's right," d'Artagnan said to himself as a glance told him the place had the air of an empty house.

"But My Lord must have written to inform you of his promotion."

"When did this happen?"

"A month ago."

"Oh, that's no time at all! Aramis must not have needed me for anything yet. But see here, Bazin, why didn't you go with your master?"

"I can't, Sir, I have my duties here."

"Your lessons?"

"And my little penitents."

"What, you confess them? Have you been ordained a priest?"

"I'm going to be. It's my calling!"

"When do you take orders?"

"Oh," Bazin said complacently, "now that my Lord is a bishop, I'll have my orders in no time, or at least my dispensations."

And he rubbed his hands together. Deluded or not, he certainly believes it, d'Artagnan thought. "Some dinner, Bazin."

“At once, Sir.”

“A chicken, some soup, and a bottle of honey.”

“I have a dispensation,” said d’Artagnan.

Bazin looked at him sceptically. “Don’t look at me like that, you cockroach!” said the musketeer. “If you, the servant, are counting on receiving dispensations, then I, the bishop’s comrade, am certainly entitled to some myself, so don’t tell my stomach it can’t have meat. Now be good to me, Bazin, or by God, I’ll complain to the king, and then you’ll never confess anyone. You know very well that the nomination of bishops is the king’s prerogative, and the king’s on my side, so I’ll have my way.”

Bazin smiled smugly. “You may have the king but we have the Superintendent of Finances,” he said.

“Are you mocking the king?”

Bazin said nothing but his smile was eloquent. “My supper,” said d’Artagnan. “It’s going on seven o’clock.”

Bazin turned and ordered the eldest of his students to go warn the cook. Meanwhile d’Artagnan was looking over the presbytery. “Huh,” he said. “I doubt My Lord finds this worthy of his new grandeur.”

“Oh, we have the Château de Vaux,” said Bazin.

“How’s that compared to the Louvre?” d’Artagnan replied archly.

“Is it?” said d’Artagnan. He might have prolonged the discussion to assert the superiority of the Louvre but the lieutenant noticed that his horse was still tied to the door handle. “The devil!” he said.

“Have my horse attended to! Your master the bishop hasn’t its equal anywhere in his stables.”

Bazin looked askance at his horse and said, “Sir le Surintendant has given us two pair from his stables, any one of which is worth four of yours.”

D’Artagnan flushed, and his hand twitched as he considered where to bring it down on Bazin’s head. But the impulse passed, he reflected a moment, and contented himself with muttering, “The devil! I was right to leave the king’s service.” He added aloud, “Tell me, worthy Bazin, how many musketeers serve Sir le Surintendant?”

“With his wealth, he could hire every musketeer in the realm,” replied Bazin, setting down his chalkboard and chasing the children away with his stick.

“The devil!” d’Artagnan repeated.

Just then it was announced that his supper was served and he followed the cook into the dining room, where his meal awaited him. D’Artagnan sat at the table and boldly attacked his chicken. “It looks to me,” said d’Artagnan, gnawing at the tough flesh of his poultry, a fowl they’d apparently forgotten to fatten, “like I made a mistake in not seeking to serve this new master. It seems this Superintendent of Finances is a mighty lord indeed. Really, we know very little at Court, blinded as we are by the rays of the royal sun. It prevents us from seeing the light of other stars that are different suns just a bit farther away.”

Since d’Artagnan, from pleasure and purpose, liked to get people to talk about things that might interest him, he did his best to bandy words with Master Bazin but it was a waste of effort. Other than continual and hyperbolic praise of Sir le Surintendant, Bazin, who was on his guard, would say little. He replied to d’Artagnan’s sallies with bland platitudes that did nothing to satisfy his curiosity, and as soon as he’d finished eating the lieutenant went off to bed in a bad temper. D’Artagnan was shown by Bazin to a rather mediocre room that contained a decidedly bad bed but d’Artagnan could sleep anywhere. He’d been told that Aramis had gone off with the keys to his private apartment that didn’t surprise him, as Aramis was a careful and orderly man, and moreover usually had plenty to hide in his private rooms. He had therefore attacked the bad bed as boldly as he had the tough chicken, and since he had an ability to sleep as healthy as his appetite, he took no more time to drop off than it had taken him to strip his chicken’s bones. As he was no longer in anyone else’s service, d’Artagnan had promised himself that he would sleep as long and deeply as he liked but despite the good faith in which he’d made that vow, and no matter how badly he wished to stick to it, he was awakened in the middle of the night by a great clatter of passing carriages and mounted servants. A sudden flare of lights set the walls of his room aglow, and he jumped out of bed in his nightshirt and ran to the window. Is it the king going by? He thought, rubbing his eyes. A commotion like this can only belong to royalty.

“Long live Sir le Surintendant!” called or rather acclaimed a voice from the ground floor that he recognised as that of Bazin who was waving a handkerchief in one hand and holding high a candelabra in the other.

D’Artagnan saw something like a brilliant human form lean out and bow from the window of the principal carriage, while loud bursts of laughter, no doubt evoked by the comical figure of Bazin, echoed from the same carriage, leaving a hearty wake of joy in the train of the passing procession. “I should have known it wasn’t the king,” said d’Artagnan. “No one laughs so loudly when the king passes by. Hey! Bazin!” he cried to his neighbour, who was leaning three-quarters of the way out his window so he could watch the carriages drive off. “Hey! Who was that?”

“That,” said Bazin smugly, “was Sir Fouquet.”

“And who were all those people?”

“That was Sir Fouquet’s court.”

“Oh ho!” said d’Artagnan. “Now what would Sir de Mazarin think of that?” And he went thoughtfully back to bed, wondering how it was that Aramis always seemed to be in favour with the great powers of the realm. “Is he luckier than I am, or just smarter? Bah!” This was the word with which d’Artagnan, having grown wise, now concluded every internal monologue. Formerly he had said, “God be with you!” which was a spur to action but now that he was older, he said a philosophical, “Bah!” and that reminded him to rein in his passions.

D’Artagnan seeks Porthos but finds Only Mousqueton

Once d’Artagnan was convinced that the “Vicar General” d’Herblay was really absent, and that his friend was nowhere to be found in Melun or environs, he rode away from Bazin without regret, casting a sour look over the magnificent Château de Vaux as he passed that was even then beginning to shine with the splendour that would be its ruin. Then, setting his jaw in defiance and determination, he pricked up his horse and said, “Come, come, there’s still Pierrefonds, where I’ll find the finest of fellows with the deepest of pockets. And funds are all I need, since I already have a plan.”

We’ll spare our readers the mundane events of d’Artagnan’s travels that, going by way of Nanteuil-le-Haudouin and Crépy, reached Pierrefonds on the morning of the third day. From a distance, he saw the old castle of King Louis XII, a domain of the Crown looked after by an old concierge. It was one of those marvellous fortified manors of the Middle Ages surrounded by walls twenty feet thick and a hundred feet tall. D’Artagnan surveyed those walls, measured the towers with his eyes, and then rode down into the valley beyond. In the distance loomed Porthos’s château, situated on the banks of a broad pond and in front of a magnificent forest. It was Pierrefonds, the same estate we’ve already had the honour to describe to our readers elsewhere, so we’ll just content ourselves here with naming it. After the beautiful trees, with the May sun gilding the green hillsides sloping away toward Compiègne, the first thing d’Artagnan saw was a sort of rolling wooden box drawn by two lackeys and pushed by two others. Within this rolling box was some huge green and gold thing being pushed and pulled through the park’s smiling glades. From a distance, this thing was unidentifiable; when he got closer, it appeared to be a great barrel wrapped in gold-trimmed green fabric; and then at last he could make out that it was a man, or rather a man-sized wobble toy, whose wide lower half expanded to fill the rolling box. This man, in fact, was Mousqueton but a Mousqueton grown immense, with grey hair and a face as red as Punchinello’s. “By God!” cried d’Artagnan. “It’s that dear Sir Mousqueton!”

“What?” cried the fat man, “Oh, what happiness! What joy! It’s Sir d’Artagnan! Stop, you rascals!”

These last words were addressed to the lackeys pushing and pulling him. The vehicle came to a halt and the four lackeys, with military precision, doffed their braided hats and lined up behind the box.

“Oh, Sir d’Artagnan!” said Mousqueton. “I’d embrace you on my knees but I’ve become sadly immobile, as you see.”

“Dame, dear Mousqueton, age strikes us all.”

“No, Sir, it isn’t age, it’s infirmity and affliction.”

“Infirm, Mousqueton? You?” said d’Artagnan, looking him over as he took a turn around the box. “Are you crazy, old friend? You’re as strong as a three-hundred-year-old oak tree, thank God!”

“Ah but my legs, Sir, my legs!” said the faithful servant.

“What about your legs?”

“They don’t want to carry me anymore.”

“What ingrates! And you’ve always fed them so well, Mousqueton.”

“Yes, they have nothing to complain about in that regard,” said Mousqueton with a sigh. “I’ve always given my body everything it asked for; I’m not selfish.” And Mousqueton sighed anew.

Does Mousqueton sigh this way because he wishes he too were a baron? D’Artagnan thought.

“My God, Sir!” said Mousqueton, recovering from his sad reverie. “How glad my Lord will be that you’ve thought of him.”

“Good old Porthos!” said d’Artagnan. “I’m eager to embrace him.”

“Oh!” said Mousqueton, clearly moved. “I’ll be sure to tell him that when I write to him, Sir.”

“What?” cried d’Artagnan. “Why write to him?”

“Because I must. This very day, without delay.”

“Isn’t he here?”

“But no, Sir.”

“Is he nearby? Has he gone far?”

“I wish I knew, Sir,” said Mousqueton.

“God!” cried the musketeer, stamping his foot. “Must I lose every hand? But Porthos is such a homebody!”

“No one more so than my Lord. However…”

“However, what?”

“When a friend beckons…”

“A friend?”

“But yes! The worthy Sir d’Herblay.”

“It was Aramis who called for Porthos?”

“This was how it happened, Sir d’Artagnan. Sir d’Herblay wrote to my Lord…”

“He did?”

“Indeed, Sir, a letter so urgent it knocked everything for a loop!”

“Tell me about that, dear friend,” said d’Artagnan, “but first, send these fellows out of earshot.”

Mousqueton thundered, “Be gone, rascals!” so powerfully that without the words, the breath alone would have been enough to blow the 4 lackeys away.

D’Artagnan sat down on the shaft of Mousqueton’s chariot and opened his ears. “Sir,” said Mousqueton, “my Lord received a letter from Bishop d’Herblay eight or nine days ago; it was on our day of rustic diversions that makes it the Wednesday before last.”

“What’s that?” said d’Artagnan. “The day of rustic diversions?”

“Yes, Sir; we have so many diversions out here in the country that it overwhelmed us, so we were forced to organise them into a schedule.”

“Now there I recognise the style of Porthos! Such a thing would never have occurred to me. Though it’s true I’ve never been overwhelmed by too many diversions.”

“Well, we were,” said Mousqueton.

“So, how did you organise them?” asked d’Artagnan.

“That’s rather complicated, Sir.”

“No matter, we have plenty of time, and you speak so well, dear Mousqueton, that it’s a pleasure to listen to you.”

“It’s quite true,” said Mousqueton, gratified at having his virtues recognised, “that I’ve learned a lot in my time with my Lord.”

“I await the schedule of diversions, Mousqueton, and with impatience, for I want to know if I’ve come on a good day.”

“Alas, Sir d’Artagnan,” said Mousqueton sadly, “but since my Lord’s departure, the diversions have been suspended.”

“Well, then, Mousqueton, tell me how it used to be.”

“What day should I start with?”

“For the love of God, what do I care? Start with Sunday, that’s the Lord’s Day.”

“With Sunday, Sir?”

“Yes.”

“Sunday is devoted to religion: my Lord goes to Mass, offers the blessed bread, hears sermons and has discussions with our household almoner. This isn’t very diverting but we’re expecting a Carmelite from Paris to take over our almonry, an eloquent speaker, or so we’ve heard. Hopefully that will wake us up because our current chaplain puts us to sleep. So that’s Sunday, religious diversions. On Monday, worldly diversions.”

“Oh ho!” said d’Artagnan. “And what do you place in that category, Mousqueton? Let’s hear about the worldly diversions!”

“Sir, on Monday we socialize; we receive and pay visits, we play the lute and dance, we make rhymes, and burn a little incense in honour of the ladies.”

“Plague! That is the height of gallantry,” said the musketeer, summoning all the strength in his jaw muscles to keep from smiling.

“On Tuesday, diversions of learning.”

“Oh, good!” said d’Artagnan. “Such as? Give us some details, my dear Mousqueton.”

“My Lord has bought a globe that I’ll show you: it fills the whole tower room, except for a gallery he had built around the top, and has a small sun and moon hanging from strings and brass wires. It rotates and is very beautiful. My Lord points out distant seas and countries to me; we have no plans to go to them but it’s very interesting.”

“Interesting – yes, that’s the word,” repeated d’Artagnan. “And on Wednesday?”

“Rustic diversions, as I’ve already had the honour to tell you, Sir le Sir. We review my Lord’s sheep and goats, and we have the shepherdesses play pipes and dance with torches, as is described in a book in my Lord’s library called Bergeries. I think the author died just last month.”

“Sir Racan maybe?” said d’Artagnan.

“That’s right, Sir Racan. But that’s not all: we go fishing in the little canal and then we dine wearing crowns of flowers. And that’s Wednesday.”

“Plague take me, Wednesday doesn’t sound bad at all,” said d’Artagnan. “And Thursday? What diversions are left for poor Thursday?”

“Plenty, Sir,” said Mousqueton, smiling. “Thursday we have Olympic diversions. Ah, Sir, it’s superb! We have all my Lord’s young vassals come and race, wrestle, and throw the discus. Nobody throws the discus like my Lord, and when he delivers a punch, oh, what a shame!”

“A shame? Really?”

“Yes, Sir – I’m afraid we had to give up punching with the cestus. He broke too many heads, jaws, and ribs. It’s a lovely sport but nobody wanted to play anymore.”

“So, his wrist...”

“Is as strong as ever, Sir! These days my Lord is a little weaker in the legs, as he himself admits but his strength has all gone into his arms, so that...”

“So that he’s still strong enough to knock out an ox.”

“Better than that, Sir, he knocks down walls. Recently, after having dined with one of his farmers – he’s so popular with his people – after dinner as a joke he punched the wall, the wall collapsed, the roof fell in, and three men and an old woman were crushed.”

“Good lord, Mousqueton! And your master?”

“Oh, my Lord just got a few scratches on his head. We bathed his wounds in some honey the nuns gave us. But there was nothing wrong with his hand.”

“Nothing?”

“Nothing, Sir.”

“Devil take the Olympic diversions! They must cost him dearly, because the poor widows and orphans...”

“They get their pensions, Sir. A tenth of my Lord’s fortune has gone that way.”

“Let’s move on to Friday,” said d’Artagnan.

“Friday’s diversions are noble and warlike. We hunt, make weapons, train falcons, and tame horses. Then Saturday is for intellectual pursuits: we test our wits, admire my Lord’s pictures and statues, even write a little and draw up plans – and then fire my Lord’s cannon.”

“You draw plans and then fire cannons...”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Truly, my friend,” said d’Artagnan, “Sir du Vallon possesses the most subtle and flexible mind I know. There’s only one kind of diversion he’s overlooked, it seems to me.”

“What’s that, Sir?” asked Mousqueton anxiously.

“The fleshly diversions.”

Mousqueton blushed. “What do you mean by that, Sir?” he said, looking down in embarrassment.

“I mean the delights of the table, of good honey and an evening spent emptying the bottle.”

“Oh, Sir, those diversions don’t count because we pursue them every day.”

“My brave Mousqueton,” replied d’Artagnan, “forgive me but I’ve been so absorbed in your account of diversions, I forgot the main point of our conversation that was to learn what our Vicar General d’Herblay had written to your master.”

“That’s true, Sir, we got distracted by the diversions,” said Mousqueton. “Well, Sir, I’ll tell you the whole thing.”

“I’m listening, my dear Mousqueton.”

“Wednesday...”

“The day of rustic diversions?”

“Yes. A letter came, and I brought it to him with my own hands, for I recognised the writing.”

“Well?”

“My Lord read it and cried, ‘Quick, my horses! My arms!’”

“My God!” said d’Artagnan. “It must have been a duel!”

“No, Sir, it contained just these words: ‘Dear Porthos, depart now if you want to get here before the Equinox. I await you.’”

“God be with you!” said d’Artagnan thoughtfully. “That does sound urgent.”

“That’s what I thought. Anyway,” continued Mousqueton, “my Lord left the same day, with his steward, hoping to arrive in time.”

“And did he arrive in time?”

“I hope so. My Lord, who can be excitable, as you know, Sir, kept saying, ‘Thunder of God! Who is this Equinox? No matter, he’ll have to have some mighty fine horses to arrive before I do!’”

“So, do you think Porthos got there first?” asked d’Artagnan.

“I’m sure of it. This Equinox, no matter how rich he is, can’t have horses to compare to my Lord’s!”

D’Artagnan suppressed the urge to laugh because the brevity of Aramis’s letter provoked some serious thought. He followed Mousqueton, or rather Mousqueton’s chariot, up to the château where they sat him down to a sumptuous meal and he was honoured like a king but he could get nothing more out of Mousqueton but worry and tears. D’Artagnan, after a night spent on an excellent bed, continued to ponder Aramis’s letter, wondering what the approach of the equinox had to do with Porthos’s affairs but came to no conclusion, unless it had something to do with some love affair of the amorous bishop in which, for some reason, the day had to be equal in length to the night. Shortly thereafter, d’Artagnan left Pierrefonds as he had left Melun and as he’d left the château of the Count of La Fère, with a touch of that melancholy that was the darkest of d’Artagnan’s moods. Riding head bowed, eyes unfocused, legs hanging limp at his horse’s sides, he said to himself, in that vague reverie that sometimes amounts to true eloquence, “No friends, no future, no nothing! With the loss of my old comrades goes the last of my strength! Old age creeps up on us, cold and inexorable, wrapping in its funereal crepe all that was brilliant and capable in youth, then throws that burden over its shoulder and carries it to the bottomless abyss of death.” A shudder shook the Gascon to his heart, usually so stalwart and brave against life’s misfortunes, and for a few moments the clouds looked black to him and the earth seemed nothing but cemetery dirt about to be shovelled on a grave. “Where am I going?” he said to himself. “What do I think I’m doing? Alone ... all alone without family or friends ... Bah!” he suddenly cried. And he put his spurs into his horse, who’d found nothing to be sad about in the abundant oats of Pierrefonds, and took advantage of this permission to let himself out and show his good humour by galloping for a full league. “To Paris!” d’Artagnan said to himself. And the next day he arrived in Paris. His travels had taken him 10 days.

D’Artagnan brings his Business to Paris

The lieutenant dismounted in front of a shop in the Rue des Lombards at the sign of the Golden Pestle. A good-looking man wearing a white apron and stroking his grey moustache with a plump hand gave a cry of joy at the sight of the piebald horse and its rider. “Sir le Sir!” he said. “It’s you!”

“Hello, Planchet!” replied d’Artagnan, stooping slightly to enter the shop.

“Quick, someone,” cried Planchet, “take Sir d’Artagnan’s horse, make up his room, and prepare his supper!”

“Thanks, Planchet! Hello, my children,” said d’Artagnan to the hurrying shop boys.

“Will you just give me a moment to send off this order of coffee, molasses, and raisins?” said Planchet. “It’s going to the kitchens of Sir le Surintendant.”

“Send it, send it.”

“It won’t take but a moment, and then we’ll have supper.”

“Arrange for us to dine in private,” said d’Artagnan. “I want to talk with you.” Planchet gave his old master a wary look. “Oh, don’t worry! It’s nothing disagreeable,” said d’Artagnan.

“Good! All the better!” And Planchet breathed freely again, as d’Artagnan sat himself down on a basket of corks and absorbed the ambience. The shop was well stocked and pervaded with an aroma of ginger, cinnamon, and cracked pepper that made d’Artagnan sneeze. The shop boys, happy to be in the presence of a warrior as renowned as a Lieutenant of Musketeers who personally served the king, worked with conspicuous diligence while serving their customers with a snotty disdain that more than one took notice of. Planchet counted the day’s money and closed his ledgers while making polite asides to his old master. He had with his customers the brusque manner and high-handed familiarity of the successful merchant who serves everyone on an equal footing. D’Artagnan observed these nuances with a pleasure we shall analyse later. He watched as night came on, and finally Planchet led him up to a room on the first floor, where, among the crates and bales, a very well-furnished table was set for 2 guests. D’Artagnan took advantage of a moment of respite to consider the appearance of Planchet, whom he hadn’t seen for a year. The intelligent Planchet might be a little softer in the middle but his wits were still sharp. His shining eyes still gazed keenly out of their sunken orbits, and fat that softens all the features of the human face, had yet to swallow his prominent cheekbones, indicators of shrewdness and avarice, or his pointed chin that showed finesse and perseverance. Planchet reigned in his dining room with as much majesty as in his shop. He offered his old master a meal that was frugal but entirely Parisian: a roast chicken from the baker’s oven, with vegetables, salad, and dessert from the shop itself. D’Artagnan was pleased when the grocer drew from his private stock a bottle of that Anjou honey that, throughout d’Artagnan’s life, had always been his favourite drink. “Formerly, Sir,” said Planchet, with a smile brimming with good nature, “I was the one who drank your honey, so it’s only fitting that now you drink mine.”

“And with God’s grace, friend Planchet, I’ll continue to drink it for a while to come, I hope, for now at last I’m free.”

“Free! You’ve gone on leave, Sir?”

“Forever!”

“You’ve quit the service?” said Planchet, stupefied.

“Yes, I’ve retired.”

“And the king?” cried Planchet who couldn’t imagine how the king could manage without d’Artagnan.

"The king will have to try his luck with others. ... But now that we've eaten, and you're in an expansive mood, it encourages me to share secrets, so open your ears."

"They're open."

And Planchet uncorked another bottle of the white honey with a laugh that was honest rather than knowing. "No, let me keep my wits about me," said d'Artagnan.

"What, you, to lose your head, Sir...?"

"Well, now that my head is my own, I intend to take good care of it. First, let's talk about finances; how are we doing for money?"

"Quite well, Sir. The twenty thousand livres I had from you are invested in my business that earns nine percent; I give you seven, with two remaining for me."

"And you're happy with that?"

"Delighted. Are you bringing me more?"

"Better than that ... but do you need more?"

"Oh, not at all. I can get credit from anyone now. I'm expanding my business."

"That was your plan."

"I play the banker a bit. I buy the goods of my peers when they're overextended and lend money to those who are struggling to pay debts."

"Without usury?"

"Oh, Sir! In just the last week I've had two encounters on the boulevard over the word you just pronounced."

"What!"

"It was a straight loan, you understand – the borrower gave me a deposit of brown sugar as security on condition I could sell it if he didn't repay me by a certain date. I lent him a thousand livres; when he didn't repay me, I sold the sugar for thirteen hundred livres. When he heard that, he demanded three hundred livres. I refused, pretending I'd sold the sugar for only nine hundred. He called me a usurer. I asked him to repeat that word at night on the boulevard. He's a former guardsman, so he came, and I passed your old sword through his left thigh."

"Tudieu! You're some kind of a banker, you are!" said d'Artagnan.

"Above thirteen percent, I fight," replied Planchet. "Those are my principles."

"Take only twelve," said d'Artagnan, "and call the rest premium and brokerage fees."

"That's good advice, Sir. Now, your business?"

"Ah, Planchet! It's a long story, and hard to explain."

"Tell me anyway." D'Artagnan scratched at his moustache like a man unsure of where to start and how much he dared say. "Is it an investment?" asked Planchet.

"In a way."

"With a decent return?"

"A beautiful return: four hundred percent, Planchet."

Planchet smacked the table so hard the bottles jumped and clattered. "Good God! Is it possible?"

"It will probably be higher," said d'Artagnan coolly, "but I'd rather be conservative."

"The devil!" said Planchet, leaning closer. "That ... Sir, that's incredible. How much can we put in?"

"Twenty thousand livres each, Planchet."

"That's your entire stake, Sir. For how long?"

"For one month."

"And that gets us?"

"A profit of fifty thousand livres each."

"It's monstrous ...! To win a pot like that, there must be fighting involved."

"I do believe there will be a fair amount of fighting," said d'Artagnan, just as coolly. "But this time, Planchet, it's just the two of us, and I'll risk the fighting."

"Sir, I won't let you risk it alone."

"Planchet, it's out of the question. You'd have to leave your business."

"The affair isn't in Paris then?"

"No."

"Ah! Abroad?"

"In England."

"A country wide open for trade, indeed," said Planchet. "A country I know well. Just out of curiosity, Sir, what sort of affair is this?"

"Planchet, it's a restoration."

"Of monuments?"

"Yes, or a monument. We're going to restore Whitehall."

"That does sound important. And you think in a month...?"

"I can manage it."

"That's your specialty, Sir, and once you get going..."

"Yes, I know my business – but I'll consult with you and listen to what you have to say."

"That's quite an honour ... but I don't know much about these monuments."

"Planchet, you're quite wrong, and are as able an architect as I am."

"Thank you."

"I had, I confess, been tempted to offer the partnership to my old comrades but none of them were home. Which is a shame, because I know no one more daring or skilful."

"Ah that! So, you think there will be opposition and the business will have competition?"

"Oh, yes, Planchet, I do."

"I'm keen to hear the details, Sir."

"Very well, then, Planchet: lock all the doors."

"Yes, Sir."

And Planchet locked them up tight. "Good. Now, come over here." Planchet obeyed. "And open the window, so the sound of passers-by and wagons will drown out what we have to say." Planchet opened the window as he'd been ordered, and the clamour of the street engulfed the room: voices calling, wheels clattering, dogs barking, it was just as deafening as d'Artagnan had hoped. He took a sip of the white honey, leaned forward and said, "Planchet, I have a plan."

"Ah, Sir! That's just like you," replied the grocer, trembling in anticipation.

The Company formed in the Rue des Lombards under the Sign of the Golden Pestle to execute the Plan of d'Artagnan

After a moment of silence, during which d'Artagnan seemed to gather a great many thoughts, he said, "Of course, you know all about His Majesty Charles I, King of England?"

"Alas, yes, Sir! You left France to go help him, and despite that help he fell and almost took you down with him."

"Exactly. I see you still have a good memory, Planchet."

"Plague, Sir! What would be astounding is if I'd forgotten any part of that story. When you've heard Grimaud, who, as you know, speaks but rarely, tell the tale of the beheading of King Charles, of how you sailed through the night in a gunpowder-mined sloop, and beheld that awful Sir Mordaunt tossing in the sea with a golden-handled dagger buried in his chest, you're not likely to forget it."

"But there are people who forget such things, Planchet."

"Yes, those who never saw them, or heard Grimaud tell of them."

"Well! Since you remember all that, I need remind you of only one thing, that King Charles had a son."

"Not to correct you, Sir but he had two," said Planchet. "I saw the second, the Duke of York, here in Paris one day when he was on his way to the Royal Palace, and was told he was the second son of King Charles I. As to the eldest, I have the honour to know his name but I've never seen him."

"Quite so, Planchet, and it's him we must speak of, that eldest son once known as the Prince of Wales, and now called Charles II, King of England."

"A king without a kingdom, Sir," replied Planchet sententially.

"Yes, Planchet, a most unfortunate prince, less happy than the lowest beggar in the most miserable quarter of Paris."

Planchet made a gesture full of that bland compassion accorded to distant strangers one never expects to meet. Besides, he heard nothing in this sentimental eulogy that seemed to bear on his main interest, Sir d'Artagnan's plan of business. D'Artagnan, from his habit of observing humanity, understood Planchet's thoughts. "We're coming to it," he said. "This former Prince of Wales, a king without a kingdom, as you so aptly put it, Planchet, caught my attention. I watched him beg the assistance of Mazarin, who is a low skinflint, and the help of King Louis, who is a child, and it seemed to me, who knows a thing or two, that in the intelligent gaze of this exiled king, in his essential nobility, a nobility that rises above all his suffering, I saw the stuff that makes a man, and the heart that makes a king."

Planchet tacitly approved of all this but in his eyes at least, it didn't cast any light on d'Artagnan's plan. The latter continued, "That's what I told myself, and it started me thinking. Now listen closely, Planchet, because we're coming to the point."

"I'm listening."

"Kings are not so thick on the ground that you can easily find one when you need one. Now, this king without a kingdom is in my opinion a rare resource, a precious seed that might burgeon and bloom if a capable hand, discreet and vigorous, sowed it well and truly, in the right soil, climate, and time."

Planchet nodded mechanically, showing that he didn't yet understand. "Poor little king seed! That's what I said to myself, and I was actually moved, Planchet that makes me think that perhaps I'm being moved to folly. That's why I wanted to consult with you, my friend."

Planchet blushed with pleasure and pride. "Poor little king seed, I said! I'll be the one who picks you up and plants you in good soil."

"Good God!" said Planchet, looking searchingly at his old master as if beginning to doubt his reason.

"What's that?" asked d'Artagnan. "Are you all right?"

"Me? Fine, Sir."

"You said, 'Good God!'"

"I did?"

"I'm sure of it. Are you starting to understand?"

"I confess, Sir d'Artagnan, that I'm a little afraid..."

"To understand?"

"Yes."

"To understand that I want to restore his throne to King Charles II, who has no throne? Is that it?"

Planchet almost leapt from his chair. "Ah!" he cried, frightened. "So that's what you mean by a restoration!"

"Yes, Planchet. Isn't that the right word for it?"

"No doubt, no doubt. But have you thought about this?"

"About what?"

"About what's going on over there?"

"Where?"

"In England."

"And what's going on there, Planchet?"

"First of all, Sir, I beg your pardon for presuming to worry about these things that aren't my concern but since you're proposing a business venture to me ... you're proposing I join a venture, aren't you?"

"A superb one, Planchet."

"Then since you're proposing a joint venture, I have the right to discuss it."

"Discuss away, Planchet; from discourse comes wisdom."

"Well! Since I have Sir's permission, I'll tell him that in the first place, there's the Parliament."

"Very well. And after that?"

"After that, the army."

"Good. And then?"

"And then, the entire nation!"

"Is that everything?"

"... The entire nation that consented to the fall and execution of the last king, father of this one, and stands by that consent."

"Planchet, my friend," said d'Artagnan, "your reasons stink like old cheese. The nation? That nation is fed up with these trumped-up gentlemen who grant themselves barbaric titles while singing psalms. When it comes to singing, my dear Planchet, I've noticed that nations prefer drinking songs to plainchant. Remember the Fronde, and the songs we sang in those days? Say hey! Good times, eh?"

"Not so much; I was nearly hanged."

"But were you hanged?"

"No."

"And didn't you found your fortune while singing those songs?"

"Well ... yes."

"So, you can have nothing to say against them."

"All right! Then I return to the Parliament and the army."

"And I say that I'll borrow twenty thousand livres from Sir Planchet, and put in twenty thousand livres of my own, and with this forty thousand I'll raise my own army."

Planchet clasped his hands in woe, for he really thought d'Artagnan had lost his mind. "An army! Oh, Sir," he said, with a gentle smile, for fear of pushing the madman into a rage. "A ... large army?"

"About forty men," said d'Artagnan.

"Forty men against forty thousand isn't going to do it. Now, you alone are worth a thousand men, Sir d'Artagnan, I know that well but how will you find thirty-nine others who are worth as much as you? Even if you find them, how would you pay them?"

"Not bad, Planchet. Devil, you speak like a courtier."

"No, Sir, I say what I think, and what I think is that at the first pitched battle you fight with your forty men, I'm afraid..."

"So, I won't fight any pitched battles," said the Gascon, laughing. "From Antiquity on, we have plenty of examples of tactical retreats and strategic marches that achieve their goals by avoiding the enemy rather than meeting him. You should know that, Planchet, you who commanded Parisians on the day they were to fight musketeers, and manoeuvred to avoid them so skilfully that you never left the Place Royale."

Planchet laughed. "For a fact," he replied, "if your forty men stay hidden with any skill, they may hope never to have to fight. But then, how do you propose to achieve your goal?"

"I'll tell you. Here, then, is how I propose to speedily restore His Majesty Charles II to his throne."

"Great!" said Planchet, all attention. "But first, it seems to me we're forgetting something."

"What?"

"We've dismissed the nation, because they prefer drinking songs to psalms, and the army, because we won't fight them. But there's still the Parliament that doesn't sing at all."

"And which also doesn't fight. How you, Planchet, an intelligent man, can worry about a bunch of debaters who call themselves Rumps and Barebones is beyond me! I'm not worried about the Parliament, Planchet."

"All right, since Sir isn't worried about them, we'll move on."

"Yes, and now we're coming to the crux. Do you remember Cromwell, Planchet?"

"I certainly heard a lot about him, Sir."

"He was a tough old soldier."

"With a big appetite on top of it."

"What do you mean?"

"He swallowed England at a single gulp."

"Well, Planchet! What if, the day after he swallowed England, someone had swallowed Sir Cromwell?"

"Oh, Sir! It's one of the first axioms of mathematics that the container must be larger than the contained."

"Quite so! And that, right there, is our venture."

"But Sir Cromwell is dead, and his container is the tomb."

"My dear Planchet, I'm pleased to see that you've become not only a mathematician but also a philosopher."

"Sir, in my grocery, I use a lot of newspaper as wrapping, and I learn from it."

"Bravo! Then you're aware, since you learned not only mathematics and philosophy but also a little history, that the previous Cromwell, who was so great, was followed by another who was much smaller."

"Yes, the one called Richard – who did as you did, Sir d'Artagnan, and resigned his position."

"Good, very good! After the great one, who died, and the small one, who resigned, there has come a third. This one is called Sir Monck: he's a skilful general in that he's never fought a battle, a capable diplomat because he never says anything and before greeting someone in the morning, he thinks about it for twelve hours and then says good evening that people call miraculous, saying he's always right."

"Indeed, that's impressive," said Planchet, "but I know of another politician quite like him."

"Sir de Mazarin, am I right?"

"Himself."

"You're right, Planchet; except Sir de Mazarin doesn't aspire to the Throne of France, and that changes everything, you see. Well! This Sir Monck, who already has England roasted on a plate and opens his mouth to swallow it, this Sir Monck, who tells the envoys of Charles II and Charles II himself, 'Nescio vos...'"

"I don't speak English," said Planchet.

"Yes, leave that to me," said d'Artagnan. "'Nescio vos' means 'I know you not.' This Sir Monck, the most important man in England, once he's swallowed her..."

"Well?" asked Planchet.

"Well, my friend! I go over there with my forty men, and I'll pack him up, carry him off, and bring him to France, where I see two bright possibilities."

"Ooh, I see one!" cried Planchet, carried away by enthusiasm. "We'll put him in a cage and folks will pay money to see him."

"Well, Planchet, that's a third possibility that hadn't occurred to me, I must say."

"Do you think it's a good one?"

"Yes, certainly – but I think mine are better."

"Let's hear yours, then."

"Number one is to hold him for ransom."

"For how much?"

"Plague! A fellow like that must be worth a hundred thousand crowns."

"Oh, yes!"

"So, my first idea is to ransom him for a hundred thousand crowns."

"And the other...?"

"The other that is even better, is to give him to King Charles, who, no longer having a general of the army to fear, and a diplomat to argue with, will restore himself, and once restored, will pay me the hundred thousand crowns in question. That's the venture I propose; what do you say to that, Planchet?"

"It's magnificent, Sir!" said Planchet, trembling with emotion. "And how did this wonderful idea come to you?"

"It came to me one morning on the banks of the Loire, when King Louis XIV, our beloved monarch, wept over the hand of Miss de Mancini."

"Sir, I grant you that your idea is sublime. But..."

"Ah! There's always a but."

"Permit me! But it's a bit like the skin of the bear the fools tried to sell, you know, before they'd caught the bear. Now, taking Sir Monck means a fight."

"No doubt; that's why I'm raising my army."

"Yes, yes, I understand that, for God's sake! A surprise attack. Oh, you'll succeed at that, Sir, because no one's your equal at that sort of thing."

"I have a knack for it, that's true," said d'Artagnan, with a proud simplicity. "You understand that if I had for this business my dear Athos, my brave Porthos, and my wily Aramis, it would be as good as done. But they're all lost and scattered, and it seems no one knows where to find them, so I'll do it on my own. Now, do you find this venture a good one, at a decent return on investment?"

"All too good."

"What do you mean?"

"It's just too good to come true."

"It can't fail, Planchet, and the proof is that I undertake it myself. There'll be a fine profit for you and a notable feat for me. They'll say, 'Such was the old age of Sir d'Artagnan,' Planchet, and I'll have a place in tales and maybe even history."

"Oh, Sir!" cried Planchet. "When I think that it's here, in my home, among my brown sugar, prunes, and cinnamon, that this colossal project was born, it makes my shop seem almost like a palace."

"Take care, Planchet, take care: if the least word of this gets out, it's the Bastille for both of us. Take care, my friend, for it's a conspiracy we're plotting here, and Sir Monck is an ally of Sir de Mazarin."

"Sir, when one has had the honour of calling you master, one knows no fear, and when one has the privilege of being your partner, he's a silent one."

"Very well, that's more your worry than mine, for in a week I'll be in England."

"Then go, Sir, go, and the sooner the better."

"So, the money is available?"

"It will be tomorrow, I'll get it for you personally. Would you prefer gold or silver?"

"Gold is more portable and convenient. But how shall we memorialize this? Let's see."

"My God, nothing could be simpler: you'll just write me a receipt."

"No, that's too simple," said d'Artagnan. "We must do this thing properly."

"Usually I'd agree but since it's you, Sir D'Artagnan..."

"And what if I'm killed over there, slain by a musket ball, or poisoned by their beer?"

"Sir, please believe that if that happened, I would be so upset by your death that I wouldn't care about money."

"Thank you, Planchet but the problem remains. We shall, like two attorneys' clerks, draw up an agreement, a sort of treaty that could be called a deed of partnership."

"Willingly, Sir."

"I know writing is hard work but we'll give it a try." Planchet went and got a pen, ink, and paper. D'Artagnan took the pen, dipped it in the ink, and wrote:

Between Lord d'Artagnan, former Lieutenant of the King's Musketeers, resident at the Hôtel de la Chevette, Rue Tiquetonne, And Sieur Planchet, Grocer, resident at the Sign of the Golden Pestle, Rue des Lombards,

It is agreed that: A company with a capital of 40000 livres is formed around an idea brought by Sir d'Artagnan. Sieur Planchet who knows of this idea and approves of it in all respects, will pay 20000 livres into the hands of Sir d'Artagnan. He demands no repayment nor interest before Sir d'Artagnan returns from a trip to England. For his part, Sir d'Artagnan undertakes to contribute 20000 livres that he will add to the 20000 already invested by Sieur Planchet. He will expend the 40000 livres as he sees fit, committing himself to a goal as set forth below. The day that Sir d'Artagnan has by some means restored His Majesty King Charles II to the Throne of England, he'll pay into the hands of Sieur Planchet a sum of...

Seeing d'Artagnan pause, Planchet said naively, "The sum of one hundred fifty thousand livres."

"Hang it! No," said d'Artagnan, "the division can't be by halves, that wouldn't be right."

"However, Sir, we each put half in," said Planchet timidly.

"Yes but listen to the full clause, Planchet, and if it doesn't sound equitable in every respect, well! We'll strike it out." And d'Artagnan wrote:

However, as Sir d'Artagnan brings to the venture, besides his capital of 20000 livres, his idea, efforts, and moreover risks his life that he prefers not to lose, Sir d'Artagnan will keep, out of 300000 livres, 200000 for himself, making his share 2/3.

"Very good," said Planchet.

"So, that sounds right?"

"Perfectly right, Sir."

"And you'll be content with a hundred thousand livres?"

"Plague! I should think so. A hundred thousand livres for twenty thousand!"

"And within one month, you understand."

"What, one month?"

"Yes, I'm asking for only one month."

"Sir," said Planchet generously, "I'll give you six weeks."

"Thank you," replied the musketeer politely.

After which, the two partners read the agreement. "It's perfect, Sir," said Planchet, "and the late Sir Coquenard, the first husband of Madam Baron du Vallon, could have done no better."

"You think so? Well, then! Let's sign it."

And they added their signatures.

"This way," said d'Artagnan, "I'll be under no obligations to anyone."

"But I'll be under obligation to you," said Planchet.

"Not at all, because no matter how much I prefer not to, if I lose my life over there, Planchet, you lose your whole investment. Plague that reminds me of the most important clause of all that I'll add: 'In the event that Sir d'Artagnan is deceased in this venture, repayment is considered made, and Sieur Planchet forgives the ghost of Sir d'Artagnan the twenty thousand livres he loaned to the company.'"

This final clause made Planchet frown in fear and doubt but when he saw in his partner that eye so brilliant, that hand so steady, that spine so firm and supple, he took courage and without hesitation added his initials to the clause. D'Artagnan did the same. And thus was drawn up the first deed of partnership, a form of agreement that may occasionally have been abused since then. "And now, dear master" said Planchet, pouring a last glass of Anjou honey for d'Artagnan, "let's get some sleep."

"No," d'Artagnan replied, "the hardest task is still ahead of me, for I have to think things through."

"Bah!" said Planchet. "I have such confidence in you, Sir d'Artagnan, that I wouldn't trade my option on a hundred thousand livres for ninety thousand in cash."

"And, devil take me!" said d'Artagnan. "I think you're right." Upon which d'Artagnan took a candle, went up to his room, and went to bed.

D'Artagnan prepares to Travel on the behalf of Planchet & Company

D'Artagnan thought so well over night that by morning his plan was fully formed. "There!" he said, sitting up on his bed, putting his elbow on his knee and his chin in his hand. "I'll seek out forty men, sure and solid, recruiting people who are somewhat compromised but with the habit of discipline. I'll promise each one five hundred livres for a month, if they survive, and nothing if they don't, or half for their dependents. As for food and lodging, that's on the English, who have cattle in the pasture, bacon in the smokehouse, chickens in the coop, and barley in the barn. I'll offer my troop to General Monck and he'll sign us up. I'll get into his confidence and abuse it at the first opportunity." But d'Artagnan paused there, shook his head, and interrupted himself. "No," he said, "If I did that, I'd never be able to tell Athos about it. It's too dishonourable. I can't resort to violence after committing myself to him," he continued. "With my forty men, I'll have to fight a guerrilla action. Yes but what if I run up against, not forty thousand English as Planchet said but even as few as four hundred? I'll be beaten, especially since, out of my forty, at least ten will get themselves killed out of stupidity. No, in fact, it would be impossible to find forty dependable men; there just aren't that many. I'll have to be satisfied with thirty. With ten fewer men I can justify avoiding an encounter, and if one happens anyway, I'll have thirty good soldiers rather than forty fools. Plus, I save five thousand livres, or an eighth of my capital that is all to the good. So, then: thirty men. I'll divide the troop into three squads, we'll separate, make our way through the country, and meet at a rendezvous point. That way, ten by ten, we'll raise no alarms, cause no suspicion, and pass unnoticed. Yes, thirty, that's the number, all right. Three tens; three, the divine number! And then, when we're reunited, we'll still be a pretty imposing company. But, oh! I'm an idiot!" continued d'Artagnan. "I'll need thirty horses. It's a disaster; how the devil did I forget about horses? You can't undertake a campaign like this without horses. Well, it has to be done; I can buy the horses once we're across, and besides, there's nothing wrong with English horses. But also, plague take it, three squads mean three commanders, and that's another problem. Of the three, I'm one, of course but hiring the other two will cost almost as much as the rest put together. No, I definitely must have no more than one lieutenant. Based on that, I'll reduce my troop to twenty men. That isn't very many, just twenty men but if I was determined to avoid encounters with thirty men, I'll be even more so with twenty. Twenty is a manageable number, and besides, it reduces the number of horses I'll need by ten that is a bonus. And then, with a good lieutenant ... God be with you! See where you get with patience and calculation? I started out with forty men, and now I'm going to do the same job with twenty. Ten thousand livres saved at one stroke, and with better results. The critical point now is the finding of this lieutenant. So, I'll find him, and then ... but it won't be that easy. I need someone brave and experienced, another me. Yes but a lieutenant would have to share my secret, a secret that's worth a million, and as I'm paying my man only ten thousand livres, or fifteen hundred at best, he'll sell that secret to Monck. No lieutenants, God be with you! Besides, even if the lieutenant was as mute as a disciple of Pythagoras, he'd be sure to have in his squad a favourite soldier whom he'd make his sergeant, and this sergeant would find out his secret even supposing the lieutenant is honest. And the sergeant, cheaper and less honest, will sell the whole thing for fifty thousand livres. Come, come, it's impossible! Decidedly, the lieutenant is impossible. But then we're done with fractions, because I can't divide my troop in two and be in two places at once, without another me who ... but why have two squads when I have only one captain? What's the point of weakening the troop by sending one squad left and the other right? A single troop, God be with you! But a band of twenty men riding cross country looks suspicious to everyone; if a troop of twenty riders is spotted, a company will be sent after them, they'll demand the password, we won't know it, and Sir d'Artagnan and his men will be shot like rabbits. I'll reduce my troop to ten men; I'll act simply and with a unified force; I'll have no choice but to be prudent that is already halfway to success in the kind of affair I'm undertaking. A larger troop would have tempted me into some recklessly fool. Ten horses can be brought from here or bought over there. An excellent idea! I'm happier already. No suspicions, no passwords, no encounters. A mere ten men, why, they're just taken for drovers or clerks. Ten men leading ten horses loaded with merchandise will be overlooked, or even well received, no matter where they go. Ten men travelling on behalf of the house of Planchet and Co., France. Nothing more need be said. These ten men, dressed like labourers, might carry hunting knives, carbines behind their saddles, even pistols in their holsters. They don't look suspicious because their business is open and above-board. Oh, they might look a bit like smugglers but so what? Smuggling's not a hanging offence like polygamy. The worst that can happen to us is that they confiscate our goods. Confiscated goods? No big deal. Come, come, this plan is superb. Just ten men, ten men I'll handpick, ten men who will be as good as forty, and cost me a quarter as much. And for greater security, I won't speak a word about our goal. I'll just say, 'my friends, there's a blow to strike.' Satan himself would have to get up extra early to play a trick on us. And fifteen thousand livres saved out of twenty – it's just superb!" Thus, comforted by his industrious calculations, d'Artagnan fixed his plan in place and resolved to make no further changes. He already had in mind, on a list furnished by his inexhaustible memory, ten veteran adventurers mistreated by fortune or harried by the law. Therefore, d'Artagnan got up and went right to work, telling Planchet not to expect him at breakfast and maybe not dinner. A day and a half spent haunting certain Parisian dives reaped him his harvest, a collection of swashbucklers all individually recruited without the knowledge of the others, so that within thirty hours he had a charming crew of ugly customers, most of them speaking a French less pure than the English they were about to attempt. They were former guardsmen for the most part, men whom d'Artagnan had taken the measure of in various encounters, and whom drunkenness, unlucky sword-wounds, unexpected windfalls at gambling, or thinning of the ranks by Sir de Mazarin had forced to seek darkness and solitude, the two great consolations of souls misunderstood and mistreated. They wore on their faces and their outfits the marks of their suffering; some of them were scarred, and all of their clothes were threadbare. D'Artagnan relieved the most urgent miseries of his brothers in arms with an early distribution of a few of the company's gold crowns; then, having made sure these crowns were employed in the physical rehabilitation of his troopers, he assigned his recruits a rendezvous in northern France, between Berghes and Saint-Omer. They were to meet at the end of six days, and d'Artagnan was sufficiently well acquainted with the goodwill and dependability of these men that he was certain none of them would fail to be waiting. These orders given, and the rendezvous appointed, d'Artagnan went to make his farewell to Planchet, who was waiting to hear news of his little army. D'Artagnan didn't think it was wise to inform Planchet about his reduction in personnel, as he thought it might diminish his partner's confidence in the venture. Planchet was delighted to hear that the army had been raised, and that he was now a sort of little king with a shop for a throne room, from which he was funding troops to wage war against perfidious Albion that enemy of all true French hearts. Planchet happily counted out twenty thousand livres worth of fine double-louis to d'Artagnan on his own account and an equal stack from the fund belonging to d'Artagnan. The Gascon poured the money into two equal purses, and then, weighing them in his hands, he said, "This much money is quite an encumbrance, don't you think, Planchet? It must weigh thirty pounds."

"Bah! To your horse it will be no more than a feather."

D'Artagnan shook his head. "I know what I'm talking about, Planchet. A horse carrying an extra thirty pounds above the weight of his rider and baggage no longer swims a river so easily, nor leaps lightly over a wall or ditch – and if the horse fails, the rider fails. Though of course, you wouldn't know that, Planchet, as you always served in the infantry."

"Then what should we do, Sir?" said Planchet, genuinely embarrassed.

"Listen," said d'Artagnan, "I'll pay my army upon their return to Paris. Keep my half of twenty thousand livres for me that you can put to use during that time."

"What about my half of the money?" said Planchet.

"I'll carry that with me."

"Your confidence does me honour," said Planchet, "but what if you don't come back?"

"I suppose that's possible, though it isn't likely. However, Planchet, in case I don't come back, give me a pen so I can write out my will." D'Artagnan took a pen and paper and wrote on a single sheet: I, d'Artagnan, am in possession of twenty thousand livres saved sou by sou for thirty-three years in the service of His Majesty the King of France. I leave 5000 to Athos, 5000 to Porthos, and 5000 to Aramis, to be given, in my name and theirs, to my young friend Raoul, Viscount of Bragelonne. I leave the final 5000 to Planchet, that he may distribute the other 15000 to my friends without regret. To that end, I sign this present document,

D'ARTAGNAN

Planchet appeared quite curious to know what d’Artagnan had written. “Here,” the musketeer said to him, “read it.” At the final lines, tears sprang from Planchet’s eyes. “You think I wouldn’t give them your money without this? Take it back – I don’t want your five thousand livres.” D’Artagnan smiled. “Accept it, Planchet, accept it, and then you’ll lose only fifteen thousand livres instead of twenty. And you won’t be tempted to ignore the signature of your master and friend in order not to lose everything.” How well d’Artagnan knew the hearts of men – especially grocers! Those who called Don Quixote crazy because he went to conquer an empire with no help but Sancho, his squire, and who called Sancho mad because he followed that master, would certainly not hesitate to pass the same judgement on d’Artagnan and Planchet. However, the first had one of the subtlest minds to be found among the razor-sharp wits of the Court of France. As to the second, he had rightly acquired the reputation of being one of the smartest grocers in the Rue des Lombards – and therefore all of Paris, and thus all of France. Now, if one considers these two men from the point of view of other men, and the means by which they intended to put a king on his throne compared to other means, those of average mind, an average that’s by no means high, would recoil from the mad arrogance of the lieutenant and the folly of his partner. Fortunately, d’Artagnan wasn’t the sort of man to take his opinions from those around him, especially opinions about himself. He had adopted as his motto, “Do the right thing and let others talk.” Planchet, for his part, had as his slogan, “Do it and say nothing.” And that was how these two flattered themselves that they were right and everyone else was wrong. (Such is the way of geniuses.) D’Artagnan set out on his journey, and at first he had the most beautiful weather possible, without a cloud in the sky and without a cloud on his spirit, joyful and strong, calm and resolved, and consequently brimming with that fluid energy that powers the human machine when shocks jolt it into action, something that future centuries will probably isolate and reproduce mechanically. As in previous adventures, he went back up the road to Boulogne, now for the fifth time. He could almost, on the way, pick out the footprints of his former travels and recognise the marks of his fist on the doors of roadside inns. His memory, sharp and ever present, brought back the days of his youth that, thirty years later, hadn’t weakened his steel wrist nor discouraged his brave heart. What a rich nature was that of this man! He had every passion, every fault, every weakness, and an intellectual spirit of contradiction that turned all these vices into virtues. D’Artagnan, thanks to his restless imagination, started at every shadow, and then, ashamed of that fear, marched bravely into the gloom and confronted it, if he found the danger was real. He reacted to everything with emotion that brought him enjoyment. He delighted in the company of others but was never bored with his own, and if one could have eavesdropped on him when he was alone, he’d have been heard laughing at the jokes he made for himself, or the imaginary mind games he played where one would expect only boredom. D’Artagnan was perhaps less cheerful than he would have been if he expected to find his good friends at Calais instead of his ten rogues but melancholy didn’t afflict him more than once a day, so he had only 5 visits from that dark deity before sighting the sea at Boulogne, and those visits were brief. Then, once d’Artagnan was nearing the theatre of action, every feeling but that of confidence disappeared, to be seen no more. From Boulogne, he followed the coast to Calais. For Calais was the site of the rendezvous, and in Calais he’d told each of his recruits to await him at the Grand Monarch Inn, where prices were moderate, where sailors took their meals, and where men of the sword, if they kept the blades in their leather scabbards, would find lodging, food, honey, and the other sweet things of life for thirty sous a day. He arrived at Calais at half past four in the evening. D’Artagnan intended to surprise his recruits in a relaxed state and take stock of them, to judge whether they’d be good and dependable companions.

D’Artagnan Travels for the House of Planchet & Company

The Grand Monarch Inn was located on a small street that ran parallel to the docks without overlooking the harbour itself; a few alleys, like rungs between the parallel sides of a ladder, connected the dockside to the parallel street. By these alleys, one could cut through quickly from the harbour to the street or from the street to the harbour. D’Artagnan arrived at the harbour, turned up one of these alleys, and came out right in front of the Grand Monarch Inn. The moment was well chosen and reminiscent of his arrival at the Inn of the Jolly Miller in Meung. Some sailors who’d been playing at dice had quarrelled and were exchanging furious threats. The host, the hostess, and two pot boys anxiously watched these angry gamblers and the circle of sailors surrounding them, bristling with knives and axes and seemingly ready for war. However, though grumbling, the two quarrellers returned to their game. 2 other men were sitting on a stone bench near the door, while four tables placed near the far wall of the common room were occupied by eight more. The two men on the bench and the eight at the tables took no part in either the game or the quarrel. In these cold and indifferent spectators d’Artagnan recognised his ten recruits. The quarrel revived and intensified. Like the sea, every passion has a tide that rises and falls. At the height of his fury one sailor turned over the table, scattering the money that had been on it. Instantly, the inn’s staff and guests all pounced on the rolling coins, gathering what they could and slipping away while all the sailors tore into each other. Only the 2 men on the bench and the eight farther inside kept out of the fray, and though they didn’t seem to know each other or be coordinating their actions, all seemed determined to remain impassive despite the angry cries and clink of coins. The sole activity was from the two at the nearest table, who used their feet to firmly repel any fighters who rolled up to them. 2 others, while staying out of the fracas, did draw their fists from their pockets, while another pair, to avoid a wave of combatants, took to their table top, like people surprised by a flood. “Come, now,” said d’Artagnan to himself, who had missed nothing we’ve just recounted, “here’s a pretty troop: circumspect, calm, unruffled by noise but with a ready defence – plague! I could hardly ask for better.” Suddenly his attention was drawn to the middle of the common room. The two sailors who’d been pushed away by the feet of the men at the nearest table were reconciled by their shared outrage at this insult. One of them, half-drunk with anger and completely drunk on beer, started threatening the smaller of the two men at the table, asking him by what right he could put his feet on sailors, who were creatures of God and not dogs. And to make his inquiry more pointed, he shook his fist under the nose of d’Artagnan’s recruit. The recruit turned pale from what might have been either anger or fear, and the sailor, concluding it must be fear, raised his fist with the evident intention of bringing it down on the stranger’s head. However, though the threatened man scarcely seemed to move, he struck the sailor in the stomach so hard that the man reeled away across the room, crying out in pain. Immediately, rallied by esprit de corps, the comrades of the injured man fell as one on his conqueror. This latter, maintaining the sangfroid he’d previously shown, and without making the mistake of drawing his weapons, picked up a heavy beer stein and knocked down his first two or three assailants. Then, as he was about to be overwhelmed by numbers, the seven other silent men within, who’d previously stood aside, suddenly decided that this was their battle and rushed to his aid. Meanwhile, the two abstainers at the door turned toward the mêlée with frowns that seemed to indicate their intention to hit the sailors from behind if they didn’t stand down. The host, his potboys, and two bystanders had gotten embroiled in the fracas and were being soundly beaten. The Paris recruits, however, were striking like Cyclopes, placing their blows with a tactical skill it was a pleasure to behold. Finally, forced to retreat in the face of superior numbers, they entrenched themselves behind the largest table that 4 of them upended. Then the 2 from the doorway finally waded in swinging wooden benches that like the arms of siege engines laid out eight sailors in four blows. The floor was strewn with fallen men and the dusty air resounded with cries of pain as d’Artagnan, satisfied with this demonstration, marched into the room naked sword in hand, striking down with the pommel on every sailor’s head that raised itself. Standing in the middle of the room, he shouted, “Whoa!” which brought the fight to a sudden end. The wounded sailors surged away from the centre of the room to its edges, leaving d’Artagnan alone on the field and in sole possession. “What’s all this about?” he demanded of all and sundry in the majestic tone of Neptune pronouncing the Quos ego. Immediately, at the first sound of his voice (to continue the Virgilian metaphor), d’Artagnan’s recruits, who recognised their lord and master, dropped their aggressive attitudes and put down their tankards and trestles. The sailors, for their part, seeing the long sword, strong arm, and martial air of a man who appeared accustomed to command, picked up their wounded and their cracked mugs and went on their way. The Parisians straightened themselves and saluted their leader while d’Artagnan was being regaled with thanks and congratulations by the Grand Monarch’s innkeeper. He accepted these plaudits like a man who knew he deserved them and announced that, while the host was preparing his supper, he would go for a walk along the harbour. Immediately each of the recruits, who understood the summons, took his hat, straightened his buff coat, and followed d’Artagnan. But d’Artagnan, strolling along like a tourist, never paused for a moment and made straight for the dunes. Meanwhile the 10 men, surprised at finding themselves walking among a pack of strangers, all looked askance at one another. It was only when they were among the deepest dunes that d’Artagnan, smiling at seeing them so worried, turned and said with a reassuring gesture, “There, there, Gentlemen! Don’t be so suspicious of each other, for you’re going to be comrades, and must get along together.” Then their hesitation disappeared, the men breathed easily again, and began looking over their new companions with some satisfaction. After this mutual appraisal they turned back to their leader, who had long experience of dealing with men of this calibre and regaled them with the following improvised speech, delivered with typical Gascon energy: “Gentlemen, you all know who I am. I’ve engaged you, knowing you to be brave and ready to join a glorious expedition. Regard working for me just as if you were working for the king – but I warn you now that if you behave like that in public, I’ll crack your heads with whatever happens to be convenient. You’re well aware, Gentlemen, that state secrets are like lethal poison: as long as the poison is in its bottle and the bottle is corked, it’s harmless – but once it’s out of the bottle, it kills. Now, come closer, and I’ll share with you as much of the secret as I may.” Curious, the men gathered around him. “Come near,” continued d’Artagnan, “so close that not the birds over our heads, the rabbits in the dunes, nor the fishes in the waves can hear us. We’re going to investigate and report to Sir le Surintendant des Finances as to how much English smuggling is harming French trade. I intend to go everywhere and see everything. We shall be poor Picard anglers thrown up on the coast by a squall. It goes without saying that we’ll sell fish just as if we were real anglers. Of course, someone might guess who we really are and confront us, in which case we must be able to defend ourselves. That’s why I chose you, men of spirit and courage. But we’ll keep our heads down and stay out of trouble, confident because we’re backed by a powerful patron who can protect us from anything. Only one thing worries me but I’ll explain it in hopes you can put it to rest. I don’t want to have to bring along a stupid crew of actual anglers, who’d be a real nuisance but if there were, among you, some who’d followed the sea...”

“Oh, no problem there!” said one of d’Artagnan’s recruits. “I was a prisoner of the pirates of Tunis for three years and can navigate like an admiral.”

“See there?” said d’Artagnan. “Luck is on our side!”

The air of pleased surprise with which d’Artagnan said this was feigned, however, for he knew quite well that this prisoner of the pirates was himself an old corsair and had engaged him with that background in mind. But d’Artagnan never said more than he had to say, preferring to leave people in doubt. He therefore appeared to take the man’s explanation at face value, accepting the result without worrying about the cause. “And I, as it happens,” said a second man, “have an uncle who’s a foreman in the port at La Rochelle. As a child, I played on boats every day, and can handle rowing and sailing as well as any sailor of the Ponant.”

This man lied only a little more than his fellow, having spent six years rowing in His Majesty’s galleys at La Ciotat. 2 others were more honest, confessing that they’d spent a couple of years as soldiers on prison ships. Thus, of the ten men of war in d’Artagnan’s troop, four also qualified as sailors, so he was armed for both land and sea, a detail that would have made Planchet swell with pride had he known of it. Then it was just a matter of issuing the general orders that d’Artagnan did with precision. He commanded his men to make for The Hague, half following the coast to Breskens, the others taking the road to Antwerp. The rendezvous was set for a fortnight hence by calculating travel time to the central square of The Hague. D’Artagnan advised his men to pair up however they liked and travel by two. He himself chose two of the least disreputable figures, a couple of former guardsmen he’d known previously whose only faults were that they were gamblers and drunkards. These men weren’t entirely lost to civilization, and with clean clothes and good habits, their hearts would be steady again. D’Artagnan, to avoid jealousy among the men, made all the others go on ahead. He kept his two favourites back, gave them clothes from his own supply, and set off with them. It was to this pair, whom he seemed to honour with his complete confidence, that d’Artagnan made a false confession intended to guarantee the success of the expedition. He explained to them that it wasn’t a question of how much English smuggling harmed French trade but rather how much English trade could be harmed by French smuggling. The men appeared convinced by this, as indeed they were. D’Artagnan was certain, of course, that at the first carousal with the others, these two, once drink had loosened their tongues, would divulge his false confession to the entire band. He thought this gambit couldn’t fail. 2 weeks after their meeting in Calais, the entire company was reassembled in The Hague. Then d’Artagnan saw that all of them, showing remarkable intelligence, had already assumed the guise of sailors who’d been recently washed up from the sea. D’Artagnan found them quarters in a dive on Newkerke Street while he lodged comfortably on the Grand Canal. He learned that the King of England had returned to his ally William II of Nassau, Stadtholder of Holland, and moreover that the rejection by King Louis XIV had put a chill on the welcome he’d felt before. Consequently, Charles had been lodged in a small house in the village of Scheveningen, in the dunes on the seaside, about a league outside The Hague. There, it was said, the unfortunate exile consoled himself for his banishment by gazing, with that melancholy particular to the princes of his race, out into the immensity of the North Sea that separated him from England as it had formerly separated Mary Stuart from France. There, beyond the beautiful grove of Scheveningen, where golden heather grows on the dunes of fine sand, Charles II also vegetated, less happy than the heather because he, self-aware, lived a life of the mind, and went from despair to hope and back again. D’Artagnan made the short trip to Scheveningen to confirm for himself what was reported about the prince. And in fact, he saw Charles II, pensive and alone, come out of a small door facing the woods and roam along the shore at sunset, without even attracting the notice of the anglers who, returning in the evening, grounded their boats, like the Greeks of the islands, high on the sand of the beach. D’Artagnan recognised the king, saw him staring sombrely over the immense expanse of the waters, absorbing on his pale face the red rays of the sun already bisected by the horizon. Then Charles II returned to the house alone, slowly and sadly, amusing himself by making the sand creak beneath his footsteps. That same evening, d’Artagnan rented for a thousand livres a fishing boat, a tracker worth four thousand. He paid the thousand down and left the other three thousand as a deposit with the harbour burgomaster. After that he secretly embarked his six soldiers, unseen in the dark, and at three in the morning, at high tide, he boarded openly with his four sailors and set out, relying on the skill of his former galley slave as if he were the foremost pilot of the port.

The Author Is Forced to Recount a Little History Despite himself

While kings and men were thus occupied with England that thought to govern itself – and which, to be fair, had never been governed so poorly – a man upon whom God had rested his gaze and laid his finger, a man destined to write his name in glowing letters in the book of history, worked on while presenting to the world a face both bold and mysterious. He was headed somewhere but no one could guess his destination, though England, France, and all Europe watched him march with a firm step and head held high. Monck had just declared his allegiance to the liberation of the Rump Parliament, that representative body that General Lambert in imitation of Cromwell, whose lieutenant he’d been, had locked up so closely, to force it to submit to his will, that no member had been able to break the blockade to escape, and only one, Peter Wentworth, had been able to get in. Lambert and Monck: everything was summed up in these two men, one of whom represented military despotism and the other republicanism. These two men were the sole political survivors of the revolution in which Charles I had lost his crown and then his head. Lambert made no secret of his intentions: he sought to establish a military government and place himself at its head. Monck, known to be a staunch republican, was said by some to be in favour of supporting and retaining the Rump Parliament, the visible (though degenerate) representation of the republic; others said that Monck, adroit and ambitious, merely wanted to use this parliament that he seemed to protect, as a stepping-stone to the throne that Cromwell had made vacant but had never assumed himself. Thus, Lambert, by persecuting the Parliament, and Monck, by declaring in favour of it, had declared themselves one another's enemies. Monck and Lambert, therefore, had raised armies for themselves, Monck in Scotland, attracting the Presbyterians and the royalists, that is, the malcontents, and Lambert in London that always strongly opposed the most visible power – in this case, the Parliament. Monck had raised an army, pacified Scotland, and found there an asylum; from there he watched and was watched in turn. But Monck knew that the day had not yet come, that day marked by the Lord for a great change, and so his sword stayed in its sheath. Unassailable in his wild and mountainous Scotland, general and absolute king of an army of eleven thousand veterans whom he had more than once led to victory, informed of affairs in London as well as or even better than Lambert, who was garrisoned in the city, this was the position of Monck when, a hundred leagues from London, he declared for the Parliament. Lambert, on the other hand, occupied the capital. That was the centre of all his operations, and there he gathered around himself all his friends, as well as the discontented of the lower classes, eternally inclined to favour the enemies of constituted power. It was in London, then, that Lambert heard of Monck's declaration of support for Parliament from beyond the Scottish frontier. He decided there was no time to lose, for the Tweed was not so far from the Thames that an army couldn't leap from one to the other, especially if it was well commanded. He also knew that once it entered England, Monck's army would increase like a rolling snowball, a growing globe of fortune that would be, for one so ambitious, a stepping-stone to elevate him to his goal. Lambert therefore gathered his army, formidable both for its quality and its size, and moved to meet Monck, who, like a careful navigator sailing through reefs was advancing in short marches, nose to the wind, listening to every sound and sniffing the breeze blowing from London. The 2 armies arrived in close proximity at Newcastle. Lambert, the first to arrive, occupied the city itself; Monck, always circumspect, halted outside and established his headquarters at Coldstream, on the Tweed. The sight of Lambert's troops spread joy through the ranks of Monck's, while on the contrary the sight of Monck threw Lambert's army into disarray. One might have thought that these intrepid warriors, who'd made so much noise in the streets of London, had set off in the hope of avoiding an encounter and instead found themselves facing an army, one that followed not just a banner but a cause and a principle. It seemed to have occurred to these once-fearless battalions that maybe they weren't as good citizens as Monck's men, who supported the Parliament, while Lambert supported nothing but himself. As to Monck, if any thoughts occurred to him they must have been sad – or so says History, that modest lady who, it's said, never lies – because the story she recounts is that on the day of Monck's arrival in Coldstream not a sheep could be found in the entire town. If Monck had commanded an English army, that would have been enough to cause the entire army to desert. But the Scots, unlike the English, don't require meat on a daily basis; the Scots, a poor and sober race, can survive on a little barley crushed between two stones, mixed with some cold water and cooked on a flat rock. The Scots, having been issued their barley, didn't care then if there were no sheep to be found in Coldstream. However, Monck, unused to barley cakes, was hungry, and his staff officers, as hungry as he was, looked anxiously right and left to see where their supper would come from. Monck called for reports but his scouts, on arriving in the town, had found it deserted, its pantries empty, and as for butchers and bakers, there were none to be found in Coldstream. No one could find a single loaf of bread for the general's table. As report succeeded report, each one less encouraging than the last, Monck, seeing the fear and dismay on the faces around him, announced that he wasn't the least bit hungry – and in any event, they were bound to eat the following day as Lambert seemed likely to give battle, and if he lost they'd have his provisions, while if he won they'd be relieved of the problem of being hungry. This didn't seem to console very many of them but that didn't appear to bother Monck who was beneath it as rigid as a rock, though of mild demeanour. So, everyone had to be satisfied with that, or at least appear to be. Monck, just as hungry as his soldiers but pretending not to care about the absence of sheep, cut a half-inch of tobacco from the plug of a sergeant on his staff and began to chew it, assuring his lieutenants that hunger was an illusion, and besides, no one can feel hungry if he has something to chew on. This just mollified some of those who hadn't been reassured by the proximity of Lambert's provisions; the discontented dispersed, the guard took up its routine, and night patrols commenced, while the general continued chewing his frugal meal in the open door of his tent. Between his camp and that of his enemy was an old abbey, of which there are almost no signs today but which was standing at the time and was known as Newcastle Abbey. It was built on a broad meadow between the fields and the river, a marshy plain watered by springs and flooded in heavy rain. However, in the midst of this marshland of tall grass, rushes, and reeds, was some higher ground formerly occupied by the vegetable gardens, park, paddocks, and outbuildings that radiated from the abbey, like one of those big sea stars with a round body and legs splaying out all around its circumference. The vegetable garden, one of the abbey's long legs, extended almost to Monck's camp. Unfortunately, as we've said, it was early June, and the garden, long abandoned, had little to offer. Monck had set a guard on the spot to prevent surprise attacks; the campfires of the enemy forces were visible beyond the abbey but between the abbey and these fires stretched the Tweed, unrolling like a luminous serpent beneath the shade of some great green oaks. Monck was well acquainted with this position, as Newcastle and its environs had served as his headquarters more than once. He knew that by day his enemy could probably throw scouts into the ruins and provoke a skirmish but that at night they'd be careful not to risk it. He was safe enough. Thus, his soldiers were able to see him, after he'd had what he'd laughably called his supper of chewing tobacco, sitting like Napoleon on the eve of Austerlitz on his folding chair, half under the light of his lamp and half under the glow of the moon that was beginning to climb to the zenith. It was about nine-thirty at night. Suddenly Monck was drawn from his half-sleep, real or feigned, by a troop of soldiers who, approaching with joyous cries, kicked his tent poles and thrummed its ropes to awaken him. There was no need for such a commotion; the general opened his eyes and asked, "Well, my children, what's going on?"

"General," answered several voices, "you shall eat at last."

"I have eaten, Gentlemen," he calmly replied, "and was quietly digesting, as you see. But come in and tell me your news."

"It's good news, General."

"Oh? Has Lambert announced that he'll fight us tomorrow?"

"No but we've captured a tracker carrying fish to his camp at Newcastle."

"Then you've done wrong, my friends. These London gentlemen are delicate and must have their fish course. You'll put them into a bad mood and then tomorrow they'll be ruthless. It would be improper, I think, not to send Lambert this boat full of fish, unless..." The general thought for a moment. "Tell me, if you please" he continued, "just who are these anglers?"

"Picard sailors who fish along the coasts of France and Holland and were blown to ours by a gale."

"Do any of them speak our language?"

"Their captain has a few words of English."

The general's suspicions were aroused by this report. "Very well," he said. "I'd like to see these men; bring them to me."

An officer immediately went off to fetch them. "How many are there?" continued Monck. "And what sort of boat is it?"

"There are ten or twelve of them, General, manning a sort of tracker, as they call it, that looked Dutch-built to us."

"And you say they were carrying fish to Lambert's camp?"

"Yes, General. They seem to have made a pretty good catch."

"We'll see about that," said Monck. At that moment the officer returned, bringing with him the anglers' captain, a man about fifty to fifty-five years old but good-looking. He was of medium height and wore a jerkin of coarse wool with a hat pulled down over his eyes. A cutlass hung from his belt, and he walked with the hesitation of a sailor who, on a rocking deck, was never sure where his foot would come down, placing his feet solidly and deliberately. Monck looked him over for a long minute, while the angler smiled back at him with that expression, half cunning and half foolish, common to the French peasant. "Do you speak English?" Monck asked him in excellent French.

"A bit, and that badly, Milord," replied the angler.

This answer came less with the lively and terse accent of the folk of the mouth of the Loire than with the slight drawl of the counties of southwest France. "But you do speak it," continued Monck, to hear more of his accent.

"Oh! We seafarers speak a little of every language," replied the angler.

"So, you're a fishing sailor?"

"Today, at least, I'm a angler, Milord, and a fine angler too! I took a barbell that must weigh thirty pounds, and over fifty mullets. I also have a bucket full of little whiting that will be perfect for frying."

"You sound to me like one who's fished more often in the Bay of Biscay than in the Channel," said Monck, smiling.

"Indeed, I come from the South; does that keep me from being a good angler, Milord?"

"Not at all, and I'd like to buy your catch. But first tell me honestly, where were you taking it?"

"Milord, in all honesty I was making for Newcastle, following the coast, when a large party of horsemen, coming up in the opposite direction, signalled me to turn my boat toward Your Honour's camp or suffer a volley of musketry. Since I wasn't armed for war," added the anglers, smiling, "I thought it best to obey."

"And why were you going to Lambert's camp and not to mine?"

"Milord, I'll be frank, if Your Lordship gives me permission."

"I'll permit it, and if necessary even order it."

"Well, Milord! I was going to Lambert's camp because those city gentlemen pay well while your Scots – Puritans, Presbyterians, Covenanters, whatever you call them – don't eat very much and pay nothing."

Monck shrugged, though he couldn't keep from smiling at the same time. "And why, coming from the South, are you fishing along our shores?"

"Because I was stupid enough to get married in Picardy."

"Maybe so but Picardy isn't England."

"Milord, the man launches his boat to sea but God and the wind move the boat where they please."

"You didn't intend to approach our coast?"

"Not at all."

"What was your intended route?"

"We were returning from Ostend, chasing the mackerel, when a strong southerly wind took us, and seeing it was useless to fight it, we rode it out. Then it was necessary, so as not to lose our catch, to make for the nearest English port that happened to be Newcastle. We were told that was lucky because there were many people camped there, both inside and outside the city, gentlemen both wealthy and hungry, so we headed for Newcastle."

"And your crew, where are they?"

"Oh, my crew, they stayed on board; they're simple, uneducated sailors."

"While you...?" said Monck.

"Oh, me!" said the captain, laughing. "I used to sail with my father, trading, and I know how to say penny, crown, pistole, Louis and double-louis in every language of Europe, so my crew listens to me like an oracle and obeys me like an admiral."

"Then, you're the one who decided Lambert would be the better customer?"

"Yes, of course. And to be frank, Milord, was I wrong?"

"That's what you're going to find out."

"In any case, Milord, if there was a mistake, I'm the one responsible, and you mustn't blame my crew for it."

He definitely has his wits about him, thought Monck. Then, after a few moments of silence while he considered the angler more closely, the general asked, "You come from Ostend, isn't that what you told me?"

"Yes, Milord, straightaway."

"Then you must have heard what they're saying on the coast, as I've no doubt they're interested in French and Dutch affairs. What do they say about the King of England?"

"Ah, Milord!" said the angler, with an expression of honest pleasure. "You're in luck, because you couldn't find a better person to ask about that than me. Listen to this, Milord: after putting in at Ostend to sell the few mackerel we'd taken, I saw the ex-king walking along the dunes waiting for the horses that were to take him to The Hague. He's a tall, pale man, with black hair and a rather severe look. He seemed unwell, and I think the air of Holland might not be good for him."

Monck listened closely to the angler’s rapid and colourful speech that, though in a language not his own, still managed to get his ideas across clearly. The angler spoke a strange mélange of English, French, and some unknown words that were probably Gascon. Fortunately, his eyes spoke for him, and were so eloquent that one could miss a word from his mouth but still get the meaning from his expression. The general seemed increasingly satisfied with his interrogation. “You must have heard that this ex-king, as you call him, was travelling to The Hague for some purpose.”

“Oh, yes!” said the angler. “Indeed, I did.”

“What was this purpose?”

“What else?” said the angler, “Isn’t he consumed with the idea of returning to England?”

“So they say,” said Monck thoughtfully.

“Not to mention,” said the angler, “that the stadtholder ... you know, Milord? William II?”

“Well?”

“He intends to aid him with all his power.”

“Ah! You heard that?”

“No but I believe it.”

“So, you follow politics, then?” asked Monck.

“Oh, Milord, you know how it is! We sailors, who are used to studying the air and the water, that is, the two most changeable things in the world, are rarely mistaken about what else we must travel through.”

“Come,” said Monck, changing the subject, “I hear you’re able to feed us well.”

“I’ll do my best, Milord.”

“How much are you charging for your fish?”

“I’m not such a fool as to set a price, Milord.”

“Why’s that?”

“Because my fish are yours.”

“By what right?”

“By the right of might.”

“But I intend to pay you.”

“That’s very generous of you, Milord.”

“As much as it’s worth too.”

“I’d never ask that much.”

“What do you ask, then?”

“Just to be able to leave.”

“To go where? To General Lambert’s camp?”

“What!” cried the angler. “Why would I go to Newcastle if I no longer have any fish?”

“In any event, listen to me.”

“I’m listening.”

“I have some advice.”

“Really? Milord wants to pay me, and give me advice to boot? Milord overwhelms me.”

Monck looked closely at the angler, whom he seemed to suspect of sarcasm. “Yes, I want to pay you, and offer you some advice, because the two things are connected. If you go, then, to General Lambert’s camp...”

The angler shrugged, as if to say, I won’t argue.

Monck continued, “Don’t go by way of the marsh. You’ll be carrying money, and in the marsh you might encounter some Scottish ambushers I’ve posted there. They’re hard folk and won’t understand the language you speak, though it seems to me to be made of three languages. They might take what I will have given you, and then, when you’re back in your country, you’ll say that General Monck has two hands, one Scottish and one English, and that he takes back with the Scottish hand what he gave with the English.”

“Oh, General, I’ll go wherever you say, never fear,” said the angler, with an anxiety too sincere to be feigned. “But if we’re staying, I just want to stay near here.”

“I believe you,” said Monck, with the hint of a smile. “But I don’t have room for you in my tent.”

“I’d never presume so far, Milord, and only ask Your Lordship to point out where we should go. Anywhere will do, for a night is soon passed.”

“Then I’ll have you escorted back to your boat.”

“As Your Lordship pleases. Only, if Your Lordship included a carpenter in that escort, I’d be grateful.”

“Why is that?”

“Because the gentlemen of your army, Milord, in drawing my boat up the river by a horse-drawn cable, dragged it along the rocky shore, and now I have two feet of water in my hold.”

“All the more reason for you to spend the night on your boat, it seems to me.”

“Milord, I am at your service,” said the angler. “We’ll unload our baskets wherever you say, you’ll pay me whatever you like, and you’ll send me on my way when it suits you to do so. You see how easy I am to get along with.”

“Come, now, you’re not such a bad fellow,” said Monck, whose scrutiny hadn’t detected a single shade of duplicity in the angler’s eye. “Hey! Digby!”

An aide-de-camp appeared. “You will escort this worthy lad and his crew to the row of tents by the canteen, in front of the marsh; that way they’ll be within reach of their boat but won’t have to sleep on the water tonight. What is it, Spithead?” he asked a newcomer who came in suddenly. This Spithead was the sergeant from whom Monck had borrowed the tobacco for his supper.

“Milord,” he said, in English, of course, “a French gentleman has just presented himself at the guard post and is asking to speak with Your Honour.”

Though this report was made in English, the angler responded with a slight start that Monck, occupied with the sergeant, failed to notice. “And who is this gentleman?” asked Monck.

“He told me, Milord,” replied Spithead, “but these French names are so devilish hard for a Scot to say that it didn’t stick with me. However, this gentleman, from what the guards told me, is the same one who presented himself yesterday when Your Honour declined to receive him.”

“True enough; I was holding a staff meeting.”

“What would Milord care to do about this gentleman?”

“Have him brought to me.”

“Should we take any precautions?”

“Such as?”

“Such as blindfolding him, for example.”

“To what end? He can only see what I want him to see that is that I’m surrounded by eleven thousand brave men who ask nothing better than to cut their throats for the honour of the Parliament of England and Scotland.”

“And this man, Milord?” said Spithead, pointing at the angler who during this conversation had stood silently with a blank expression like a man who sees but doesn’t understand.

“Ah, right,” said Monck. Then, turning to the fish merchant, he said, “Farewell, my good man; I’ve selected your lodgings. Digby, take him away. Don’t worry, we’ll send you your money presently.”

“Thank you, Milord,” said the angler who bowed and left with Digby. About a hundred paces from the tent they came upon his crew, who were whispering volubly among themselves, betraying some anxiety but he made a gesture that seemed to reassure them. “Hoy, you lot,” he said, “come along. His Lordship General Monck has the generosity to pay for our fish and the goodness to offer us hospitality for the night.” The anglers fell in behind their captain, and, escorted by Digby, the little troop marched toward the canteen, where they’d been assigned their lodgings. As they walked through the gloom, the anglers passed the guard who was escorting the French gentleman to General Monck. This gentleman was on horseback and wrapped in a large cloak, so the captain couldn’t get a good look at him, despite his curiosity. As for the gentleman, unaware that he was passing fellow countrymen, he paid no attention to the little troop. The aide-de-camp installed his guests in a reasonably clean tent, dislodging an Irish cook-wife who went off with her 6 children to sleep wherever she could. A large fire was burning in front of this tent, casting its flickering light over the open pools in the marsh that were rippled by a cool breeze. Once the crew was settled, the aide-de-camp wished the sailors a good evening, pointing out that the swaying masts of their boat were visible from the tent door, proof that it was still afloat. This sight seemed to please the anglers’ captain.

288 The Treasure

The French gentleman whom Spithead had announced to Monck, and who, enveloped in his cloak, had passed near the angler after he’d left the general’s tent five minutes before, passed through a series of guard posts without so much as glancing around him to avoid appearing too inquisitive. As ordered, he was escorted to the general’s tent. The gentleman was left alone in the sort of canvas antechamber at the tent’s entrance, where he awaited Monck, who was not long in appearing once he’d heard his man’s report. He paused at the gap in the canvas door to study the face of this man who’d requested an interview. The soldier who’d accompanied the French gentleman must have reported that he’d behaved with discretion, for the first impression the foreigner received from his reception by the general was more favourable than he might have expected from such a suspicious man. Nevertheless, as was his usual custom when meeting a stranger, Monck surveyed the man with a penetrating gaze that, for his part, the foreigner tolerated without showing embarrassment or anxiety. After a few moments, the general indicated with a nod and a gesture that he was ready to listen. “Milord,” said the gentleman in excellent English, “I’ve requested an interview with Your Honour on a matter of consequence.”

“Sir,” replied Monck in French, “you speak our language well for a son of the continent. I beg your pardon, because perhaps the question is indiscreet but do you speak French with the same purity?”

“It’s not surprising, Milord, that I speak English fluently, as I lived in England during my youth and since then have visited it twice.” These words were spoken in a French so pure that it not only revealed the speaker as a Frenchman but a native of the region of Tours. “And where in England did you live, Sir?”

“In my youth, in London, Milord. After that, in 1635, I took a pleasure trip to Scotland, and in 1648 I resided for a time in Newcastle, specifically in that abbey whose gardens are occupied by your army.”

“Your pardon, Sir but you understand why I must ask such questions, do you not?”

“I’d be astonished if you didn’t, Milord.”

“Now, Sir, how may I serve, and what do you ask of me?”

“Well, Milord – but first, are we alone?”

“Completely so, Sir, except for the guard outside at his post.”

And saying this, Monck lifted aside the tent door, showing the gentleman the sentry ten paces beyond, where he could be summoned at a single word. “In that case, Milord,” said the gentleman, in a tone as calm as if he were speaking with an old friend, “I’m determined to speak with Your Honour because I know you to be an honest man. Moreover, what I’m about to say will prove the esteem in which I hold you.”

Monck, astonished at the tone that claimed between the French gentleman and himself at least equality, raised his piercing gaze to the stranger’s face, and with the merest trace of irony in his voice, though his expression never changed, he said, “Thank you, Sir – but first, who are you, if you please?”

“I already gave my name to your sergeant, Milord.”

“Your pardon, Sir but he’s Scottish, and found your name difficult to retain.”

“I’m called the Count of La Fère, Sir,” said Athos with a bow.

“The Count of La Fère?” said Monck, searching his memory. “Pardon me, Sir but it seems to me this is the first time I’ve heard that name. Do you fill an office at the Court of France?”

“No. I am a simple gentleman.”

"Of what rank?"

"King Charles I made me a Knight of the Garter, and Queen Anne of Austria gave me the Cordon du Saint-Esprit. Those are my only dignities, Sir."

"The Garter! And the Saint-Esprit! You're a knight of both orders, Sir?"

"Yes."

"And on what occasions were such favours granted to you?"

"For services rendered to Their Majesties."

Monck looked with astonishment at this man, who appeared so simple and yet at the same time so grand; then, as if he'd renounced the intention to penetrate the mystery of this simplicity and grandeur, since the stranger didn't seem disposed to give him any information than what he'd already conveyed, he said, "So, it was you who presented yourself at the guard post yesterday?"

"And who was sent away; yes, Milord."

"Many commanders, Sir, wouldn't let any outsider enter their camp, especially on the eve of a probable battle; but I'm not like my colleagues, and I prefer to leave no loose ends behind me. To me, all advice has value; every danger was sent by God as a warning or test, and I weigh it in my hand and respond with the energy it deserves. Thus, you were turned away yesterday only because I was taking counsel of my staff. Today I am free, so speak."

"Milord, it was quite proper for you to receive me, as my business doesn't concern the battle you're about to have with General Lambert, nor with your camp, and the proof is that I turned my head as I passed through your men and closed my eyes so I couldn't count your tents. No, what I have to say to you, Milord, is on my own account."

"Speak, then, Sir," said Monck.

"Just now," continued Athos, "I had the honour to tell Your Lordship that I once resided in Newcastle; this was at the time when King Charles I was turned over to Cromwell by the Scots."

"I know," said Monck coldly.

"At that moment I had a large sum of gold, and on the eve of the battle, perhaps due to some presentiment as to what would happen the next day, I hid it in the main cellar of Newcastle Abbey, beneath that tower the top of which you can see by the moon's silvery light. My treasure was buried there, and I came to beg Your Honour to allow me to retrieve it before, perhaps, if the battle turned that way, a mine or some other engine of war might destroy the building and scatter my gold, exposing it to the soldiers."

Monck was a judge of men, and he saw in this one a model of energy, reason, and discretion. He could only attribute to magnanimous discernment the confidence the French gentleman showed in him, and he showed himself profoundly touched by it. "Sir," he said, "you have divined my character well. But is the sum worth taking the risk? Can you even believe it's still there?"

"It's there, Milord, I have no doubt of it."

"That answers one question but what of the other? I asked if the sum was so great that it's worth exposing yourself in this way."

"It is that great, Milord, for it's a million in gold that I packed into two barrels."

"A million!" Monck cried, and this time it was Athos who looked at him so long and searchingly that his distrust returned. Here, Monck thought, is a man who's setting a trap for me. ... Aloud, he said, "So, Sir, you would like to retrieve this sum, as I understand it?"

"If you please, Milord."

"Today?"

"This very evening, because of the circumstances that I explained to you."

"But, Sir," objected Monck, "General Lambert is as near to that abbey as I am. Why didn't you address yourself to him?"

"Because, Milord, when one acts on matters of importance, one must trust one's instincts over all. And General Lambert doesn't inspire in me the confidence that you do."

"So be it, Sir. I'll help you retrieve your money, assuming it's still there that it may not be. Since 1648 a dozen years have passed and many things have happened."

Monck offered this excuse to see if the French gentleman would grasp at it but Athos didn't deviate. "I assure you, Milord," he said firmly, "that I'm convinced those two barrels are still there and have changed neither position nor possessor."

This answer removed one suspicion from Monck but suggested another. What if this Frenchman was some agent sent to lead the protector of Parliament astray? The gold might be only a decoy, a lure meant to excite the general's avarice. A treasure like that couldn't really exist. It was up to Monck to expose the gentleman's ruse and turn the tables on his enemies, adding another triumph to his name.

Once Monck had decided what he had to do, "Sir," he said to Athos, "no doubt you will do me the honour of sharing my supper this evening."

"Yes, Milord," replied Athos with a bow, "for you do me an honour that is in accord with my esteem for you."

"It's all the more gracious of you to accept this offer under the circumstances that are that my cooks are few and poorly trained and my foragers have returned this evening with empty hands. In fact, if it wasn't for a angler of your own country who strayed into my camp, tonight General Monck would have no supper at all. I have fresh fish, however, thanks to this sailor."

"Milord, it is principally for the honour of spending a bit more time with you that I accept."

After this exchange of civilities that had done nothing to quell Monck's suspicions, the supper, or what stood in for one, was served before them on a wooden folding table. Monck invited the Count of La Fère to seat himself at the table and sat down across from him. The single platter, stacked with boiled fish that was offered to the illustrious guests, promised more to hungry stomachs than to sophisticated palates. While supping – that is, eating fish and washing it down with bad ale – Monck had Athos tell him of the concluding events of the Fronde, the reconciliation of Sir de Condé with the king, and the probable marriage of His Majesty to the Infanta Maria Teresa. But he avoided any allusion to the current political situation that united, or rather disunited, England, France, and Holland, and Athos did the same. During this conversation Monck became convinced of one thing, confirming his first impression that was that he was dealing with a man of great distinction. This man was no assassin, and Monck couldn't imagine him as a spy. But he showed enough resolve and finesse that he might be a conspirator. When they rose from the table, Monck asked, "You really believe in your treasure, Sir?"

"Yes, Milord."

"Seriously?"

"Quite seriously."

"And you're sure you can find where it was buried?"

"At a single glance."

"Well, Sir!" said Monck. "Out of curiosity, I will go with you. In fact, you need me or one of my lieutenants as your escort, or you wouldn't be allowed to move freely through the camp."

"General, I wouldn't allow you to trouble yourself with this if I didn't need your company – but as I recognise that your company is not only honourable but necessary, I accept."

"Do you think we ought to take any soldiers with us?" Monck asked Athos.

"No point to it, I think, General, unless you believe they're needed. Two men and a horse will suffice to carry the barrels to the sloop that brought me here."

"But surely you must dig, through earth, brick, and stone, and you don't intend to do that yourself, do you?"

"General, there's no need to pry or dig. The treasure is hidden beneath the abbey's burial vault, under a stone that's drawn up by a big iron ring. Beneath that, it's four steps down into a crypt. The barrels are there, placed end to end and covered with plaster to form the shape of a bier. The right stone has a certain inscription on it, and since this is a delicate matter that depends on trust, I'll share the secret with Your Honour. The inscription reads, Hic jacet venerabilis Petrus Guillelmus Scott, Canon. Honourab. Conventus Novi Castellii. Obiit quarta et decima die. Feb. ann. Dom., MCCVIII. Requiescat in pace."

Monck didn't miss a word of this. He was astonished by either the amazing duplicity of this man and the superior manner in which he played his role, or at the candid good faith in which he presented his request in a situation where a million in gold could be lost at the stroke of a dagger, in the middle of an army that would regard the theft as rightful restitution. "All right," he said, "I'll accompany you, and the adventure is so intriguing I'll carry your torch personally." And saying this, he buckled on a short sword and thrust a pistol into his belt, in the act of which his doublet opened enough to reveal beneath it the rings of a mail coat intended to turn an assassin's blade. He took a Scottish dirk in his left hand, and said to Athos, "Are you ready, Sir? I am."

Athos, on the other hand, removed his dagger and put it on the table, unbuckled his sword belt that he placed next to the dagger, and, unbuttoning his doublet while affecting to look for his handkerchief, revealed nothing beneath it but a fine cambric shirt and no other arms or armour. This is indeed a singular man, thought Monck. He's unarmed. Has he laid an ambush down there?

"General," said Athos, as if he'd guessed Monck's thoughts, "you said we should go alone that would usually be right but a high commander should never expose himself to such risk. It's night and the marsh might conceal hidden dangers; bring someone with you."

"You're right," said Monck. And raising his voice, he called, "Digby!"

His aide-de-camp appeared. "Fifty men armed with sword and musket," Monck said, looking at Athos.

"Not enough, if there's real danger," said Athos, "and far too many if there isn't."

"I'll go alone," Monck said. "Digby, I don't need anyone after all. Let's go, Sir."

The Marsh

In going from the camp to the Tweed, Athos and Monck crossed the same ground Digby had crossed bringing the anglers from the Tweed to the camp. The aspect of the place, and the appearance of the changes wrought upon it by the actions of men, made a deep impression on the imagination of a man as sensitive as Athos. Athos saw only desolation, while Monck looked only at Athos as he looked around at heaven and earth, and sought, and thought, and sighed. Digby, to whom the general's last order, and particularly the tone in which it was given, seemed unusual, had followed the two, staying about twenty paces behind. But the expression of the general, upon turning around and seeing that his final orders hadn't been executed, was such that the aide-de-camp realised he was out of line and returned to his tent. He supposed that the general wanted to make one of those incognito inspections of the camp that a veteran commander never fails to make on the eve of a battle, and then tried to explain to himself the presence of Athos, as a subordinate tries to figure out everything mysterious done by his superior. Digby decided that Athos must be a sort of spy who was reporting important information to the general. At the end of ten minutes' walk between the tents and supply posts that were thickest near headquarters, Monck arrived at a pathway that split into three directions. The branch on the left led to the river, the middle branch to Newcastle Abbey, while the path to the right crossed the outer lines of Monck's camp, that is, the lines closest to Lambert's army. Across the river was an advance post of Monck's army, one hundred and fifty Scots who were keeping an eye on the enemy. They had swum across the Tweed, and if attacked were to swim back, giving the alarm but as there was no bridge at this spot, and Lambert's soldiers seemed less eager to enter the water than Monck's, he wasn't much worried about that flank. This side of the river, about five hundred paces from the old abbey, the anglers were lodged in a busy anthill of small tents put up by the soldiers of the local clans to house their wives and children. This haphazard bivouac was visible by the glow of the half-moon that gleamed from stacked musket barrels and highlighted every white piece of linen and canvas. Monck arrived with Athos at this spot, a dark landscape lit only by the moon and a dying fire at the little crossroads of three paths. There Monck stopped and said to his companion, "Sir, do you know your way?"

"General, if I'm not mistaken, the middle road leads straight to the abbey."

"That's the way; but we're going to need a light to go down into the vaults." Monck turned around. "Ah ha! Digby followed us anyway, it appears. All the better; he can get us what we need."

"Yes, General, a man has been shadowing us for quite a while."

"Digby!" cried Monck. "Digby! Come here, please."

But, instead of obeying, the shadow started as if in surprise and then withdrew instead of advancing, crouching and making off to the left toward the riverbank and the little camp where the anglers were lodged. "It seems it wasn't Digby," said Monck.

The pair observed the shadow as it disappeared but it wasn't strange to see someone moving around at eleven o'clock at night in a camp of ten to twelve thousand men, and Athos and Monck weren't alarmed by this apparition. "Well, we're going to need some kind of light, a lantern or a torch, so we can see where we're putting our feet, so let's find one," said Monck.

"General, any soldier we meet can light our way."

"No," said Monck, thinking he saw a way to determine if there was any complicity between the Count of La Fère and the anglers. "No, I'd rather have one of those French sailors who came in tonight to sell me their fish. They leave in the morning and they'll take the secret with them. If the rumour spread through the Scottish army that there were treasures hidden in Newcastle Abbey, my Highlanders will think there's a million under every flagstone and they won't leave one brick standing on another."

"As you wish, General," replied Athos in a tone so natural it was clear that, soldier or sailor, it was all the same to him, and he had no preference.

Monck took the left causeway, beyond which the man he'd mistaken for Digby had disappeared, and encountered a patrol that, going around the bivouac, was returning toward headquarters. The soldiers stopped him and his companion, Monck gave the password, and they continued on their way. Another soldier, awakened by the exchange, rose draped in plaid to see what was going on. "Ask him where the anglers are," said Monck to Athos. "If I speak to him, he'll recognise me." Athos approached the soldier, who pointed out the right tent. Monck and Athos went toward it. It seemed to the general that as they approached a shadow like the one they'd seen before slipped into the tent but when he looked within he realised he must have been mistaken, for everyone there was asleep, lying pell-mell with legs and arms across each other. Athos, thinking he might be suspected of colluding with these other Frenchmen, stayed outside. "Whoa!" said Monck in French. "Wake up in there." Two or three sleepers sat up. "I need a man to light my way," continued Monck.

Everyone stirred at that, some rising and standing. The captain had risen first. "Your Honour can count on us," he said, in an accent that made Athos start. "Where do you want to go?"

"You'll find out. A lantern, who has one? Quickly, now!"

"Yes, your Honour. Would Your Honour like me to accompany him?"

"You or whoever, I don't care, so long as someone lights my way."

Strange, thought Athos. What a distinctive voice that angler has.

"A light, there," cried the captain. "Move it!" Then, whispering to one of his nearby companions, "Take the lantern, Menneville," he said, "And be ready for anything."

One of the anglers struck flint to steel, ignited a piece of tinder, and with this match lit a lantern. The whole tent was instantly illuminated. "Are you ready, Sir?" said Monck to Athos who had turned so his face wasn't exposed to the light.

"Yes, General," Athos replied.

"Ah! That French gentleman," whispered the anglers' captain. "Plague! It's a good thing I thought to give you the job, Menneville, as he might recognise me. Light their way!"

This was spoken at the far end of the tent, and so low that Monck didn't hear a syllable; in any event, he was talking with Athos. Menneville was gathering what he needed while listening to his chief's orders. "Well?" said Monck.

"Be right there, General," said the angler.

Monck, Athos, and the angler left the tent. Impossible, thought Athos. What could I have been thinking?

"Go ahead, and take the middle path," said Monck to the sailor. "Stretch those legs!" They hadn't gone 20 paces before the same shadow once more emerged from the tent, and, crawling along parallel to the causeway, behind a fence of hanging nets, kept a curious eye on the general's progress. All three disappeared into a rising mist. They were walking toward Newcastle Abbey, whose white stones appeared out of the gloom like sepulchres. After standing for a few seconds under the portico, they went through the gate. The door had been splintered by axes. Inside, a squad of four men was sleeping soundly in a corner of the court, so certain were they that there was no chance of attack on this flank. "The presence of these men doesn't bother you?" said Monck to Athos.

"On the contrary, Sir, they can help us roll out the barrels, if Your Honour will permit it."

"Very well."

These sentries, asleep though they were, awoke when they heard their visitors advancing through the brambles and grass that grew in the outer court. Monck gave the password and they went into the abbey's interior, led by the man with the lantern. Monck came last, watching Athos's every movement, his naked dirk in his sleeve, ready to plunge it to the hilt into the French gentleman at the first sign of betrayal. But Athos unhesitatingly marched on through the halls and corridors with a sure step. Not a single door or window was intact. The doors had been burned, some while still on their hinges, where they stood blackened by the fire but only partly consumed, the flames having burned out before they could devour the great oak slabs held together by iron hasps and nails. As for the windows, every inch of glass had been broken out, and night birds, frightened by the lantern light, fled out through the gaping frames. Meanwhile above great bats began to circle the intruders, the lantern light casting their shadows fitfully against the naked walls. Thinking about it, Monck found this spectacle reassuring, as the presence of the animals meant there were no men lurking deeper in the abbey. After traversing many rubble-strewn chambers and tearing down more than one vine that had grown across a doorway, Athos arrived at the great hall under the central tower, with its chapel built over the vaults below. There he stopped. "Here we are, General," he said.

"Have you found the right slab?"

"Yes."

"Indeed, I see this flagstone has a ring but it's mortared down flat."

"We need a lever."

"That's easily gotten." Looking around, Athos and Monck spotted an ash sapling three inches in diameter growing up in a corner, toward a window now filled by its branches. "Do you've a knife?" Monck asked the angler.

"Yes, Sir."

"Hack down this tree then."

The angler drew a cutlass and obeyed, though not without notching its blade. When the trunk was stripped, it served as a lever, and the three men opened the crypt. "Wait there," said Monck to the angler, pointing to a corner of the chapel. "We have black powder to dig up, and your lantern would be dangerous."

The man recoiled in fear and retreated to the spot assigned to him, while Monck and Athos turned back to the crypt, where luckily a beam of moonlight fell directly on the stone that the Count of La Fère had come so far to find. "There it is," said Athos, showing the general the slab with its Latin inscription.

"Indeed," said Monck. Then, offering the Frenchman one final opportunity to give up his pretence, he said, "Have you noticed, lining the chapel, the number of broken statues?"

"Milord, you have no doubt heard of the religious practice of the Scots whereby they erect statues of the deceased to protect the valuable objects they had in life. Some soldiers no doubt thought those statues might conceal treasure beneath them, so they overthrew the statues and cracked open their pedestals. But the tomb of the venerable canon before us was never distinguished by a monument, protected instead by your Puritans' superstitious fear of sacrilege; not an inch of this tomb has been chipped."

"That's true," said Monck.

Athos took up his makeshift lever. "Do you want any help?" asked Monck.

"Thank you, Milord but I don't want Your Honour to put your hand to work on any labour that you might not wish to take responsibility for later, once you knew the consequences."

Monck raised his head. "What do you mean by that, Sir?" he asked.

"What I mean is ... wait, that man."

"Right," said Monck. "I understand what you fear, so let's put him to the test."

Monck turned toward the angler, whose silhouette was outlined by the light of his lantern. "Come here, friend," he ordered the man in English.

The angler didn't budge. "It's fine," he continued, "he doesn't understand English. Speak in English, if you please, Sir."

"Milord," replied Athos, "I have known men who, under certain circumstances, are able to pretend not to answer a question posed in a language they supposedly don't understand. The angler may be more cunning than we think. Please dismiss him, Milord."

No doubt about it, thought Monck, he wants me alone in this vault with him. No matter, let's see this to the end; he's only one man, and I should be a match for him.

"My friend," Monck said in French to the angler, "wait for us outside the entrance, and make sure no one comes in to disturb us."

The angler moved to obey. "Leave your lantern," said Monck. "It will just reveal your location and might attract a stray musket shot."

The angler seemed to appreciate this advice, set down his lantern, and disappeared under the arch of the entrance. Monck went and took up the lantern that he brought down into the crypt. "So!" he said. "There's a fortune hidden in this tomb?"

"Yes, Milord, and in five minutes you will cease to doubt it."

And saying this, Athos used the ash lever to strike a violent blow on the surface of the plaster that cracked and split. He inserted the lever into the crack and pried up whole slabs of plaster that split and fell aside. Then the Count of La Fère resorted to his hands, tearing off hunks of mortar with a strength one would never have suspected in such delicate fingers. "Milord," said Athos, "this is the concealing masonry of which I told Your Honour."

"Yes but I don't yet see any barrels," said Monck.

"If I had a dagger," said Athos, looking around, "you'd see them sooner. Unfortunately, I forgot mine in Your Honour's tent."

"I'd offer you mine," said Monck, "but the blade isn't strong enough for what you have in mind."

Athos seemed to hunt around for an object that would serve the purpose he desired. Monck watched every movement of his hands, every expression of his eyes. "Why don't you ask that angler for his blade?" said Monck. "He has a cutlass."

"Ah, quite so!" said Athos. "The one he used to cut down that tree." He went to the staircase. "My friend," he called to the angler, "toss me your cutlass, if you please, I need it."

The weapon clanged down the steps.

"Take it," said Monck. "It looks to me like a solid enough instrument, and a firm hand could make good use of it."

Athos seemed to accord to Monck's words only the natural and simple meaning in which they were couched. He also didn't notice, or didn't seem to notice, that when he returned toward Monck, Monck stepped back, putting his left hand on the butt of his pistol: the right hand already held his dirk. Athos set to work, turning his back toward Monck and putting his life in his hands. He made a few sharp and adroit blows on the connecting plaster that separated it into two parts, and Monck could then see two barrels placed end to end encased in a chalky shell. "Milord," said Athos, "you see that my presentiments are proven true."

"Yes, Sir," said Monck, "and I have every reason to believe you're satisfied, do I not?"

"Entirely. The loss of this money would have been a terrible blow to me but I was certain that God, who protects the good cause, would not have allowed us to lose the gold that could let us triumph."

"Upon my honour, you're as mysterious in your words as in your actions, Sir," said Monck. "Just now, I didn't understand what you meant when you said that I might not want to be responsible for the task you just accomplished."

"I had good reason to say that, Milord."

"And now you speak of the good cause. What do you mean by those words, the good cause? At present we're fighting for five or six causes here in England that doesn't keep anyone from regarding their own, not only as good but as the best. Which is yours, Sir? Speak frankly, and then we'll see if on this point, to which you attach such great importance, we are of the same opinion." Athos gave Monck one of those penetrating looks as if probing for deception; then, removing his hat, he began to speak in a solemn voice, while his listener, hand to his face, allowed his long, nervous fingers to ply his moustache and beard, while his vague and melancholy gaze wandered aimlessly around the crypt.

Heart & Mind

to carry on the civil war. Alas, Milord, that is the fatal situation of that unhappy prince, that he must either corrupt or kill; for everything resists him, all are against him, yet he is marked with the divine seal of royalty, and to be true to his blood, he must retake the throne or die trying on the sacred soil of his fatherland. Milord, you have heard what I have to say. To anyone other than the illustrious man whom I address, I would have said, 'Milord, you are poor; Milord, the king offers you this million as down payment on a great bargain: take it and serve Charles II as I have served Charles I, and I am sure that God, who listens to us, who sees us, who reads in your heart what is hidden from all human eyes, I am sure that God will grant you a happy eternal life after death.' But to General Monck, to the illustrious man whose measure I believe I have taken, I say, 'Milord, there is a brilliant place for you in the history of nations and kings, an immortal and imperishable glory. With no motive but the good of your country and the interest of justice, you can become the prime supporter of your king. Many others have been conquerors or usurpers; you, Milord, will be satisfied to be the most virtuous, honest, and worthy of men; you will have held a crown in your hand and instead of fitting it to your brow, you will have placed it on the head for whom it was made. Oh, Milord! Act thus, and you will bequeath to posterity the most glorious name a mortal can bear."

Athos stopped. During the whole time the noble gentleman was speaking, Monck hadn't given the slightest sign of approval or disapproval. Despite this earnest speech, his eyes had scarcely shown even a glint of intelligence. The Count of La Fère looked at him sadly, and seeing that dull visage, felt discouragement enter his heart. Finally, Monck stirred, and breaking the silence, said in a soft and solemn voice, "Sir, I am going to use your own words to answer you. To anyone other than you, I would respond with expulsion, imprisonment, or worse. Because in fact, you tempt me and at the same time force my hand. But you are one of those men, Sir, to whom one can't refuse the attention and consideration they deserve. You're a brave gentleman, Sir, for I know one when I see one. You mentioned a fortune that the late king set aside for his son; are you not one of those Frenchmen who, as I've heard, attempted to rescue Charles from Whitehall?"

"Yes, Milord, in fact I was under the scaffold during his execution, where I, having been unable to redeem him, received on my forehead the blood of the martyred king. At the same time, I heard the last word of Charles I, for it was to me that he said, 'Remember!' And in saying 'Remember,' Milord, he was referring to the gold now at your feet."

"I have heard a great deal about you, Sir," said Monck, "but I'm glad I had the opportunity to meet you for myself and not to judge you at second hand. I will give you explanations I've shared with no one else, so you'll appreciate the distinction I make between you and those who've been sent to me before." Athos bowed, eager to absorb the words about to fall from Monck's mouth as rare and precious as drops of dew in the desert. "You speak to me of King Charles II," said Monck. "But tell me, I pray you, Sir, what does that shadow of a king mean to me? I have grown old in war and in politics, two things that, today, are so closely bound together that every man of the sword must fight for his rights and ambition on his own behalf, rather than blindly follow the orders of an officer, as in ordinary wars. For myself, I desire nothing but I fear everything – for on the outcome of today's war depends the freedom of England, and perhaps of every Englishman. Why, given the situation of free action I've made for myself, should I shackle myself to a stranger? For that's all that Charles is to me. Insofar as Charles has fought battles here and lost them, he's a bad general; inasmuch as he's failed in every negotiation, he's a bad diplomat; and since he bemoans his misery in all the courts of Europe, he shows a character weak and cowardly. Nothing of nobility, nothing of leadership, nothing of strength has he shown, this genius who aspires to govern one of the greatest realms of the Earth. So, I know this Charles only by his weaknesses; and you want me, a man of good sense, to go and freely enslave myself to this creature who is my inferior militarily, politically, and personally? No, Sir. Once some great and noble action has taught me to appreciate this Charles, I may recognise his rights to a throne that we removed from his father, because he lacked all those virtues that so far are also lacked by the son. But when it comes to rights, I recognise only my own; the revolution made me a general, and if I desire it, my sword will make me the Protector. Let Charles show us what he's made of, let him present himself fairly, let him enter the competition that is open to genius, and most of all let him remember that he comes of a race of which we will ask more than of any other. Sir, we need speak no more of this; as for me, I neither refuse nor accept. I watch, and I wait."

Athos knew that Monck was so well informed about everything relating to Charles II that there was no point to further argument – this was neither the time nor place for it. "Milord," he said, "it's only left for me to thank you."

"For what, Sir? Because you judged my character well and were proven right? Is that worthy of thanks? That gold you take to King Charles will serve to test him for me; once I see what he does with it that may give me a new opinion."

"Isn't Your Honour concerned he might compromise himself by allowing such a sum to reach the hands of his enemy?"

"My enemy, you say? Why, Sir, I don't have any enemies. I am in service to Parliament that orders me to fight General Lambert and King Charles – their enemies, not mine – and so I fight them. If the Parliament, on the contrary, ordered me to fly my flag in the port of London, to assemble my soldiers on the riverbank to receive King Charles II..."

"You would obey?" Athos gasped.

"Forgive me," said Monck, smiling. "Here I am, with a head of grey hair, about to speak childish nonsense. Where is my mind?"

"So, you wouldn't obey?" said Athos.

"I didn't say that either, Sir. The good of my country comes before everything else. God, who had a reason for giving me strength, probably wanted me to use that strength for the good of all; at least I think so, for he also made me perceptive. If the Parliament ordered me to do that, I'd ... consider."

Athos frowned. "I see, then," he said, "that Your Honour definitely isn't disposed to favour King Charles II."

"Always you question me, Sir le Count. Now it's my turn, if you please."

"Do so, Sir, and may God inspire you to reply as honestly as I shall!"

"When you have brought this million back to your prince, what will you advise him to do?"

Athos fixed Monck with a look both proud and resolute. "Milord," he said, "while others might advise using that million as a lever in negotiations, I'd tell the king to raise two regiments with it, bring them into Scotland that you have just pacified, and give the people those freedoms that the revolution had promised but has not delivered. I would advise him to command this little army in person – and it would grow, believe me – and then to die, flag in hand and sword in its sheath, saying, 'Englishmen! Here is the third of my race whom you'd kill: beware of the justice of God!'"

Monck lowered his head and thought for a moment. "If he succeeded," he said, "which is unlikely, though not impossible, for everything is possible in this world, what would you counsel then?"

"To think that by the will of God he had lost his crown but by the goodwill of men he regained it."

An ironic smile touched Monck's lips. "Unfortunately, Sir," he said, "kings rarely listen to good advice."

"Ah but Milord, Charles II is no king," replied Athos, smiling in his turn, albeit with a different expression than Monck's.

"Come, let's end this, Sir le Count. We've said enough, haven't we?"

Athos bowed. "I'll give the order to have you and your two barrels taken wherever you like. Where are you staying, Sir?"

"In a little village at the mouth of the river, Your Honour."

"I know this village; it's composed of no more than five or six houses, is it not?"

"That's it; I've taken the largest that I'm sharing with a couple of fishnet knotters. It's their boat that brought me here."

"But you have a vessel of your own, Sir?"

"Mine is anchored a quarter of a mile offshore, where it awaits me."

"But you don't intend to leave immediately?"

"Milord, I hope to try one more time to convince Your Honour."

"You won't succeed," replied Monck, "but it's important for you to leave Newcastle without your passage raising the least suspicion toward either of us. My officers think that Lambert will attack me tomorrow. I, on the contrary, think he won't make a move; in my eyes it seems impossible. Lambert commands an army without a common cause, and that's no army at all. I have told my soldiers to consider my authority subordinate to a superior authority, so that after me, around me, or above me, they still have something to follow. The result is that, if I die, my army won't be immediately demoralized, and even if, for example, I decided to leave the camp for a while, as I sometimes do, there wouldn't be in my troops the least shadow of anxiety or disorder. Today I am the great magnet that draws together all the natural and sympathetic forces of the English. All this scattered iron that's sent against me, I will draw it together. At this moment Lambert's command consists of eighteen thousand deserters – though I didn't share that number with my officers, as you can well imagine. Nothing is more useful to an army than the feeling of imminent battle; everyone is careful, everyone is alert. I tell you this so you can rest assured that you can stay nearby safely. A week from now, there will be a new situation, either from battle or negotiation. At that time, because you've judged me to be an honest man, and confided to me your secret – and I must thank you for your confidence – I'll either visit you or send for you. I sincerely ask you not to leave until we've spoken again."

"I so swear, General!" cried Athos, so transported by joy that, despite his natural reserve, he couldn't suppress a sparkle in his eye. Monck spotted this flash, and immediately stifled one of those mute smiles that passed across his lips when he saw that someone believed they'd divined what he was thinking. "So, Milord," said Athos, "a week will be the extent of our delay?"

"One week, yes, Sir."

"And during this week, what shall I do?"

"If there's a battle, keep out of it, I pray you. I know you French are curious about these kinds of amusements, and you'd like to assess our manner of fighting but you'd just catch a stray bullet. Our Scots are terrible marksmen, and I'd hate to see a worthy gentleman like you return wounded to France. I don't want to have to be responsible for sending your million on to your prince for you, for that would look like I was paying the pretender to wage war on the Parliament, and with some justification. Go then, Sir, stay low, and keep to what's agreed between us."

"Ah, Milord!" said Athos. "What joy it would be to be the first to penetrate to that noble heart that beats beneath your cloak."

"So, you believe that I keep secrets," said Monck, without changing the half-wry expression on his face. "Why, Sir, what secrets do you think could be kept in the hollow head of a soldier? But it's getting late, and our lantern is burning down; time to call our man. Whoa!" cried Monck in French, approaching the foot of the stairs. "Whoa! Angler!" The angler, numbed by the night's chill, replied in a hoarse voice asking what was wanted. "Go to the sentry post," said Monck, "and order the sergeant there, on the behalf of General Monck, to come here at once." This was an easy commission to fulfil, for the sergeant, intrigued by the presence of the general in this deserted abbey, had slowly followed, coming little by little until he was only a few steps from the angler. Thus, the general's order reached him directly and he hurried to comply. "Get a horse and two men," said Monck.

"A horse and two men?" repeated the sergeant.

"Yes," Monck replied. "Can you get a packhorse with two paniers?"

"Sure, no more than a hundred paces from here in the Scottish camp."

"Good."

"What do I do with the horse, General?"

"Look here."

The sergeant came down the three or four steps that separated him from Monck and appeared in the vault. "Do you see, there by that gentleman?" Monck said to him.

"Yes, General."

"You see those two barrels?"

"Yes, Sir."

"These two barrels contain, one of them powder, the other musket balls. I want you to have these barrels taken to the little village at the mouth of the river that I intend to garrison with two hundred muskets. You understand that this mission is secret, because this is a flanking movement that could decide the battle."

"Oh! Yes, General," murmured the sergeant.

"Good! So, tie these two barrels on the horse, and then you and the two men are to escort this gentleman, who is my friend, to his house. But, you understand, without attracting attention."

"I'd go through the marsh if I only knew a way," said the sergeant.

"I know one," said Athos. "It's narrow but it's solid, as it's laid over piles. If we're careful, we can manage it."

"Do what this cavalier tells you to," said Monck.

"Whoa! These barrels are heavy," said the sergeant, trying to lift one.

"About four hundred pounds each, if they contain what they should, eh, Sir?"

"More or less," said Athos.

The sergeant went to find the two men and the horse. Monck, left alone with Athos, seemed inclined to make only small talk, while distractedly examining the vault. Then, hearing the hooves of the horse, he said, "I'll leave you with your men, Sir, and return to the camp. You should be safe."

"I can count on seeing you again, Milord?" asked Athos.

"So I've said, Sir, and it will be my great pleasure." Monck held out his hand to Athos.

“Oh, Milord, if only you would!” murmured Athos.

“Hush, Sir!” said Monck. “We agreed to say no more about it.”

And, saluting Athos, he went up, passing the men on the stairs who were coming down. He’d gone no more than twenty paces outside the abbey when he heard a long, low whistle. Monck cocked an ear but, seeing nothing, continued on his way. Then he remembered the angler and looked around for him but the angler had disappeared. However, if he’d looked a bit more closely, he’d have seen his man bent over double, slipping like a snake along the stones and losing himself in the mist, skimming along the surface of the marsh. And if he could have seen through the mist, he’d have seen something else that would have attracted his attention that was that the masts of the anglers’ boat showed it had moved closer in to the river bank. But Monck saw nothing and, thinking he had nothing to fear, took the deserted causeway that led to the camp. It was as he did so that the disappearance of the angler struck him as strange and he began to have serious suspicions. He had just placed at Athos’s orders the only soldiers who were near enough to protect him, and he had nearly a mile to cross to return to camp. The fog rose and thickened, so that one could barely distinguish objects at a distance of ten paces. Monck thought he heard a sound like the beat of an oar echoing from the swamp on his right. “Who’s there?” he shouted. But no one answered. Then he cocked his pistol, took his dirk in hand, and hurried on without another word. Calling for help, when there was no urgent reason to do so, seemed to him to be beneath him.

The Next Day

It was 7<sub>AM</sub>: the first light of day glanced from the pools in the marsh, the sun reflected in them like a crimson ball, when Athos, getting up and opening his bedroom window that looked out on the riverbank, saw not fifteen paces away the sergeant and men who’d escorted him the day before, and who, after leaving the barrels at his house, had returned to the camp by the causeway. Having returned to camp, why had the men come back again?

That was the question that suddenly occupied Athos’s mind. The sergeant, head up and alert, seemed to have been waiting for the moment the gentleman would appear to question him. Athos, surprised to find before him those he’d seen departing the day before, was unable to conceal his astonishment. “There’s no reason for surprise, Sir,” said the sergeant. “Yesterday the general ordered me to watch over your safety, and I’m obeying that order.”

“The general is in camp?” asked Athos.

“Doubtless, Sir, since you left him yesterday going there.”

“Very well! Wait a moment and I’ll go there to give an account of your loyal service, and to recover my sword that I left yesterday on the table.”

“That suits us perfectly,” said the sergeant, “for we were going to ask you to do that.” Athos thought he noticed a sardonic edge to the sergeant’s expression but the adventure in the vault might have excited the man’s curiosity, in which case it was no surprise to read on his face the ideas disturbing his mind. Athos shut all the doors firmly and gave the keys to Grimaud, who had taken up residence in the shed over the locked door to the cellar where the barrels were stored. The sergeant escorted the Count of La Fère to the gates of the camp. There, a new guard squad awaited and took over for the four men who’d accompanied Athos thus far. This new guard was commanded by Aide-de-Camp Digby, who, during their walk, regarded Athos with such baleful looks that the Frenchman wondered what he’d done to deserve them, when the day before he’d been so perfectly respectful. He continued on his way toward headquarters while keeping to himself his observations about his escort and situation. Inside the general’s tent, where he’d been taken the day before, he found three superior officers, Monck’s lieutenant commander and two colonels. Athos saw that his sword was still on the general’s table, where he’d left it the day before. None of these officers had seen Athos before, and therefore didn’t know him. Monck’s lieutenant commander asked, indicating Athos, if this was the gentleman with whom Monck had left the tent. “Yes, Your Honour,” said the sergeant, “the very same.”

“I never denied it,” said Athos haughtily. “And now, it seems to me, Gentlemen, it’s my turn to ask you the point of all these questions, especially the tone in which they’re asked.”

“Sir,” said the lieutenant commander, “if we address these questions to you, it’s because we have the right to do so, and if we do so in such a tone, it’s because that tone, believe me, is appropriate to the situation.”

“Gentlemen,” said Athos, “you don’t know me but I must tell you that I recognise no one here as my equal except General Monck. Where is he? Let me be taken before him, and if he has any questions to ask me, I’ll answer them, and to his satisfaction, I hope. I repeat, Gentlemen: where is the general?”

“God! You’d know better than we where he is,” said the lieutenant.

“Me?”

“Sir, I don’t understand you,” said Athos.

“You will understand me – but first of all, for God’s sake, Sir, keep your voice down. Now, what did you talk about with the general yesterday?”

Athos smiled disdainfully. “We don’t want your smiles,” said one of the colonels angrily, “we want answers.”

“And I, Gentlemen, declare that you’ll get no response unless it’s in the presence of the general.”

“But you’re well aware that you’re asking the impossible,” said the same colonel.

“That’s the second time you’ve responded strangely to my request,” said Athos. “Is the general gone?”

Athos’s question was asked in such obvious good faith, and with such an air of naïve surprise, that the three officers exchanged glances. The lieutenant commander spoke by tacit agreement of the two other officers. “Sir,” he said, “the general left you yesterday on the outskirts of the abbey?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“And you went…?”

“It’s not for me to answer that, it’s up to those who escorted me. They’re your soldiers, question them.”

“But if it pleases us to question you?”

“Then it will please me to answer you, Sir that I don’t know anyone here, I know only the general, and it’s to him that I’ll respond.”

“Perhaps, Sir but we are in charge, we’re set up as a council of war, and when you stand before judges, you must answer them.”

To this the face of Athos expressed only surprise and disdain, rather than the fear the officers expected their threat to evoke. “Scottish or Englishmen to judge me, a subject of the King of France – me, here under the safeguard and protection of British honour!” said Athos, shrugging his shoulders. “It’s madness, Gentlemen.”

The officers looked at him. “Then, Sir,” said the leader, “you pretend not to know where the general is?”

“As to that, Sir, I already said so.”

“Yes but that answer just isn’t believable.”

“It’s nonetheless true, Sir. People of my rank don’t usually lie. I’m a gentleman as I told you and when I wear at my side the sword that I left last night on that table where it still is today through an excess of delicacy, no one tells me anything I deem unworthy to hear, believe me. However, today I’m disarmed; if you claim to be my judges, then judge me. But if you’re merely executioners, then kill me.”

“Oh, really, Sir,” said the lieutenant in a more courteous voice, struck by Athos’s grandeur and self-possession.

“Sir, I came here to speak confidentially with your general on matters of importance. He received me with no ordinary welcome, as your soldiers can convincingly report. If your general gave me such a welcome, it’s because he knew I was worthy of his esteem. So, don’t suppose I’m going to reveal my secrets to you, let alone his.”

“But those barrels, what do they contain?”

“Haven’t you asked your soldiers that? What did they tell you?”

“That they contained powder and shot.”

“And where did they get that information? They must have told you.”

“From the general; but we’re not fools.”

“Take care, Sir, for it’s not me you’re calling a liar, it’s your commander.”

The officers looked at each other again. Athos continued, “In front of your soldiers, the general asked me to wait a week for him, that in one week he’d have an answer for what I’d asked him. Should I have left? No, I’m here and I wait.”

“He told you to wait for a week!” said the lieutenant.

“He said that, Sir, though he knew I had a sloop at anchor outside the river mouth and could have embarked on it yesterday and sailed away. Now, if I’m still here, it’s solely to conform to the general’s wishes. His Honour advised me not to leave until he’d given me a final audience at the end of a week. So, I tell you again, I’m waiting.”

The lieutenant commander turned to the other two officers and said, in a low voice, “If that gentleman is right, there’s reason to hope. The general has sometimes conducted negotiations so secret he thought it unwise to warn even us. If so, then the outside limit of his absence will be a week.”

Then, turning to Athos, “Sir,” he said, “your statement is of the gravest importance; will you repeat it under oath?”

“Sir,” replied Athos, “I have always lived in a world in which my word is regarded as a sacred oath already.”

“However, this time, Sir, the circumstances are more serious than any in which you’ve previously found yourself. This involves the security of an entire army. Consider: the general has disappeared, so we must search for him. Was the disappearance natural? Was some crime committed? Should we pursue our investigations, no matter what, or should we wait patiently? At this point, Sir, everything depends on what you have to say to us.”

“Asked in that way, Sir, I don’t hesitate to reply,” said Athos. “Yes, I had come to speak confidentially with General Monck to ask him for a response relating to certain interests. Yes, the general, being unable, no doubt, to provide an answer in advance of the expected battle, asked me to wait a week longer in the house where I was lodging, promising me that in a week he would see me again. Yes, all of the foregoing is true, as I swear by God, who is the absolute master of my life and yours.”

Athos pronounced these words with such solemnity and majesty that the three officers were nearly convinced. However, one of the colonels made a final attempt: “Sir,” he said, “though we’re now persuaded of the truth of what you say, there’s still a strange mystery in all this. The general is too prudent a man to abandon his army on the eve of battle without giving at least one of us a warning. As for me, I admit I can’t help but believe that some strange event is behind his disappearance. Yesterday, some foreign anglers came to sell us their fish, and were lodged with the Scots near the road used by the general to go to the abbey with Sir and then to return. It was one of those anglers who lit the general’s way with a lantern. In the morning, boat and anglers had both disappeared, carried away on the midnight tide.”

“I don’t see anything unnatural in that,” said the lieutenant. “After all, those people weren’t prisoners.”

“No but I repeat, it was one of them who lighted the way of the general and Sir to the abbey vault, and Digby assured us that the general was suspicious of them. Now, who can prove these anglers weren’t colluding with Sir here, and that once the blow was struck, Sir, who is certainly brave, didn’t stay to reassure us by his presence and turn aside an investigation?”

This argument made an impression on the other 2 officers. “Sir,” said Athos, “permit me to say that your reasoning, plausible though it sounds, falls apart where it concerns me. I stayed behind, you say, to allay your suspicions. But on the contrary, Gentlemen, I can have suspicions as well as you have, and I say it’s impossible for the general, on the eve of a battle, to go off without saying anything to anyone. Yes, there is some strange event involved in this, and rather than remain idle and waiting, you must exhibit all possible activity and vigilance. I am your prisoner, Gentlemen, on parole or otherwise. My honour is engaged in learning what has become of General Monck, so much so that if you said, ‘Depart!’ I’d say, ‘No, I remain.’ And if you asked for my opinion, I’d say, ‘Yes, the general is the victim of some plot or conspiracy, for if he were going to leave the camp, he’d have told me so. Seek, search everywhere, by land and by sea; the general hasn’t left, at least not of his own free will.’”

The lieutenant commander shared a significant look with the other officers. “No, Sir,” he said, “now you go too far. The general is unlikely to be a victim in these events, and in all likelihood he’s directed them. General Monck has done this kind of thing before. It would be a mistake for us to be alarmed; no doubt his absence will be short-lived, so we should be careful to avoid doing something out of fear to announce his absence, because if we demoralize his army that, to the general, would be the true crime. The general is giving us proof of his confidence in us, and to be worthy of his esteem we must wreath the whole affair in profound silence. We’re going to safeguard Sir, not out of distrust because he’s committed a crime but to better ensure the secret of the general’s absence by keeping him with us, so until further notice Sir will live here at headquarters.”

"Gentlemen," said Athos, "you forget that the general entrusted me with a charge over which I must keep watch. Give me whatever guard you please, shackle me if you must but use my house as my prison. Otherwise I swear the general, on his return, will reproach you for it, on my faith as a gentleman."

The officers consulted with one another for a moment, and then the lieutenant commander said, "So be it, Sir; return to your house." They gave Athos a guard of 50 men who surrounded his house, not losing sight of him for a moment. The secret was kept but hours passed, and then days, without the return of the general or any word of him.

Contraband Merchandise

Two days after the events just related, while General Monck was expected to return to the camp at any instant – but did not – a small Dutch tracker, with a ten-man crew, dropped anchor offshore from Scheveningen, almost within cannon-shot of the port. It was the darkest hour of the night and the tide was rising in the gloom, an excellent time to disembark passengers and unload merchandise. The harbour of Scheveningen that curved in a broad crescent, was shallow and moreover unsafe; almost nothing anchored there but large Flemish hoys or local Dutch fishing boats that the sailors drew up on the sand on rollers, as Virgil says the ancients did in the Mediterranean. When the tide is rising it isn't safe to bring a vessel too close to shore, for if the wind is stiff its prow can be driven into the sand, and the sand of that coast is spongy: what it takes in it doesn't give up so easily. This was probably why a longboat detached from the tracker as soon as it dropped anchor and came in with eight of its sailors, who surrounded a long oblong object, some sort of basket or box. The shore was deserted; the few anglers who lived in the dunes were in bed. The sole watchman who guarded the coast – a coast very poorly guarded, since disembarking from large vessels was impossible – was imitating the sleeping anglers as far as possible, though he had to sleep in his sentry box instead of a bed. The only sound to be heard was the whistling of the night breeze as it hissed through the heather on the dunes. But the approaching sailors must have been suspicious men, for the apparent solitude didn't satisfy them, and their boat, barely visible as a dark blot on the ocean, slipped in without sound, eschewing the noisy use of oars, until the tide drove it onto the sand. The moment he felt the keel strike a single man jumped out of the longboat, after giving a brief order in a voice that indicated the habit of command. As a consequence of this order, several muskets immediately showed themselves by the faint light from the sea, that mirror of the sky, and the oblong bundle previously mentioned that doubtless contained some form of contraband, was carried ashore with infinite care. Immediately, the man who'd landed first ran diagonally past the village of Scheveningen, heading for the nearest grove of the wood. There he sought that house that we saw once before through the trees, and which we know was the temporary, and very humble, dwelling of he who was called by courtesy the King of England. Everyone was asleep there as elsewhere; only a big dog, of the breed the fishmongers of Scheveningen harness to their little carts to carry their fish into The Hague, began a wild barking as soon as he heard the stranger's footsteps outside the windows. But this reception, instead of frightening the newcomer, seemed on the contrary to delight him, for his voice might not have been enough to awaken the inhabitants of the house but with the dog's assistance his voice was hardly needed. The stranger therefore waited until the repeated barking had had its probable effect, and then ventured to call out. At that sound the mastiff began to roar with greater violence, and soon another voice was heard within, quieting the watchdog. Once the dog had settled down, a voice, weak, broken, and polite, said, "Wh-what do you want?"

"To call on His Majesty King Charles II," said the stranger.

"What do you want with him?"

"I want to speak with him."

"Who are you?"

"Ah, God be with you! Too many questions. I don't like talking through doors."

"Just tell me your name."

"I don't like to announce my name in the open air. Look, it's not like I'm going to eat your dog – I just hope to God he doesn't eat me."

"You bring news, maybe, Sir?" replied the voice, patient and hesitant like that of an old man.

"In fact, I do bring news, and news you'd never expect! So, open up, won't you?"

"Sir," continued the old man, "on your soul and conscience, do you believe your news is worth waking the king for?"

"For the love of God! My dear Sir, you won't be sorry, I swear to you, for putting him to the trouble. I'm worth my weight in gold, word of honour!"

"Sir, I simply cannot open this door until you tell me your name."

"Must I, then?"

"That's my master's order, Sir."

"All right! My name is ... but I warn you, my name won't tell you anything."

"Nevertheless, tell me anyway."

"Well! I'm the Sir d'Artagnan."

The voice gave a happy gasp. "My God!" said the old man on the other side of the door. "Sir d'Artagnan! What joy! I thought I recognised that voice."

"Well!" said d'Artagnan to himself. "They know my voice here. How flattering!"

"Oh, yes, we know it!" said the old man, throwing open the locks. "And here's the proof."

And with these words he admitted d'Artagnan who, by the light of the lantern in the old man's hand, recognised the stubborn guardian. "God!" he cried. "It's Parry! I should have known."

"Parry, yes, my dear Sir d'Artagnan, it is I. What joy to see you again!"

"Well said: what joy!" said d'Artagnan, squeezing the old man's hands. "That! Now you'll warn the king, won't you?"

"But the king is asleep, my dear Sir."

"God! Awaken him and he won't scold you for disturbing him, I promise you."

"Do you come on behalf of the count?"

"Which count?"

"The Count of La Fère."

"On the behalf of Athos? My faith, no – I come on behalf of me. Let's go to the king, Parry! I need to see the king!"

Parry didn't feel a duty to resist any longer; he'd known d'Artagnan a long time and knew that, Gascon though he was, his words never promised more than they could deliver. He led the way across a courtyard and a small garden, soothed the dog, who seriously wanted a taste of musketeer, and knocked on the shutter of a small chamber on the ground floor of a rear pavilion. Immediately a small dog within began imitating the big dog in the courtyard. "Poor king!" d'Artagnan said to himself. "These are his bodyguards. Though it's true they're not the worst sentries I've seen."

"What is it?" asked the king from within the chamber.

"Sire, it's the Sir d'Artagnan who's brought news."

No more noise from within, just the door quickly opened. Bright light flooded the corridor and the garden, for the king had been working by lamplight. Papers were scattered across his desk where he had begun the draft of a letter that, by its many erasures, showed the difficulty he was having in writing it. "Come in, Sir le Sir," he said. But upon turning he saw only a angler, and asked, "What were you talking about, Parry, and where is the Sir d'Artagnan?"

"He is before you, Sire," said d'Artagnan.

"In such an outfit?"

"Yes. Look closely at me, Sire; don't you recognise the man you saw at Blois in the antechambers of King Louis XIV?"

"I do, Sir, and I recall that I had much to thank you for."

D'Artagnan bowed. "It was my duty to behave as I did, once I knew I was dealing with Your Majesty."

"You bring me news, you say?"

"Yes, Sire."

"On the behalf of the King of France, no doubt?"

"My faith, no, Sire," replied d'Artagnan. "Your Majesty must have seen that the King of France is occupied only with his own majesty."

Charles rolled his eyes and sighed.

"No, Sire," continued d'Artagnan, "I bring news that I've made myself. However, I dare to hope that Your Majesty will hear this news with some favour."

"Speak, Sir."

"If I'm not mistaken, Sire, Your Majesty spoke forcefully at Blois about the frustration of his affairs in England."

Charles flushed. "Sir," he said, "I spoke of that only to the King of France."

"No, Your Majesty is mistaken," said the musketeer coolly. "When kings are in trouble, they also speak to me. In fact, that's the only time they speak to me; once the sun shines again, they speak to me no more. But I have for Your Majesty, not only the greatest respect but also absolute devotion – and when that comes from a d'Artagnan, Sire, it means something. Now, when I heard Your Majesty complain of the turns of fate, I found him noble, generous, and ill-served by fortune."

"In truth," said Charles, astonished, "I'm not sure which is greater, your respect or your liberties."

"You can decide that later, Sire," said d'Artagnan. "So, Your Majesty complained to his brother Louis XIV of the difficulties he was having in returning to England and regaining his throne without men or money." Charles struggled in a manner that betrayed some impatience. "And the principal obstacle he found blocking his way," continued d'Artagnan, "was a certain general commanding the armies of Parliament and who was acting like another Cromwell. Isn't that what Your Majesty said?"

"Yes; but I repeat to you, Sir, these words were spoken for the king alone."

"And you will find, Sire that you're glad they also fell into the ears of his Lieutenant of Musketeers. This man who was frustrating Your Majesty was called General Monck, I think. Did I hear his name rightly, Sire?"

"Yes, Sir – but once more, what is the point of these questions?"

"Oh, I'm well aware, Sire, that etiquette doesn't permit us to question kings. I hope that later Your Majesty will forgive me this discourtesy. Your Majesty added that if only he could come face to face to confer with him, then by force or persuasion he would remove this stubborn obstacle, the only real barrier he found in his path."

"That's all true, Sir; my destiny, my future, my obscurity or my glory depend on that man. But what did you gather from that?"

"Just one thing: that if this General Monck is as troublesome as you say, it would be worthwhile to rid Your Majesty of him or make him your ally."

"Sir, since you listened to my conversation with my royal brother, you know that a king who has neither men nor money has no way of dealing with a man like Monck."

"Yes, Sire, I know that was your opinion – but fortunately for Your Majesty, it wasn't mine."

"What are you saying?"

"That with neither an army nor a million, I've done what Your Majesty thought could be done only with a million or an army."

"What! What do you mean? What have you done?"

"What have I done? Well, Sire! I went across to get this man who was so frustrating Your Majesty."

"To England?"

"Exactly, Sire."

"You went to England to get General Monck?"

"Did I do something wrong, by chance?"

"Really, Sir, you must be mad!"

"Not in the least, Sire."

"You've taken Monck prisoner?"

"Yes, Sire."

"From where?"

"From the middle of his camp."

The king gaped and blinked. "And having plucked him from the causeway at Newcastle," said d'Artagnan simply, "I've brought him to Your Majesty."

"You've brought him to me!" cried the king indignantly, thinking this was a hoax.

"Yes, Sire," replied d'Artagnan without changing his tone. "I've brought him to you. He's just beyond, in a big box pierced with holes so he can breathe."

"Good Lord!"

"Oh, don't worry, Sire, we've taken good care of him. He arrives in good condition and perfect health. Is it Your Majesty's pleasure to meet and confer with him, or shall I dump him in the Channel?"

"Good Lord!" repeated Charles. "Good Lord! Sir, is this true? You're not insulting me with some low jest? You've pulled off such a bold and brilliant feat? Impossible!"

"Would Your Majesty permit me to open the window?" said d'Artagnan, opening it.

The king didn't even have time to say yes. D'Artagnan gave a long, high-pitched whistle that he repeated three times into the silence of the night. "There!" he said. "They'll bring him to Your Majesty."

D'Artagnan begins to fear the Investment of Planchet & Company might be Lost

The king couldn't contain his surprise, looking back and forth from the smiling musketeer to the dark window opened onto the night. Before he could arrange his thoughts, six of d'Artagnan's men – for two had remained to guard the boat – brought to the house, where Parry received them, that oblong object that contained at that moment the destinies of England. Before leaving Calais, d'Artagnan had had a carpenter in that town make a sort of special coffin, large and deep enough for a man to turn easily around in it. The bottom and the sides were densely padded, forming a bed soft enough that the roll of the waves didn't turn the box into a punishment cage. The little grating that d'Artagnan had mentioned to the king was like the visor of a helmet, installed at the height of a seated man's face. It had a solid shutter so that at the slightest cry it could stifle the sound, and even, if need be, smother the one who cried out. D'Artagnan was well acquainted with the character of his crew, as well as that of his prisoner, and during the crossing had been afraid of only two things: that the general would prefer death to this strange bondage and get smothered in trying to cry out, or that his crew would allow themselves to be tempted by the prisoner's offers and put d'Artagnan in the box in place of Monck. Therefore, d'Artagnan had spent the last two days and nights next to the trunk alone with the general, offering him honey and food which were refused, and repeatedly trying to reassure him about the eventual outcome of his singular captivity. Two pistols and his sword on the nearby table were his precautions against interference from outside. Once they arrived at Scheveningen, he stopped worrying. His men dreaded trouble with the authorities ashore, and he had enlisted as his second-in-command the man we've seen answer to the name Menneville, who acted as his lieutenant. The latter, being less vulgar a spirit than the others, had more at stake than they because he had more of a conscience. He believed he had a future in the service of d'Artagnan and would have been cut to pieces rather than violate his leader's orders. Therefore, it was to him that, once ashore, d'Artagnan had confided the box, and the life, of the general. It was also to him that d'Artagnan had given the order to bring the box when he heard the triple whistle. We've seen that the lieutenant obeyed. Once the trunk was in the king's house, d'Artagnan dismissed his men with a gracious smile, saying, "Gentlemen, you've rendered a great service to His Majesty King Charles II, who within six weeks will be King of England. Your reward will be doubled; return to wait for me at the boat." They departed with such joyful whoops and cries that they even frightened the big watchdog. D'Artagnan had had the trunk brought into the king's antechamber. He closed the outer doors of this chamber with great care, after which he opened the trunk, saying to the general, "My General, I have a thousand pardons to ask of you; my methods were unworthy of a man such as you, I'm well aware but I had to have you take me for a fishing boat captain. And transportation in England can be so awkward. But here, General," continued d'Artagnan, "You're free to get up and walk again." That said, he cut the bonds that tied the general's arms and legs. The latter got up, and then sat down with the expression of a man who expects imminent death. D'Artagnan then opened the door to Charles's study and said to him, "Sire, here is your enemy, General Monck; I had taken a personal vow that I would bring him to you. It is done, and now it's up to you. Sir Monck," he added, turning to the prisoner, "you're before His Majesty King Charles II, Sovereign Lord of England and Scotland."

Monck raised his coldly stoic gaze to the young prince, and replied, "I recognise no King of England and Scotland; I don't even know anyone here who is worthy to bear the title of gentleman, for it was in the name of King Charles II that an agent, whom I took for an honest man, came to take me in an infamous trap. I fell into this trap, the more fool me – but now you, the plotter," he said to the king, "and you, the executioner," he said to d'Artagnan, "hear every word I have to say to you: you have my body, and you can kill me, if you have the nerve to do it but you'll never have my mind or my soul. And now don't ask me for another word, because from this moment forward I will not open my mouth even to shout. I have spoken."

He pronounced these words with the fierce and invincible resolution of the most diehard Puritan. D'Artagnan saw that his prisoner was a man who knew the value of every word and who fixed that value by the tone with which he pronounced them. "The fact is," he whispered to the king, "that the general is just that implacable; he didn't take a mouthful of bread or a drop of honey for two days. But from this moment it's Your Majesty who decides his fate, and I wash my hands of him, as Pilate said."

Monck, standing pale and resigned, waited with eyes glowering and arms crossed. D'Artagnan turned to him and said, "You must understand that your speech, lovely as it was, is no use to anyone, not even you. His Majesty wanted to speak to you but you refused him an interview; now that you're here face to face, brought by a force independent of your own will, why would you force us to take measures that are ignoble and unworthy? Speak, devil take you! If only to say no."

Monck didn't open his lips; Monck didn't blink an eye; Monck just stroked his moustache with an air that announced he wasn't at all mollified. Meanwhile, Charles II was deep in thought. He was facing Monck for the first time, the man he'd wanted so long to see, and with that profound gaze that God gives to eagles and to kings, he had sounded the depths of his heart. He recognised Monck was sincere in his determination to die before he'd speak, entirely consistent with so grave and distinguished a man who had been humiliated so cruelly. Charles II suddenly made one of those fateful decisions upon which an ordinary man bets his life, a general his career, and a king his realm. "Sir," he said to Monck, "in certain respects, you are entirely justified. I don't ask you to answer me but I do ask you to listen."

There was a moment of silence during which the king gazed at Monck, who remained impassive. "Just now you directed a painful reproach to me, Sir," continued the king. "You said that one of my agents went to Newcastle to set a trap for you, and as an aside I must have it understood that that can't be said of Sir d'Artagnan here, whom I sincerely thank for his generous, even heroic devotion." D'Artagnan bowed respectfully. Monck just stroked his moustache. "But Sir d'Artagnan – and please note, Mister Monck, that I don't say this to excuse myself – Sir d'Artagnan went to England on his own initiative, without avarice, without orders, without hope, like the true gentleman he is, to render a service to an unfortunate king, and to add one more glorious exploit to the illustrious history of a life already full of them."

D'Artagnan, somewhat abashed, flushed and coughed a little. Monck didn't budge. "I see you don't believe that, Mister Monck," said the king. "That's understandable; such acts of devotion are so rare it's reasonable to doubt them."

"Sir would be badly mistaken not to believe you, Sire," said d'Artagnan anxiously, "for what Your Majesty has said is utterly true, so true that I now see that by going to bring back the general, I was completely in the wrong. And in truth, if that's the case, I'm in despair."

"Sir d'Artagnan," said the king, taking the musketeer's hand, "you have obliged me as much as if you'd actually helped my cause, for you have revealed to me an unknown friend to whom I'll be forever grateful and will always love."

And the king shook his hand warmly. "Plus," he continued, bowing to Monck, "you've introduced me to an enemy whom I now know to esteem at his proper value."

The Puritan's eyes flashed but only once, before his expression resumed its dark impassivity. "So, Sir d'Artagnan," continued Charles, "here is what's been interrupted: the Count of La Fère, whom you know, I believe, had gone to Newcastle..."

"Athos?" cried d'Artagnan.

"Yes, I believe that's his nom de guerre. The Count of La Fère had gone to Newcastle in hopes of arranging a conference with me or my representative when you somewhat violently abbreviated the negotiation."

"God be with you!" replied d'Artagnan. "That must have been him I saw coming into the camp the same night I entered with my anglers..."

A barely perceptible frowning of Monck's brow told d'Artagnan he was right. "Yes," he murmured, "I thought his figure and his voice seemed familiar. The devil! Oh, Sire, forgive me! I believed I'd steered my ship so carefully."

"There's nothing wrong, Sir," said the king, "except the general accuses me of having laid a trap for him that I did not. No, General, these are not the means I planned to use with you, as you'll soon see. Meanwhile, when I give you my word as a gentleman, Sir, you can take it, believe me. Now, Sir d'Artagnan, listen."

"On my knees, Sire!"

"You are mine, are you not?"

"As Your Majesty has seen. Too much so!"

"Good. From a man like you, one word is enough – and the acts count even more. General, please follow me. Come with us, Sir d'Artagnan."

D'Artagnan, surprised, was quick to obey. Charles II went out, Monck followed him, and d'Artagnan followed Monck. Charles took the path by which d'Artagnan had come to him; soon the fresh sea air struck the faces of the three night walkers, and, fifty paces beyond a little gate that Charles opened, they found themselves atop a low dune, facing the ocean that, having stopped its advance, pawed at the shore like a restless monster. Charles II, pensive, walked with his head down and his hand under his cloak. Monck followed him, his arms ready and his eyes alert. D'Artagnan came last, his fist on theommel of his sword. "Where is the boat that brought you, Gentlemen?" Charles said to the musketeer.

"Over there, Sire; I have seven men and an officer who await me at that small boat next to that little fire."

"Ah, yes! That boat drawn up on the sand, I see it. But you certainly didn't come from Newcastle in a longboat?"

"No, Sire, I have a hired tracker that's at anchor about a cannon shot from the dunes. It was in that tracker that we made the trip."

"Sir," said the king to Monck, "you are free."

Monck, despite himself, let out a murmur of surprise. The king nodded and continued, "We're going to wake up an angler from this village who will put his boat to sea this very night to take you back to wherever you would go. Sir d'Artagnan, here, will escort Your Honour. I place Sir d'Artagnan under the safeguard of your integrity, General Monck."

Monck muttered another syllable of surprise, and d'Artagnan let out a deep sigh. The king, without seeming to notice, knocked on the gate of a pine-wood fence that surrounded the first shack at the edge of the dunes. "Hey! Keyser!" he cried. "Wake up!"

"Who's calling me?" asked the angler.

"It's me, Charles, the king."

"Ah, Milord!" said Keyser, appearing at the door wrapped in the sail in which he slept like a hammock. "What can I do for you?"

"Captain Keyser," said Charles, "set sail at once. Here is a traveller who hires your boat and will pay you well; oblige him."

And the king stepped back a few paces to allow Monck to speak freely with the angler. "I wish to go over to England," said Monck who spoke enough Dutch to be able to make himself understood.

"This very moment, if you want," said the angler.

"How long before we can go?" said Monck.

"Not half an hour, Your Honour. My eldest son is already up and readying the boat, since we sail with the tide at three in the morning."

"Well! Is it settled?" asked Charles, approaching again.

"Yes, Sire, all but the price," said the angler.

"That's my affair," said Charles. "This gentleman is my friend."

At that word, Monck shivered all over and looked at Charles. "Good, Milord," replied Keyser.

And just then they heard his eldest son signalling from the shore with a blast on a bull's horn. "And now, Gentlemen, on your way," said the king.

"Sire," said d'Artagnan, "may it please Your Majesty to give me just a few minutes? I have hired men I'm leaving behind and must notify them."

"Whistle for them," said Charles, smiling.

D'Artagnan whistled loudly, and while Keyser went to warn his son, Menneville and four men came up at a run. "Here's payment as promised," said d'Artagnan, showing them a purse containing twenty-five hundred livres in gold. "Wait for me in Calais at the place you know of."

And d'Artagnan, uttering a deep sigh, dropped the purse into Menneville's hands. "What, are you leaving us?" the men said anxiously.

"For a short time," said d'Artagnan, "or a long one, who knows? But with these twenty-five hundred livres and the two thousand five hundred you've already received, you've been paid according to our agreement. So, go happily, my children."

"What about the tracker?"

"Don't worry about it. It's back in port."

"But our things are still aboard."

"Go get them and then be on your way."

"Yes, Commander."

D'Artagnan returned to Monck and said, "Sir, I await your orders, for it seems we're going together, unless my company is disagreeable to you."

"On the contrary, Sir," said Monck.

"Let's go, Milords! We're ready!" Keyser's son called.

Charles saluted the general with nobility and dignity, and told him, "You will forgive me for the violence and inconvenience you've suffered once you're convinced I didn't cause them."

Monck bowed deeply but said nothing. Charles spoke a final word to d'Artagnan but aloud rather than privately, saying, "Thank you for your services. They'll be repaid by the Lord God, who reserves for me alone, I hope, all trials and pain."

Monck followed Keyser and his son and went aboard with them. D'Artagnan came last, murmuring, "Ah, my poor Planchet! I'm afraid we've made a bad investment."

The Stock of Planchet & Company Rebounds

During the passage, Monck spoke to d'Artagnan only when absolutely necessary. When the Frenchman hesitated to join him at supper, a poor meal of salt fish, biscuits, and gin, Monck called to him and said, "To table, Sir!"

That was all. D'Artagnan, precisely because he was himself extremely concise when engaged in important affairs, didn't think this curtness augured a favourable result for his situation. As he had plenty of time to himself, he used it in racking his brain to try to figure out how Athos had met Charles II, how they had conspired on his mission to England, and how he'd gotten into Monck's camp. The poor Lieutenant of Musketeers pulled a hair from his moustache every time he thought that Athos must have been the cavalier who'd accompanied Monck to the abbey on the night of the abduction. Finally, after a crossing of two days and two nights, the skipper landed at the spot designated by Monck, who'd given all the orders during the passage. It was at the village at the mouth of the river where Athos had taken lodgings. The day was fading; the beautiful sun, like a buckler of red steel, was dipping its lower edge into the sea's blue horizon. The fishing boat was making its way up the river that was wide enough at its mouth but Monck, in his impatience, ordered it to the shore, and Keyser landed him, along with d'Artagnan, on the muddy river bank among the reeds. D'Artagnan, resigned to obedience, followed his master Monck like a chained bear but the position was humiliating, and he grumbled under his breath that the service of kings, even the best of them, was a bitter calling. Monck set a quick pace. One might almost say he wouldn't really be certain he was back in England until he'd reached the few houses of sailors and anglers scattered around the little quay of this humble harbour. Suddenly d'Artagnan shouted, "Look! God love me, there's a house afire!"

Monck looked up. There was indeed a house beginning to be devoured by fire. It had begun at a little shack attached to its side, and flames were beginning to lick at the roof. The cool evening breeze was feeding it. The two travellers quickened their pace, hearing shouts and seeing, as they approached, a troop of soldiers waving their arms and surrounding the burning house. This was no doubt what had kept them from noticing the approach of the fishing boat. Monck stopped short for a moment, and for the first time expressed his thoughts in words. "Hmm!" he said. "What if they're not my soldiers but Lambert's?"

These words contained both concern and a reproach that d'Artagnan understood perfectly. In fact, during the general's absence, Lambert might have brought to battle, defeated, and dispersed the parliamentary troops, occupying the terrain once held by Monck's army, bereft of their greatest asset. To this possibility, passing from Monck's thoughts to his own, d'Artagnan reasoned, There are two ways this could go: if Monck is right and only Lambert's men are left in this area, I should be well received, since it's to me they owe their victory; or nothing has changed and Monck, delighted to find his army still camped in the same place, will go easy on me.

While thinking this through, the two travellers continued their advance and soon found themselves in a small crowd of sailors, who watched the burning of the house with dismay but dared not say anything, intimidated as they were by the soldiers. Monck addressed one of these sailors, asking, "What's going on?"

"Sir," the man replied, not recognising Monck as a senior officer under the thick cloak that enveloped him, "this house is inhabited by a foreigner, and the soldiers became suspicious of him. They wanted to enter his house under the pretext of escorting him to the camp but he, despite their numbers, threatened any man who crossed his threshold with death, and the first man who risked it, the Frenchman laid out with a pistol shot."

"Ah, so he's a Frenchman?" said d'Artagnan, rubbing his hands. "Good!"

"What do you mean, good?" asked the angler.

"No, I meant he should ... not, or something. Gah, this language!"

"He shouldn't have, all right. It made the other soldiers as angry as lions, and they fired at least a hundred musket shots at the house but the Frenchman was safe behind the wall, and anyone who approached the door was shot by his lackey, and can he shoot! Those who tried the window met the pistol of his master. Now seven men are down – count them!"

"Ah, my brave compatriot!" muttered d'Artagnan. "Just wait till I join you, and together we'll deal with this rabble!"

"A moment, Sir," said Monck. "Wait."

"For long?"

"No, just long enough for me to ask a question." Then, turning back to the sailor, "My friend," he asked, with an emotion that despite himself he couldn't quite suppress, "tell me whose soldiers these are, if you would?"

"And whose soldiers would they be but those of that madman Monck?"

"So, there hasn't been a battle yet?"

"Why would there be? What's the point? Lambert's army is melting away like snow in April. Most are coming over to Monck, both officers and soldiers. In another week Lambert won't have more than fifty men."

The angler was interrupted by a fresh volley of shots aimed at the house, and by a pistol fired in reply that felled the most reckless of the attackers. The fury of the soldiers was at its height. The flames were still rising, and a plume of fire and smoke swirled above the house top. D'Artagnan could no longer contain himself. "God be with you!" he said and looked accusingly at Monck. "You call yourself a general but you let your soldiers burn down houses and assassinate people while you watch happily, warming your hands at the fire! What kind of a man are you?"

"Patience, Sir, patience," said Monck, smiling.

"Patience! Until this brave gentleman is roasted, is that it?"

And d'Artagnan leapt forward. "Stay here, Sir," said Monck imperiously.

And he himself advanced toward the house. An officer stepped up and called out to the besieged, "The house is on fire, you'll be ashes inside an hour! Here, there's still time – tell us what you did with General Monck, and we'll let you come out safely. Answer me, or by Saint Patrick ...!"

The besieged didn't answer; no doubt he was reloading his pistol. "We sent for reinforcements," the officer continued. "In a quarter of an hour there will be a hundred men around this house."

"I'll answer you when everyone has withdrawn," said the Frenchman. "I will come out freely and go to the camp myself, or I'll die right here!"

"A thousand thunders!" cried d'Artagnan. "That's Athos's voice! Ah, you rabble!"

And d'Artagnan's sword flashed from its scabbard. Monck paused and gestured to him to stop. Then he said, in a resounding voice, "Halt! What are you doing here? Digby, what's this fire? Why all this commotion?"

"The general!" Digby gasped, his sword dropping.

"The general!" repeated the soldiers.

"Well? Is that so amazing?" said Monck in a calm voice. Then, into the resulting silence, he said, "Come, who set this fire?"

The soldiers lowered their heads. "What! I ask and am not answered?" said Monck. "What! I find fault, and no one repairs it? That fire is still burning, I think."

Immediately twenty men rushed forward, gathering buckets, jars, and pails, extinguishing the fire with the same ardour they'd shown in setting it. But ahead of them, first and foremost, d'Artagnan ran up to the house with a ladder, shouting, "Athos! It's me, d'Artagnan! Don't kill me, old friend."

And moments later he was holding the count in his arms. Grimaud, meanwhile, dismantled the ground floor fortifications while maintaining his air of calm. He started once upon hearing d'Artagnan's voice but otherwise, having opened the door, he stood serenely on the threshold, arms crossed. When the fire was out, the soldiers were unsure what to do next, Digby most of all. "Forgive us, General," he said. "What we did was out of love for Your Honour, whom we thought lost."

"You're mad, Gentlemen. Lost! Does a man like me get lost? Can I not leave when necessary at will, even without warning? Do you take me for some minor town burgess? Is a gentleman who's my friend and guest to be besieged, threatened, and burned on suspicion? What does this word mean, suspicion? God damn me, I should shoot everyone this brave gentleman left alive myself!"

"General," said Digby piteously, "we were twenty-eight, and now eight of us are fallen."

"I authorise the Count of La Fère to send the remaining twenty to join those eight," said Monck, extending a hand toward Athos. "Oh, just send them back to camp," said Monck, with a gesture of dismissal. "Mister Digby, place yourself under arrest for one month."

"But, General..."

"That will teach you, Sir, to act on your own without my orders."

"I was acting at the orders of the lieutenant commander."

"The lieutenant commander had no authority to give such an order, and he'll stand to arrest in your place if I find he ordered that this gentleman be burned."

"He didn't order that, General, he ordered us to bring him to camp but the count wouldn't go with us."

"I didn't want anyone to plunder my house," said Athos, with a significant look at Monck.

"And quite right too. The rest of you, to camp, I say!"

The soldiers marched off with their heads down. "Now that we're alone," said Monck to Athos, "Tell me, Sir, why you persisted in staying here, when you have a sloop..."

"I was waiting for you, General," said Athos. "Didn't Your Honour ask me to wait a week for another audience?"

An agonized look from d'Artagnan made it clear to Monck that these two men, so brave and honest, hadn't connived at his abduction. This just confirmed what he already knew. "Sir," he said to d'Artagnan, "you were entirely right. Just give me a moment to chat with the Count of La Fère."

D'Artagnan took advantage of the respite to go and greet Grimaud. Monck asked Athos to lead him to his living chamber. The room was still full of smoke and debris. More than fifty musket balls had passed through the window and peppered the walls. Monck found a table, an inkwell, and writing materials; he took pen and paper, wrote a single line, signed it, folded the sheet, sealed it with the signet on his ring, and handed the letter to Athos, saying, "Sir, if you would, take this letter to King Charles II, going at once if there's nothing to keep you here."

"And the barrels?" said Athos.

"The anglers who brought me will help you get them aboard. Be gone, if possible, within the hour."

"Yes, General," said Athos.

"Sir d'Artagnan!" called Monck out the window. D'Artagnan rushed in. "Embrace your friend and say farewell, Sir, for he's returning to Holland."

"To Holland!" said d'Artagnan. "And I?"

"You're at liberty to go with him, Sir but I'd prefer you to stay," said Monck. "Will you refuse me?"

"Oh, no, General! I'm at your service."

D'Artagnan embraced Athos and said a brief goodbye. Monck watched them both closely. Then he personally oversaw the preparations for departure, the loading of the barrels, the embarkation of Athos, and finally, taking the bemused d'Artagnan by the arm, led him toward Newcastle. Following Monck, d'Artagnan said to himself, "Well, well – it seems to me that shares in the firm of Planchet and Company are on the rise."

295
Monck reveals himself

D'Artagnan, though he flattered himself that things were going well, didn't really have a firm grasp of the situation. He had a lot to think about: Athos's association with the king, his friend's journey to England, and the unexpected results of the collision of his own plot with the mission of the Count of La Fère. Best just to set it aside. He'd committed an indiscretion, and though he'd done what he set out to do, d'Artagnan found himself with none of the rewards of success. At least, with everything lost, there was nothing more to risk. D'Artagnan followed Monck through the camp to headquarters. The general's return had produced a remarkable effect, for everyone had thought him lost. But Monck, with his austere expression and upright bearing, seemed to question why his eager lieutenants and delighted soldiers should be so happy. To the lieutenant commander who hurried to meet him, and explained how anxious his sudden departure made them, he said, "Why is that? Am I obliged to report to you?"

"But, Your Honour, the sheep without the shepherd will tremble."

"Tremble!" replied Monck in his calm and resonant voice. "What a word! God damn me, Sir! If my sheep don't have teeth and claws, I give up being their shepherd. You trembled, Sir?"

"For you, General."

"Mind your own concerns and not mine. I may not have the wits that God gave Oliver Cromwell but I have what He gave to me, and I'm satisfied with them, few as they may be."

The officer had no reply, and thus Monck silenced all his people, who were convinced that he'd been on an important mission or had been testing them – which showed how little they understood this patient and scrupulous genius. Monck, if he still had the faith of his allies the Puritans, must have given thanks to his patron saint for getting him out of d'Artagnan's box. Meanwhile, our musketeer was telling himself, "My God! Sir Monck must have less pride than I have, for I declare, if someone had locked me in a trunk with a grate across its mouth and carried me like a boxed-in veal-calf across the sea, I would hold such a grudge for my time in the trunk, and such animosity for the one who locked me in, that if I saw as much as the shadow of a smile cross the face that man, or thought I saw him mocking my posture while in the box, God be with you! I'm afraid I'd carve my dagger across his throat in memory of the grate, and put him into a real coffin in memory of the fake casket he'd kept me in for two days."

And d'Artagnan was honest in saying this, for our Gascon did have a rather thin skin. Fortunately, Monck was thinking about other things. He didn't say a word about the past to his former conqueror, instead inviting him to be a close observer of his work. Monck took him along when he went on reconnaissance to achieve one of his goals, the rehabilitation of d'Artagnan's spirit. The latter behaved like the most flattering courtier, admiring Monck's troop dispositions and the organisation of his camp, and joking about the ramparts ringing Lambert's camp, saying that he'd built a camp large enough to house twenty thousand men when in the end an acre would be enough for the corporal and fifty guards who would be left loyal to him. Monck, as soon as he'd arrived, had accepted the proposal for a parley that Lambert had made the day before that Monck's lieutenants had refused on the pretext that Monck was unwell. This parley was neither long nor interesting: Lambert demanded the fealty of his rival, and Monck declared he owed fealty to no one but the majority party. Lambert then asked if it wouldn't be easier to end the quarrel by an alliance rather than a battle. Monck asked for a week in which to consider. Lambert could scarcely refuse, even though he'd come north with the stated intent of devouring Monck's army. After this interview Lambert's people grew impatient, as nothing had been decided upon, neither a treaty nor a battle. The rebel army began, as d'Artagnan had foreseen, to prefer the good cause over the bad, and the Parliament, rump though it was, over the empty composites of General Lambert. They began to recall the good food they'd had in London, the profusion of ale and sherry that the burghers of the City had lavished on their friends, the soldiers; they bit with disgust into the black bread of war, and tasted the brackish water of the Tweed, too salty for the glass, too bland for the pot, and they said to themselves, "Wouldn't we be better off on the other side? Aren't they preparing roasts in London for Monck?" From then on, the only news from Lambert's army was of desertion. The soldiers found that this war conflicted with their principles that, like discipline, is the motivation that gives a force its purpose. Monck defended the Parliament, and Lambert attacked it. Monck had no more respect for the Parliament than Lambert did but its name was embroidered on his flags, leaving nothing for the opposition to write on theirs but Rebellion that sounded bad in the ears of the Puritans. They went from Lambert to Monck like humble sinners from Baal to God. Monck figured that at a thousand desertions a day, Lambert could hold out for twenty days. But like a snowball gathering speed and mass as it rolls downhill, the desertion accelerated, so that a hundred left the first day, three hundred the second, and a thousand the third, at which point Monck thought they'd reached the anticipated rate. But a thousand desertions soon became two thousand, and then four thousand. By the end of the week, Lambert, feeling like he no longer had the means to accept a battle if it was offered, made the wise decision to escape in the night to return to London, hoping to head off Monck and arrive where he could consolidate his power with the remnants of the military party. But Monck, unconcerned and showing no haste, marched toward London as a conqueror, increasing his army by absorbing lesser parties as he passed. He went into camp at Barnet, about four leagues from the city, praised by the Parliament, who thought they saw in him a protector, and watched by the people, who waited to see him commit himself before they judged him. D'Artagnan himself couldn't tell from his tactics what to think. He watched, and he admired. Monck couldn't enter London before committing himself without getting embroiled in a prolongation of the civil war. He bided his time for some weeks. Suddenly, when no one expected it, Monck struck, driving the remnants of the military party out of London, installing himself in the City among the burghers by order of the Parliament; and then, when the burghers began to cry out against Monck, just when even the soldiers began to question their commander, Monck, sensing that the majority was ready for it, declared that the Rump Parliament must resign, step aside, and yield its place to a government that was more than just a joke. Monck made this declaration backed by fifty thousand swords, joined by the end of the day by five hundred thousand citizens of London, who acclaimed the move with shouts of joy. And then, just when the people, after their triumphal celebrations and parties in the street, were looking for a leader they could pledge to follow, word went out that a vessel had left The Hague bearing Charles II and his fortune. "Gentlemen," said Monck to his officers, "I go to welcome the legitimate king. Whoever loves me will follow me!"

A roar of acclamation followed these words that d'Artagnan couldn't hear without a shiver of pleasure. "God be with you!" he said to Monck. "You are bold, Sir."

"You'll go with me, won't you?" said Monck.

"Lord, yes, General! But, tell me, if you would, what was in the letter you wrote for Athos – I mean, the Count of La Fère – on the day we arrived?"

"I have no more secrets from you," replied Monck. "I wrote these words: 'Sire, I expect Your Majesty at Dover in six weeks.'"

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. "Rather than bold, instead I say 'well played.' It was a fine stroke!"

"You know something of such matters," Monck replied. It was the only reference he ever made to his trip to Holland.

How Athos & d'Artagnan met Once More at the Hartshorn Inn

The King of England made his entrance with great pomp at Dover, and then again at London. He had brought his mother and sister and summoned his brothers. England had for so long been left to herself, that is, to tyranny, anarchy, and unreason, that the return of King Charles II, whom the English knew only as the son of a man they'd beheaded, was celebrated throughout the three kingdoms. The warm reception and general acclamation that welcomed his return struck the young king so strongly that he said into the ear of James of York, his younger brother, "In truth, James, it seems we were mistaken to be so long absent from a country where we're so well loved."

The royal procession was magnificent. Beautiful weather framed the solemnities. Charles had regained all his youth, all his good humour, and seemed transfigured; all hearts seemed to smile on him like the sun. Among this noisy crowd of courtiers and admirers, who didn't seem to remember that they'd conducted the new king's father to his scaffold at Whitehall, was a man in the uniform of a Lieutenant of Musketeers, looking on with a smile on his thin, clever lips, sometimes at the people shouting their blessings, sometimes on the prince borne on this tide of emotion and who saluted above all the women who tossed bouquets beneath his horse's feet. "It's a fine thing to be a king!" said this man, lost in his contemplation, so absorbed that he stopped in the middle of the street, letting the crowd and procession pass by and around him. "Here indeed is a prince bedecked with gold and diamonds like a Solomon, covered with flowers like a spring meadow, on his way to plunge his hands into the immense treasury that his faithful subjects, formerly so unfaithful, have filled with cartloads of gold, in coins and ingots. They've thrown enough flowers at him to bury him twice, though if he'd appeared here less than two months ago, they'd have thrown bullets and musket balls rather than bouquets. Decidedly, it's something to be born of a certain rank, no offence to the lowborn who say they're not worse for being born low."

The procession went marching on, with the king and his adulation beginning to move off toward the palace, though this didn't mean our officer wasn't being considerably jostled. "God be with you!" continued the philosopher. "So many people treading on my feet with so little regard, or rather none at all, since they're English and I'm French. If one asked these people, 'Who is Sir d'Artagnan?' they'd reply, 'Nescio vos' – I don't know you. But tell them, 'There goes the king, and there goes General Monck,' and they'd shout, 'Vive le roi! Vive General Monck!' until their lungs wore out. However," he continued, regarding the crowd with that look so keen and so proud, "consider, good people, what your King Charles has done, and what General Monck has done, and then think of what that wretched foreigner called Sir d'Artagnan has done. Of course, you can't think about it because it's unknown but what does that matter? That doesn't keep Charles II from being a great king, though he was exiled for twelve years, nor Mister Monck from being a great general, though he took a trip to Holland in a box. So, since one must acknowledge that one is a great king and the other is a great commander, I say Hurrah for King Charles III! Hurrah for General Monck!" And his voice mingled with the voices of thousands of spectators, rising above them for a moment, and to show his true devotion, he even waved his hat in the air. But he was stopped by a hand on his arm in the middle of this show of loyalism (that is what in 1660 they called what we now call royalism). "Athos!" d'Artagnan cried. "You, here?" And the two friends embraced. "You are here! And being here," continued the musketeer, "why aren't you in the midst of that crowd of courtiers, my dear Count? What! You, the hero of the day, not riding at the left side of His restored Majesty, as General Monck rides on his right? Really, I can understand the character of neither you nor of the prince who owes you so much."

"Always mocking, my dear d'Artagnan," said Athos. "Will you never correct this unseemly fault?"

"But seriously, why aren't you part of the procession?"

"I'm not part of the procession because I don't wish to be."

"And why don't you wish to be?"

"Because I'm neither envoy, ambassador, nor representative of the King of France, and it doesn't suit me to associate myself so closely with another king whom God didn't make my master."

"God be with you! You were pretty close to the king his father."

"That's another thing, my friend; he was on his way to death."

"And yet what you did for this one..."

"I did because it was what I had to do. But I deplore all ostentation, as you know. May King Charles II who no longer needs me, leave me to retire back into the shadows. That's all I ask of him."

D'Artagnan sighed. "What would you have?" Athos said to him. "Anyway, my friend, it looks to me like this joyous return of the king to London saddens you, though you did at least as much for His Majesty as I did."

"Could it be," replied d'Artagnan, with his Gascon laugh, "that I did a great deal for His Majesty without his being aware of it?"

"Oh but the king knows it well, my friend!" said Athos.

"He knows it!" said the musketeer bitterly. "By my faith! You'd never suspect it, and up to a moment ago I almost forgot it myself."

"But he, my friend, will not forget – I'll answer for it."

"You tell me that to console me a little, Athos."

"For what?"

"God be with you! For all the expenses I've had. I've ruined myself, friend, for the restoration of this young prince who just cantered by, riding on his bay horse."

"The king doesn't know you've ruined yourself, my friend but he's aware that he owes you a great deal."

"Does that get me anywhere, Athos? Tell me! To be fair, I must say you performed your mission nobly and well. But I, who seemingly almost wrecked it, was the one who really made it succeed. Follow my thinking on this: you might not have been able to convince General Monck by persuasion or diplomacy but my rude means of conducting the dear general to our prince gave Charles the opportunity to be generous, a generosity inspired solely by my blessed blunder, and Charles sees himself repaid for it by this restoration engineered by Monck."

"All that, dear friend, is undeniably true," Athos replied.

"Well! As undeniably true as that is, it's just as true that I, though beloved of General Monck, who calls me his dear captain all day long, though I'm neither his dear nor his captain, and though appreciated by the king, though he's already forgotten my name – it's just as true, I say, that when I return to my native country, I'll be cursed by the soldiers whom I'd led to hope for a big payoff, and cursed by my brave Planchet, from whom I borrowed much of his fortune."

"How's that? What the devil does Planchet have to do with all this?"

"Why, everything, old friend! Here's the king, splendid, smiling, and adored, there's General Monck who thinks he's brought him back, you who believe you supported him, I who think I nudged them all together, the citizens who feel they've reconquered him, the king himself who thinks he's negotiated his restoration but none of this is true: in reality, Charles II, King of England, Scotland, and Ireland, was replaced on his throne by a French grocer of the Rue des Lombards named Planchet. And such is grandeur! 'Vanity,' says Scripture, 'all is vanity!'"

Athos couldn't help but laugh at his friend's joke. "Dear d'Artagnan!" he said, taking his hand affectionately. "Have you turned philosopher? Wasn't it enough for you to have saved my life by your timely arrival with Monck when those damned parliamentarians wanted to broil me alive?"

"Well, you know," said d'Artagnan, "you just about deserved to be broiled, my dear Count."

"What? For protecting King Charles's million?"

"What million?"

"Ah, right! You never knew about that. But you mustn't be angry with me about it, my friend, for it wasn't my secret. That word Remember that King Charles pronounced on the scaffold..."

"The word that means Souviens-toi?"

"Exactly. That word meant remember that I have a million in gold buried in the vaults of Newcastle Abbey, and that million belongs to my son."

"Ah, very nice! Now I understand. But what I also understand, and it's frightful, is that every time he thinks of me, His Majesty Charles II will say, 'There was a certain man who nearly made me lose my crown. Fortunately, I was generous, noble, and clever enough to save the day.' That's what he'll say of me, that young gentleman who came to the Château de Blois in a shabby black doublet, hat in his hand, to ask me if I'd admit him to see the King of France."

"D'Artagnan, d'Artagnan, you're wrong," said Athos, placing a hand on the musketeer's shoulder.

"I'm in the right."

"No, because you don't know the future."

D'Artagnan looked his friend right between the eyes and began to laugh. "In truth, my dear Athos, you talk just like Cardinal Mazarin."

Athos flinched.

"Sorry!" continued d'Artagnan, laughing. "Pardon me if I offended you. But the future! Haha ha! Such pretty words that promise so much, words spoken from lips that have nothing else to offer! God be with you! After having met so many who promise, when will I meet someone who delivers? But never mind that," continued d'Artagnan. "What are you doing here, dear Athos? Are you the king's treasurer?"

"What! The king's treasurer?"

"Yes, if the king has a million, he must need a treasurer. The King of France, who hasn't a copper, has a Surintendant des Finances, Sir Fouquet. Though it's true that there it's Fouquet who has the millions."

"Oh, that million is long spent," laughed Athos in his turn.

"I see, it's become satin, gemstones, velvet, and plumes of all kinds and of every colour. All these princes and princesses were in urgent need of tailors and couturiers. Do you remember, Athos, what we spent to equip ourselves for the La Rochelle campaign, for clothes and horses? Two or three thousand livres each, by my faith! But a king is greater than we are and needs a million to outfit himself. But Athos, if you're not treasurer, at least tell me you're in well at Court?"

"Faith of a gentleman, I wouldn't know," replied Athos simply.

"Come now! You don't know?"

"No, I haven't seen the king since Dover."

"So, he's forgotten you as well. God! That's appalling."

"His Majesty has had many affairs to attend to!"

"Oh, right!" said d'Artagnan, with one of those sarcastic expressions unique to him. "It's almost enough to make me admire Monsignor Mazarini. Really, Athos? The king hasn't seen you?"

"No."

"And you're not furious?"

"Me? Why? Do you imagine, old friend that I did what I did for the king? That young man, I scarcely know him. I defended his father, who represented a sacred principle to me, and I allowed myself to be drawn to the son out of sympathy for that same principle. Besides, he's a worthy knight and a noble individual, like his father, whom you remember."

"That's true, he was a fine, brave man, who had a sad life but made a good death."

"Well, then, my dear d'Artagnan, understand this: to that king, that man of heart, that noble soul-mate, if I dare call him so, I swore at the supreme hour to faithfully preserve the secret of the fortune that was to help his son when the time was right; and that young man came to me, he told me of his misfortune, not knowing me for anything but a living memory of his father. And I accomplished for Charles II what I had promised to Charles I, that's all. What matter to me whether he's grateful or not? I did this service for myself, to fulfil my obligation and responsibility, not for him."

"I've always said," replied d'Artagnan with a sigh, "that selflessness is the finest thing in the world."

"As to that, dear friend," said Athos, "aren't you in the same position I am? As I understood it, you allowed yourself to be moved by that young man's misfortunes; you were more selfless than I, for I had a duty to fulfill, while you owed absolutely nothing to the martyr's son. You didn't have to repay the price of that precious drop of blood that fell on my brow beneath the scaffold. You acted solely from the heart, that noble and good heart you hide under your apparent scepticism and sarcastic irony. Perhaps it did cost a servant's fortune, and your own, you benevolent miser, and maybe no one knows of that sacrifice. No matter! Of course, you want to return Planchet's money, I understand that, for it isn't proper for a gentleman to borrow from his inferior without repaying him capital and interest. Well, then! If necessary, I'll sell La Fère or a small farm or two. You'll pay Planchet, and I'll still have enough grain in my barns for the two of us and Raoul. That way, my friend, you'll have no debts to anyone but yourself, and if I know you, it will be more than a little to be able to tell yourself, 'I made a king.' Am I right?"

"Ah, Athos!" murmured d'Artagnan thoughtfully. "I've told you more than once, on the day you take up preaching, I'll go to the sermon – and the day you tell me there really is a hell, God be with you! I'll fear the inferno and the pitchforks. You're better than I am, or rather better than anyone is, while I have only one virtue, that of not being jealous. But as to faults, damn-me, as the English say, if I don't have all the rest."

"I know of no one the equal of d'Artagnan," Athos replied, "but though we went slowly, we've still arrived at where I've taken lodgings. Won't you come in, my friend?"

"Eh? But isn't this the Hartshorn Inn?" said d'Artagnan.

"I confess, old friend that I chose it deliberately. I like old acquaintances and returning to the place where you found me collapsed from fatigue, in the depths of despair, on that night of thirtieth January."

"After I'd discovered the lair of that masked executioner? Yes, that was a terrible day!"

"Come in, then," said Athos, interrupting him.

They entered the former common room. The inn in general, and its common room in particular, had undergone great changes; the musketeers' former host who had become wealthy, at least for an innkeeper, had closed up the tavern and turned this chamber into a warehouse of colonial merchandise. As for the rest of the house, he rented the rooms out to foreigners. It was with an indescribable emotion that d'Artagnan recognised all the furnishings in Athos's room on the first floor: the woodwork, the tapestries, and even the framed map that Porthos had studied so lovingly in his spare time. "Eleven years ago!" he said. "God be with you! It seems like a century."

"And to me but a day," said Athos. "Imagine the joy I feel, my friend, in seeing you here, pressing your hand, tossing aside my sword and dagger, knowing I won't need them, and pouring us glasses of sherry without fearing poison. Oh, this joy could only be greater if our two friends were here, sitting at the corners of the table, with Raoul, my beloved Raoul, on the threshold regarding us with his eyes, so brilliant and so sweet!"

"Yes, it's true," said d'Artagnan, moved, "especially the first part of your thought. It's sweet to smile where we so legitimately shivered, thinking from one moment to the next that Sir Mordaunt might appear on the landing."

At that moment the door opened, and d'Artagnan, brave as he was, made a frightened start. But Athos understood and said, smiling, "It's our host, come to bring me some correspondence."

"Yes, Milord," said the hotelier, "I do have a letter for Your Honour."

"Thank you," said Athos, taking the letter without looking at it. "Tell me, my dear host, do you recognise Sir, here?"

The old man raised his head and looked attentively at d'Artagnan. "No," he said.

"He's one of those friends of mine I mentioned to you," said Athos, "who stayed with me here eleven years ago."

"Oh!" said the old man. "I've had so many strangers lodge with me!"

"But we were here on the date of January 30th, 1649," added Athos, hoping to jog the host's memory.

"It's possible," he replied, smiling blandly, "but that was long ago!"

He bowed and went out. "Oh, thanks," said d'Artagnan. "Perform brilliant exploits, instigate revolutions, inscribe your name in brass and stone with the point of your sword but you'll find nothing harder and less penetrable than the skull of an old landlord – he doesn't recognise me! Well, I'd certainly have recognised him."

Athos, smiling, opened the letter. "Ah!" he said. "It's from Parry."

"Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan. "Read it, my friend, it must be news." Athos shook his head, and read:

Sir le Count,

The king much regretted not seeing you beside him today at his entrance; His Majesty commands me to say so, and to recall him to your memory. His Majesty expects you this evening at the palace of Saint James between nine and eleven o'clock. I am, with respect, Your Honour's most humble and obedient servant,
Parry

"You see, my dear d'Artagnan," said Athos, "we mustn't despair of the hearts of kings."

"You're right, and I shall despair no more," said d'Artagnan.

"Oh, my dear, dear friend," said Athos, who hadn't failed to catch the note of bitterness in d'Artagnan's reply, "please pardon me. I didn't mean to hurt my closest comrade, even unintentionally."

"You're quite mad, Athos, and the proof is I'm going to escort you all the way to the palace door. I need a walk, anyway."

"And you'll come in with me, my friend, for I want to tell His Majesty..."

"Not at all!" said d'Artagnan, with pride untainted by jealousy. "The only thing worse than begging for oneself is having others beg for you. That! Let's go, my friend, it's a charming night for a walk. I want, in passing, to show you the home of General Monck, who's lodging me with him; my faith, it's a lovely house! Being a general in England pays better than being a marshal in France, it seems." Athos allowed himself to be carried away, saddened though he was by d'Artagnan's attempts to be cheerful. The whole city was in the streets; the two friends were met at every corner by enthusiasts who demanded they shout, "Long live good King Charles!" D'Artagnan replied with a grunt, and Athos with a smile. They made their way thus toward Monck's house that was on the route to the Saint James's Palace. Athos and d'Artagnan spoke very little on their way because if they had spoken they would have had too much to say. Athos thought that if he spoke he would be too joyful that might hurt d'Artagnan, while the latter feared to express bitterness that might cause Athos discomfort. It was a strange silence that hovered between contentment and discontent. D'Artagnan yielded first to the itch to speak, saying, "Do you remember, Athos, that passage in the Memoirs of d'Aubigné in which that devoted servant, a Gascon like me, and poor like me, and I was almost going to say brave like me, recounts the stinginess of Henri IV? My father always told me, I remember, that d'Aubigné was a liar. And yet, take a look at all the princes descended from the Great Henry!"

"Come now, d'Artagnan," said Athos, "the kings of France, misers? You're mad, my friend."

"Oh, you never see others' faults, you're too perfect. But in reality, Henri IV was stingy, as was his son, Louis XIII. We know something about that, don't we? Gaston took that vice to extremes, and everyone around him hated him for it. Henriette, poor woman, had no choice but to be frugal, when she had nothing to eat some days and nothing to burn for heat in the winters, and that's the example she gave to her son Charles II, grandson of the great Henri IV, and as miserly as his mother and his grandfather. Come, isn't that a family tree of the tight-fisted?"

"D'Artagnan," said Athos, "how can you be so harsh on that race of eagles called the Bourbons?"

"And I forgot the finest example, that other grandson of the Béarnaise, Louis XIV, my ex-master. I believe we can fairly call him miserly since he wouldn't lend a million to his brother Charles! Oh, I see I'm starting to annoy you but fortunately we've arrived at my house, or rather the house of my friend Monck."

"Dear d'Artagnan, I'm not annoyed, just saddened. It's cruel, in fact, to see a man of your merit unrewarded by the position that his services should have brought him. It seems to me that your name, old friend, ought to rank up there with the greatest names of war and diplomacy, as worthy of fortune and honour as Luynes, Bellegarde, and Bassompierre. You are right, my friend, a hundred times over."

D'Artagnan sighed, and led his friend under the portico of Monck's house at the edge of town, saying, "Allow me to stop in and leave my purse here, for if, in the crowd, these clever London crooks, who are light-fingered even by Parisian standards, rob me of the rest of my poor crowns, I won't have enough to buy passage back to France. And I'm eager to get back to France and will be delighted to see it again, now that all my old prejudices against England have been reconfirmed, with new ones added."

Athos said nothing. "I'll just be a moment," d'Artagnan said to him. "I know you're in a hurry to get on to receive your reward but believe me, I'm no less eager than you to enjoy it, albeit from a distance. Wait for me."

D'Artagnan was halfway across the vestibule when a man, half footman and half soldier, who served Monck in the capacities of both doorman and guard, stopped our musketeer and said, in English, "Excuse me, Milord d'Artagnan!"

"Well, what is it?" replied the latter. "Is the general ready to dismiss me? All that was missing was for me to be sent away!"

These words, spoken in French, made no impression on the guard, as he spoke only English mixed with Scots. But Athos was sad because it was beginning to look like d'Artagnan was right. The Englishman gave a letter to d'Artagnan. "From the general," he said.

"Well, there it is: my dismissal," said the Gascon. "Should I read it, Athos?"

"You must be mistaken," said Athos, "or the only honest people left are you and me."

D'Artagnan shrugged his shoulders and tore open the letter, while the Englishman held up a lantern to help him read it. "Well! What does it say?" said Athos, seeing the reader's expression change.

"Here, read it yourself," said the musketeer. Athos took the paper and read:

Sir d'Artagnan, the king very much regretted that you didn't come to Saint Paul with his cortège. His Majesty says he missed you, and I missed you as well, dear Captain. There is only one way to repair this: His Majesty expects me at nine o'clock at the palace of Saint James; will you join me there? His Most Gracious Majesty appoints that hour for the audience he grants you.

The letter was signed

Monck.

297

The Audience

"Well?" said Athos in a voice of gentle reproach, when he'd read Monck's letter to d'Artagnan.

"Well!" said d'Artagnan, red with pleasure and a little shame at having been so quick to accuse the king and Monck. "It's a very polite gesture ... and amounts to nothing, of course ... but it is polite, nonetheless."

"I found it hard to believe the young prince would be ungrateful," said Athos.

"The fact is that his present is still very near his past," replied d'Artagnan. "After all, everything prior to this indicated I was right."

"I admit it, dear friend, I admit it. Ah! Now we'll see your well-earned recompense. You can't believe how happy this makes me."

"So, then," said d'Artagnan, "Charles II receives General Monck at nine o'clock, and will receive me at ten; and a fine audience it is, the kind they call at the Louvre the 'bestowal of Court Holy Water.' Let's go, old friend, and place ourselves under the spout."

Athos made no reply, so the two of them went on their way toward Saint James's Palace that was surrounded by a crowd there to see the silhouettes of the courtiers through the windows, and perhaps a glimpse of the royal personage. Eight o'clock was striking as the two took their places in a gallery full of courtiers and hopeful petitioners. Everyone noticed their modest foreign attire and proud profiles, so noble and full of character. For their part, Athos and d'Artagnan, having taken the measure of the assemblage at a glance, resumed chatting together. A great noise suddenly came from one end of the gallery: it was General Monck making his entrance, followed by more than twenty officers all hoping for one of his smiles, for the day before he'd been master of England, and they imagined a fine tomorrow for he who'd restored the family Stuart. "Gentlemen," said Monck, turning toward them, "I pray you, remember that now I am no one. Not long ago I commanded the principal army of the republic but now that army is the king's, into whose hands I commit, at his order, my power of yesterday."

Dismayed surprise showed on all the officers' faces, and the circle of admirers and supplicants that had ringed Monck a moment before gradually widened and dispersed itself into the general surge of the crowd. Monck simply waited in the antechamber like everyone else. D'Artagnan couldn't keep from remarking upon this to the Count of La Fère, who frowned. Suddenly the door to Charles's audience chamber opened and the young king appeared, preceded by two of his household officers. "Good evening, Gentlemen," he said. "Is General Monck here?"

"Here I am, Sir," the old general replied.

Charles strode up to him and took his hands in a friendly grip. "General," the king announced, "I have just signed the patent making you Duke of Albemarle, and my intention is that no one in this kingdom should equal you in power and in fortune, because, except for Montrose, no one has equalled you in loyalty, courage, and talent. Gentlemen, the duke is commander in chief of our armies on land and at sea, and in that capacity, honour him and pay him your respects."

While everyone hastened to gather around the general, who received their congratulations with his usual impassivity, d'Artagnan said to Athos, "To think that this duchy, this command of the armies on land and at sea, all these grandeurs, in short, were contained in a box six feet long by three feet wide!"

"Friend," said Athos, "greater grandeurs than those are enclosed in smaller boxes – forever."

Suddenly Monck noticed the two gentlemen where they stood apart, waiting for the crowd to thin out. He made his way to them through the throng, surprising them in the middle of their philosophical reflections. "You were talking about me," he said with a smile.

"Milord," replied Athos, "we were also talking of God."

Monck thought for a moment and then responded cheerfully, "Gentlemen, let us also speak of the king, if you will; for you have, I believe, an audience with His Majesty."

"At nine o'clock," said Athos.

"Or ten," said d'Artagnan.

"Let's go to his audience chamber right now," Monck replied, making a gesture for his two companions to precede him, to which neither of them would consent.

During this debate, conducted in French, the king had returned to the centre of the gallery. "Ah, my Frenchmen!" he said, in that tone of carefree cheer that he was still able to summon despite his many troubles and sorrows. "The Frenchmen, my consolation!"

Athos and d'Artagnan bowed. "Duke, bring these gentlemen into my chamber," said the king, adding in French, "I am all yours, Gentlemen."

And he promptly dismissed his Court so he could attend to his Frenchmen, as he called them. "Sir d'Artagnan," he said, entering his audience chamber, "I'm pleased to see you again."

"Sire, having the honour to salute Your Majesty in his own palace of Saint James's, my joy could not be greater."

"Sir, you have done me a great service, and I owe you a debt of gratitude. Though I don't want to encroach on the rights of our commander in chief, I wish to offer you a post worthy of you near to our person."

"Sire," replied d'Artagnan, "when I left the service of the King of France, I promised my prince it was not to serve another king."

"Come," said Charles, "that displeases me greatly, for I like you, and I'd hoped to do a lot for you."

"Sire..."

"Here, now," said Charles with a smile, "is there no way I can persuade you to set that aside? Duke, help me here. What if you were offered – if I offered you – the command of all my musketeers?"

D'Artagnan bowed even lower than before, and said, "I should always regret refusing what Your Gracious Majesty offers me but a gentleman has only his word, and that word, as I had the honour to tell Your Majesty, is pledged to the King of France."

"Then we'll say no more about it," said the king, turning to Athos – and leaving d'Artagnan plunged into the deepest pit of disappointment.

"Ah! It's just like I said," murmured the musketeer. "Words! Court Holy Water! Kings have the amazing talent of offering what they know can't be accepted and thus appear generous without risk. Fool! Oh, triple fool for hoping even for a moment!"

Meanwhile, Charles took Athos by the hand. "Count," he said, "you've been a second father to me, and the service you've rendered can never be repaid. You were made by my father a Knight of the Garter, an order to which not even the kings of Europe are invited, and by the queen regent you were made a Sir du Saint-Esprit, an order no less illustrious. Now I award you the ribbon of the Order of the Golden Fleece – it was sent to me by the King of France who had been given two by the King of Spain, his father-in-law, on the occasion of his recent marriage. But I, in return, have a further service to ask of you."

"Sire!" said Athos, flustered. "The Golden Fleece, for me! When the King of France is the only other person in my country who shares that distinction!"

"I want you to be, in your country and everywhere, the equal of all those whom sovereigns have honoured with their favour," said Charles, lifting the chain from around his neck. "And I am certain, Count that my father smiles on this from the depths of his tomb."

"How strange it is," said d'Artagnan to himself, as his friend received on his knees the eminent order conferred upon him by the king, "how incredible that I always see the rain of prosperity fall on those around me, while not a drop reaches me! If one were the jealous type, it would be enough to make him tear out his hair, word of honour!"

Athos rose, and Charles embraced him tenderly. "General," he said to Monck, then, stopping himself with a smile, "excuse me, I meant to say Duke. And if I made that mistake, it's because duke just seems too short to me. I need to find a longer title, one that brings you close enough to the throne that I could say to you, 'My Brother,' as I do to Louis XIV. But I have it! To make you almost my brother, my dear Duke, I name you Viceroy of Ireland and Scotland. That way I won't again call you by too short a title."

The duke took the king's hand, though without apparent joy or enthusiasm, as he did everything. Yet his heart had been stirred by this final favour. Charles, skilfully managing his generosity, had given the duke time to form a wish, though he might not have wished for as much as he was awarded. "God be with you!" grumbled d'Artagnan. "Here come the rains again. Oh! It's enough to drive one mad." And he turned aside with an air so sad and comically pitiful that the king couldn't restrain a smile. Monck was preparing to take his leave of Charles. "What's this, my brother?" said the king to the duke.

"Are you leaving?"

"If it please Your Majesty, for in truth, I'm very tired. The emotion of the day has been exhausting, and I need my rest."

"But you're not leaving without Sir d'Artagnan, I hope!" said the king.

"Why, Sire?" said the old warrior.

"You know perfectly well why," said the king.

Monck looked at Charles with astonishment. "I beg Your Majesty's pardon," he said, "but I don't know what he means."

"I suppose that's possible – but if you've forgotten, I'm sure Sir d'Artagnan has not."

Now it was the musketeer's turn to be astonished. "See here, Duke," said the king, "aren't you lodging with Sir d'Artagnan?"

"I have the honour to offer lodging to Sir d'Artagnan, yes, Sire."

"And this idea was yours and yours alone?"

"Mine and mine alone, yes, Sire."

Well, of course it had to be that way ... since the prisoner always lodges with his conqueror."

Monck flushed. "Ah, that's true! I am Sir d'Artagnan's prisoner."

"Quite so, Monck, since you have yet to ransom yourself – but don't worry, it was I who took you from Sir d'Artagnan, so I will pay your ransom."

D'Artagnan's eyes regained their cheerful sparkle, for the Gascon began to understand. Charles turned toward him. "The general," he said, "isn't wealthy and can't pay you what he's worth. I am certainly richer but now that he's a duke, and nearly a king, he's worth a sum that perhaps even I couldn't pay. Come, Sir d'Artagnan, be lenient: how much do I owe you?"

D'Artagnan, delighted by this turn of events but maintaining his self-possession, said, "Sire, Your Majesty has no cause to be alarmed. When I had the good luck to capture His Grace, Mister Monck was still a general, so only the ransom of a general is due to me. But if the general will give me his sword, I'll consider myself paid, for there is nothing in the world but a general's sword that's worth as much as he is."

“Odds fish, as my father used to say,” cried Charles II. “That’s a gallant speech from a gallant man – don’t you agree, Duke?”

“Upon my honour, Sire, I do!” replied the duke. And he drew his sword. “Sir,” he said to d’Artagnan, “here is that which you asked for. Many have owned better blades but, modest as mine is, I’ve never surrendered it to anyone.”

D’Artagnan took with pride this sword that had just made a king. “Here, now!” said Charles II. “What! Is a sword that placed me on the throne to go out of my kingdom rather than be added one day to the crown jewels? No, upon my soul, I think not! Captain d’Artagnan, I’ll give you two hundred thousand livres for this sword; if that’s not enough, tell me so.”

“It isn’t enough, Sire,” replied d’Artagnan with grave seriousness. “And moreover, I don’t want to sell it – but Your Majesty wishes it and that is an order. I obey, then – but the respect in which I hold the illustrious warrior listening to us commands me to estimate his worth at half again that assessment. I therefore ask three hundred thousand livres for the sword, or Your Majesty may have it for nothing.”

And, taking it by the point, he presented the sword to the king. Charles II burst out laughing. “Oh, gallant man and happy companion! Isn’t it so, Duke? Am I right, Count? Odds fish! How that pleases me. Here, Sir d’Artagnan,” he said, “take this.”

And, going to a table, he wrote a voucher on his treasury for three hundred thousand livres. D’Artagnan took it, and turning gravely to Monck, he said, “I still asked too little, I know but believe me, Duke, I would rather die than be ruled by avarice.”

The king laughed again like the jolliest Cockney in his kingdom. “You must come back and see me again before you go, Sir,” he said. “I need to lay by a supply of cheer before my Frenchmen leave me.”

“Ah, Sire! Unlike the duke’s sword, I’ll give you the cheer for free,” replied d’Artagnan, whose feet scarcely touched the ground.

“And you, Count,” added Charles, turning to Athos, “come back as well, for I have an important message to confide to you. Duke, your hand.” Monck shook hands with the king. “Farewell, Gentlemen,” said Charles, extending a hand to each of the Frenchmen who touched them to their lips.

“Well, then!” said Athos when they were outside. “Are you satisfied?”

“Hush!” said d’Artagnan, grinning with joy. “I haven’t been to see the treasurer yet, and the roof could still fall on my head.”

The Embarrassment of Riches

D’Artagnan didn’t waste any time: as soon as it was convenient and opportune, he paid a visit to His Majesty’s Treasurer. There he had the great satisfaction of exchanging a bit of paper covered with an ugly scrawl for a prodigious quantity of crowns, all newly struck with the image of His Most Gracious Majesty Charles II. D’Artagnan had long ago learned to master his emotions but on this occasion he couldn’t help expressing a joy the readers may forgive, if they deign to be indulgent toward a man who, since his birth, had never seen so many coins and rolls of coins laid out before him in a pattern truly pleasing to the eye. The treasurer enclosed these rolls in sturdy sacks and sealed each bag with the arms of England, a favour that treasurers do not grant to everybody. Then, impassive and just as polite as he ought to be to a man honoured by the friendship of the king, he said to d’Artagnan, “Take your money, Sir.”

Your money. Those words made a thousand strings thrum in d’Artagnan’s heart where he’d never felt them before. He had the sacks loaded on a small cart and returned home, thinking deeply. A man who possesses three hundred thousand livres can no longer have an unlined brow; a wrinkle for every 100000 livres is the least he can expect. D’Artagnan locked himself in, refused to open the door to anyone, wouldn’t eat, just sat with the lamp burning, a pistol cocked on the table, watching his fortune all night, considering how to keep those lovely crowns that had passed from the royal coffers to his own, from somehow passing out of his coffers and into the pockets of a thief. The best means the Gascon could devise was to box his treasure up under locks so strong no tool could break them, and so clever no ordinary key could open them. D’Artagnan remembered that the English are masters of mechanisms of security, and resolved to go the next day to find a mechanic who could sell him a safe. He didn’t have to go far: Mister Will Jobson, residing in Piccadilly, listened to his propositions, understood his needs, and promised to construct a lock for him so secure he would be freed from all fear of the future. “I will make for you a mechanism totally new,” he said. “At the first serious attempt to crack your lock, a hidden aperture will open, and a miniature gun will shoot out a lovely copper bullet the weight of a mark that will discommode your thief while making a resounding report. What do you think?”

“I think it sounds ingenious!” said d’Artagnan. “I particularly like the lovely copper bullet. So, Mister Mechanic, your terms?”

“Two weeks to make it, and fifteen thousand livres payable on delivery,” replied the artisan.

D’Artagnan grimaced. Two weeks were enough time for every thief in London to have their way with his fortune, and then he wouldn’t need a safe. As for the fifteen thousand livres, it was a high price to pay for what his vigilance could do for nothing. “I’ll ... think about it,” he said. “Thank you, Sir.”

And he returned home at a run – but no one had disturbed his treasure. That same day, Athos came to visit his friend and found him so anxious he confessed to being surprised. “What! Here you are rich but not happy?” he said. “You who always wanted wealth...”

“My friend, the pleasures we aren’t used to are worse than the sorrows we’re familiar with. You’ve always had money; can you give me some advice? When one has money, what does one do with it?”

“That depends.”

“What did you do with yours so as not to end up either a miser or a spendthrift? ‘For greed withers the heart, and prodigality wastes it’ – isn’t that how it goes?”

“Even Fabricius couldn’t say it better. But, in truth, having money never troubled me.”

“Come, do you invest it in annuities?”

“No; you know I have a pretty good country house, and this house comprises the majority of my wealth.”

“Yes, so you’ve said.”

“Well, you can be as rich as I am, even richer if you like, by the same means.”

“But your income from rent – do you save it?”

“No.”

“What would you think of a hidden wall cache?”

“I’ve never used such a thing.”

“Then you have some confidential partner, some reliable businessman who manages your funds and pays a decent interest?”

“Not at all.”

“My God! What do you do, then?”

“I spend whatever I have and no more than that, my dear d’Artagnan.”

“Well, there! But you’re a sort of lesser prince, with fifteen or sixteen thousand livres of revenue to fritter away, plus expenses to keep up appearances.”

“But I don’t see that you’re much less noble than I am, my friend, and your fortune should be quite enough for you.”

“Three hundred thousand livres! It should be three times enough.”

“Your pardon but it seems to me you told me ... or I thought I understood ... that is, you also have a partner...”

“Ah, God be with you! That’s right!” cried d’Artagnan, colouring. “There’s Planchet! I forgot about Planchet, upon my life. Well! There’s my three hundred thousand broken into ... such a shame, it was a nice round figure. But it’s true, Athos, I’m not rich at all, really. What a memory you have!”

“Good enough, yes, God be praised.”

“The worthy Planchet,” groaned d’Artagnan. “His golden dreams come true. What an investment, plague! Well, what was said is said.”

“How much will you give him?”

“Oh, he’s not a bad lad,” said d’Artagnan. “I’ll do right by him. But I was put to considerable trouble, you see, had expenses, and all that must be taken into account.”

“I know you can be trusted, my dear,” said Athos serenely, “and I don’t worry about the good Planchet; his interests are better off in your hands than in his. But now that we’ve no more to do here, we can go whenever you’re ready. You just need to take your leave of His Majesty, ask him if he has any orders, and we can see the towers of Notre Dame within a week.”

“Frankly, my friend, I’m burning to leave, so I’ll go and pay my respects to the king.”

“While I’m just going to meet a few people in the city,” said Athos, “and then I’m yours.”

“Will you lend me Grimaud?”

“With all my heart. What do you need him for?”

“A simple task that won’t wear him out – I just need to ask him to sit by this table with my pistols and keep an eye on my coffers of coins.”

“Very well,” Athos replied imperturbably.

“He won’t go off on his own?”

“No more than the pistols would.”

“Then I’ll go to see His Majesty. See you shortly.”

D’Artagnan hastened to Saint James’s Palace, where Charles II, who was writing his correspondence, kept him in the antechamber a full hour. As d’Artagnan walked back and forth across the gallery, from the doors to the windows and the windows to the doors, he thought he saw someone with a cloak like Athos’s leaving through the outer vestibule but just as he was about to go see for himself the usher summoned him in to see His Majesty. Charles II rubbed his hands while receiving our musketeer’s thanks. “Sir,” he said, “you’re wrong to think you owe me any gratitude, because I haven’t paid even a quarter of the worth of the story of the box in which you encased our brave general ... or rather the excellent Duke of Albemarle.”

And the king burst out laughing. D’Artagnan thought it would be impolite to interrupt His Majesty and looked away modestly. “By the way,” continued Charles, “has my dear Monck really forgiven you?”

“Forgiven me! I certainly hope so, Sire.”

“Heh! It must have been a cruel passage. Odds fish! To jug the leading personage of the English Revolution like a herring! I wouldn’t trust him if I were in your place, Sir.”

“But, Sire...”

“Yes, I’m well aware that Monck calls you his friend ... but he has too calculating an eye not to have a sharp memory behind it, and a forehead that tall indicates great pride – you know, grande supercilium.”

“I really must learn some Latin,” d’Artagnan said to himself.

“Here, you must let me arrange your reconciliation,” said the king, enchanted with the idea. “I know just how to do it...”

D’Artagnan gnawed his moustache. “Would Your Majesty permit me to speak the truth?”

“Speak, Sir, speak.”

“Well, Sire, you’re starting to frighten me! If Your Majesty tries to manage my affairs, as he seems to wish, I’m a doomed man – the duke will have me assassinated.”

The king burst out laughing again that made d’Artagnan genuinely alarmed. “Sire, I beg, promise me you’ll let me handle this matter myself. And now, if you have no further need of my services...”

“Not yet, Sir. You don’t really want to leave?” laughed Charles with increasingly disturbing hilarity.

“If Your Majesty has nothing more to ask of me.”

Charles grew more serious. “One more thing. Go see my sister, Princess Henrietta. Does she know you?”

“No, Sire ... but an old soldier like me won’t find favour with a young and cheerful princess.”

“And I say to you that I wish my sister to know you. I want her to know that she can count on you at need.”

“Sire, everything dear to Your Majesty is sacred to me.”

“Quite so ... Parry! Come here, good Parry.”

The side door opened, and Parry came in, his face lighting up when he saw the Sir. “What’s Rochester* doing?” asked the king.

“He’s on the canal with the ladies.”

“And Buckingham?”*

“The same.”

"Perfect. Bring the Sir to Villiers – that's the Duke of Buckingham, Sir – and ask the duke to introduce Sir d'Artagnan to Milady Henrietta." Parry bowed and smiled at d'Artagnan. "Sir," continued the king, "this is your final audience, and you may take your leave whenever you please."

"Thank you, Sire!"

"But make your peace with Monck."

"Oh! Sire..."

"You know that one of my vessels is at your disposal?"

"Sire, you overwhelm me! I couldn't think of putting Your Majesty's officers to such trouble for me."

The king clapped d'Artagnan on the shoulder. "It's not just for you, Sir but also for an ambassador I'm sending to France – one you'll be happy to have for a companion, I think, for you know him."

D'Artagnan looked at the king in surprise. "It's a certain Count of La Fère, whom you call Athos," added the king, ending the conversation as he'd begun it, with a burst of laughter. "Farewell, Sir, farewell! Love me as I love you." And with that, making a gesture to Parry to inquire if anyone awaited him in the adjacent study, the king disappeared into that room, leaving the audience chamber to the Sir, still stunned by this unusual interview. The old man took him amicably by the arm and led him into the gardens.

On the Canal

On the green waters of the canal, bordered by marble stonework that time had marred with black spots and grassy tufts, majestically glided a long, flat barge, blazoned with the arms of England, surmounted by a canopy and hung with long damask curtains that trailed golden fringe into the water. Eight rowers, loosely plying their oars, made her move along the canal with the languid grace of the swans, who, disturbed in their aquatic territory by the barge's wake, glared from a distance as it passed in its splendour and clamour. We say clamour because the barge contained four guitar and lute players, two singers, and several courtiers glittering with gold and precious stones, all showing their white teeth at each other in an effort to please Milady Stuart, granddaughter of Henri IV, daughter of Charles I, and sister of Charles II, who sat on the barge's dais in the place of honour. We know this young princess, having seen her in the Louvre with her mother, bereft of firewood, bereft of bread, kept alive by the Coadjutor and the Parliament of Paris. She'd had, like her brothers, a hard youth but now she'd suddenly awakened from that long, horrible dream to find herself seated at the foot of a throne, surrounded by courtiers and flatterers. And like Mary Stuart upon leaving her prison, she aspired to life and liberty, and moreover, to power and wealth. Princess Henrietta had grown up to become a remarkable beauty, and her prominence in the recent restoration had already made that beauty famous. Misfortune had humbled her pride but prosperity had restored it to her. She glowed with the joy of her youth, like those hothouse flowers that, wilted for a night by the first frost of autumn, recover in the warmth of the next day and bloom more splendidly than ever. George Villiers, second Duke of Buckingham, the son of he who played such a celebrated role in the first volume of this history – Villiers of Buckingham, a handsome cavalier, melancholy with women and merry with men, and Wilmot, Lord Rochester, merry with both sexes, were at that moment standing before Lady Henrietta, vying for the privilege of making her smile. As for that young and beautiful princess, lying back on a velvet cushion embroidered with gold, trailing a languid hand in the water, she listened nonchalantly to the musicians without really hearing them, and heard every word of the courtiers without appearing to listen to them. For Lady Henrietta, this charming creature who combined the feminine graces of France and England, had never yet loved, and thus was cruel in her coquetry. So, the smile, that naïve favour of young ladies, never lit up her face, and if she raised her eyes, it was to fasten them so directly upon one or the other of the cavaliers that their gallantry, usually so bold, was abashed and made timid. Meanwhile, the barge slid along, the musicians played frantically, and the courtiers, like the singers, began to run out of breath. It must have seemed all too monotonous to the princess, for she suddenly shook her head impatiently and said, "Come, that's quite enough, Gentlemen. Let's go ashore."

"Ah, Milady, how unfortunate we are," said Buckingham. "Our canal excursion has failed to please Your Highness."

"My mother's waiting for me," replied Lady Henrietta, "and I must tell you candidly, Gentlemen, that I'm bored."

But upon saying that cruel word, the princess tried with a glance at each to console the two young men, who seemed dismayed by such frankness. The looks produced their effects and the two faces brightened – but immediately, as if the royal coquette thought she might have offered too much to mere mortals, she turned her back on her two orators and fell into a reverie that evidently had nothing to do with them. Buckingham bit his lip in anger, for he was truly in love with Lady Henrietta, and as a result took everything seriously. Rochester bit his lip as well but his mind always dominated his heart, and he was merely suppressing a malicious laugh. The princess was allowing the eyes she'd turned away from the young men to gaze across the banks to the gardens and lawns when she saw Parry and d'Artagnan approaching in the distance. "Who's coming over there?" she asked.

The two young men instantly spun about. "It's Parry," replied Buckingham, "no one but Parry."

"Beg pardon," said Rochester, "but it seems to me he has a companion."

"Yes, I see," replied the princess languidly, then added more sharply, "but what did you mean by 'no one but Parry,' Milord?"

"I meant, Milady," replied Buckingham, piqued, "that the loyal Parry, the ubiquitous Parry, the wandering Parry, seems to me quite insignificant."

"You are mistaken, Your Grace: Parry, the wandering Parry, as you call him, has always wandered in service to my family, and so to see this old man is always a pleasure for me."

Lady Henrietta followed the usual routine of pretty women when toying with men of passing from capricious to contrary; her gallant had submitted to her caprice and now must suffer her contradiction. Buckingham bowed but said nothing. "It's true, Milady," said Rochester, bowing in his turn, "that Parry is a model servant – but he's no longer young, Milady, and we laugh only with the light-hearted. Is he light-hearted, this old man?"

"Enough, Milord," said Lady Henrietta drily. "The subject of this conversation irritates me." Then, as if speaking to herself, "It's truly incredible how little regard my brother's friends have for his servants!"

"Ah, Milady!" cried Buckingham. "Your Highness pierces my heart with a dagger forged by your own hands."

"What is the meaning of this speech, Duke? It has the sound of bad poetry."

"It means, Milady that you yourself, so good, so charming, so sensitive, have laughed sometimes, or at least smiled, at the random maunderings of the ancient Parry, for whom Your Highness today has such a marvellous fondness."

"Well, Milord!" said Lady Henrietta. "If I forgot my manners so far as to do that, it's ill-mannered of you to remind me of it." She made an impatient gesture. "The good Parry wants to speak to me, I think. Lord Rochester, have them put in to the bank, if you please."

Rochester hastened to repeat the princess's command. A few moments later, the barge touched the canal's bank. "Step ashore, Gentlemen," said Lady Henrietta, reaching for the arm offered by Rochester, though Buckingham was nearer to her and had presented his first.

Then Rochester, with an ill-concealed pride that smote the heart of the unhappy Buckingham, escorted the princess across the gangplank the crew had extended from the royal barge to the bank. "Where to, Your Highness?" asked Rochester.

"As you see, Milord, toward that good Parry, who wanders, as Lord Buckingham put it, searching for me with eyes weakened by the tears he's shed for our misfortunes."

"God's wounds but Your Highness is sad today," said Rochester, "in light of which, our chattering must make us seem like ridiculous fools."

"Speak for yourself, Milord," interrupted Buckingham bitterly. "As for me, I displease Her Highness so much I seem like nothing at all."

Neither Rochester nor the princess replied to this; Lady Henrietta only pressed her cavalier to walk faster. Buckingham was left behind and took advantage of his isolation to take his anger out on his handkerchief, tearing the batiste to pieces with his teeth. "Parry, good Parry," called the princess in a gentle voice, "come this way. I see you're looking for me, and I'm waiting."

"Indeed, Milady, let's wait," said Rochester, charitably coming to the aid of the duke, who was still behind them. "Even if Parry can't see Your Highness, the man with him would be guide enough for a blind man, for he has sharp, even fiery eyes. His gaze glows like a lantern."

"Lighting a strong face and a martial figure," said the princess, to sting the young nobles. Rochester bowed. "One of those vigorous and manly soldiers one sees only in France," she added, with the persistence of a woman certain of her impunity.

Rochester and Buckingham looked at each other as if to say, What makes her do that?

"Milord Buckingham, go see what Parry wants," said Lady Henrietta.

The young man, who regarded this command as a sign of favour, was encouraged and hurried to meet Parry, who, accompanied by d'Artagnan, was slowly making his way toward the trio of nobles. Parry walked slowly due to his age; beside him, d'Artagnan marched slowly but with dignity, ennobled by the consciousness that he was now worth a third of a million. Eager to follow the desires of the princess, who had sat down upon a marble bench as if fatigued by her brief walk, Buckingham approached Parry, and when he was within a few paces the old man recognised him. "Ah, Milord!" he said, wheezing. "Would Your Grace kindly oblige the king?"

"In what way, Mister Parry?" asked the young man, his usual hauteur tempered by his desire to please the princess.

"Well! His Majesty would like Your Grace to present Sir, here, to Her Highness Henrietta Stuart."

"And who is Sir, here?" asked the duke coldly.

D'Artagnan, as we know, was quick to take offence, and the Duke of Buckingham's tone irritated him. He looked the courtier in the eye, and his own eyes flashed beneath a frowning brow – but he mastered himself and said calmly, "Sir le Sir d'Artagnan, Milord."

"Pardon, Sir but that tells me your name, nothing more."

"Meaning?"

"Meaning I don't know you."

"Then I have the advantage of you, Sir," d'Artagnan replied, "for your family is known to me, particularly the first Duke of Buckingham, your illustrious father."

"My father?" said Buckingham. "Now that you mention it, Sir ... the Sir d'Artagnan, you said?"

D'Artagnan bowed. "In person," he said.

"Beg pardon but aren't you one of those Frenchmen who was involved in some secret intrigue with my father?"

"Precisely, Your Grace – I'm one of those Frenchmen."

"Then, Sir, permit me to say that it's strange that my father, during his lifetime, never mentioned your name."

"No, Your Grace, though he heard it at the moment of his death; it was I who sent to him, by way of Queen Anne's valet the warning of the danger he was in. Unfortunately, the warning arrived too late."

"I see, Sir," said Buckingham. "I understand now that having hoped to render a service to the father, you come to make a claim upon the son."

"No, Milord – I make no claims upon anyone," d'Artagnan replied coolly. "His Majesty King Charles II, for whom I had the honour to perform some services – I've passed my life in such occupations, Your Grace – King Charles II, who wished to honour me with a favour, asked that I be introduced to Princess Henrietta, his sister, to whom I might have the privilege of being useful in the future. The king happened to know that you were at this moment with Her Highness and sent me with Parry to find you. No mystery and no intrigue. I have nothing else to ask of Your Grace, and if you don't wish to introduce me to Her Highness, I will have to do without you and be so bold as to introduce myself."

"At least, Sir," replied Buckingham, wanting to get the last word, "you won't back down from answering some questions about yourself."

"I never back down, Your Grace," said d'Artagnan.

"If you were involved in my father's private affairs, there must be some secret you can reveal that would prove it."

"Those affairs were long ago, well before your time, Your Grace, involving some diamond studs that I received from his hands and returned to France, a matter too private to bandy about now."

"Ah, Sir!" said Buckingham eagerly, approaching d'Artagnan and extending his hand. "It is you! You, whom my father sought everywhere, and who has the right to expect so much from us!"

"Expect, Your Grace? In truth, expectations are my forte, and have been all my life."

Meanwhile, the princess, tired of waiting for the stranger to come to her, had risen and was approaching. "At least, Sir," said Buckingham, "you can expect the introduction that you want from me."

Then, turning and bowing to Lady Henrietta, the young man said, "Milady, the king your brother desires me to have the honour of presenting to Your Highness Sir le Sir d'Artagnan."

"So that Your Highness shall have at need a strong defender and a reliable friend," added Parry.

D'Artagnan bowed. "You have something else to add, don't you, Parry?" replied Lady Henrietta, smiling at d'Artagnan while addressing her old servant.

"Yes, Milady," Parry said to her. "The king wishes Your Highness to inscribe that name in her memory so she will remember his worth, for it is to him, as much as to anyone, that His Majesty owes the recovery of his realm."

Buckingham, the princess, and Rochester looked at each other in astonishment. “That,” said d’Artagnan, “refers to another little secret, one that I probably won’t boast about to the son of His Majesty King Charles II as I just did to His Grace about his father’s diamond studs.”

“Your Highness,” said Buckingham, “Sir has just reminded me again of an episode that so excites my curiosity that I would dare to ask her permission to let me take him aside for a moment so I can ask him about it in private.”

“Do so, Milord,” said the princess, “but do so quickly so that you can return to the sister this friend so devoted to her brother.”

And she took Rochester’s arm while Buckingham took d’Artagnan’s. “Now, tell me, Sir,” said Buckingham, “all about that affair of the diamond studs that no one in England knows about, not even the son of its hero.”

“Milord, only one person in England had the right to recount that affair, and that was your father. Since he saw fit to keep quiet about it, I must ask you for permission to do the same.”

And d’Artagnan bowed like a man who clearly intended not to say another word. “If that’s the case, Sir, then pardon me for my indiscretion,” said Buckingham, “and if, someday, I travel to France…”

And he turned to glance at the princess, who was paying no attention to him, busy as she was, or seemed to be, in conversation with Rochester. Buckingham sighed. “Well?” asked d’Artagnan.

“I was saying that if someday I, too, should travel to France…”

“You will, Milord – I’ll answer for that,” said d’Artagnan, smiling.

“Really? Why?”

“Oh, I have strange powers of prediction … and when I predict something, I’m rarely wrong. So, if you come to France…”

“Well, Sir! To you, whom kings take in friendship because you restore them their crowns, I will dare to ask to know a bit more about this great intrigue you shared with my father.”

“Milord,” replied d’Artagnan, “believe me that I will be honoured to speak to you, if you’re still happy to remember that you saw me here. And now, if you’ll permit me…” He turned toward Lady Henrietta.

“Milady,” he said, “Your Highness is a Daughter of France, and in that capacity I hope to meet her again in Paris. My happiest day will be when Your Highness gives me a command that shows she remembers the recommendations of her august brother.”

And he bowed before the young princess, who gave him her hand to kiss with a becoming royal grace. “Ah, Milady,” said Buckingham quietly, “what could I possibly do to obtain from Your Highness the same favour?”

“By Our Lady, Milord,” replied Princess Henrietta, “ask Sir d’Artagnan, he can tell you.”

How d’Artagnan Drew a Country Estate from a Wooden Box as if by Fairy Magic

The king’s words on the subject of Monck’s wounded pride had inspired more than a little anxiety in d’Artagnan. All his life the lieutenant had shown a talent for choosing his enemies, and when he had taken on those who were implacable and invincible it was because he couldn’t, under any pretext, do otherwise. But one’s point of view can change greatly over the course of a life; it’s a magic lantern lensed by a human eye that changes from year to year. One year in which we see things as white and the next year in which we see them as black are separated, on the last day of the year, by a single night. D’Artagnan, as he was when he left Calais with his ten rogues, was as ready to contend with a Goliath, a Nebuchadnezzar, or Holofernes as he was to spar with a recruit or chat with a barmaid. Then he was like a hawk that, starving, will attack a ram out of blind hunger. But d’Artagnan sated, d’Artagnan rich, d’Artagnan a conqueror, d’Artagnan proud of a difficult triumph, this d’Artagnan had too much to lose not to reckon, tally by tally, the odds of probable disaster. He was thinking, then, while returning from his royal introduction, of only one thing: how to handle a man as powerful as Monck, a man whom even Charles handled with great care. For, newly restored, the protégé might still need the protector, and if asked would scarcely refuse Monck the small favour of deporting Sir d’Artagnan, or throwing him in some dungeon in Middlesex, or arranging a small maritime tragedy in the crossing from Dover to Boulogne. These are the kinds of favours kings do for viceroys without a second thought. It wasn’t even necessary for the king to take an active role in the scenario of Monck’s revenge; all he need do was to pardon the Viceroy of Ireland for whatever action he took against d’Artagnan. Nothing more was needed to settle the conscience of the Duke of Albemarle than a te absolvo [one who absolves] said with a laugh or the scribbled signature of King Charles at the bottom of a document, and with these two or three words spoken or scrawled, poor d’Artagnan might just as well have never existed. And as a further circumstance worrisome to one with as much foresight as our musketeer, he was essentially on his own, with only the friendship of Athos as a slight reassurance. Of course, if it was just a matter of sword thrusts, the musketeer could count on his comrade; but in crossing privileges with a king, where the benefit of the doubt might serve to support the position of Monck or of Charles II, d’Artagnan knew Athos well enough to be sure that he’d find his duty most due to the noble survivor and content himself with shedding tears on the tomb of the deceased, composing, if the deceased was his friend, a eulogy of pompous superlatives. Decidedly, thought the Gascon, reaching the conclusion of those inner reflections we just revealed aloud, decidedly I must be reconciled with Mister Monck, and with a proof that he holds no grudge. If, God forbid, he remains sullen and unforgiving, I’ll give my money to Athos to take to France while I stay in England just long enough to make Monck show his hand; then, at the first hostile sign, I’ll decamp, and as I have a keen eye and a light foot, I’ll go to ground with Milord de Buckingham, who seems a good devil at heart, and to whom, as recompense for his hospitality, I’ll recount the entire history of the diamond studs. At this point it can only compromise an aging queen who need not be ashamed, after being the secret wife of Sir de Mazarin, of having also been the mistress of a noble lord like the first Buckingham. “God!” he said aloud, “this Monck won’t outplay me! And besides, I have an idea.”

As we know, a shortage of ideas was never d’Artagnan’s problem. During this monologue d’Artagnan had buttoned up his jerkin to his chin, and nothing excited his imagination like this preparation for combat that the Romans called accinctio. He was quite wound up by the time he arrived at the house of the new Duke of Albemarle, where he was escorted to the viceroy’s presence with a speed that showed he was still regarded as a member of the household. Monck was in his study. “Milord,” said d’Artagnan, wearing a convincing expression of frankness upon his cunning features, “I come to ask Your Grace for advice.”

Monck, as buttoned-up morally as his antagonist was physically, replied, “Ask, my friend.”

And his face presented an expression no less frank than d’Artagnan’s. “Milord, first of all, please promise me secrecy and forbearance.”

“I promise you whatever you ask. What is it? Speak!”

“Oh, really? And in what way, if you please, my dear Lieutenant?”

“In the way that His Majesty sometimes makes jokes at the expense of his servants – and mockery, Milord, is a weapon that wounds men of the sword like us.”

Monck made every effort not to betray his thoughts but d’Artagnan watched with such close attention that he couldn’t miss the almost imperceptible flush on his cheeks. “But I’m no enemy of such pleasantries, my dear Sir d’Artagnan,” said Monck with the most natural air in the world. “My soldiers will even tell you that many times in camp I heard with indifference, and even appreciation, the satirical songs Lambert’s soldiers sang from their own camp, and which definitely would have scorched the ears of a general more susceptible to mockery than I am.”

“Oh, Milord!” said d’Artagnan. “I know that you are completely self-possessed and far above the insecurities of humankind – but there are jokes, and there are jokes. And some of them, I confess, have the ability to irritate me above all expression.”

“Of what kind are those, old boy?”

“The kind that foster disrespect for my friends and allies, Milord.”

Monck winced ever so slightly but d’Artagnan noticed it. “And in what way can the pin that pricks another affect you?” asked Monck. “Tell me that!”

“I’ll tell you, Milord: because the pin was intended to prick you.”

Monck took a step toward d’Artagnan. “Me?” he said.

“Yes, and that’s what I don’t understand; maybe it’s because I don’t know him well. How can the king have the heart to mock a man who’s served him so much and so well? Why would he amuse himself by setting a gnat like me at the ears of a lion like you?”

“I don’t understand what you’re telling me,” said Monck.

“Very well, consider this! Why didn’t the king, who owed me some recompense, reward me like a soldier instead of concocting that ransom story that reflects upon you, Milord?”

“But no,” said Monck, laughing, “that doesn’t reflect upon me at all, on my oath.”

“I know it’s not my place to talk, and you know me, Milord, I’m as quiet as the grave but – don’t you get it, Milord?”

“No,” Monck said stubbornly.

“If another knew the secret I know…”

“Which secret?”

“Why, Milord! The ugly secret of Newcastle.”

“Ah! You mean the Count of La Fère’s million?”

“No, Milord – the exploit that involved Your Grace.”

“It was a game well played, Sir, that’s all, and there’s nothing more to say about it. You are a man of war, brave and cunning that shows you combine the qualities of Fabius and Hannibal. You used force, wits, and the resources at hand, and there’s nothing to say against that; I should have taken better care to guard myself.”

“Thank you, Milord, I expected nothing less from your innate fairness, and if it was just a simple matter of your abduction, God be with you! I wouldn’t worry – and yet there’s the…”

“What?”

“The circumstances of that abduction.”

“What circumstances?”

“You’re well aware, Milord, of what I’m talking about.”

“I’m damned if I do!”

“To say what?”

“Well! To speak of that cursed … box.”

Monck visibly flushed.

“The indignity of the box,” continued d’Artagnan, “the wooden coffin, you know?”

“That? Forget about it.”

“Made of wooden planks, with air holes and a speaking grate,” continued d’Artagnan. “In truth, Milord, the rest of the exploit is fine – but the box, the box! That was a bad joke.” Monck squirmed in his chair. “And yet, the fact that I did that,” said d’Artagnan, “I, a soldier of fortune, that’s understandable, because though it might have been somewhat unworthy, it could be excused by the gravity of the situation. But never mind, I’m circumspect and discreet.”

“Oh!” said Monck. “Rest assured that I know you well, Sir d’Artagnan, and appreciate your virtues.”

D’Artagnan kept a close eye on Monck, detecting all that was passing through the general’s mind as he spoke. “But this isn’t about me,” he said.

“Well, who’s it about, then?” asked Monck, beginning to be impatient.

“Well, if he tells all he knows, so what?” said Monck, nervously.

“Milord,” replied d’Artagnan, “don’t pretend, I beg, with one who speaks as honestly as I do. You have a right to be concerned, no matter how blameless you are. What the devil! It’s not proper for a serious man like you, a man who plays with thrones and sceptres like an acrobat juggles balls, to be displayed in a box like a curiosity of natural history; if you have enemies – and you’re so great, so noble, and so generous that you must have many – and they heard of this, they would make you a laughingstock. A picture circulated of you locked in that box would set half the human race to laughter. Now, it’s neither decent nor proper for others to laugh like that at the second personage of the realm.”

Monck was beside himself at the idea of being depicted inside the box. The idea of ridicule as d’Artagnan had wisely foreseen, had gotten to him in a way that neither the hazards of war, the desires of ambition, nor the fear of death could. Good, thought the Gascon, he’s afraid, and I am saved.

“Oh, as to the king,” said Monck, “don’t worry about him, dear Sir d’Artagnan – the king won’t make fun of Monck, I assure you!” But d’Artagnan saw how his eyes flashed. Monck softened his tone immediately. “The king,” he continued, “has too noble a nature, too generous a heart to wish to injure those who mean him well.”

“Absolutely!” said d’Artagnan. “I’m entirely of your opinion as regards his heart but not his head; he means well but lets his wit carry him away.”

“The king’s wit won’t carry him away from me, I assure you.”

“So, you’re not at all worried, Milord?”

“On that flank at least I’m unconcerned, yes.”

“Got it, I understand, you’re unconcerned about the king.”

“As I said.”

“But you’re not as unconcerned about me?”

“I thought I told you that I believe in your loyalty and discretion.”

“No doubt, no doubt but you’re overlooking one thing...”

“Which is?”

“That I wasn’t alone, that I had companions – and such companions!”

“Oh! Yes, I remember them.”

“Unfortunately, Milord, they remember you too.”

“Well?”

“Well! They’re over there at Boulogne, waiting for me.”

“And you fear...?”

“Yes, I fear that in my absence ... for God’s sake! If only I were near them, I could answer for their silence.”

“Then I was right to say that the danger, if there was any, would come not from His Majesty, despite his tendency to jest but from such as your companions, as you say. To be mocked by a king may be tolerated but by mercenary rabble ... Goddamn!”

“Yes, I understand, that would be unbearable – which is why, Milord, I came to you to say, “Don’t you think I ought to depart for France as soon as possible?””

“Certainly, if you believe your presence...”

“Would impose discipline on those rogues? I’m certain of it, Milord.”

“Your presence won’t prevent the rumour from spreading if it’s already begun.”

“Oh, it hasn’t yet begun, Milord, I can guarantee that. In any event, you can be sure I’m determined on one thing.”

“And that is?”

“To blow the head off the first one to spread such a rumour, and follow with whoever might have heard it. After which, I’ll return to England to seek asylum and perhaps employment with Your Grace.”

“What, return? Return?”

“Unfortunately, Milord, I know no one here but you, and if I find you again, you may have forgotten me in your new grandeurs.”

“Listen, Sir d’Artagnan,” Monck replied, “you’re a charming gentleman, full of wit and courage, and deserve all the rewards the world can offer. Come with me to Scotland and I swear to you, within my viceroyalty you’ll find a place that others will envy.”

“Ah, Milord, that’s impossible right now! At the moment I have a sacred duty to fulfil: I must guard your glory and make sure no mean-spirited jest tarnishes you in the eyes of your peers, and who knows? Perhaps dims the lustre of your name in posterity.”

“In posterity, Sir d’Artagnan?”

“Why, of course! For the sake of posterity all the details of this affair must remain hidden – because, if the ugly story of the wooden box were to spread, everyone would say that you didn’t restore the king out of loyalty and your own free will but because the two of you made a bargain at Scheveningen. Then it would be useless for me to say what had really happened, because people would say I was part of the deal and had gotten my piece of the pie.”

Monck frowned darkly. “Glory, honour, integrity,” he said, “nothing but empty words!”

“Mist and smoke,” d’Artagnan nodded, “through which no one can ever see clearly.”

“Well, then! Go to France, my dear Sir,” said Monck. “Go, and to make England more accessible and receptive to you, accept a gift from me.”

What now? D’Artagnan thought.

“On the banks of the Clyde, in a little grove,” continued Monck, “I own a house, a cottage as we say, and with this house go a hundred acres of land. Accept this from me.”

“Oh, Milord ...!”

“And by Our Lady, there you will have a secure home, that refuge of which you spoke to me just now.”

“I’m so very obliged to you, Milord! In truth, I’m unworthy!”

“Not at all, Sir,” replied Monck with a wry smile, “not at all, it’s I who am obliged to you.” He shook the musketeer’s hand and said, “I’ll go have the deed of transfer drawn up right now.” And he left.

D’Artagnan watched him leave the room, pensive and even moved. “At last,” he said to himself, “I’ve found a good man. It’s sad to feel that it’s out of fear that he does this rather than affection but never mind! I’ll just have to make sure the affection continues.”

Then, after a moment of further reflection, he said, “But why bother? He’s an Englishman!”

And he went out in his turn, a bit dazed by the effort of the contest. “So,” he said, “now I’m a landowner. But how the devil will I divide the cottage with Planchet? Unless I give him the land while I keep the house, or I give him the house while I ... Bah! Mister Monck would never approve of my sharing his house with a grocer! He’s far too proud for that. Besides, why mention it at all? I didn’t acquire this property with our company’s funds, I did it with my own wits, and thus it’s entirely mine. Let’s go find Athos.” And he made his way toward the lodgings of the Count of La Fère.

How d’Artagnan settled the Liabilities of the Company before reckoning its Assets

“I’m on a winning streak and no doubt about it,” d’Artagnan said to himself. “That star that shines once in the life of every man, even for Job and Iruś, the most unfortunate of the Jews and the poorest of the Greeks, finally shines on me. But I won’t be reckless as I take advantage of it, because I’m mature enough to be sensible.”

He supped cheerfully that evening with his friend Athos, and though he didn’t mention Monck’s gift, as they ate he couldn’t help asking his friend about sowing, planting, and farm production. Athos replied agreeably, as always. He assumed d’Artagnan was considering becoming a landowner but more than once he missed his old companion’s lively mood and witty sallies. D’Artagnan, preoccupied, took advantage of the greasy remains on his plate to draw figures and make calculations that amounted to pleasantly round sums. The order, or rather permit, for their embarkation arrived later that evening. While the visa was being handed over to the count, another messenger arrived and gave d’Artagnan a bundle of parchment pages fluttering with all the colourful seals that adorn real estate deeds in England. Athos surprised him skimming through these documents that established the transfer of property. The prudent Monck, or one might say the generous Monck, had converted the gift into a sale with a receipt that acknowledged having been paid the sum of fifteen thousand livres for the transaction. D’Artagnan had begun reading the deeds before the messenger had even disappeared. Athos watched him and smiled. D’Artagnan, catching one of these smiles over his shoulder, folded up the parchments and thrust them back into their packet. “Pardon me,” said Athos.

“No problem, there are no secrets here, old friend,” replied the lieutenant. “I’d just like...”

“No, don’t tell me anything, I beg. Orders are sacred things, and the person charged with them shouldn’t reveal a single word even to his brother or father. Even I, who loves you more tenderly than a brother, a father, or anyone...”

“Outside of Raoul?”

“I will love Raoul even more when he is a man, fully formed in all phases of character and behaviour ... in other words, when he’s like you, my friend.”

“You said that you’d received orders as well; don’t you intend to share them with me?”

“No, friend d’Artagnan.”

The Gascon sighed. “There was a time,” he said, “when you would have laid that order open on the table and said, ‘D’Artagnan, read this gibberish to Porthos, Aramis, and myself and tell us what it means.’”

“You’re right. We shared the confidence of youth, that generous season when we’re ruled by the hot blood of passion!”

“Well, Athos, can I tell you something?”

“Speak, my friend.”

“That wonderful time, that generous season, that reign of hot blood, those are all beautiful things beyond doubt but I wouldn’t go back to them. It’s just like thinking about your school days – I’m always meeting some fool nostalgic for copying tasks, canings, and crusts of dry bread. It’s bizarre, because I never enjoyed that. The old days? No matter how serious and active I was (and you can confirm this, Athos), no matter how simple my everyday clothes, I still would have preferred Porthos’s embroidered finery to my threadbare doublet that was protection from neither the cold winds of winter nor the hot sun of summer. My friend, I can’t help but mistrust anyone who says he prefers bad over good. Now, in the good old days, when everything was terrible, every month saw another hole in my coat and my skin, and a gold crown less in my sagging purse; from that awful time of watered honey and constant worry I absolutely regret nothing, nothing, nothing but our friendship. For I still have within me a heart, and by some miracle, that heart wasn’t withered by the wind of misery that howled through the holes in my cloak or impaled by the swords of all sorts that made holes in my poor flesh.”

“Never regret our friendship,” said Athos. “It will die only when we do. Friendship is mainly made up of memories and shared habits, and if you had to make a small satire on mine because I wouldn’t reveal my mission to France...”

“Me? By heaven, my old and dear friend, if you only knew how little all the world’s missions will mean to me from here on out!” And he folded his packet of parchments and shoved it into his travel bag. Athos rose from the table and called over the host to settle the bill. “As long as I’ve been your friend,” said d’Artagnan, “I’ve never once paid the bill. Porthos did it often, Aramis occasionally, and you nearly always drew out your purse upon the arrival of dessert. Now that I’m rich, I’d like to see just how heroic it is to pay the bill.”

“Go ahead,” said Athos, returning his purse to his belt pouch.

The two friends then made their way to the port, not without d’Artagnan frequently looking behind him to check on the transport of his beloved money. Night had spread its thick veil over the muddy waters of the Thames; they could hear the sounds of rolling casks and creaking pulleys, the preliminaries to setting sail that had so often quickened the musketeers’ hearts when the dangers of the sea were the least of the perils they would face. This time they were to embark on a large vessel that awaited them at Gravesend, and Charles II, always thoughtful of the little things, had sent one of his river yachts with twelve of his Scots Guards to do honour to the ambassador he was sending to France. By midnight the yacht had seen its passengers onto the larger vessel, and at eight o’clock the next morning that vessel disembarked the ambassador and his friend onto the jetty at Boulogne. While the count, helped by Grimaud, went to hire some horses for the ride to Paris, d’Artagnan went to the inn where, according to his orders, his little army was to wait for him. These gentlemen were breakfasting on oysters, fish, and spiced eau-de-vie when d’Artagnan entered. They were all in a good mood, and none were yet drunk beyond the ability to reason. They raised a cheer when they saw their commander. “Here I am,” said d’Artagnan. “The campaign is over, and I’ve come to bring you your promised bonus.” Their eyes shone. “I’d wager there’s no more than a hundred livres left in the purse of the richest of you!”

“Gentlemen,” said d’Artagnan, “these are your final orders. Your mercenary contracts are fulfilled, thanks to that master stroke that made us the master of the England’s leading financier. Now I can reveal that the man we had to transport was none other than General Monck’s treasurer.”

The word treasurer was met with obvious approval by his army. D’Artagnan noted that only Menneville’s gaze conveyed a certain doubt. “This treasurer,” continued d’Artagnan, “I brought to the neutral territory of Holland, where I persuaded him to sign a certain declaration. Then I took him back to Newcastle, and as he must have been satisfied with our treatment of him, his wooden coffin having been padded so softly and carried so carefully, I asked him for a gratuity for you. Here it is.” He dropped a bulging and rather heavy bag onto the tablecloth. All hands reflexively reached for it. “Not so fast, my lambs,” said d’Artagnan. “If there are profits, there are also prices.”

“Oh?” murmured the assembled rogues.

"We now find ourselves, my friends, in a position that could be dangerous for those who lack brains. To be plain: we stand between the gallows and the Bastille."

"Uh-oh!" gasped the chorus.

"It's not hard to understand. I had to explain the disappearance of his treasurer to General Monck. I waited to do so until the moment of the unexpected restoration of King Charles II, who is one of my friends..."

The little army exchanged looks of satisfaction that were smug compared to d'Artagnan's that was rather proud. "Once the king was restored, I restored General Monck his man of business – slightly the worse for wear, perhaps but at least I returned him. Now, General Monck, when he pardoned me, for that was part of the bargain, couldn't refrain from telling me the words I'm about to repeat to you, and which I urge each of you to engrave into your memory: 'Sir, that was a good joke but I don't care much for jokes. If a single word of what you've done ever escapes your lips' – do you hear me, Sir Menneville? – 'or the lips of your companions, I have in my viceroyalty of Scotland 741 oaken gallows, with hooks of iron and trapdoors greased every week. I would present one of these gallows to each of you, and take note, Sir d'Artagnan' – take note as well, Sir Menneville – 'I would still have seven hundred and thirty gallows left for others. Moreover ...'"

"Oh!" said the mercenaries. "There's more?"

"One threat more: 'Sir d'Artagnan, I am writing to the King of France to report this bargain, with the request that a cell in the Bastille be prepared for each member of your troop who falls into his hands, the lot to be turned back over to me, a request he will certainly comply with."

A gasp of fear was heard all around the table. "Now, now," said d'Artagnan. "The noble Monck had forgotten one thing that is that he doesn't know any of your names; only I know you, and as you can well believe, I'm not about to betray you. Why would I? And as to you, none of you are foolish enough to betray yourselves, for then the king, to save himself the expense of keeping you in the Bastille, would send you to Scotland to grace one of the 741 gallows. So, there you have it, Gentlemen: I have not another word to add to what I've had the honour to tell you. I'm sure I was understood perfectly – was I not, Sir Menneville?"

"Perfectly," the latter replied.

"And now, the beautiful crowns!" said d'Artagnan. "Shut the doors."

And he emptied the shiny new gold coins on the table, a few rolling off the edge. Everyone grabbed at the floor. "How pretty!" said d'Artagnan. "Put the loose ones back in the pile so it doesn't throw off my count."

He then doled out fifty gleaming crowns to each of them, receiving nearly as many blessings as coins he allotted. "Now," he said, "if you could just clean yourselves up a bit and become good and honest citizens..."

"But that's so very difficult," said one of the rogues.

"Why would we do that, Captain?" said another.

"Because then I might be able to find you again, and who knows? By then you might need me."

D'Artagnan made a sign to Menneville, who'd been listening to all this coolly and calmly. "Menneville," he said, "come with me. Farewell, my Braves! I needn't warn you to be discreet."

Menneville followed him, while the sound of the mercenaries' farewells mingled with the sweet jingle of gold in their pouches. "Menneville," d'Artagnan said when they were in the street, "you're no fool, so take care not to act like one. You don't impress me as one who fears either the gallows of Monck or the Bastille of His Majesty King Louis XIV, so you will do me the favour to be afraid of me. Now, listen: you say a single word about what you know to anybody, and I'll find you and wring your neck like a chicken's. I already have in my pocket the permission and absolution of our Holy Father the Pope."

"I assure you I know absolutely nothing, Sir d'Artagnan, and your every word is to me an article of faith."

"I always knew you had brains," said the musketeer. "Knew it from the first time I met you. These fifty gold crowns I give you as a bonus should show you what I think of you. Take them."

"Thank you, Sir d'Artagnan," said Menneville.

"That ought to be enough to enable you to live as an honest man," replied d'Artagnan in a serious tone. "It would be a shame if a mind like yours and the name you no longer dare to use were to disappear into a wasted life. Wipe the slate clean, Menneville, and live for a year as an honest man – you can do it, I just gave you twice the pay of a ranking officer. After a year, come see me, and, God be with you! We'll make something of you yet."

Menneville swore, as his comrades had, to be as quiet as the grave. And yet, somebody must have talked eventually, and if it wasn't Menneville or one of the other nine mercenaries, it must have been d'Artagnan, who, as a Gascon, always had a tongue ready to wag. After all, if it wasn't him, who else could it have been? How else could the story of the wooden box bored with breathing-holes have come down to us complete in every detail? Details which, moreover, clear up an unexplained episode in the history of England, left until today out of the accounts of the historians.

The French Grocer was already Well-Established in the 17th Century

Once his accounts had been settled and his warnings communicated, d'Artagnan thought of nothing but getting back to Paris as soon as possible. Athos, for his part, was eager to return to the repose of his house. After the fatigues of a journey, whether a man feels well or exhausted, even if the day has been pleasant, he looks forward to its end, for the night will allow him to sleep. So, from Boulogne to Paris, riding side by side, the two friends, each preoccupied with his own thoughts, encountered nothing interesting enough to relate to the reader: the cavaliers, while considering the future each in his own way, devoted themselves to speed. On the evening of the fourth day after their departure from Boulogne, Athos and d'Artagnan arrived at the gates of Paris. "Where are you bound for, dear friend?" asked Athos. "I'm going straight to my town house."

"And I, straight to my partner."

"Planchet's place?"

"The Golden Pestle? My God, yes."

"Shall we find a way to meet again?"

"If you stay in Paris, yes, because the city is where I'm staying."

"No. After embracing Raoul, whom I expect to find at my house, I leave immediately for La Fère."

"Well, then! Farewell, my dear and perfect friend."

"Au revoir, rather, because I hope you will come and visit, or even live with me at Blois. You are free, you are rich, I can help you buy, if you like, a property near Cheverny or Bracieux. On one side you'd have the most beautiful woods in the world, backing up on Chambord, while on the other, a lovely marsh. You who love hunting, and who has the soul of a poet, though you won't admit it, will find pheasant, rail, and teal, not to mention long sunsets and such boating that you'll feel like Nimrod and Apollo themselves. While waiting for the sale to close, you'll live at La Fère, and we'll go fly our hawks among the vineyards, as King Louis XIII used to do. It's a suitable life for old soldiers like us."

D'Artagnan took hold of Athos's hands. "Dear Count," he said, "I won't say yes or no. Let me spend the time I need in Paris to order my affairs and little by little get used to the great and growing idea that's shining in my mind. I am rich, as you say but until I've taken enough time to get used to riches, I'm going to be an insufferable monster, I just know it. Now, at least I've got the sense not to behave like a lack-wit in front of a friend like you, Athos. My cloak of wealth is handsome, it's richly embroidered but it's new, it isn't broken in, and it itches."

Athos smiled. "So be it," he said. "But about this new cloak, dear d'Artagnan, would you like to hear some advice?"

"Indeed, I would!"

"You won't be upset?"

"Speak freely."

"When wealth comes to a person late, that person, to keep from changing, must become either a miser, that is, spend no more than he did before, or a spendthrift, going into debt so quickly that he becomes poor again."

"Hmph. That sounds like sophistry to me, O wise philosopher."

"I don't think so. Will you become a miser, then?"

"No, by God! I've already done that, and more than enough. We must change."

"Then, it's spendthrift?"

"Even less likely, God be with you! Debt terrifies me. Creditors remind me of those devils who roast the damned on spits, and as patience isn't my chief virtue, I'm always tempted to send them to hell early."

"You are the wisest man I know and need no advice from anyone. One would be a great fool to think he had anything to teach you. But isn't this Rue Saint-Honoré?"

"Yes, dear Athos."

"And here, on the left, this long, white house is the hôtel where I'm lodging. You'll notice it has only two floors; I occupy the lower, while the other is rented to an officer whose service keeps him far away eight or nine months of the year, so I have the house as much to myself as if I was at home but without the expense."

"You manage things so well, Athos, in both order and economy! That's what I want to copy. But what can I do? You were born to rank, while I just do the best I can."

"Such flattery! Come, say farewell, dear friend. By the way, give my regards to Planchet; he's a lad of wits, isn't he?"

"And of heart, Athos. Farewell!"

They separated. During this long conversation, d'Artagnan had never for a second lost sight of the packhorse carrying the paniers in which, under a layer of hay, the money sacks were hidden among the other luggage. Nine in the evening was sounding from the belfry of Saint-Merri, and Planchet's shop boys were shuttering the store. Under an awning on the corner of the Rue des Lombards d'Artagnan stopped the postilion who rode the packhorse, and, calling over one of Planchet's lads, told him to watch the horses as well as the postilion. Then he entered the house of the grocer, who'd just finished his supper, and who, on the landing, was anxiously consulting the calendar on which every evening he scratched off the day that had just passed. At that moment when, with a sigh, Planchet drew a line through another day, d'Artagnan kicked firmly at his open side door, the blows setting his iron spurs jingling. "Good Lord!" cried Planchet. Having taken one look at his partner, the worthy grocer could say no more. D'Artagnan, who couldn't resist the idea of stringing Planchet along, entered with his shoulders slumped and his eyes averted.

My God! The grocer thought, staring at the traveller. He's destroyed.

"My dear Sir d'Artagnan!" said Planchet, his heart skipping a beat. "You're back! Are you all right?"

"Well enough, Planchet, I suppose," said d'Artagnan with a sigh.

"You aren't wounded, are you?"

"Eh!"

"I see," continued Planchet, more and more alarmed. "The expedition was a rough one?"

"Yes," said d'Artagnan. A shiver shook Planchet from head to toe. "I need ... a drink," said the musketeer with a pitiful look.

Planchet ran to the sideboard and poured d'Artagnan a large glass of honey. D'Artagnan looked at the bottle. "What honey is this?" he asked.

"Why, it's your favourite, Sir," said Planchet, "that good old honey of Anjou that one day nearly cost us so dearly."

"Ah!" replied d'Artagnan with a melancholy smile. "And should I be drinking so expensive a honey, my poor Planchet?"

"Come, dear Master," said Planchet, making a superhuman effort, though his trembling and pallor revealed deep anguish. "I was a soldier, you know, so I'm brave enough to hear it. Don't keep me guessing, Sir d'Artagnan. Our money: it's all gone, isn't it?"

D'Artagnan hesitated before answering, a delay that seemed like a century to the poor grocer. Finally, he turned in his chair, head held low, and said slowly, "And if that were so, what would you say to me, my poor friend?"

Planchet, already pale, turned yellow. His eyes twitched, his throat swelled, and he felt as if he was going to swallow his tongue. "Twenty thousand livres!" he murmured. "Twenty ... thousand ...!"

D'Artagnan, his head slumping on his neck, his limbs lax, hands drooping, was the very image of discouragement. Planchet tore a heavy sigh from the very depths of his chest. "Come," he said. "I see how it is. Let's be men. It's over, isn't it? At least, Sir, you survived, and that's the important thing."

"No doubt, no doubt. Life is something, I suppose ... but in the meantime, I'm ruined."

"Cordieu!" said Planchet. "If that's so, Sir, there's no need to despair. You can be a grocer with me! I'll make you a partner in my business, we'll share the profits, and when there are no profits, well! We'll share the almonds, raisins, and prunes, and nibble on our last quarter of Dutch cheese."

D'Artagnan could sustain it no longer. "God be with you!" he brightly cried. "You're a brave lad, upon my honour, Planchet! Did you like my little comedy? Look, out there in the street, under that awning – do you see that horse with the paniers?"

"Awning? Horse? Paniers?" said Planchet, his heart sinking at the idea that d'Artagnan had gone mad.

"God, yes, those English paniers!" said d'Artagnan, radiant and transfigured.

"Good Lord!" cried Planchet, recoiling before his partner's burning gaze.

"Fool!" laughed d'Artagnan. "You think I'm crazy. God be with you! On the contrary, I've never had a sharper head and a happier heart. To the packhorse, Planchet – to the paniers!"

"But what paniers, where, for the love of God?"

D'Artagnan pushed Planchet toward the window. "Under the awning over there," he said, "do you see a horse?"

"Yes."

"Do you see how his back bends?"

"Yes, yes."

"Do you see one of your lads talking to the postilion?"

"Yes, yes, yes."

"Well, then! You know that lad's name, since he's one of yours. Call to him."

"Abdon! Abdon!" shouted Planchet from the window.

"Bring the horse," whispered d'Artagnan.

"Bring the horse!" shouted Planchet.

"Now, ten livres for the postilion," said d'Artagnan in the tone used to command a manoeuvre. "Two lads to bring up the first two bags, two more for the last two, and lively, now! Move it!"

Planchet threw himself down the stairs as if the devil was at his heels. A few moments later the shop boys came up the stairs, bent beneath their burdens. D'Artagnan sent them off to their garrets, shut the door carefully and turned to Planchet, who himself was looking a little wild. "Now," d'Artagnan said, "it's just us." And he spread a large blanket on the floor and emptied onto it the first bag. Planchet did the same with the second, then d'Artagnan, his hand trembling a bit, cut open the third with his knife. When Planchet heard the thrilling clink of silver and gold, when he saw the shining crowns that glittered like fish swept out of the sea, when he felt his arms plunge up to the elbows into this rising tide of silver and gold coins, the shock hit him all at once, and, as if struck by lightning, he fell down heavily on the enormous heap with a metallic crash. Planchet, overcome by joy, had passed out. D'Artagnan threw a glass of white honey into his face that brought Planchet back to life. "Ah! My God! My God!" he repeated as he wiped his moustache and beard. At that time, as now, a grocer wore a cavalier's moustache and a soldier's beard but bathing in silver and gold, already a rare thing then, is today almost unknown. "God be with you!" said d'Artagnan. "A hundred thousand livres of this is yours, Sir Partner. Count out your share, if you will, and then I'll take mine."

"Oh, the lovely silver, Sir d'Artagnan! The beautiful gold!"

"Half an hour ago I confess I was regretting the part that belongs to you," said d'Artagnan, "but now, I regret nothing. You're a fine grocer, Planchet, who keeps good accounts, and good accounts, they say, keep good friends."

"Oh! But first tell me the whole story," said Planchet. "It must be even prettier than the money."

"My faith," replied d'Artagnan, stroking his moustache, "I won't say you're wrong, and if ever a historian demands the whole tale, he'll hear more than he thought he would. Listen, then, Planchet, and I'll tell you."

"And I'll start counting this into stacks," said Planchet. "Please begin, my dear partner."

"It starts like this," said d'Artagnan, drawing a breath.

"And ends like this," said Planchet, picking up his first handful of coins.

Sir Mazarin at his Games

On the evening of the arrival in Paris of our two Frenchmen, in a grand chamber of the Royal Palace, its walls draped in dark velvet that showed off the gilded frames of many handsome paintings, one could see the entire Court arrayed before the sleeping alcove of Sir Cardinal de Mazarin, who was hosting an evening at cards for the king and the queen. Low screens separated three tables placed around the chamber. The king and the two queens were seated at one of these tables; Louis XIV sat across from the young queen, his wife, whom he smiled upon with a genuine expression of happiness. Anne of Austria held the cards against the cardinal, and her daughter-in-law advised her when she wasn't smiling at her husband. Beyond the table, in his bed, lay the cardinal, an emaciated figure, always tired, the Countess de Soissons holding his cards for him that he scanned with a look of calculation and avarice. The cardinal wore makeup that had been applied by Bernouin but the rouge glistening on his cheekbones just emphasized the unhealthy pallor of the rest of his face and the sallow yellow flesh of his forehead. Only his eyes glowed brightly, and those feverish eyes, from time to time, attracted worried glances from the king, the queens, and the courtiers. The fact is that Signor Mazarin's gleaming eyes were the inconstant stars in which 17th-century France read its destiny every night and morning. My Lord was neither winning nor losing, so he was neither cheerful nor sour. It was a stagnant state in which Anne of Austria would not have left him, if she could help it but to engage the invalid's interest through some change of fortune she would have to either win or lose. To win was dangerous, as Mazarin might trade his disinterest for irritation but to lose she would have had to cheat, and the Infanta, who was watching her mother-in-law's game closely, might spot the misplay, and that would be the end of any chance of a good mood from Sir de Mazarin. Taking advantage of this calm, the courtiers were talking among themselves. Mazarin, when he wasn't in an ill temper, was a congenial lord, and he, who never prevented anyone from singing, providing they paid, wasn't tyrant enough to prohibit others' speech, provided they lost. So, everyone talked. At the first table, the king's younger brother, Philippe, Duke of Anjou,* admired his handsome face with a mirror-topped box. His favourite, the Sir de Lorraine,* though leaning on the prince's chair, was actually listening with secret envy to the Count de Guiche,* another of Philippe's favourites, who was recounting the juicy details of the various turns of fortune of the royal adventurer Charles II. He told the fabulous tale of his dangerous journey across Scotland, and his terror with the enemy pursuers hot on his trail. He told of nights spent in trees, and days spent in hunger and combat. Gradually, the fate of this unfortunate king had interested the listeners to the point where the game languished, even at the royal table, where the young king, distracted and staring sightlessly at his cards, absorbed without seeming to every detail of the picturesque odyssey described by the Count de Guiche. The Countess de Soissons interrupted the narrator, saying, "Confess, Count that you're exaggerating."

"Madam, I repeat like a parrot the stories various Englishmen have told me. I will even admit, to my shame, that I recite an exact copy."

"Charles II would be dead if he'd gone through all that."

Louis XIV raised his proud and intelligent head. "Madam," he said, in a low voice that still harked back to the timid child, "Sir Cardinal will tell you that in my minority, the affairs of France were often unsettled, and if I had been older and obliged to take my sword in my hand, I might have had to do so just to get our evening meal."

"Thank God," replied the cardinal, speaking for the first time, "that Your Majesty exaggerates, and your supper was always prepared perfectly along with that of your servants."

The king blushed. "Oh!" interrupted Philippe, without ceasing to admire himself. "I remember one time at Melun when nobody had supper except the king. He had two-thirds of a heel of bread, leaving the final third to me."

The whole assembly, seeing Mazarin smile, began to laugh. One flatters kings with the reminder of past distress and the assurance of future fortune. "The fact is, that the Crown of France has always stayed firmly on the heads of its kings," added Anne of Austria hastily, "and though England's has fallen from their king, every time some chance event shook ours, for there are realm-quakes as well as earthquakes, each time, I say, that rebellion threatened, a timely victory restored us to peace."

"With a few more jewels added to the crown," said Mazarin.

The Count de Guiche was silent, and the king kept his expression neutral, while Mazarin exchanged a look with Anne of Austria that seemed to thank her for her intervention. "No matter," said Philippe, smoothing his hair. "My cousin Charles may not be good-looking but he's very brave and fights like a paladin, and if he continues to fight well, no doubt he'll end up winning a famous battle! Like Rocroi..."

"He has no troops," interrupted the Sir de Lorraine.

"The King of Holland, his ally, will give him some. I would certainly have given him some if I were the King of France." Louis XIV turned bright red. Mazarin affected to watch his game more closely than ever. "At this moment," continued the Count de Guiche, "the fate of that unhappy prince is being decided. If he's been deceived by Monck, he's lost. Prison, perhaps even death, will end what exile, war, and privations had begun."

Mazarin frowned. "Is it certain," said Louis XIV, "that His Majesty Charles II has left The Hague?"

"Quite certain, Your Majesty," replied the young man. "My father received a letter with all the details. It's even known that the king disembarked at Dover; anglers saw him enter the port. The rest is still a mystery."

"I wish I knew the rest," said Philippe impetuously. "Do you know, Brother?"

Louis XIV blushed again. It was the third time in an hour. "Ask Sir Cardinal," he replied, in a tone that made Mazarin, Queen Anne, and everyone else look at him. "That means, my son," laughed Anne of Austria to Philippe, "that the king doesn't like us to discuss affairs of state outside the council."

Philippe received this gentle reprimand with good grace and bowed, smiling, first to his brother and then to his mother. But Mazarin saw from the corner of his eye that a group of young nobles was gathering in the corner of the chamber, where the Duke of Anjou and his favourites the Count de Guiche and Sir de Lorraine, thwarted at discussing affairs aloud, could continue in low voices to say what they wanted. He began to glare at them with suspicion and anxiety in hopes that Anne of Austria would say something to disrupt their conclave, when suddenly Bernouin came in. Sidling up to the bed, he whispered in his master's ear, "My Lord, an Envoy from His Majesty the King of England."

Mazarin couldn't conceal a slight reaction that the king noticed, to the cardinal's annoyance. To avoid appearing indiscreet, not to mention irrelevant, Louis XIV rose, approached His Eminence, and wished him a good night. The whole assembly rose, with a great noise of chairs pushed back and tables scraping the floor. "Let everyone go, little by little," said Mazarin quietly to Louis XIV, "and give me a few minutes' privacy. I need to address an affair about which I'd like to inform Your Majesty this evening."

"Including the queens?" asked Louis XIV.

"And the Duke of Anjou," said His Eminence.

And he retired into his alcove, letting the bed curtains fall – but in such a way that he could still see the conspirators in the corner. "Sir le Count de Guiche!" he called in a quavering voice while behind the curtain he donned the dressing gown that Bernouin had brought him.

"Here I am, My Lord," said the young man, approaching.

"You're a lucky fellow; take my cards and win me a little money from these gentlemen."

"Yes, my Lord." The young man sat at the table from which the king had withdrawn to speak with the queens. A serious game began between the count and several wealthy courtiers. Meanwhile, Philippe was chatting with the Sir de Lorraine, as the swish of the cardinal's silk robe came no more from behind the curtain of the alcove. His Eminence had followed Bernouin into the study adjacent to the bedchamber.

An Affair of the State

Upon entering his study, the cardinal found the Count of La Fère waiting there, admiring a beautiful Raphael hung above a gilded dresser. His Eminence came in slowly, light and silent as a shadow, hoping to surprise the count's unprepared expression; that was his custom, since he believed that he instantly could read from an envoy's face what direction a conversation would take. But this time, Mazarin's expectations were thwarted, for he could read absolutely nothing from Athos's expression, not even the respect he expected to see on all supplicants' faces. Athos was dressed in black accented with simple silver embroidery. He wore the Saint-Esprit, the Garter, and the Golden Fleece, three orders of such significance that only a king, or a stage-actor, could wear them all. Mazarin derved for a long moment in his capacious memory trying to remember the name of this man of ice without success. Finally, he said, "I knew that a message would be coming from England."

And he sat down, dismissing Bernouin and Brienne, the latter of whom was preparing, in his capacity as secretary, to take notes. "On the behalf of His Majesty the King of England, yes, Your Eminence," said Athos.

"You speak French very well, Sir, for an Englishman," said Mazarin graciously, still sneaking glances at the Saint-Esprit, the Garter, and the Fleece while trying to place the profile of the messenger. "I am not English, I am French, Sir Cardinal," replied Athos. "It's peculiar for the King of England to choose Frenchmen as ambassadors but I'll take it as a good omen. Your name, Sir, if you please?" "Count of La Fère," replied Athos, bowing a shade less deferentially than custom and the pride of the all-powerful minister required. Mazarin twitched his shoulders as if to say, I do not know that name. Athos showed no reaction. "And you come, Sir," continued Mazarin, "to tell me..." "I come on the behalf of His Majesty the King of England to announce to the King of France..." Mazarin frowned. "To announce to the King of France," Athos continued impassively, "the happy restoration of His Majesty Charles II to the throne of his fathers." The frosty tone didn't escape the notice of His Canny Eminence. Mazarin was too familiar with the ways of men not to see, in the cold and almost haughty politeness of Athos, a measure of hostility that didn't accord with the ordinary hothouse warmth of discourse at Court. "You have accreditation, no doubt?" asked Mazarin in a querulous tone. "Yes ... My Lord."

This words my Lord came painfully from Athos's lips, almost seeming to scorch them as it passed. "In that case, present it." Athos drew a dispatch from an embroidered velour packet inside his doublet. The cardinal extended his hand. "Your pardon, My Lord," said Athos, "but the dispatch is for the king." "Since you are French, Sir, you must know the powers of the prime minister at the Court of France." "There was a time," replied Athos, "when I took care to respect the powers of prime ministers – but I since formed, some years ago, the resolution to deal with no one but the king." "Then, Sir," said Mazarin, who was beginning to be annoyed, "you will deal with neither minister nor king." And Mazarin rose. Athos returned the dispatch to its packet, bowed gravely, and took a few steps toward the door. His sangfroid exasperated Mazarin. "What strange diplomacy is this!" he cried. "Are we still in the days when Sir Cromwell was sending us cutthroats as envoys? You lack only the round helmet on your head and the Bible at your belt!" "Sir," replied Athos drily, "unlike you I never had the experience of treating with Sir Cromwell, and I only met the envoy you mention sword in hand; I don't know how he dealt with prime ministers. As to the King of England, Charles II, I know that when he writes to His Majesty King Louis XIV, it isn't addressed to His Eminence Cardinal Mazarin; in that distinction, I don't see any diplomacy." "Ah ha!" cried Mazarin, lifting his emaciated head and striking his hand to his brow. "I remember now!" Athos looked at him, astonished. "Yes, that's it!" said the cardinal, continuing to stare at his visitor. "Yes, of course – I recognise you, Sir! Ah, devil, now I needn't wonder..." "Indeed, I was surprised, given Your Eminence's excellent memory, that Your Eminence didn't recognise me sooner," replied Athos with a smile. "Always so stiff and recalcitrant, Sir ... Sir ... what did they call you? Wait a moment ... the name of a river – Potamos! No, no ... the name of an island. Naxos? No, per Giove, the name of a mountain – Athos! That's it! How delightful to see you again, so long as we're not at Rueil, where you and your damned accomplices made me pay a ransom. Ah, the Fronde! The cursed Fronde! That stupid chaos! Ah çà, Sir, why has your enmity outlasted mine? If anyone had anything to complain about how that turned out, I don't think it was you, who got away with a whole skin and the sash of the Saint-Esprit around your neck."

"Sir Cardinal," replied Athos, "please be so kind as to leave me out of such tale-spinning, I merely have a mission to fulfil. Will you provide the means of facilitating this mission?" "I am astonished," said Mazarin, delighted to have recovered his memory and bristling with malice, "I say, I am astonished, Sir ... Athos ... that a Frondeur like you accepted a mission to the great scoundrel Mazarin, as they used to call me in those times."

And Mazarin began to laugh in spite of a painful cough that turned the laughter into sobs. "Sir Cardinal, I have only accepted a mission to the King of France," retorted the count with some asperity, though given the situation he felt he could moderate his hauteur.

"And yet, Sir le Frondeur," said Mazarin gleefully, "as to the king, this affair of which you've taken charge..." "With which I was charged, My Lord – I don't go running after affairs."

"As you like! I tell you this negotiation must pass through my hands, so let's not waste precious time. Tell me your conditions."

"I have had the honour to assure Your Eminence that only the letter from His Majesty King Charles II contains the essence of his wishes."

"Come! It's ridiculous to be so rigid, Sir Athos. One can see you picked up some of the Puritans' habits over there ... I know your secret message better than you do, and it might be a mistake to have so little regard for a suffering old man who has worked as hard in his life, and campaigned as bravely for his ideas, as you have for yours. So, you don't want to say anything to me? Fine. You don't want my hands to touch your letter? Come with me to my little alcove, where you may speak to the king, and in front of the king. Now, one last question: who gave you the Fleece? I remember how you got the Garter but as to the Fleece, I have no idea..."

"Recently, My Lord, Spain, upon the occasion of the marriage of His Majesty Louis XIV, sent to Charles II a blank brevet for the Golden Fleece; Charles II immediately presented it to me, filling in the blank with my name."

Mazarin rose, and, leaning on Bernouin's arm, returned to his alcove, just at the moment when the audiencer in the grand chamber announced, "Sir le Prince!" The Prince de Condé, First Prince of the Blood, the victor of Rocroi, Lens, and Nördlingen, was in fact entering My Lord de Mazarin's chambers, followed by his gentlemen, and he'd already saluted the king when the prime minister lifted his curtain. Athos had time to catch a glimpse of Raoul shaking hands with the Count de Guiche and exchanged a smile for his respectful bow. He also had time to see the cardinal's radiant face when Mazarin saw before him on the table the enormous pile of gold coins the Count de Guiche had won by a lucky run with the cards His Eminence had confided to him. Forgetting the ambassador, his embassy, and the prince, for a moment the cardinal's only thoughts were for the gold. "What!" cried the old man, "All this ... my winnings?" "Something around fifty thousand crowns, yes, My Lord," replied the Count de Guiche, rising. "Should I allow Your Eminence to resume or shall I continue?" "Resume? Resume? You're mad! We'd lose all you gained, plague!"

"My Lord," said the Prince de Condé, bowing. "Good evening, Sir le Prince," said the minister lightly. "It's very good of you to visit a sick friend."

"A friend ...!" murmured the Count of La Fère as he considered, stupefied, that word as somehow applied to Mazarin and Condé. Mazarin guessed the thoughts of the old Frondeur, for he smiled at him in triumph, and immediately said to the king, "Sire, I have the honour to present to Your Majesty Sir le Count of La Fère, ambassador of His Britannic Majesty. An affair of State, Gentlemen!" He added, dismissing with a wave of his hand all those who thronged the chamber, and who, with the Prince de Condé at their head, disappeared at a mere gesture from Mazarin. Raoul, after a final glance at the Count of La Fère, followed Sir de Condé. Philippe d'Anjou and the queen appeared to be asking each other if they should leave. "It's a family affair," Mazarin said quickly, keeping them in their seats. "Sir, here, brings the king a letter from Charles II, now completely restored to the throne, demanding an alliance between Sir, the king's brother, and Miss Henrietta, grand-daughter of Henri IV ... you might want to give the king your letter of accreditation, Sir Count."

Athos paused for a moment, stunned. How could the minister know the contents of a letter that had never left his side for a moment? However, always master of himself, he presented his dispatch to the young King Louis XIV, who took it and blushed. A solemn silence reigned throughout the cardinal's chamber while the king read the letter, disturbed only by the clink of gold as Mazarin, with his dry, yellow hands, piled his coins in a coffer.

305 The Report

The cardinal's malice hadn't left much for the king to say to the ambassador but that word restoration had struck him. Addressing the count, upon whom he'd had his eyes fixed since he'd entered, he said, "Sir, please give us some details of the state of affairs in England. You've just come from that country, you are French, and the orders that decorate your person announce a man of merit who is also a man of quality."

"Sir," said the cardinal, turning toward the queen mother, "is the Count of La Fère, an old servant of Your Majesty."

Anne of Austria was as forgetful as any queen whose life had been a mixture of days both stormy and serene. She glanced at Mazarin, whose wicked smile promised some nasty trick, then she sought, by a look, her own explanation from Athos. "Sir," continued the cardinal, "was one of Tréville's musketeers in the service of the old king. Sir is quite familiar with England, where he's travelled for various reasons at various times. He rightly considers himself a subject of the highest merit."

These words evoked all the memories that Anne of Austria most hesitated to reawaken. England meant her hatred for Richelieu and her love for Buckingham; Tréville's musketeers brought back the odyssey whose terrors and triumphs had agitated a young woman's heart and nearly cast her from a young queen's throne. These words had power, for they rendered mute and attentive all the royal persons who, with various reactions, began to think about the events of those mysterious years that the young hadn't seen and that the old had thought forever buried. "Speak, Sir," said Louis XIV, the first to emerge from wonder, suspicion, and memories.

"Yes, speak," added Mazarin, to whom the malicious prod he'd just given Anne of Austria had restored all his energy and glee.

"Sire," said the count, "a sort of miracle has utterly changed the destiny of King Charles II. Where men could not succeed, God resolved and accomplished." Mazarin coughed and fidgeted in his bed. "King Charles II," continued Athos, "left The Hague not as a fugitive nor a victim but as an absolute king, who, after a voyage away from his kingdom, returns amid universal benedictions."

"A great miracle indeed," said Mazarin, "for if what we heard was true, King Charles II, who returned amid benedictions, went away chased by musket balls."

The king remained impassive. Philippe, younger and more frivolous, couldn't repress a smile that applauded Mazarin for his joke. The king said, "In fact, it seems there was a miracle; but God, though He does much for kings, Sir le Count, nonetheless uses the hands of men to accomplish His plans. To what men does Charles II principally owe his restoration?"

"But," interrupted the cardinal, without concern for the king's pride or feelings, "doesn't Your Majesty know that credit belongs to Sir Monck?"

"I know that, of course," replied Louis XIV resolutely, "however, I'm asking Sir Ambassador the causes of this change in Sir Monck."

"And Your Majesty's question is to the point," replied Athos, "for, without the miracle that I had the honour to mention, Sir Monck would probably have remained an inveterate enemy of King Charles II. God arranged for a strange, bold, and ingenious idea to fall into the mind of a certain man, while a devoted and determined idea entered the mind of another. The combination of these two ideas brought about the change in Sir Monck's position, so that from a bitter enemy he became a friend of the fallen king."

"That's just the kind of detail I was asking for," said the king. "What kind of people are these two men you mentioned?"

"Two Frenchmen, Sire."

"In truth, that makes me happy."

"And the two ideas?" interrupted Mazarin. "I'm more curious about ideas than about men."

"Yes," murmured the king.

"The second idea, the devoted, determined, and least important, Sire, was to go dig up a million in gold buried by King Charles I at Newcastle and to use this gold to buy Monck's support."

"Oh ho!" said Mazarin, energized by the word million. "But wasn't Newcastle occupied by this self-same Monck?"

"Yes, Sir Cardinal that is why the idea had to be determined as well as devoted. It was necessary, if Sir Monck refused the negotiator's offers, to restore ownership of this million to King Charles II despite the disloyalty, or rather misplaced loyalty of General Monck. Despite some difficulties, the negotiator was able to work around the general's loyalties and remove the gold."

"It seems to me," said the timid and hopeful king, "that Charles II must not have been aware of this million during his visit to Blois and Paris."

"It seems to me," added the cardinal maliciously, "that His Majesty the King of England was quite aware of the existence of this million but preferred two million to one."

"Sire," Athos replied firmly, "when His Majesty King Charles II was in France, he was so poor he was unable to ride by post, and so hopeless that he several times contemplated death. He was entirely ignorant of the Newcastle million, and if a gentleman, one of Your Majesty's subjects and the appointed ward of the legacy, hadn't revealed the secret to Charles II, that prince would still languish in cruel oblivion."

"Let's return to the strange, bold, and ingenious idea," interrupted Mazarin, who intuitively saw where this was going. "What was that idea about?"

"This: that since Sir Monck formed the sole obstacle to the restoration of His Majesty the fallen king, a Frenchman resolved to remove this obstacle."

"Oh ho! Then this Frenchman was a scoundrel," said Mazarin, "and the idea is not so ingenious as to prevent its author from being sent to the Place de Grève by an act of our parliament."

"Your Eminence is mistaken," said Athos drily, "for I didn't say that the Frenchman in question had resolved to assassinate Monck but to remove him. For French gentlemen, the words of the French language have a precise meaning. Besides, it was an action of warfare, and when kings are served against their enemies, we are not judged by parliament, only by God. So, this French gentleman had the idea to seize the person of Sir Monck, and he executed his plan."

The king was thrilled by this exciting story. His Majesty's younger brother pounded the table with this fist, crying, "Ah! How lovely!"

"He carried Monck off?" said the king. "But Monck was in his camp..."

"And the gentleman was alone, Sire."

"It's wonderful!" said Philippe.

"Wonderful, indeed!" cried the king.

"Fine! Let the two young lions roar," murmured the cardinal. Then, with an air of contempt he didn't bother to hide, he said, "I was unaware of these details. Can you guarantee their authenticity, Sir?"

"All the more easily, Sir Cardinal, since I witnessed them myself."

"You?"

"Yes, My Lord."

The king had almost involuntarily drawn nearer to the count, while the Duke d'Anjou pressed Athos on the other side. "After that, Sir?" they shouted at the same time.

"Sire, Sir Monck, being taken by the Frenchman, was brought to King Charles II in Holland. The king restored Monck's liberty, and the general, in gratitude, gave Charles II in return the throne of England, for which so many valiant people had fought without success."

Philippe clapped enthusiastically. Louis XIV, more thoughtful, turned to the Count of La Fère and said, "Is it true, all these details?"

"Absolutely true, Sire."

"One of my gentlemen knew the secret of the million and safeguarded it?"

"Yes, Sire."

"The name of this gentleman?"

"It was your humble servant," said Athos simply.

The murmur of admiration that followed swelled Athos's heart. He had reason to be proud, at least. Even Mazarin had raised his arms – and rolled his eyes – toward heaven. "Sir," said the king, "somehow, I will find a way to reward you." Athos began to shake his head. "Oh, not for your honesty! To be paid for that would humiliate you. But I owe you a reward for assisting in the restoration of my brother Charles II."

"Certainly," said Mazarin.

"This triumph in a good cause fills the whole House of France with joy," said Anne of Austria.

"To continue," said Louis XIV, "is it also true that a lone man penetrated the defences of Monck's camp to carry him off?"

"The man was aided by ten auxiliaries of inferior rank."

"And nothing more?"

"Nothing more."

"Do you know his name?"

"Sir d'Artagnan, the former Lieutenant of Your Majesty's Musketeers."

Anne of Austria flushed, Mazarin went yellow with shame, while Louis XIV gasped and broke into a sudden cold sweat. "What men!" he murmured.

And, involuntarily, he shot at Mazarin such a glare that it would have terrified him if the minister hadn't had his face turned into his pillow. "Sir," cried the young Duke d'Anjou, laying his fine, white ladylike hand on Athos's arm, "tell that brave man, I beg, that Sir, the king's brother, will drink his health tomorrow before a hundred of the finest gentlemen of France!"

And having delivered this speech, the young man, noticing that in his enthusiasm he'd disarranged one of his lace cuffs, began to restore it with great care. "Let us talk business, Sire," interrupted Mazarin, who had neither enthusiasm nor lace cuffs.

"Indeed, Sir," replied Louis XIV, and turning to the count, he added, "Proceed with your presentation, Sir Count." Athos then commenced to solemnly offer the hand of Princess Henrietta Stuart to that of the young prince, the king's brother. The conference lasted an hour, after which the doors of the chamber were opened to the courtiers, who resumed their places as if nothing had disrupted their evening schedules. Athos then made his way to Raoul, and father and son shook hands and embraced.

Sir Mazarin becomes Extravagant

While Mazarin was trying to recover from the shock of Athos's revelations, Athos and Raoul exchanged a few words in a corner of the chamber. "Are you back in Paris, then, Raoul?" said the count.

"Yes, Sir, since Sir le Prince has returned."

"I can't talk with you here, where we're being observed," said Athos, "but I'm going back to my house shortly and will wait to see you there as soon as your service allows."

Raoul bowed. The prince came straight to them. Condé had that penetrating and profound look that distinguishes the more noble species of birds of prey, with several traits that emphasized the resemblance. It's well known that the heir of the illustrious princes of the House of Condé had a low and retreating forehead, beneath which jutted out a long, sharp, aquiline nose that to the Court's mockers, people pitiless even toward the brilliant, looked more like an eagle's beak than a human nose. In the victor of Rocroi, this penetrating raptor's gaze and imperious expression intimidated those with whom he spoke more than majesty or ordinary good looks would have done. Besides, the flame of ire rose so rapidly to those prominent eyes that in Sir le Prince all animation resembled anger. Thanks to this quality, everyone at Court respected the prince, and some, knowing him only by appearance, even feared him. Now, Louis de Condé advanced on the Count of La Fère and Raoul with the decided intention of being greeted by one and introduced to the other. No one bowed with more reserved grace than the Count of La Fère, though he disdained to add to paying his respects all the nuances and flourishes a courtier employs to flatter and to please. Athos knew his personal worth and saluted the prince like a man, with a care and precision that somehow corrected any lack that might offend another's pride. The prince prepared to speak to Raoul but Athos forestalled him. "If the Viscount of Bragelonne's not one of the humblest servants of Your Highness, I'd beg to have him pronounce my name before you ... my Prince."

"I believe I have the honour to speak to Sir le Count of La Fère," Condé immediately said.

"My guardian," added Raoul, blushing.

"One of the most honourable men of the realm," continued the prince, "one of the first gentlemen of France, and one of whom I've heard so much, I've often desired to count him among my friends."

"An honour of which I would be worthy, My Lord," replied Athos, "only by my respect and admiration for Your Highness."

"Sir de Bragelonne is a fine officer," said the prince, "and it's because, as we see, he's been to a good school. Ah, Sir le Count! In your day, the generals had soldiers..."

"That's true, My Lord; but today, the soldiers have generals."

This compliment, stated without the accent of flattery, gave a thrill of pleasure to a man whom all Europe regarded as a war hero and who ought to have been sated with praise. "It's unfortunate for me that you're retired from the service, Sir le Count," replied the prince, "for soon enough the king must pursue a war with Holland or with England, and there will be plenty of opportunities for a man like you who knows England as well as France."

"I think I can tell you, My Lord, that I was wise to retire from the service," said Athos with a smile. "France and England will henceforth live as sisters, if I'm to believe my premonitions."

"Your premonitions?"

"Come, My Lord, and listen to what's being said at Sir Cardinal's table."

"Among the players?"

"Among the players, quite so, My Lord."

In fact, the cardinal had raised himself on one elbow and beckoned to the young brother of the king, who approached him. "My Lord," said the cardinal, "I beg you, gather up all these gold crowns."

And he designated the enormous pile of shining yellow coins that the Count de Guiche had gradually built before him, thanks to a run of luck. "For me?" cried the Duke d'Anjou.

"These fifty thousand crowns, yes, My Lord – they're for you."

"You're giving them to me?"

"That's my intention, my Lord," replied the cardinal, voice fading, as if the effort of giving money away had drained all his physical and emotional resources.

"Oh, my God!" murmured Philippe, overwhelmed with joy. "What a happy day!" He began raking coins into his pockets but when they were filled, more than a third of the gold remained on the table.

"Come here, Sir," said Philippe to his favourite, the Sir de Lorraine. The favourite came running. "Pocket the rest of this," said the young prince. This singular scene was regarded by no one nearby as anything more than a touching family moment. The cardinal often assumed the air of a father with the two Sons of France, and the young princes had grown up under his wing, so no one ascribed to pride or presumption, as we would today, this liberality of the prime minister. The courtiers contented themselves with envying the prince, and the king turned his head away. "I've never had so much money," said the young prince happily, crossing the chamber with his favourite to head for his carriage. "No, never! How heavy it is. It must be a hundred and fifty thousand livres!"

"But why would the cardinal give him so much money?" Sir le Prince asked the Count of La Fère in a whisper. "Is he so very sick, our dear cardinal?"

"Yes, My Lord, no doubt he's very ill, as Your Highness can see."

"Ill, yes but ... surely not dying? A hundred fifty thousand livres! Oh, that's beyond belief. Come, Count, why is this? Give me a reason."

"Patience a moment, if you will, My Lord – here comes the Duke d'Anjou chatting with the Sir de Lorraine. I wouldn't be surprised if they spared me the trouble of being indiscreet. Listen to them."

In fact, the Sir was saying to the prince in a low voice, "My Lord, it isn't natural for Sir de Mazarin to give money away – careful, you're dropping some coins. Why is the cardinal so generous with you?"

"As I said," Athos murmured in the ear of Sir le Prince, "here may be the answer to your question."

"Why is it, My Lord?" repeated the Sir impatiently, while weighing his pockets to calculate the amount that had fallen indirectly to him.

"My dear Sir, it's a wedding gift."

"What do you mean, a wedding gift?"

"Why, yes – I'm going to be married!" replied the Duke d'Anjou, without noticing that he was at that moment passing before Sir le Prince and Athos, who both bowed deeply.

The Sir gave Anjou a glare so strange and spiteful that the Count of La Fère shivered. "You! You, married!" the Sir repeated. "Oh, that's impossible. How could you be so foolish?"

"Fah, it's not my idea; they're making me do it," replied the Duke d'Anjou. "But come on – we've got money to spend."

Whereupon he disappeared with his companion, laughing and chatting, while all heads bowed at their passage. Then Sir le Prince whispered to Athos, "So, that's the secret?"

"It didn't come from me, My Lord."

"He'll marry the sister of Charles II?"

"I think so, yes."

The prince thought for a moment, and then his eye flashed. "In that case," he said slowly, as if talking to himself, "our swords will go back on the wall ... for a long time!"

And he sighed. All that this sigh contained of ambitions thwarted, of illusions crushed and hopes disappointed, only Athos guessed, for only he had heard the sigh. The prince immediately took his leave, after which the king departed. Athos, by a sign to Bragelonne, renewed the invitation he'd made at the beginning of the episode. Little by little the chamber emptied out until only Mazarin remained, alone with the suffering he no longer felt he had to conceal. "Bernouin! Bernouin!" he called in a broken voice.

"What does My Lord desire?"

"Guénaud* ... call for Guénaud," said His Eminence. "It seems to me I'm dying." Bernouin, alarmed, ran to the study to give an order, and the messenger sent to find the doctor rode so swiftly, he passed the king's carriage in Rue Saint-Honoré.

The cardinal's summons was urgent, and Guénaud was quick to obey it. He found his patient sprawled on the bed, his legs swollen and livid and his stomach collapsed. Mazarin had undergone a severe attack of gout. He suffered cruelly and with the impatience of a man who wasn't used to not getting what he wished. At the arrival of Guénaud, he said, "Ah! Now I'm saved!"

Guénaud was a very learned and cautious man who had earned a reputation even before Boileau's satires about him. When he was faced by sickness, even in the person of a king, he treated the patient as a Turk treats a Moor. He did not reply to Mazarin as the minister expected, with, "The doctor is here now, sickness be gone!" On the contrary, after examining the patient he said gravely, "Uh-oh."

"Eh, Guénaud! What kind of tone is that?"

"The tone I take when I see a condition like yours, My Lord that is dangerous."

"The gout? Yes, the gout is awful."

"There are ... complications, My Lord."

Mazarin raised himself on one elbow and questioned him with a look and a gesture. "What are you telling me? Am I more ill than I thought I was?"

"My Lord," said Guénaud, sitting down by the bed, "Your Eminence has worked hard in this life, and suffered a great deal."

"But it seems to me I'm not that old. The late Sir de Richelieu was only seventeen months younger than I am when he died, and he had a fatal illness. Compared to him, I'm youthful, Guénaud; I'm barely fifty-two."

"Oh, My Lord, you're older than that. How long did the Fronde last?"

"Why do you ask that, Guénaud?"

"To make a medical calculation, My Lord."

"Well, around ten years, more or less."

"Very well. We must count each year of the Fronde as two years that makes twenty, and fifty-two plus twenty extra years makes seventy-two. You're really seventy-two years old, My Lord, an advanced age." As he said this, he felt the patient's pulse that conveyed such a negative prognosis that the doctor immediately continued, over the objections of his patient, "Actually, let's call each year of the Fronde three that puts you at age eighty-two."

Mazarin became deadly pale, and in a thin voice he said, "Are you speaking seriously, Guénaud?"

"Alas! Yes, My Lord."

"You took this roundabout way, then, to inform me that I'm extremely ill?"

"My faith, yes, My Lord, and with a man of wits and courage like Your Eminence, a roundabout way still leads to the truth."

The cardinal gasped, and had such trouble catching his breath that it inspired pity even in this pitiless doctor. "There is illness, and illness," Mazarin replied. "Some may be recovered from."

"That's true, My Lord."

"Isn't it?" cried Mazarin, almost with joy. "For in the end, don't we have power and force of will? And genius, your genius, Guénaud! What good are science and art if a patient who has access to all of it can't be saved from danger?"

Guénaud started to open his mouth but Mazarin continued, "Remember that I'm the most faithful of your patients, that I obey you blindly, and consequently..."

"I know all that," said Guénaud.

"Then, will I get better?"

"My Lord, there is no force of will, no power, no genius, no science that can resist a disease that doubtless comes from God that he released into the world at Creation with the final power to bring death to men. When a disease is mortal, it kills, and then nothing..."

"My disease ... is mortal?" asked Mazarin.

"Yes, My Lord."

His Eminence went limp for a moment, like a man who's been crushed by a falling column. But there was a well-tempered soul, or rather an iron-hard mind, in Sir de Mazarin. "Guénaud," he said, reviving a little, "you will allow me to take other opinions. I shall gather all the most learned men of Europe and consult them; I'm willing to try virtually any remedy."

"Surely My Lord doesn't suppose that I would presume to make a lone decision on an existence as precious as his. I have already assembled the finest doctors of France and all Europe – there were twelve of them."

"And they said...?"

"They said that Your Eminence has a fatal illness; I have their signed consultations here in my portfolio. If Your Eminence wishes to see the report, he will see the names of all the incurable diseases we discovered. First of all, there is..."

"No! No!" cried Mazarin, pushing away the portfolio. "No, Guénaud, I surrender! I surrender!"

This outburst was followed by a profound silence, during which the cardinal regained his senses and recouped his strength. "There's another option," murmured Mazarin. "There are still the charlatans and the mountebanks. In my country, those whom the doctors give up for lost turn to a quack, who out of a hundred might kill ten outright but still save ninety."

"Over the last month, did Your Eminence not notice that I changed his treatment ten times over?"

"Yes ... and so?"

"And so, I spent fifty thousand livres to buy – and try – all the secrets of those quacks. The list is exhausted, and so is my purse. You are not healed, and without my care you would be dead."

"It's the end," murmured the cardinal, "the end." He looked darkly around at his accumulated wealth. "I'm going to have to leave it all behind," he sighed. "I'm dead, Guénaud! Dead!"

"Oh, not quite yet, My Lord," said the doctor.

Mazarin seized his hand. "How long?" he asked, fixing wide, staring eyes on the doctor's face.

"My Lord, we never answer that question."

"To ordinary men, maybe but to me ... to me, for whom every minute is a treasure – tell me, Guénaud, tell me!"

"No, no, My Lord."

"Answer me, I tell you! Oh, give me another month, and for each of those thirty days I'll pay you a hundred thousand livres."

"My Lord," replied Guénaud in a firm voice, "it's God who gives you these days of grace and not I. And God gives to you two more weeks!"

The cardinal sighed deeply and fell back on his pillow, murmuring, "Thank you, Guénaud. Thank you."

The doctor got up to leave but the moribund man half rose and said, "Silence!" with eyes of flame. And he repeated, "Silence!"

"My Lord, I've known this secret for two months, and as you see, I've kept it well."

"Go, then, Guénaud; I'll see to the making of your fortune. Go but tell Brienne to send me a certain clerk, whose name is Sir Colbert."

Colbert wasn't far away. He'd spent the entire evening in a nearby corridor, chatting with Bernouin and Brienne, and commenting, with the insight of those who haunt the Court, on the news that rippled through the courtiers. And this seems the time to sketch, in a few words, a portrait of one of the most interesting men of his century, and to delineate it as truthfully as contemporary painters might have done. Colbert is a man to whom both the historian and the philosopher have an equal right. He was thirteen years older than Louis XIV, his future master. Of moderate size, more slender than stout, he had sunken eyes, a downward gaze, and hair black and thick except where it was thinning that made him take the skullcap early. His expression was severe, even stony, a stiffness that toward his inferiors was pride, and toward his superiors an affectation of worthy virtue. In short, he wore a dour visage at all times, even when looking at himself in a mirror. So much for his exterior. Professionally, he was admired for his skill and talent with accounts and ledgers, and his ingenuity at harvesting revenue from otherwise barren budgets. It was Colbert who'd come up with the idea of requiring the governors of border posts to feed their garrisons by dunning local sources. That kind of talent had given Cardinal Mazarin the idea of replacing his intendant Joubert, who'd recently died, with Sir Colbert, who shaved percentages even more closely. Colbert had gradually worked his way into the Court despite the liability of low birth, for he was the son of a honey-seller, like his father before him, who had also sold cloth and silk remnants. Colbert, destined by his family for commerce, had first worked for a merchant of Lyons, whom he had left to come to Paris to study bookkeeping with an auditor at the Châtelet named Biterne. There he'd learned the art of maintaining financial accounts, and the even more useful art of fudging them. His severity of manner became his greatest asset, for like Dame Fortune, or like those ladies of antiquity who cared only for their fancies, he seemed principled while actually allowing nothing to stand between him and his goal. In 1648 Colbert's cousin, the Lord de Saint-Pouange, found him a position in the office of Michel Le Tellier, the Secretary of State who favoured him one day by assigning him to bear a message to Cardinal Mazarin. At that time His Eminence was in good health, the stressful years of the Fronde not yet having counted double or triple against his age. He was at Sedan, on internal exile due to a Court intrigue in which Anne of Austria seemed inclined to desert him. Le Tellier held the threads to this intrigue. He had gotten hold of a letter from Anne of Austria as valuable to him as it was compromising to Mazarin. Using it, he undertook to play that double role he played so often, taking advantage of a conflict by either stoking the adversaries' differences, or by reconciling them. Le Tellier wanted to send Queen Anne's letter to Mazarin, so he would see how far he was exposed and be grateful for the service rendered. But then he wanted it back. To send the letter was easy but to recover it after lending it was far more difficult. Le Tellier looked around the office, and seeing the dark and scrawny clerk scribbling away, brows furrowed, he selected him over the most polished gendarme for the task. Colbert was assigned to go to Sedan with the order to share the letter with Mazarin and then bring it back to Le Tellier. He listened to his instructions with scrupulous attention, had them repeated twice, pointedly asked whether recovering the letter was as necessary as sharing it, and was told by Le Tellier, "Even more necessary."

Then he left, travelling like a courier without a care for his health or person. When he reached Mazarin, first he handed to him a note from Le Tellier announcing to the cardinal the sending of the precious letter, and then the letter itself. Mazarin blushed deeply while reading Anne of Austria's letter, gave Colbert a gracious smile, and dismissed him. "When will I have your response, My Lord?" asked the courier humbly.

"Tomorrow."

"Tomorrow morning?"

"Yes, Sir."

The clerk made his most deferential bow and turned on his heel. The next morning, he was back again at 7 o'clock. Mazarin made him wait until ten. Colbert bided his time patiently in the antechamber, and when his turn came, he went in. Mazarin handed him a sealed packet, on the envelope of which was written, "To Sir Michel Le Tellier, Etc."

Colbert examined this packet with the closest attention, while the cardinal gave him a charming smile and pushed him toward the door. "And the letter from the queen mother, My Lord?" asked Colbert.

"It's in the packet with the rest," said Mazarin.

"Ah! Very good," replied Colbert.

And, placing his hat between his knees, he began tearing open the packet. Mazarin uttered a cry. "What are you doing?" he growled.

"Opening the packet, My Lord."

"Do you distrust me, you pen pusher? I've never seen such impertinence!"

"Oh, My Lord, please don't be angry with me! It's certainly not the word of Your Eminence I distrust, God forbid."

"What, then?"

"It's the thoroughness of your secretaries, My Lord. What is a letter? A mere scrap. And can't a scrap be overlooked? And look, My Lord, see if I was wrong! Your clerks have overlooked the scrap, for the letter isn't in the packet."

"You're as insolent as you are blind!" cried Mazarin, irritated. "Withdraw and await my summons." And saying these words, he made an Italian gesture of distraction with one hand and whisked the packet away from Colbert with the other, and then went back into his study. But his anger was soon replaced by thoughtfulness. Mazarin, upon opening the door of his study each morning, found

Colbert waiting on a bench, and this dowdy figure humbly but persistently asked for the queen mother's letter. Eventually, Mazarin ran out of excuses and had to return it. He accompanied this restitution with a severe reprimand, during which Colbert was content to examine, feel, and even smell the paper of the letter, scrutinizing the writing and signature as if he were dealing with the greatest forger in the realm. Mazarin added further rude remarks while Colbert, impassive, having proven to himself the authenticity of the letter, departed as if he were deaf. It was this conduct that won him the post of the late Joubert, for Mazarin, instead of holding a grudge, admired his tenacity and desired to have it in his own service. We see from this single story the entire character of Colbert. The events that followed gradually enabled his wit and talent to come to full flower. Colbert wasn't slow to insinuate himself into the cardinal's good graces, and before long he was indispensable. This clerk knew the details of all the cardinal's accounts before His Eminence ever spoke of them. The secrets shared between them were a powerful bond that is why, when he appeared on the verge of passing into the next world, Mazarin wanted solid advice on how to dispose of the wealth he would leave, so unwillingly, behind him. Thus, after Guénaud's visit the cardinal summoned Colbert, had him sit beside him, and said to him, "Let's have a talk, Sir Colbert, and a serious one, because I'm sick and may be about to die."

"Man is mortal," replied Colbert.

"I have never forgotten that, Sir Colbert, and have tried to prepare for it. You know that I've amassed a bit of a fortune..."

"I know, My Lord."

"And how much do you estimate that little fortune comes to, Sir Colbert?"

"To forty million five hundred sixty thousand two hundred livres, nine sous, and eight deniers," replied Colbert. The cardinal sighed deeply and regarded Colbert with admiration, then allowed himself a smile. "Known money," added Colbert in response to this smile.

The cardinal sat bolt upright. "What do you mean by that?" he said.

"I mean," said Colbert, "that besides these forty million five hundred sixty thousand two hundred livres, nine sous, and eight deniers there are thirteen other millions no one knows of."

"Phew!" sighed Mazarin. "What a man this is!"

At that moment Bernouin's head appeared in the doorway. "What is it," asked Mazarin, "and why are you disturbing me?"

"The Theatine father you sent for, Your Eminence's confessor, has arrived, and can't come back again to My Lord's until after tomorrow."

Mazarin looked at Colbert, who at once picked up his hat and said, "I'll return another time, My Lord."

Mazarin hesitated. "No, no," he said, "I have as much business with you as with him. Besides, you are my temporal confessor, and what I say to one can be heard by the other. Stay, Colbert."

"But, My Lord, if there is no privacy of penance, will the confessor agree to it?"

"Don't worry yourself about that. Go back into the alcove."

"I can wait outside, My Lord."

"No, no – better that you hear the confession of a man of means."

Colbert bowed and went into the alcove. "Admit the Theatine father," said Mazarin, closing the curtains.

The Confession of a Man of Means

The Theatine entered deliberately, showing no astonishment at the noise and disturbance in the household raised by concern for the cardinal's health. "Come, Most Reverend," said Mazarin after a final glance at the curtained alcove. "Come and comfort me."

"Such is my duty, My Lord," replied the Theatine.

"Start by sitting comfortably, for I'll begin with a general confession; you'll quickly grant me a good absolution, and I'll feel calm again."

"My Lord," said the reverend, "surely you aren't so ill that a general confession is urgent. And it will be very tiring, so take care!"

"Do you suppose it would take long, Reverend?"

"How could it be otherwise when one has lived as complete a life as Your Eminence?"

"Ah, that's true! Yes, the story might be a long one."

"The mercy of God is great," intoned the Theatine.

"Here," said Mazarin, "I'm beginning to alarm myself by thinking of everything I've allowed to pass of which the Lord would disapprove."

"Of course; who would not?" said the Theatine naively, turning his narrow face and mole-like features from the light. "Sinners are like that: forgetful before, then scrupulous when it's too late."

"Sinners?" replied Mazarin. "Do you use the term ironically, or to reproach me with the background I've left behind? For as the son of an angler, I was certainly a ... seiner."

"Hmph!" said the Theatine.

"Family pride was my first sin, Reverend, because I allowed it to be said that I'd descended from ancient Consuls of Rome: Geganius Macerinus I, Macerinus II, and Proculus Macerinus III, all found in the Chronicle of Haolander. For Macerinus is temptingly close to Mazarin, though Macerinus, as a diminutive, means scrawny. Mazarini is also close to the augmentative, macer that means as thin as Lazarus. Look!"

And he showed his arms and legs, emaciated by fever. "That you are born of a family of anglers is no shame to you," replied the Theatine, "for indeed, Saint Peter was a angler, and you are a Prince of the Church, My Lord, as he was its supreme leader. Let's move on, if you please."

"However, I did threaten to put in the Bastille a certain Bounet, a priest of Avignon who wanted to publish a genealogy of the House of Mazarin that was entirely too exaggerated."

"To be believed, you mean?" replied the Theatine.

"Hmph! But if I'd acted on that threat, Reverend, it would have been the vice of pride – another sin."

"His was an abuse of wit but no one reproaches a person for that sort of crime. Let's move on."

"Mine was an abuse of pride, and I think, Reverend, I should categorize my errors by the mortal sins."

"I like proper categorisation."

"I do it by habit. You should know, then, that in 1630 – alas! Thirty-one years ago!"

"You were twenty-nine years old, my Lord."

"A hot-headed age. I fancied myself a soldier, and at Casale I joined the charge against the harquebusiers, just to show I could ride as well as any cavalier. It's true that I then negotiated the peace between the Spanish and French that somewhat redeems my sin."

"I don't see the slightest sin in displaying skill at riding," said the Theatine. "It's in perfect taste and does honour to our robes. In my capacity as a Christian, I approve of your halting bloodshed, and as a priest, I'm proud of the bravery of a colleague."

Mazarin bowed his head humbly. "Yes," he said, "but the results!"

"What results?"

"This damned sin of pride gets into everything! Since I'd thrown myself into battle between two armies, smelled the powder and charged lines of soldiers, I began to regard generals with disdain."

"Ah!"

"That's the result: since then, I haven't been able to stand them."

"Well, the fact is," said the Theatine, "that you haven't had many good generals."

"Oh, I certainly had Sir le Prince!" cried Mazarin. "And haven't I made him pay?"

"No point in feeling sorry for him, he's had plenty of glory and gain."

"True for Sir le Prince but what of Sir de Beaufort, whom I treated so harshly in the dungeons of Vincennes?"

"Yes but he was a rebel, and the security of the State required you to make that sacrifice. Let's move on."

"I think that's it for pride. There's another category of sin that I hesitate to name..."

"Tell me of it, and I'll figure out its category."

"It's a truly great sin, Reverend."

"We'll see, My Lord."

"You must have heard tell of ... certain relations I've had with Her Majesty the queen mother ... relations that the malicious..."

"The malicious, My Lord, are fools. Wasn't it necessary, for the good of the State and the best interests of the young king that you should act as a close adviser to the queen? Move on, move on."

"Believe me, that lifts a terrible burden from me," said Mazarin.

"Trivia and trifles! Find us something serious."

"I've been full of ambition, Reverend..."

"That's the price of doing great things, My Lord."

"But to covet the tiara of the pope..."

"The pope is first among Christians. Why shouldn't you desire that?"

"It's been said in print that, in order to get it, I sold Cambria to the Spanish."

"You've published pamphlets yourself, so one can't say you've been too harsh on pamphleteers."

"Ah, Reverend, you set my heart free. The rest are mere peccadilloes."

"Tell me."

"There's gambling."

"A worldly pursuit, to be sure but your position required you to keep a grand house and entertain your guests."

"I loved to win, though."

"No one plays to lose."

"I cheated. A little."

"You took your advantage. Move on."

"That's it, Reverend! I feel no other burden on my conscience. Give me my absolution, and my soul will be ready, when God calls it, to ascend unhindered to his throne."

The Theatine neither moved nor spoke. "What are you waiting for, Reverend?" said Mazarin.

"The final statement."

"Final statement of what?"

"Of the confession, My Lord."

"But I'm finished."

"Oh, no! Your Eminence is mistaken."

"Not that I'm aware of."

"Think hard."

"I've thought as hard as I could."

"Then I'll assist your memory."

"Let's see."

The Theatine coughed several times. "You have not spoken to me of avarice, another mortal sin, nor of the millions," he said.

“What millions, Reverend?”
“Why, your millions, My Lord.”
“Mon père, that money belongs to me; why should I speak of it?”
“Because, you see, on that our opinions differ. You say that money is yours, and I think it belongs to others.”
Mazarin raised a cold hand to his sweating forehead. “What do you m-mean?” he stammered.
“This: Your Eminence has gained a great deal of wealth in the service of the king...”
“Hmph. A great deal? It’s not that much.”
“In any event, where did this wealth come from?”
“From the State.”
“Which means, from the king.”
“But what do you conclude from that, Reverend?” said Mazarin, starting to tremble.
“I can reach no conclusion without a list of your revenues. Let’s add it up: you have the Bishopric of Metz.”
“Yes.”
“The Abbacies of Saint-Clément, Saint-Arnoud, and Saint-Vincent, also in Metz.”
“Yes.”
“You have the Abbey of Saint-Denis, one of the loveliest properties in France.”
“Yes, Reverend.”
“You have the Abbey of Cluny, a rich living.”
“I have that.”
“And that of Saint-Médard, at Soissons, with income of a hundred thousand livres.”
“I can’t deny it.”
“Plus, that of Saint-Victor at Marseilles, one of the richest abbeys of the South.”
“Yes, mon Père.”
“Over a million a year. With the income of the cardinalate and the ministry, call it two million.”
“But...”
“Over ten years, that’s twenty million ... and twenty million at interest that compounds to fifty per cent gives, in ten years, another twenty million.”
“For a Theatine father, you’re quite an accountant!”
“Since 1644, when Your Eminence granted our order the monastery we occupy near Saint-Germain-des-Prés, I have reckoned the society’s accounts.”
“And mine as well, I see, Reverend.”
“One must know a little bit about everything, My Lord.”
“Well, then! Your conclusion?”
“I conclude that your baggage is too heavy to carry across the threshold of Paradise.”
“So, I’m ... damned?”
“Unless you make restitution, yes.”
Mazarin uttered a pitiful cry. “Restitution! But, good Lord, to whom?”
“To the master of this money – to the king!”
“But it’s the king who gave it all to me!”
“Not so! The king signed no such decrees.”
Mazarin sighed and groaned. “Absolution,” he said. “Absolution!”
“Impossible, My Lord. Restitution,” replied the Theatine. “Restitution!”
“But you absolved me of the other sins before. Why not this one?”
“Because,” replied the reverend, “to absolve you of this sin is a crime for which the king would never absolve me, My Lord.”
Upon which, the confessor stood and, sighing with unease, left the same way he had come. “Oh, my God,” groaned the cardinal. “Whoa! Come here, Colbert – I’m sick, very sick!”

The Bequest

Colbert emerged from behind the curtains. “Did you hear?” said Mazarin.
“Alas! Yes, My Lord.”
“Is he right? Is that money ill-gotten?”
“A Theatine, My Lord, is a bad judge on matters of finance,” Colbert replied coldly. “However, it may be that, by his theological lights, Your Eminence has made some mistakes. We often find it so ... when we die.”
“The first mistake is that of dying.”
“True, My Lord. But on whose behalf does he think you’re mistaken? That of the king.”
Mazarin shrugged his shoulders. “As if I hadn’t saved his State and its finances!”
“That cannot be denied, My Lord.”
“It can’t? Then, I’ve earned no more than a legitimate salary, despite what my confessor thinks?”
“Beyond all doubt.”
“And I can retain for my family, always so needy, the better part of what I’ve earned!”
“I see no obstacle to that, My Lord.”
“I was sure, Colbert, that if I consulted you, you’d give me good advice,” replied Mazarin with joy.
Colbert made his sour miser’s grimace. “My Lord,” he interrupted, “we must consider whether the Theatine’s words are not some sort of snare.”
“A snare? Why? The Theatine is an honest man.”
“He believed Your Eminence was at death’s door, since Your Eminence summoned him for confession. Did I not hear him say to you, ‘Distinguish what the king has given you from what you’ve earned for yourself’? Recall, My Lord, if he said something like that to you, though in the terms of a Theatine father.”
“He might have.”
“In which case, My Lord, I’d say you’ve been required by the father to...”
“To make restitution?” cried Mazarin in alarm.
“I ... wouldn’t disagree.”
“To make full restitution! You can’t mean it. You talk like the confessor!”
“Restitution of a part – that is to say, His Majesty’s part – or else, My Lord, there could be trouble. Your Eminence is too able a politician to ignore the fact that at this moment the king doesn’t have even a hundred fifty thousand livres in his coffers.”
“That is not my business,” said Mazarin triumphantly, “but rather that of Sir le Surintendant Fouquet, whose accounts you’re aware of, as I’ve shared them with you in recent months.”
Colbert pinched his lips at the name of Fouquet. “His Majesty,” he said between his teeth, “has no money but that collected by Sir Fouquet; your fortune, My Lord, would look like food to the starving.”
“Yes but I’m not the king’s superintendent of finances, I have my own sources. I’m sure I can find something to help His Majesty, some legacy but ... I can’t neglect my own family...”
“A meagre legacy will dishonour and offend the king. Bequeathing a mere part to His Majesty is as much as admitting that what you’re keeping wasn’t legitimately acquired.”
“Sir Colbert!”
“I thought Your Eminence did me the honour to ask for my advice.”
“Yes but you’re ignorant of the principal details of the issue.”
“I’m ignorant of nothing, My Lord; for ten years I’ve reviewed every column of figures calculated in France and have engraved them so deeply on my memory that, from the disbursals of Sir Le Tellier, who is reliable, to the secret skimming of Sir Fouquet, who is fraudulent, I could recite, line by line, every expenditure from Marseilles to Cherbourg.”
“I suppose you’d have me throw all my money into the king’s coffers!” cried Mazarin sardonically, from whom the gout then wrenched several painful groans. “Then the king would have nothing to blame me for but he’d amuse himself at my expense with my millions, and rightly so.”
“Your Eminence has misunderstood me. I did not at all mean that the king should spend your money.”
“To me it seems clearly otherwise, since you advise me to give it to him.”
“Ah!” replied Colbert. “That’s because Your Eminence, preoccupied with the problem, completely overlooks the character of His Majesty Louis XIV.”
“How so?”
“I believe his character, if I may dare to say so, centres on the sin that My Lord confessed just now to the Theatine.”
“You may so dare. What sin is that?”
“It is pride. Pardon, My Lord, I mean majesty; kings don’t show pride, that’s a mere human emotion.”
“Pride will do – and yes, you’re right. So?”
“So, My Lord, if I’ve reasoned correctly, Your Eminence has only to offer all his fortune to the king, and without delay.”
“Why is that?” asked Mazarin, intrigued.
“Because the king won’t accept the entire amount.”
“What? A young man without money who’s consumed by ambition?”
“Indeed.”
“A young man who wishes me dead.”
“My Lord...”
“To inherit, yes, Colbert – yes, he’d like me dead, so he can inherit. Triple fool that I am not to have seen it! But I’ll thwart him.”
“You will. Because if the bequest is made in the right form, he’ll refuse it.”
“Come, now!”
“I’m certain of it. A young man who’s accomplished nothing, who yearns for recognition, who burns to be the sole ruler, won’t take anything just handed to him – he wants to achieve everything on his own. This prince, My Lord, won’t be content with the Royal Palace left to him by Richelieu, nor the magnificent Palais Mazarin that you’ve built, nor the Louvre of his ancestors, nor even with Saint-Germain where he was born. I predict that all that does not come from him, he will scorn.”
“And you guarantee that if I give my forty million to the king...”

"If the bequest is couched in certain terms, I guarantee he'll refuse it."
"What terms are these?"
"I can write them out if My Lord wishes me to."
"But what advantage will I gain from this?"
"An enormous one. No one will be able to accuse Your Eminence of the rampant avarice of which the pamphleteers reproach the most brilliant mind of the century."
"You're right, Colbert, you're right. Go to the king on my behalf and present him my will and testament."
"Your bequest, My Lord."
"But he might accept it! What if he accepts it?"
"Even then, you'd still have thirteen million for your family, and that's no small sum."
"But then you'd be a fool – or a traitor."

"And I'm neither one nor the other, My Lord. You seem very much afraid that the king will accept it but oh! Be more afraid if he doesn't."
"If he doesn't agree, we must make sure he overlooks the thirteen million I have in reserve. But ... yes, I will do it. Yes. Ah but here comes the pain again! Weakness overcomes me – I'm very ill, Colbert; it's near the end." Colbert trembled. The cardinal was very ill indeed: he was sweating profusely in his bed of pain, and the frightening pallor of his face, streaming with perspiration, was a sight to touch the heart of the most hardened physician. It clearly touched Colbert, for he rushed from the room, calling Bernouin to come to the sick man's aid, and then exited into the corridor. There, walking back and forth, with a pensive expression that made his vulgar visage almost noble, shoulders hunched, neck extended, lips twitching to his tumbling thoughts, he nerved himself up for a risky endeavour. Meanwhile, no more than ten paces away, just the other side of a wall, his master writhed in anguish with pitiful cries, thinking no longer of the treasures of the earth, nor the joys of paradise but of the horrors of hell. While hot towels, topical ointments, and tonics were feverishly administered by Guénaud, who'd been recalled to the cardinal's side, Colbert, holding his big head in both hands to suppress his own fever of ideas, considered the wording of the bequest that he would submit to Mazarin at the first opportunity his illness allowed. The cries at the approach of death from the cardinal, that pillar of the past, seemed to stimulate the genius of this thick-browed thinker who was already turning toward the new sun that would regenerate the future. Colbert returned to Mazarin when reason also returned to the patient, and persuaded him to dictate a bequest in the following terms:
As I prepare to appear before God, the master of all men, I pray that the king, who was my master upon earth, will repossess the abundance which his kindness has granted me, and which my family will be happy to see pass into his illustrious hands. The details of my property have been prepared whenever His Majesty requests, or when the last breath passes from the lips of his devoted servant. Jules, Cardinal de Mazarin
The cardinal sighed as he signed this. Colbert sealed the packet and carried it immediately to the Louvre, where the king had just returned. Then he went home, rubbing his hands together with the satisfaction of a workman on a job well done.

How Anne of Austria Gave Louis XIV One Sort of Advice & Sir Fouquet Gave Him Another

The news of the cardinal's condition had already spread, and it attracted at least as many people to the Louvre as the news of the marriage of Sir, the king's brother, once that had been officially announced. No sooner had Louis XIV returned home, still pondering the things he'd seen and heard that evening, when the audiencier announced that the same crowd of courtiers who, that morning, had attended his lever, had returned to attend his coucher – a favour that, during the reign of the cardinal at Court, had been rarely accorded to the king, who'd seen them flock instead to the cardinal despite the king's displeasure. But with the minister down, as we've seen, with a serious attack of gout, the flock of flatterers flew to the throne. Courtiers have an amazing instinct for sensing events in advance, a supreme science that makes them diplomats divining political difficulties, generals foretelling the outcomes of battles, and doctors diagnosing diseases. Louis XIV, who had learned this lesson from his mother, among others, understood from this turnout that His Eminence My Lord Cardinal Mazarin must be very ill indeed. Anne of Austria had scarcely finished escorting the young queen to her chambers, reclaiming the ceremonial tiara from her brow, when she returned to seek out her son in his study. There, alone, disturbed, and with an unquiet heart, he allowed himself, as if to exercise his will, to indulge in surging waves of terrible anger. His was a royal anger that forced events when it broke out but which, thanks to his burgeoning self-control, never erupted in more than brief outbursts. In fact, his confidant Saint-Simon later mentioned his astonishment when, fifty years later, he lost his temper at a little lie told by his son the Duke Maine, and the result was a hail of blows with a cane on a poor lackey who'd pilfered a biscuit. The young king was thus in the grip of a sad fury and said to himself when he saw his reflection in a mirror, "O King! King in name but not in fact. O Phantom, rather, vain image that you are! Lifeless statue that has no power beyond provoking a reflexive salute from courtiers, when will you raise your velvet-clad arm and tighten your silken-gloved fist? When will you be able to open your lips to do other than sigh or smile at the stupid immobility of the other statues in the gallery?" Smacking his forehead with his hand, suddenly desperate for air, he went to the window where he saw some cavaliers below, chatting in animated whispers. These gentlemen were just curious onlookers, eager subjects for whom a king is a wondrous curiosity, like a rhinoceros, crocodile, or serpent. He struck his forehead again and said, "King of France! Some title! People of France! What a mob of creatures! I've just returned to my royal palace of the Louvre, my horses are still steaming, and I caught the attention of barely twenty people who watched as I passed ... Twenty? What am I saying? No, not even twenty interested in the King of France, not even ten King's Archers to guard my house – archers, people, guards, everyone is at the Royal Palace. Why, dear God? Don't I, the king, have the right to ask that?" "Because," said a voice responding to his own, from the study doorway, "the Royal Palace is home to all the money – in other words, all the power – of he who would reign." Louis turned suddenly; the voice was that of Anne of Austria. The king shuddered, then advanced toward his mother and said, "I hope Your Majesty paid no attention to those vain remarks that just show how the solitude and sorrow of kings can affect even the happiest personality." "I paid attention to only one thing, my son: that you were complaining." "Me? Not at all," said Louis XIV. "No, really, you're mistaken, Madam." "Then what were you doing, Sire?" "I imagined I was under the eye of my tutor and was developing an argument for debate." "My son," replied Anne of Austria, shaking her head, "you're wrong to be ashamed of your words, and wrong not to take me into your confidence. The day will come, maybe as soon as tomorrow, when you'll need to remember this axiom: 'Gold is the only power, and those who have that power are the only true kings.'" "You don't mean to cast blame on those who've gained wealth under my rule, do you?" asked the king. "No," said Anne of Austria sharply. "No, Sire, those who became wealthy under your rule are rich because you willed it, and I have no envy or complaint against them. They have doubtless served Your Majesty well enough for Your Majesty to permit them to attend to their own recompense. That's not what I hear in your words that reproaches me." "God forbid, Madam, that I should ever reproach my mother for anything!" "Besides," continued Anne of Austria, "the Lord doesn't grant riches on this earth forever; the Lord, as a corrective for honours and wealth, gives us suffering and disease, and no one," added Anne of Austria with a painful smile that proved she didn't except herself from this funereal premise, "no one carries their grandeur and wealth into the grave. In that way, the young reap the fruitful harvest sowed by the old." Louis listened with increasing attention to these words, as Anne of Austria seemed to offer them as some sort of consolation. "Madam," said Louis XIV, looking his mother in the eye, "do you, in fact, have something else you wish to tell me?" "Absolutely nothing, my son – only, you must have noticed how ill Sir Cardinal was this evening." Louis looked at his mother, seeking some emotion in her voice, some sadness in her expression. Indeed, Queen Anne's face seemed somewhat altered but by a suffering of a personal character. Perhaps this change was due to the cancer that was even then gnawing at her breast. The king said, "Indeed, Madam, Sir de Mazarin is very ill." "And it would be a great loss to the realm if His Eminence was called to God. Don't you agree, my son?" asked Anne of Austria. "Yes, Madam, certainly, a great loss to the realm," said Louis, colouring. "But the danger can't be that great, it seems to me, as Sir Cardinal isn't that old." The king had just finished speaking when an usher stepped in under the door tapestry and stood with a roll of paper in his hand, waiting for the king to acknowledge him. "What's that?" asked the king. "A message from Sir de Mazarin," replied the usher. "Give it to me," said the king. And he took the paper. But just as he was about to unroll it, a great noise arose in the courtyard, the gallery, and the antechambers. "Ah ha!" said Louis XIV, who seemed to recognise this commotion. "Did I say there was only one king in France? I was wrong, there are two." At that moment the door opened, and Superintendent of Finance Fouquet appeared before Louis XIV. His horses had made the noise in the courtyard, his retainers had made the commotion in the gallery, and it was he the courtiers had loudly welcomed in the antechambers, an uproar that stirred as he passed and continued long after his passage. It was this clamour that Louis XIV regretted not hearing when he came through. "He's not the king you think he is," Anne of Austria said quietly to her son. "He's just a wealthy man, that's all." Nonetheless, her bitter feelings gave these words a hateful tone, though Louis's expression, on the contrary, remained calm, not a wrinkle showing on his forehead. He nodded politely to Fouquet and continued to unroll the paper he'd received from the usher. Fouquet saw this movement, and, with a manner both easy and respectful, approached Anne of Austria so as not to interrupt the king. Louis unrolled the paper but he didn't read it; he listened to Fouquet compliment his mother on the graceful turn of her hand and arm. The queen's frown relaxed a bit and she almost smiled. Fouquet noticed that the king, instead of reading, was watching and listening, and he made a half-turn so that, while continuing to speak to Anne of Austria, he was also facing the king. "Do you know, Sir Fouquet," said Louis XIV, "that His Eminence is ill?" "Yes, Sire, I know that," said Fouquet, "and very ill indeed. I was at my country estate of Vaux when I heard the news and dropped everything to come." "You left Vaux this evening, Sir?" "An hour and a half ago, yes, Your Majesty," said Fouquet, consulting a watch encrusted with diamonds. "An hour and a half!" said the king, who had enough control to restrain his anger but not to hide his surprise. "I understand Your Majesty is sceptical, and rightly so but I did come that quickly, wonderful as it sounds. I recently received from England three pairs of horses that I was assured were very lively; I had them posted at intervals of four leagues, and I tried them tonight. I rode them in relay from Vaux to the Louvre in an hour and a half, so Your Majesty can see it was money well spent." The queen mother's smile couldn't conceal her jealousy. Fouquet reacted before she could express it. "Indeed, Madam," he hastened to add, "such horses are made, not for subjects but for kings, for kings must never defer to their subjects in anything." Louis raised his head. "However, so far as I know," interrupted Anne of Austria, "you're not a king, are you, Sir Fouquet?" "Which is why, Madam, the horses await only a signal from His Majesty before entering the stables of the Louvre. If I allowed myself to try them, it was only to ensure that I didn't offer the king anything less than a marvel." The king flushed deep red. "You know, Sir Fouquet," said the queen, "that it isn't the custom at the Court of France for a subject to offer such a present to his king?" Louis started. "I had hoped, Madam," said Fouquet anxiously, "that my love for His Majesty, my unending desire to please him, would serve to mitigate my failure of etiquette. It was not a present that I presumed to offer him but rather a tribute I hoped to pay him." "Thank you, Sir Fouquet," said the king politely. "I appreciate your intention, as I do love good horses but I'm not wealthy enough to keep them – as you, my Surintendant des Finances, should know better than anyone. I am unable, however much I might like them, to purchase such an expensive set." The queen mother seemed to be enjoying the minister's awkward position but Fouquet gave her a haughty glance and replied, "Luxury is the virtue of kings, Sire; it is by luxury that they approach divinity, for by luxury they are elevated above other men. By luxury a king rewards his subjects and honours them. Under the golden sun of this royal luxury grows the luxury of individuals, the source of wealth for the people. His Majesty, by accepting the gift of six such incomparable horses, would pique the vanity of our domestic breeders of Limousin, Perche, and Normandy, and their subsequent efforts to excel would benefit everyone ... But the king is silent, and therefore I stand convicted." During this speech Louis XIV, to keep his temper, rolled and unrolled the letter from Mazarin, though without looking at it. His eyes lit upon it at last, and he gasped at its first line. "What is it, my son?" asked Anne of Austria, drawing nearer. "Can this be from the cardinal?" said the king, continuing to read. "Yes, it is from him." "Has his illness grown worse?" "Read it," said the king, handing the letter to his mother as if he thought that only by reading it could Anne of Austria believe the paper's astonishing contents.

Anne of Austria read it in her turn, and as she did her eyes sparkled with a joy that Fouquet noticed, though she tried to turn away. “It’s a bequest, a regular deed of gift,” she said. “A bequest?” repeated Fouquet.

“Yes,” said the king, speaking to his Surintendant des Finances. “Yes, on the eve of death, Sir Cardinal makes me a bequest of all his wealth.”

“Forty million!” cried the queen. “Ah, my son! This is a fine gesture on the cardinal’s part, one that will contradict a host of vile rumours. Forty million, slowly gathered and then returned in one fell swoop to the royal treasury, the act of a loyal subject and a true Christian.”

And after casting a final glance at the note, she returned it to Louis XIV, who was thrilled at the size of the sum mentioned. Fouquet had withdrawn a few steps and was silent. The king approached and handed him the letter. The superintendent gave it a brief, haughty look, then bowed and said, “Yes, Sire, it’s a bequest, as I see.”

“You must reply, my son,” cried Anne of Austria. “You must reply, and right away.”

“In what way, Madam?”

“By a visit to the cardinal.”

“But it’s scarcely an hour since I left His Eminence,” said the king.

“Then write, Sire.”

“Write!” said the young king with disgust.

“Indeed,” replied Anne of Austria. “It seems to me, my son, that a man who makes such a bequest has the right to expect a speedy show of gratitude.” And turning to the superintendent, she said, “Don’t you agree, Sir Fouquet?”

“The bequest is worth the trouble, yes, Madam,” replied the superintendent with a hauteur that didn’t escape the king’s notice.

“Accept it, then, and thank him,” insisted Anne of Austria.

“What says Sir Fouquet?” asked Louis XIV.

“His Majesty wants to know what I think?”

“Yes.”

“Thank him, Sire…”

“Ah!” said Anne of Austria.

“But don’t accept it,” continued Fouquet.

“And why is that?” demanded Anne of Austria.

“You said so yourself, Madam,” replied Fouquet. “Because kings must not and cannot receive gifts from their subjects.”

The king remained silent in the face of these two very different opinions. “But … forty million!” said Anne of Austria, in the same tone that Marie Antoinette much later said, “You tell me that much!”

“I know,” Fouquet said, laughing. “Forty million is a nice round sum, an amount that might tempt even a monarch’s conscience.”

“But, Sir,” said Anne of Austria, “instead of dissuading the king from receiving this present, point out to His Majesty, in your official capacity, that these forty million will make his fortune.”

“It is precisely, Madam, because this forty million is a subject’s fortune that I say to the king, ‘Sire, if it’s indecent for a king to accept from a subject six horses worth twenty thousand livres, it’s that much more dishonourable to owe his fortune to a subject who was less than scrupulous in the collection of that fortune.’”

“It’s not your place, Sir, to give the king such a lesson,” said Anne of Austria, “Unless you provide a replacement for the forty million you cause him to lose.”

“The king shall have it whenever he wishes,” said the Surintendant des Finances, bowing.

“Yes, by squeezing it out of the people,” said Anne of Austria.

“And weren’t they squeezed, Madam, when they sweated out the forty million offered in this bequest?” Fouquet replied. “In any event, His Majesty asked for my opinion, and he has it. If His Majesty asks for my assistance, it shall be the same.”

“Come, come, accept it, my son,” said Anne of Austria. “You are above such petty considerations.”

“Refuse it, Sire,” said Fouquet. “While a king lives, he has no other measure but his conscience, no other judge but his will – but when he is dead, posterity will applaud or accuse.”

“Thank you, Mother,” replied Louis, bowing respectfully to the queen. “And thank you, Sir Fouquet,” he said, politely dismissing the superintendent.

“Will you accept it?” Anne of Austria asked again.

“I’ll think about it,” replied the king, looking at Fouquet.

Agonies

The same night the bequest was sent to the king, the cardinal had himself taken to Vincennes. The king and the Court followed him there. The last glimmers of this torch still cast enough light to outshine, in its radiance, the combined light of the rest of the Court. Moreover, as we saw, the young Louis XIV, a faithful satellite of his minister, still orbited in his gravitation until the final moments. Mazarin’s illness, following Guénaud’s prediction, had worsened; it was no longer an attack of gout, it was the grip of death. And there was one more thing that afflicted the dying man with an even greater agony: the anxiety of having made that bequest to the king, the gift that, according to Colbert, the king would return unaccepted to the cardinal. The cardinal had a lot of faith, as we’ve seen, in the predictions of his financial secretary – but the sum was a great one, and no matter how brilliant Colbert was, from time to time the cardinal had his doubts, thinking that it might have been the Theatine who was mistaken, and there was at least as great a chance that he wouldn’t be damned as that Louis XIV would reject his millions. Moreover, the longer the delay before the bequest was returned, the more Mazarin thought that forty million was enough to risk losing something as hypothetical as a soul. Mazarin, though a cardinal, was first and foremost a prime minister, and in that capacity committed to materialism almost as much as an atheist. Every time the door opened he turned to look, longing to see the return of his unhappy bequest but he was deceived by hope and lay back down again with a sigh, finding his sorrow all the deeper because for a moment he’d forgotten it. Anne of Austria, too, had followed the cardinal to Vincennes. Her heart, though age had made it selfish, couldn’t refuse to bear this dying man witness to a sadness she owed him in her quality as a wife, according to some, and in her capacity as sovereign, according to others. She had adopted, as it were, the face of mourning in advance, and all the Court followed her example. Louis, in order not to show on his face what was passing in his soul, confined himself to his apartment with his old governess as his only company. The more he thought that he was approaching the end when all restraint would be lifted from him, the humbler and more patient he became, gathering himself like all strong men who have secret plans, preparing to spring forward more effectively at the decisive moment. Last rites had been secretly administered to the cardinal, who, faithful to his habits of concealment, fought against the appearance, and even the reality, of his situation, pretending to keep to his bed as if merely afflicted by a passing malady. Guénaud, for his part, maintained absolute discretion, and when questioned, tired of being interrogated, he said nothing except, “His Eminence is still full of youth and strength but God wills what he wills, and when he decides to take a man, that man will be taken.” These words, though spoken with the greatest care and reserve, were really intended for an audience of two: the king and the cardinal. Mazarin, despite Guénaud’s predictions, continued to deceive himself, or rather, to play his part so well that even the most cunning courtiers, when saying he deceived himself, were actually his dupes. Louis, who hadn’t seen the cardinal for two days – his mind fixed on the bequest that also preoccupied the cardinal – didn’t know the cardinal’s real condition. The son of Louis XIII, following in the footsteps of his father, had been the king so little until then that, while longing for rule, his desire was coupled with the fear of the unknown. As to the bequest, having made up his mind, a resolution he’d shared with no one, he decided to ask Mazarin to receive his visit. It was Anne of Austria, in her constant attendance on the cardinal, who received the king’s proposal, and she passed it on to the dying man, who heard it and trembled. Why did Louis XIV wish this audience? Was it to refuse the bequest, as Colbert had predicted? Was it to accept it with gratitude, as Mazarin feared?

Nevertheless, despite his rising anxiety, the dying man didn’t hesitate for a moment. “His Majesty will be quite welcome, yes, very welcome indeed,” he said, dismissing Colbert with a gesture that he, sitting at the foot of the bed, understood very well. “Madam,” continued Mazarin, “would Your Majesty please assure the king of the truth of what I’ve just said?”

Anne of Austria rose; she, too, was eager to resolve the question of the forty million that was at the forefront of everyone’s minds. After Queen Anne left, Mazarin made a great effort and leaned toward Colbert, saying, “Well, Colbert! Two unhappy days have passed, two mortal days, and, as you see, the bequest has not been returned.”

“Patience, My Lord,” said Colbert.

“Patience! Are you mad, you wretch? You advise me to be patient! In truth, Colbert, you mock me – I’m dying, yet you tell me to be patient!”

“My Lord,” said Colbert with his usual coolness, “it’s impossible that things won’t turn out as I said. His Majesty comes to see you so that he can return the bequest personally.”

“You think so? Well, I, on the contrary, am quite sure His Majesty is coming to thank me for it.”

Anne of Austria returned at that moment; on her way to find her son, she’d encountered another charlatan with a miracle cure, a medicinal powder sure to save the cardinal. Anne brought a sample of this powder but that wasn’t what the cardinal was interested in and he wouldn’t even look at it, insisting that life wasn’t worth the trouble it took to continue it. But once he’d uttered this maxim of philosophy, his secret, so long concealed, finally burst forth. “That powder, Madam, has no bearing on the situation. I made a small bequest to the king two or three days ago, and until now, out of delicacy no doubt, His Majesty hasn’t spoken of it. But the moment has arrived for explanations, and I beg Your Majesty to tell me if the king has any ideas on the matter.”

Anne of Austria opened her mouth to reply but Mazarin stopped her. “The truth, Madam,” he said. “In the name of heaven, the truth! Don’t flatter a dying man by offering him vain hope.”

He stopped himself at a look from Colbert that told him he was going too far. “I know,” said Anne of Austria, taking the cardinal’s hand. “I know that you have offered, not a small bequest, as you modestly call it but a generous, a magnificent gift; I know how painful it would be for you if the king…”

Mazarin listened, dying as he was, with the intensity of ten living men. “If the king?” he repeated.

Mazarin fell back on his pillow like the tragic clown Pantaloon, with the exaggerated despair of a man who abandons himself to a shipwreck – but he retained enough strength and presence of mind to throw at Colbert one of those looks that exceed the tragedy of ten epic poems. “It’s true, isn’t it,” added the queen, “that you’d consider the king’s refusal a kind of insult?”

Mazarin rolled his head on his pillow without uttering a single syllable. The queen was deceived, or pretended to be deceived, by this behaviour. “Therefore, I’ve given him sound advice,” said she, “and though certain others, jealous no doubt of the glory you’ll gain by your generosity, tried to persuade the king to refuse the bequest, I took your side and argued so well that I hope you won’t have to suffer such a denial.”

“Oh!” murmured Mazarin from behind half-closed eyes. “That’s a service I won’t forget for a single minute during the few hours I have left to live.”

“And I must say that it wasn’t without difficulty that I rendered it to Your Eminence,” added Anne of Austria.

“Ah, plague, I believe it. Oh!”

“My God, what is it?”

“I’m burning up.”

“Are you suffering so badly?”

“Like the damned!”

Colbert wished he could disappear through the floor. “Then,” continued Mazarin, “Your Majesty thinks that the king” – he paused for several seconds – “that the king is coming here to pay me the compliment of accepting?”

“So I think,” said the queen.

Mazarin assassinated Colbert with a look like daggers. Just then, the ushers announced the king was approaching through the crowded antechambers. This announcement caused a stir, and Colbert took advantage of it to slip out through a side door. Anne of Austria arose and awaited her son. Louis XIV appeared in the chamber’s doorway, his eyes going straight to the dying man, who no longer took the trouble to even half rise for the monarch from whom he thought he had nothing more to expect. An usher rolled an armchair next to the bed. Louis saluted his mother, then the cardinal, and sat down. The queen sat down in her turn. The king glanced behind him, and the usher, understanding the look, waved those courtiers who remained in the room out ahead of him. As the velvet curtains fell across the door, silence fell over the chamber. The king, still childish and timid before he who had been his master since his birth, respected him all the more in the supreme majesty of impending death. He dared not start the conversation, feeling that every word must weigh with significance, not just in this world but the next. As for the cardinal, he had only one thing on his mind: his bequest. It was not the pain of his illness that gave him that dejected expression and dull look, it was the expectation of the gratitude that was about to come tumbling from the king’s mouth, destroying all hope of restitution. It was Mazarin who first broke the silence. “Your Majesty,” he said, “are you also lodged here at Vincennes?” Louis nodded. “It’s a gracious favour that you grant to a dying man,” continued Mazarin, “and which will make his death that much easier.”

"I hope," replied the king, "that I've come to visit, not a dying man but a patient still able to be cured."

Mazarin made a movement of his head that signified, Your Majesty is very good but I know the truth of the matter. "The final visit, Sire," he said, "the final visit."

"If that were so, Sir Cardinal," said Louis XIV, "then I've come one final time to hear the advice of a guide to whom I owe everything." Anne of Austria was a woman; she could no longer restrain her tears. Louis showed himself much moved as well but Mazarin was even more moved than his guests, though for different motives. Here the silence fell again. The queen dabbed at her cheeks, and Louis regained his resolve. "I said," continued the king, "that I owe a great deal to Your Eminence." The cardinal's eyes devoured Louis XIV, for he felt the approach of the supreme moment. "And," continued the king, "the principal object of my visit is to deliver sincere thanks for that final testimony of friendship that you sent me."

The cardinal's cheeks inflated, his lips parted, and the most lamentable sigh he'd ever uttered prepared to issue from this chest. "Sire," he said, "I've impoverished my poor family, and ruined all who depend upon me that some might call a mistake but at least no one can say that I refused to sacrifice everything to my king."

Anne of Austria resumed her weeping. "Dear Sir Mazarin," said the king, in a tone more serious than one would have expected given his youth, "I think you misunderstand me."

Mazarin raised himself on one elbow. "There's no question of ruining your dear family, nor of robbing your dependents. No, that must not be!"

Come, he's going to leave me a bit after all, thought Mazarin. Let's get as much as we can.

The king softens enough to be generous, thought the queen. Just let him not be too generous – this chance at a fortune will never come again.

"Sire," the cardinal said aloud, "my family is large, and my nieces will be destitute when I'm gone."

"Oh, don't worry about your family," the queen interrupted hastily. "Dear Sir Mazarin, we will hold no friends more precious than yours; your nieces will be my children, the sisters of His Majesty, and whenever favours are distributed in France, it will be to those you love."

Rubbish! Mazarin thought, who knew better than anyone what faith to put in the promises of monarchs.

Louis read the dying man's thoughts on his face. "Fear not, dear Sir de Mazarin," he said, with a sad and half-ironic smile. "Misses Mancini will lose their most precious blessing in losing you but they will nonetheless remain the richest heiresses in France, since you've given me their dowry..." the cardinal held his breath. "...and I restore it to them," continued Louis, drawing from his doublet and placing on the cardinal's bed the letter of bequest that, for two days, had been the burning obsession of Mazarin's mind.

"What did I tell you, My Lord?" came a whisper from the side door behind the bed.

"Your Majesty returns my bequest!" cried Mazarin, so overcome by joy that he forgot his role of benefactor.

"Your Majesty refuses the forty million!" cried Anne of Austria, so stupefied that she forgot her role of mourner.

"Yes, Sir Cardinal; yes, Madam," replied Louis XIV, tearing up the letter that Mazarin hadn't dared take back. "Yes, I annihilate this act that despoiled an entire family; the wealth acquired by His Eminence in my service is his and not mine."

"But, Sire, consider!" cried Anne of Austria. "Your Majesty doesn't have even ten thousand crowns in his coffers!"

"Madam, I have just committed my first act of royalty that I hope will worthily inaugurate my reign."

"Ah, Sire, you're right!" said Mazarin. "It's truly grand, truly generous what you've done here!" And he picked up, one after another, the pieces of the bequest scattered on his bedclothes to make sure it was the original and not a copy. Finally, he found the piece bearing his signature and, recognising it, fell back on his pillows. Anne of Austria, unable to hide her disappointment, raised her eyes and hands to the heavens. "Ah, Sire!" cried Mazarin. "My God! Sire, you will be blessed by my whole family! Perbacco! If any member of my family ever causes you trouble, just frown and I'll rise from my grave."

These theatrics didn't produce quite the effect Mazarin had counted upon. Louis had already passed on to considerations of a higher order, while as for Anne of Austria, unable to continue without giving in to the anger she felt at the magnanimity of her son and the hypocrisy of the cardinal, she rose and left the room to find another venue for her spite. Mazarin understood completely, and, afraid that Louis XIV might rescind his decision, to distract him he began to groan and cry out, like Scapin in a later role, making that sublime jest for which the sad grumbler Boileau dared to criticize Molière. But gradually his cries subsided, and when Anne of Austria left the room they ceased entirely. "Sir Cardinal," said the king, "do you have any advice to give me?"

"Sire," replied Mazarin, "you are already wisdom itself, prudence incarnate. As for benevolence, let's not speak of it; what you have done exceeds the generosity of all men from antiquity to modern times."

The king remained cool, unmoved by this praise. "So, Sir," he said, "you speak only of gratitude. Doesn't your experience that is far greater than my wisdom, prudence, and generosity, inspire you to give me any counsel that will help me in the future?"

Mazarin thought for a moment. "You came here," he said, "to do a great thing for me and for mine, Sire."

"No need to talk about that," said the king.

"Well!" continued Mazarin. "I do want to give you something in exchange for the forty million that you so royally gave up." Louis XIV made a gesture that indicated he'd heard enough flattery. "I wish to give you an opinion," said Mazarin, "a single idea more valuable than all those millions."

"Sir Cardinal!" interrupted Louis XIV.

"Sire, hear my advice."

"I'm listening."

"Come near, Sire, for I'm getting weaker ... closer, Sire, closer."

The king leaned down over the bed of the dying man.

"Sire," said Mazarin, so quietly that the breath of his words came like a whisper from the tomb into the ears of the young king, "Sire ... never have a prime minister."

Louis sat up, astonished. This advice amounted to a confession. And it was a treasure indeed, this sincere confession from Mazarin. The cardinal's legacy to the young king consisted of no more than these six words – but these six words, as Mazarin had said, were worth millions in gold. Louis sat stunned for a moment. As for Mazarin, he acted as if he'd said nothing unusual. The young king finally spoke. "Apart from your family, Sir de Mazarin, do you have anyone else to recommend to me?"

A slight drumming sounded from the side door behind the bed. Mazarin understood. "Yes, yes," he said quickly. "Yes, Sire, I recommend to you a wise man, honest and capable."

"His name, Sir Cardinal?"

"His name will be entirely unknown to you, Sire – it's Sir Colbert, my financial secretary. Oh, you can trust him," added Mazarin with emphasis. "Everything he's predicted has come to pass, and he has a sharp eye for business and for judging men, one that's never mistaken. He's surprised even me. Sire, I owe you a great deal but I think I settle the score by giving you Sir Colbert."

"All right," said Louis faintly.

For as Mazarin had said, the name of Colbert was unknown to him and he thought the cardinal's enthusiasm might be no more than the delirium of a dying man. The cardinal had fallen back again on his pillow. "For now, Sire, farewell," murmured Mazarin. "I still have a hard road to travel before I present myself before my new master. Farewell, Sire." The young king felt tears in his eyes. He leaned over the dying man, already more than half dead ... and then he hurried away.

Enter Colbert

That night was one of anguish for both the dying man and the king. The dying man awaited his deliverance. The king awaited his freedom. Louis never went to bed. An hour after he'd left the cardinal's chamber, he heard that the dying man, recovering a little strength, had had himself dressed, rouged, and combed, and had asked to receive the latest ambassadors. Like Caesar Augustus, he seemed to regard the world as a theatre and wanted to play out properly the last act of his comedy. Anne of Austria didn't visit the cardinal again; she had nothing more to do there. The appearance of propriety was the pretext for her absence. Besides, the cardinal didn't ask for her, as the advice the queen had given her son still irked him. Toward midnight, while still fully dressed, Mazarin entered his final agony. He had reviewed his will, and as that document was the exact expression of his desires, and he feared someone with another agenda would take advantage of his weakness to get him to change it, he'd given it to Colbert, a most vigilant sentry who posted himself in the corridor outside the cardinal's bedroom. The king, confining himself to his room, sent his old governess every hour to Mazarin's suite for the latest report on the cardinal's health. After having heard that Mazarin had had himself dressed to receive the ambassadors, Louis next heard that they were beginning the prayers for the dying. At one o'clock in the morning Guénaud prepared a final potion, his Remedy Heroic. This was a prime example of a period that saw everything as swordplay, an old attitude that, though on its way out, still clung to belief in a "secret thrust" effective even against death. Mazarin, after taking this remedy, was able to breathe easily for almost ten minutes. Immediately he gave orders that the word should be spread of a sudden improvement. The king, at this news, felt cold sweat break out on his forehead; having glimpsed his liberty, slavery seemed darker and less acceptable than ever. But the next report completely changed the face of things: suddenly Mazarin scarcely breathed at all, and had trouble following the prayers that the Curate of Saint-Nicolas-des-Champs recited before him. The king began to march back and forth in his chamber, consulting, as he walked, several papers taken from a bureau to which he alone had the key. A third time the governess returned: Sir de Mazarin was making jokes and had ordered the cleaning of his Flora by Titian. Finally, at about half past two in the morning, the king could no longer stand the strain – he hadn't slept for twenty-four hours. Sleep, so powerful at that age, took hold of him for about an hour. But he didn't go to bed, he slept in an armchair. Around four o'clock the governess entered the room and woke him up.

"Well?" the king asked.

"Well, my dear Sire!" said the governess, wringing her hands sadly. "Well! He is dead."

The king rose suddenly, as if a steel spring had brought him to his feet. "Dead!" he cried.

"Alas! Yes."

"For sure?"

"Yes."

"Officially?"

"Yes."

"Has the news been announced?"

"Not yet."

"Then, who told you the cardinal was dead?"

"Sir Colbert."

"Sir Colbert?"

"Yes."

"And he was sure of what he told you?"

"He'd just come from the bedchamber where he'd spent several minutes holding a mirror up to the cardinal's lips."

"Ah!" said the king. "And what has become of this Sir Colbert?"

"He's just left His Eminence's chamber."

"To go where?"

"To follow me."

"So, then he's...?"

"Here, Sire, waiting outside your door for when it pleases you to receive him."

Louis sprang to the door, opened it himself, and saw Colbert standing there and waiting. The king started at the sight of this statue all dressed in black. Colbert bowed with profound respect and took two steps toward His Majesty. Louis withdrew into his room, gesturing for Colbert to follow him. Colbert came in. Louis dismissed the governess, who closed the door behind her as she left. Colbert stood humbly near the door. "What have you come to tell me, Sir?" said Louis, troubled by this surprise intruder who seemed to divine his secret thoughts. "That the cardinal has just passed away, Sire, and that I bring you his final farewell."

The king paused thoughtfully for a moment, looking attentively at Colbert. It was apparent that the cardinal's last words were on his mind. "So, you're Sir Colbert?" he asked.

"Yes, Sire."

"His Eminence's loyal servant, as he described you to me?"

“Yes, Sire.”

“Guardian of some of his secrets?”

“Of all of them.”

“The friends and servants of His Late Eminence will be dear to me, Sir, and I’ll make sure that you find a place in my own service.”

Colbert bowed. “You’re a financial secretary, Sir, are you not?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“And Sir Cardinal employed you in his accounting?”

“I had that honour, Sire.”

“But you didn’t do anything for the royal budget, I believe.”

“On the contrary, Sire, it was I who gave Sir Cardinal an idea that saved Your Majesty’s treasury three hundred thousand livres a year.”

“What idea was that, Sir?” asked Louis XIV.

“Your Majesty is aware that the Hundred Swiss display silver lace on all their uniform ribbons?”

“Of course.”

“Well, Sire! I proposed that their ribbons be made with imitation silver. No one can tell the difference, and three hundred thousand livres can feed a regiment for half a year, or buy ten thousand good muskets, or build a ten-gun flute ready to sail.”

“That’s true,” said Louis XIV, looking more attentively at the character before him. “And, my faith, that’s a sensible savings, for it’s ridiculous to have soldiers wearing lace like they’re lords.”

“I’m happy that His Majesty approves,” said Colbert.

“And is that the only job you had with the cardinal?” asked the king.

“It was I whom His Eminence charged with examining the accounts of the Superintendent of Finances, Sire.”

“Ah!” said Louis XIV, who had been about to dismiss Colbert when he was stopped by these final words. “So, it was you His Eminence charged with auditing Sir Fouquet. And what was the result of this audit?”

“It found a deficit, Sire. If Your Majesty will permit me…?”

“Speak, Sir Colbert.”

“I ought to give Your Majesty some explanations.”

“No need, Sir; you audited the accounts, so tell me the balance.”

“Easily done, Sire. Empty everywhere, money nowhere.”

“Take care, Sir, you’re impugning the management of Sir Fouquet, whom everyone says is a capable man.”

Colbert flushed, then turned pale, for he felt that from this moment, he was at war with a man whose power was nearly as great as that of the late minister. “Indeed, Sire, a very capable man,” Colbert repeated with a bow.

“But if Sir Fouquet is a capable man who, despite his capability, lacks funds, whose fault is that?”

“I accuse no one, Sire, I just state the facts.”

“Very well; summarize your accounts and present them to me. There’s a deficit, you say? But a deficit can be temporary – credit comes back, the funds replenish.”

“No, Sire.”

“Not this year, perhaps, I understand that but next year?”

“Next year, Sire, is as exhausted as this year.”

“And the year after that?”

“The same.”

“What are you telling me, Sir Colbert?”

“That the next four years’ revenue is expended in advance.”

“We’ll need a loan, then.”

“We’ll need three, Sire.”

“I’ll create offices and sell them, and the price of the posts will be paid into the treasury.”

“Impossible, Sire, for post upon post has already been created and sold, most with their requirements left blank so that the purchasers need do nothing to fulfil them – which means Your Majesty can’t even force them to resign for noncompliance. Furthermore, Sir le Surintendant sold the posts at a one-third discount, so the people are further burdened, and Your Majesty doesn’t even profit from it.”

The king frowned. “Explain that to me, Sir Colbert.”

“If Your Majesty can formulate his question more clearly, I shall try to explain what he wishes to know.”

“You’re right – clarity is what we need.”

“Yes, Sire, clarity. God is God above all because he made the light.”

“Then, tell me, for example, if Sir Cardinal is dead,” asked Louis XIV, “now that I rule as king, what if I want some money?”

“Your Majesty has none.”

“How can that be, Sir? Can’t the superintendent find me any money?”

Colbert shook his heavy head. “Why?” said the king. “Are the State’s revenues so completely committed that there’s no income at all?”

“At this point, Sire, yes.”

The king frowned. “In that case, I’ll have the King’s Council draw up orders to sell off our notes at a low rate for quick liquidation.”

“Impossible, for the notes have been converted into mortgages and the mortgages have been leveraged, with the debts divided into so many parts and resold that the original note could never be reconstructed.”

Louis, upset, was walking back and forth, frowning. “But if it’s as you say, Sir Colbert,” he said, stopping suddenly, “wouldn’t I be ruined before I’ve even reigned?”

“That is, in fact, the case, Sire,” replied the impassive compiler of figures.

“But surely, Sir, there’s some money somewhere?”

“There is, Sire, and as a beginning, I bring Your Majesty an account of funds that Sir Cardinal de Mazarin wasn’t willing to list in his last will and testament, or in any testament at all but which he entrusted to me.”

“To you?”

“Yes, Sire, with instructions to deliver them to Your Majesty.”

“What? Money beyond the forty million in the will?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Sir de Mazarin had even more money?”

Colbert bowed. “What a bottomless pit that man was!” murmured the king. “Sir de Mazarin on the one hand, Sir Fouquet on the other, and maybe a hundred million between them! It’s no wonder my coffers are empty.”

Colbert just waited. “And is the sum you bring me worth the trouble?” asked the king.

“Yes, Sire, it’s a goodly sum.”

“Amounting to…?”

“Thirteen million livres, Sire.”

“Thirteen million!” cried Louis XIV, trembling with joy. “Did you say thirteen million, Sir Colbert?”

“I said thirteen million, yes, Your Majesty.”

“That nobody knows about?”

“That nobody knows about.”

“And which are in your hands?”

“In my hands, yes, Sire.”

“And when could I have it?”

“Within two hours.”

“But where is it, then?”

“In the cellar of a house that Sir Cardinal had in the city, and which he was good enough to leave to me in a particular clause in his will.”

“You’re familiar with the cardinal’s will?”

“I have a legal copy signed by his hand.”

“A copy?”

“Yes, Sire. Here it is.”

Colbert drew the will from his doublet and showed it to the king. Louis read the article relative to the gift of the house. “But,” he said, “This is only about the house, and doesn’t mention any money.”

“Your pardon, Sire but that part was confided to my conscience.”

“And Sir de Mazarin confided that to you?”

“Why not, Sire?”

“Him, the most suspicious of all men?”

“He wasn’t so with me, Sire, as Your Majesty can see.”

Louis paused to admire that face, vulgar but expressive. “You’re an honest man, Sir Colbert,” said the king.

“But isn’t that money intended for his family?” asked Louis XIV.

“If that money were for his family, it would be listed in the cardinal’s will with the rest of his fortune. If that money was owed to the family, I, who drew up the deed of bequest in favour of His Majesty, would have added the sum of thirteen million to the forty million already offered to you.”

“What!” said Louis XIV. “It was you who drew up the bequest, Sir Colbert?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“And yet the cardinal trusted you?” added the king naïvely.

“I told His Eminence that Your Majesty would never accept it,” said Colbert in his usual tone, calm and rather solemn.

Louis wiped his hand across his brow. “Oh, how young I am,” he murmured under his breath, “to think I can command men!”

Colbert waited until the end of this interior dialogue and Louis lifted his head. “At what time should I bring the money to Your Majesty?” he asked.

“Tonight, at eleven o’clock. And I don’t want anyone to know that I have this money.”

Colbert made no reply, as if he preferred to talk as little as necessary about secrets.

“This sum, is it in ingots or in coins?”

“In gold coins, Sire.”

“Good.”

“Where shall I bring it?”

“To the Louvre. Thank you, Sir Colbert.”

Colbert bowed and left.

“Thirteen million!” whispered Louis XIV when he was alone. “It’s like a dream!”

He leaned his forehead into his hands, as if he were preparing to sleep. But after a moment he raised his head, shook his shining hair, rose, and throwing open the window, bathed his burning forehead in the brisk morning breeze that brought him the bitter scent of the trees and the sweet perfume of the flowers. A resplendent dawn was rising on the horizon, and the first rays of the sun gilded the young king’s brow. “This golden dawn is the first of my reign,” murmured Louis XIV. “Is this an omen that you send me, Almighty God?”

The 1st Day of the Reign of Louis XIV

That morning the news of the cardinal’s death spread throughout the château, and from the château to the city. The ministers Fouquet, Lyonne, and Le Tellier went to the King’s Council chamber for a meeting; the king, hearing of it, sent for them immediately. “Gentlemen,” he said, “while Sir Cardinal lived, I allowed him to govern my affairs but now I intend to govern them myself. You will give me your opinion when I ask you for it. Now go!”

The ministers looked at each other in surprise. If they managed not to openly smile it was with great effort, for they knew that the prince, raised in absolute ignorance of affairs, had taken on, out of pride, a burden far beyond his abilities. Fouquet took leave of his colleagues on the staircase, saying, “So much the less work for us, Gentlemen.”

And he went cheerfully to his carriage. The other two, rather anxious about this turn of events, returned together to Paris. The king, around ten o’clock, went to visit his mother, with whom he had a long conversation, and then, after the midday meal, he called for a closed carriage and went straight to the Louvre. There he received a great many people, taking a certain pleasure in their curiosity and hesitation. Toward evening, he ordered the gates of the Louvre to be closed, all but one that opened onto the river quay. He sent as sentries to this gate two of the Hundred Swiss who didn’t speak a word of French, with orders to admit all bearers of deliveries but no one else, and then to let no one leave. At eleven exactly he heard the rumbling of a heavy wagon outside the river gate, then another, and finally a third, and then the gate squealed on its hinges as it closed. Shortly thereafter someone scratched at the door to his study; the king opened it himself to find Colbert, whose first words were, “The money is in Your Majesty’s cellars.”

Louis then went down personally to see for himself the barrels of coins, gold, and silver, that, under the eye of Colbert, four men had just rolled down into a vault the key to which the king had given Colbert that morning. His inspection completed, the king returned to his rooms, followed by Colbert, whose chilly demeanour seemed not the least bit warmed by the satisfaction of this personal success.

“Sir,” said the king, “what would you desire as your reward for this devotion and integrity?”

“Absolutely nothing, Sire.”

“What, nothing? Not even the opportunity to serve me?”

“If Your Majesty doesn’t give me an opportunity, I will serve him nonetheless. It’s impossible for me not to serve the king as well as I’m able.”

“You will be my Intendant des Finances, Sir Colbert.”

“But isn’t there a superintendent, Sire?”

“Indeed.”

“Sire, the Surintendant des Finances is the most powerful man in the realm.”

“Oh?” exclaimed Louis, flushing. “Is that what you think?”

“I won’t last a week under him, Sire, unless Your Majesty gives me independent authority. An intendant under a superintendent has none.”

“You don’t think you could depend upon me?”

“As I had the honour to tell Your Majesty, while Sir Mazarin was alive, Sir Fouquet was the second man in the kingdom; now that Sir Mazarin is dead, he’s the first.”

“Sir, I’m willing to tolerate hearing you say such things to me today but tomorrow, believe me, I won’t put up with it.”

“Then I shall be of no use to Your Majesty?”

“You’re already useless, since you’re afraid to compromise yourself by serving me.”

“The only thing I fear is not having the means to serve.”

“What do you want, then?”

“I want Your Majesty to give me some assistants to serve in his intendency.”

“Won’t that diminish your position?”

“It will add to its security.”

“Name your colleagues.”

“Gentlemen Breteuil, Marin, and Harvard.”

“They’ll be in place tomorrow.”

“Thank you, Sire!”

“Is that all you need?”

“No, Sire, one thing more…”

“What’s that?”

“Allow me to empanel a Court of Justice.”

“A Court of Justice? To do what?”

“To try the corrupt tax-farmers and debt collectors who’ve been cheating the treasury for the past ten years.”

“But … what will we do to them?”

“We’ll hang two or three of them that will make the rest come clean.”

“But I can’t begin my reign with a spate of executions, Sir Colbert.”

“On the contrary, Sire, better to begin with a few executions than to end in mass upheaval.”

The king said nothing to him.

“Does Your Majesty agree?” said Colbert.

“I’ll think about it, Sir.”

“A delay to think about it will render it too late.”

“Why?”

“Because we’re dealing with men whose positions, given time to reinforce them, are stronger than ours.”

“Empanel your Court of Justice, Sir.”

“I shall do so.”

“Is that all?”

“No, Sire, there’s one more important thing. What authority does Your Majesty give to this intendency?”

“Well, I don’t know … the usual authority, I suppose.”

“Sire, I need this intendency to include the right to read any correspondence with England.”

“Impossible, Sir – that correspondence isn’t even shared with the King’s Council. Sir Cardinal handled it personally.”

“I thought Your Majesty had declared this morning that he would handle such affairs without the council.”

“Yes, I did declare that.”

“Then let Your Majesty himself be the only one to read such correspondence, particularly from England; I must emphasize the importance of this.”

“Sir, you shall handle that particular correspondence, and give me a full account of it.”

“Now, Sire, what shall I do regarding the finances?”

“Everything that Sir Fouquet doesn’t do.”

“Then that’s all I need from Your Majesty. Thank you: that puts my mind at ease.” And with these words, he took his leave. Louis watched him go. Colbert wasn’t a hundred paces from the Louvre when the king received a courier from England. After a quick look at the envelope the king opened it and found within a letter from King Charles II. Here’s what the English prince wrote to his royal brother:

Your Majesty must be very anxious about the illness of Sir Cardinal Mazarin but this imminent danger must serve to inspire you, as the cardinal is given up for dead by his own physician. I thank you for your gracious reply to my communication regarding Lady Henrietta Stuart, my sister, and in a week the princess will leave for Paris with her court. It warms my heart to acknowledge the fraternal friendship which you’ve shown me, and which makes you all the more my brother. And it’s good, moreover, to prove to Your Majesty just how warm my feelings are. You are quietly fortifying Belle-Île-en Mer. This is a mistake; we will never make war on one another. This measure doesn’t upset me, it just makes me sad. You are spending millions there uselessly and can tell your ministers as much. As you can see, my intelligencers are well informed, and I hope, my brother, that you can render me a similar service if the chance arises.

The king tugged violently on his bell pull, and his valet appeared. “Sir Colbert just left and can’t have gone far,” he cried. “Call him back!”

The valet was about to follow this order when the king stopped him. “No, never mind,” he said, and then continued to himself, “I see what Colbert was up to. Belle-Île belongs to Sir Fouquet, and fortification of it implicates Fouquet in conspiracy. Discovery of this conspiracy is the ruin of the superintendent, its discovery would be reported in correspondence from England, and that’s why Colbert wanted to handle that correspondence. But, oh! I can’t rely solely on this man – he’s a brain but I also need brawn.”

Louis paused, then gave a cry of satisfaction. He said to the valet, “Didn’t I have a Lieutenant of Musketeers?”

“Yes, Sire, Sir d’Artagnan.”

“Who recently left my service?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Find him for me, and make sure he’s here for tomorrow morning’s lever.”

The valet bowed and went out. “Thirteen million in my cellar,” the king said, “Colbert holding my purse and d’Artagnan wielding my sword: I’m king!”

A Passion

On the day of his arrival in Paris, upon returning from the Place Royal, Athos returned to his lodgings on Rue Saint-Honoré. There he found the Viscount of Bragelonne waiting for him in his rooms and chatting with Grimaud. It was no easy thing to converse with the old servant and only 2 men possessed the secret: Athos and d’Artagnan. The first succeeded because Grimaud wanted to get him to speak; d’Artagnan on the contrary because he knew how to make Grimaud talk. Raoul was trying to get the story of the journey to England out of Grimaud who had told it in all its detail by way of gestures and about eight words, more or less. He had first indicated by a sinuous wave of his hand that he and his master had gone across the sea. “On some mission?” Raoul had asked. Grimaud, replied yes in bowing his head. "In which sir Count went into danger?" asked Raoul. Grimaud shrugged his shoulders slightly as if to say, not too much. "But still, there's danger!" insisted Raoul. Grimaud pointed to a sword, the fire, and a musket hanging on the wall. "Then sir Count had an enemy there?" cried Raoul.

"Monck," Grimaud replied.

"It's strange," continued Raoul, "that sir Count persists in regarding me as a novice, refusing to share with me the honour and danger of these missions." Grimaud smiled. At that moment Athos returned. The hotelier lit his way up the stairway and Grimaud ran to meet him that cut the conversation short recognising his master's footsteps but Raoul had begun asking questions and was not about to stop. Gripping the count's hands with tender respect, he said, "How's it, sir, that you can go on a dangerous mission without bidding me farewell, let alone asking me to aid you with my sword – me who'd be your main support while in the strength of my youth? Me whom you raised to act like a man? Ah, sir! Would you risk putting me through the cruel ordeal of never seeing you again?"

"Who told you, Raoul, that my journey was dangerous?" replied the count, placing his cloak and hat in the arms of Grimaud who had just removed his sword.

"Me," said Grimaud.

"And why is that?" asked Athos severely.

Grimaud was embarrassed; Raoul tried to come to his rescue by replying: "It's natural, sir, for our good Grimaud to tell me the truth when it concerns you. By whom you'll be loved and supported if not by me?" Athos made no reply. He dismissed Grimaud with a friendly gesture, then sat in an armchair while Raoul, still standing, hovered over him. "Besides," Raoul continued, "it's not just a journey, it's a mission ... one on which you're threatened by iron and fire."

"No need to speak of that, viscount," said Athos softly. "I left quickly, it's true but the service of King Charles II required an urgent departure. As for your concern, I thank you for it and I know I can count on you. Did you lack anything during my absence, viscount?"

"Nothing, sir, thank you."

"I'd ordered Blaisois to issue you a hundred pistoles if you needed money."

"Sir, I've not seen Blaisois."

"Did you run short of money then?"

"Sir, I'd thirty pistoles left from the sale of the horses I captured in my last campaign and sir Prince of Condé had the kindness to let me win two hundred more at his card table three months ago."

"You, gambling? I don't like that, Raoul."

"I never gamble, sir but in Chantilly, sir Prince had me hold his cards for him one night while he received a courier from the king. I played, won, and the prince told me to keep the winnings."

"Is that the custom in his household, Raoul?" said Athos, frowning.

"Yes, sir, every week sir Prince finds one excuse or another to let one of his gentlemen win some money. His Highness's fifty gentlemen and my turn came up."

"Very well! You went to Spain for the royal wedding?"

"Yes, sir, it's a lovely trip and very interesting."

"And you've been back for about a month?"

"Yes, sir."

"And during that month?"

"During the month?"

"Yes, what did you do?"

"My duty, sir."

"You've not gone home to La Fère?"

Raoul blushed. Athos gave his son a look direct but calm. "You'd be wrong not to believe me," said Raoul. "I blush because of my feelings despite myself. The question you do me the honour to ask me is bound to raise such emotions; I blush because I'm moved, not because I lie."

"I know, Raoul that you never lie."

"No, sir."

"Besides, my friend, you might be wrong about what I'm asking you..."

"I know what you mean, sir – you want to know if I've been to Blois."

"That's it."

"I didn't go; I've not seen the person you're alluding to."

Raoul's voice trembled as he said this. Athos, sensitive in delicate matters, immediately added, "Raoul, I see your feelings are wounded; you're suffering."

"A great deal, sir – since you forbade me to go to Blois and see Miss La Vallière again."

There the young man stopped; that sweet name so lovely to say, tore his heart as it passed over his lips. "And I did the right thing," said Athos hastily. "I'm not a cruel or unjust father, I respect true love but I foresee a particular future for you, a grand future. We're at the dawn of a new reign and war calls to the spirit of our chivalrous young king. What he needs to support this heroic ardour's a brigade of cavaliers who're young, free, can charge into battle, and fall crying, 'Long live the King!' rather than, 'Farewell, my wife!' You understand that, Raoul. As heartless as my reasoning may seem, I implore you to listen to me and turn your gaze away from your younger days when you lived for love, soft and carefree days that weaken the heart until it can't stand the strong drink we call glory and adversity. Raoul, I tell you again, see in my counsels only the desire to help you, nothing but the ambition to see you prosper. I believe you capable of becoming a remarkable man. March forward alone and you'll march faster and farther."

"You've commanded, sir," replied Raoul. "I obey."

"Commanded!" cried Athos. "Is that your response? I commanded you! Oh, you twist my words because you misunderstand my intentions. I don't command, I entreat."

"No, sir, you command," said Raoul stubbornly. "However you ask, your wish is to me a command. I'll not see Miss La Vallière again."

"But that wounds you! You're hurt!" said Athos. Raoul made no reply. "You're pale, distressed ... this feeling's strong then!"

"It's a passion," said Raoul.

"No – just a habit."

"Sir, you know that I've been travelling a great deal, spent two years away from her. A habit, why in two years that'd fade, I think ... but when I saw her again, I loved her not more, that's impossible but still and deeply. Miss La Vallière's for me the woman beyond all other women – but to me, you're a god upon earth. For you, I'd sacrifice everything."

"And that'd be wrong," said Athos. "I've no further rights over you. Age's emancipated you; you've no need of my consent. Besides, I'd not refuse it after what you've just told me. Marry Miss La Vallière if that's what you wish."

Raoul started but quickly said, "You're very kind, sir and your concession warms me with gratitude – but I can't accept it."

"What, now you refuse?"

"Yes, sir."

"I'll oppose you in nothing, Raoul."

"But in your heart, you do oppose this marriage. You'd have me choose another."

"That's ... true."

"That's enough to forestall me. I'll wait."

"Take care, Raoul! What you're saying is serious."

"I'm aware of it, sir. And I say, I'll wait."

"What? Until I die?" said Athos, dismayed.

"Oh, sir!" cried Raoul, voice choking. "How can you tear my heart that way when I've never given you a single cause for complaint?"

"My dear boy, that's true," murmured Athos between his lips, trying to contain the emotion he could no longer suppress. "No, I don't want to hurt you, I just don't know what you expect. Do you think you'll fall out of love with her?"

"No, never that, sir. I'll wait ... until you change your mind."

"Then I'll put it to the test, Raoul – and we'll see if Miss La Vallière will wait as you do."

"I hope so, sir."

"But be warned, Raoul – she might not wait! Ah, you're so young, so confident, so loyal ... but women are changeable."

"You've never spoken ill of women to me before, sir. You've never had cause to complain of them – why'd you doubt Miss La Vallière?"

"That's true," said Athos, looking away. "I've never spoken ill of women, never had reason to complain. Miss La Vallière's done nothing to deserve suspicion – but when one looks to the future, one must consider exceptions, even improbabilities! What if as I said, Miss La Vallière doesn't wait for you?"

"What do you mean, sir?"

"What if she turned her eyes elsewhere?"

"Onto another man, you mean?" said Raoul, suddenly pale.

"Just so."

"Well, sir! I'd kill that man," said Raoul simply, "and every other man Miss La Vallière chooses until one of them kills me or Miss La Vallière comes back to me."

Athos winced. "I thought you told me just now," he said, voice strained, "that I was your god, your law in this world?"

"Oh!" said Raoul, trembling. "Would you forbid me the right to duel?"

"What if I did forbid it, Raoul?"

"Then you'd forbid me to hope, sir. But you could not forbid me to die."

Athos raised his eyes and looked searchingly at the viscount. He had spoken these words in a dark tone and followed them with a darker look. "Enough," said Athos after a long silence. "This is a sad subject and we've carried it to extremes. Live life day by day, Raoul; do your duty, love Miss La Vallière – in short, act like a man since you've reached the age of manhood. But never forget that I love you dearly as you say you love me as well."

"Ah, sir Count!" said Raoul, pressing Athos's hand against his heart.

"My dear child. Leave me now, I need rest. By the way, sir d'Artagnan's returned with me from England and you owe him a visit."

"With all my heart, sir! I love sir d'Artagnan."

"And rightly so: he's an honest man and a brave cavalier."

"Whom you love!" said Raoul.

"I do indeed. Do you know where to find him?"

"At the Louvre, I expect or the Place Royal – wherever the king is. Doesn't he still command the King's Musketeers?"

"Not at the moment: sir d'Artagnan took a leave of absence ... for his kind of vacation. No, don't look for him at his old posts. You'll find news of him at the house of Planchet."

"His former lackey?"

"Who's become a grocer, yes?"

"Rue des Lombards, right?"

"Or Rue des Arcis, something like that."

"I'll find him, sir, I'll find him."

"And you'll give him a thousand compliments on my behalf and bring him to dine with me before I leave for La Fère."

"Yes, sir."

"Goodnight, Raoul!"

"Sir, I see you wear an order that's new to me. Accept my compliments."

"The Fleece? Ah, yes. A trifle, my son and the kind of bone they throw to an old dog like me. Goodnight, Raoul!"

The Lesson of D'Artagnan

Raoul did not find d'Artagnan the next day as he had hoped. He encountered only Planchet who was delighted to see the young man again, and paid him 2 or 3 warlike compliments that did not sound like they had come from a grocer. However, the next day as Raoul was returning to Paris from Vincennes at the head of 50 dragoons entrusted to him by Sir Prince, he saw a man who was looking at a house the way a man looks at a horse he is considering buying with his head cocked to the side on the Place Baudoyer. This man, dressed in a bourgeois suit buttoned up like a military coat, wearing a modest citizen's hat but with a long shagreen-sheathed sword at his side, turned his head when he heard the horses and left off looking at the house to consider the dragoons. It was none other than Sir d'Artagnan but d'Artagnan on foot, hands behind his back, reviewing the dragoons as they passed as closely as he'd reviewed the houses. Not a trooper, not a button or ribbon, not a horse's hoof escaped his inspection. Raoul was riding at his column's flank, and d'Artagnan noticed him last. "Hey!" he called. "Eyes right!"

"Can it really be you?" said Raoul, turning his horse.

"No, you're not mistaken. Good morning!" replied the former musketeer.

Raoul leaned down to shake his old friend's hand. "Watch it, Raoul," d'Artagnan said, "the second horse in the fifth rank will be unshod before you reach Pont Marie; there are only two nails still holding it on in front."

"Wait for me," said Raoul, "I'll be right back."

"Can you leave your detachment?"

"My cornet can take over."

"Will you have dinner with me?"

"I sure will, Sir d'Artagnan."

"Then be quick, either leave your horse or get me one."

"I'd rather walk back with you."

Raoul hurried off to warn the cornet, who took his place in the vanguard, then he dismounted, gave his horse to one of the dragoons to lead, and ran happily back to take the arm of Sir d'Artagnan, who watched all this activity with the satisfaction of a connoisseur. "Have you come from Vincennes?" he said.

"Yes, Sir Knight."

"And Cardinal Mazarin...?"

"He's very sick; some even say he's died."

"Are you in good standing with Sir Fouquet?" asked d'Artagnan, showing how little moved he was by the death of Mazarin with a disdainful shrug.

"With Sir Fouquet?" said Raoul. "I don't know him."

"Too bad, because a new king likes to elevate his own favourites."

"Oh, the king has nothing against me!" replied the young man.

"I'm not talking about the man wearing the crown but the king," said d'Artagnan, "by which I mean Sir Fouquet, now that the cardinal is dead. You should get in good with Fouquet unless you want to model your life after mine ... though it's true that you have other protectors, fortunately."

"Sir Prince, for one."

"He's yesterday's news, my friend."

"Sir Count of La Fère."

"Athos? Oh, well, that's different. If you want to make your fortune in England, you can't do better. And I'll tell you, without boasting too much, that I too have a little credit at the Court of Charles II. Now there's a king and no mistake!"

"Oh?" said Raoul with the natural curiosity of a well-bred young man in the presence of courage and experience.

"Yes, a king who's a pleasure-seeker, it's true but who knows how to hold a sword, and appreciates those who know what that's good for. Athos stands well with Charles II. Take service with him and leave behind this crowd of tax-farmers and corrupt officials who steal with French fingers anything the Italian left behind. And leave that little cry-baby of a king who will give us another reign like that of François II. Have you studied history, Raoul?"

"Yes, Sir Knight."

"Then you know how François II always had an earache?"

"No, I didn't know that."

"And Charles IX always had a headache?"

"Oh?"

"And Henri III always had a stomach-ache?"

Raoul laughed. "Well, my friend, Louis XIV always has a heartache. It's a sad sight to see a king who sighs from morning till night, never once shouting: Belly of the Grey Saint! Or Ox-horn! Like a man of spirit."

"Is that why you left his service, Sir Knight?" asked Raoul.

"Yes."

"But then you yourself have burned your bridges, and now will never make your fortune."

"Oh, me!" said d'Artagnan lightly. "I'm all set. I've had a legacy from my family."

Raoul just stared at him. The poverty of d'Artagnan was proverbial; Gascon to the core, his ill fortune out-Gascon-ed every other Gascon in the Kingdom of France and Navarre. Raoul had always heard the name d'Artagnan paired with that of Job, as close as Romulus with Remus. D'Artagnan noticed this look of surprise. "Hmm. Did your father tell you I was with him in England?"

"Yes, Sir Knight."

"And that I had a lucky break there?"

"No, Sir, I don't know anything about that."

"Yes, a good friend was made a great lord, Viceroy of Scotland and Ireland, and he awarded me an estate."

"An estate?"

"Of a decent size."

"So, now you're rich?"

"Eh!" d'Artagnan shrugged.

"Accept my sincere congratulations."

"Thanks ... look, this is my house."

"Here on the Place de Grève?"

"Yes. Don't you like this neighbourhood?"

"No, I do – you have a great view of the water. What a handsome old house!"

"Home of Our Lady's Portrait, an old tavern that I've converted to a residence."

"But isn't the tavern still open?"

"Lord, yes!"

"So, you don't live there?"

"No, I live at Planchet's."

"But didn't you just say: this is my house?"

"I said that because it is my house. I bought it."

"Ah!" said Raoul.

"I bought it for thirty thousand livres but it'll earn me ten per cent a year, my dear Raoul – a fine return indeed! It has a garden on the Rue de la Mortellerie, the tavern rents the first two floors for a thousand a month, and the attic goes for five hundred."

"You're jesting!"

"Word of honour."

"An attic for five hundred livres? But it's too small to live in."

"So, no one lives in it. Only, you see that the attic has two windows overlooking the square?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well! Whenever there's a hanging, quartering, or breaking on the wheel, those two windows rent for twenty pistoles apiece."

"Oh!" said Raoul with horror.

"Revolted, isn't it?" said d'Artagnan.

"Oh!" repeated Raoul.

"It's disgusting but there it is. Parisian spectators can be real cannibals. I don't see how Christian men can make money from such a thing."

"Truly."

"As for me," continued d'Artagnan, "if I lived in that house, I'd shut it up tight on execution days – but I don't live there."

"But don't you rent out the attic for five hundred livres?"

"Only to that animal of an innkeeper, who then sublets it. Anyway, that's how it brings in fifteen hundred livres a month."

"Five per cent, the natural return on investment," said Raoul.

"Exactly. And I still have the storerooms at the back of the house, plus the cooling cellars that flood every winter, and the garden that is quite pretty, well planted and very private under the shadow of the walls and gate of the adjoining church, Saint Gervais and Saint Protais. The garden brings thirteen hundred livres. "

"Thirteen hundred livres! That's a princely sum."

"Here's the story: it rents to a canon of the church – these canons are all as rich as Croesus – whom I suspect employs the garden for private frolics. The tenant rents it under the name Sir Godard that is either a true name or a false one. If it's true, then there's our canon; if it's false, then who knows? And why should I care, since he always pays in advance? Now, when you came by, I was considering the idea of buying, on Place Baudoyer there, a house that adjoins my garden to make a handsome combined property. But your dragoons distracted me. Here, let's go up the Rue de la Vannerie, it'll take us straight to Master Planchet's." D'Artagnan marched on and led Raoul to Planchet's, inside and up to a room that the grocer had ceded to his former master. Planchet was out but dinner was served and ready. There was in this grocer still a touch of military punctuality. D'Artagnan returned to the subject of Raoul's future. "Does your father keep you within strict limits?" he said.

"Mostly, Sir Knight."

"Yes, I imagine Athos's fair but rather strict."

"But generous as a king, Sir d'Artagnan."

"In that case, lad, your money must be tight indeed! But if you ever need a few extra pistoles, your old musketeer's here."

"Ah, dear Sir d'Artagnan..."

"Do you gamble at all?"

"Never."

"But you try your luck with women? ...Ah, you blush – you little Aramis, you! My friend, that'll cost you more than cards and dice. Though with gambling, we often fight when we lose and that's some compensation. Bah! That little cry-baby king makes winners give him a chance at revenge. What a reign, my poor Raoul, what a reign! To think that in our day we musketeers were often besieged in our houses like Hector and Priam in the city of Troy, then the women wept, we laughed, five hundred rabble beat their hands together, and cried: Kill them! But they daren't touch a musketeer. God be with you! You won't see days like that."

"You're very hard on the king, Sir d'Artagnan though you barely know him."

"I? Barely know him? Listen, Raoul, day by day, hour by hour – mark my words! – I can predict exactly what he'll do. Now that the cardinal's dead, he'll worry – which isn't the silliest thing he'd do, especially if he doesn't weep about it."

"And then?"

"Then he'll beg a salary from Sir Fouquet and go to Fontainebleau <sup>13</sup> where he'll compose verses to some Mancini or other, whom the young queen will terrorize. You see, she's Spanish, the new queen, like her mother-in-law Madam Anne of Austria. I know them, the Spaniards of the House of Austria."

"And then?"

"Then having clipped the silver ribbons from the Swiss Guard because they were too expensive he'll dismount the musketeers and put them on foot because hay for horses costs five sous apiece every day."

"Oh, don't say that!"

"What do I care? I'm not a musketeer, am I? Whether they're on horse or afoot, and armed with a sword, a larding pin, or nothing at all, what do I care?"

"Dear Sir d'Artagnan, I beg you, please don't speak any more ill of the king. I'm practically in his service, and my father would be upset with me for hearing, even from your mouth, anything that would offend His Majesty."

"Your father, eh? Yes, he's the knight errant for every lost cause. By my troth! Brave as a Caesar, of course but a man of poor judgement."

"Oh, fine!" said Raoul, laughing. "Now you'll even speak ill of my father, whom you call the great Athos! You're in a foul mood today, and I think wealth makes you as sour as poverty does to others."

"You're right, by God! I'm a cranky old coot in my dotage, a petulant old man. I'm a tent cord unravelled, a cuirass with a hole in it, a boot missing a heel and a spur without a rowel. But listen, just say one thing for me."

"What would that be, Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Just say, 'Mazarin was a peasant.'"

"But he's probably dead!"

"All the more reason! I did say was. If I didn't think he was dead, I'd have said, Mazarin is a peasant. Now come on, say it for my sake."

"All right, I suppose."

"Say it!"

"Mazarin was a peasant," said Raoul, smiling at the musketeer now as cheerful as in the old days.

"All right," said the latter, "that was my first proposition, and here's the conclusion. Repeat after me, Raoul: 'But I'm going to miss him.'"

"Knight!"

"You don't want to say it? Then I'll say it for you: but I'm going to Miss Mazarin."

They were still laughing at this recitation of propositions when one of the shop boys came in. "A letter, Sir," he said, "for Sir d'Artagnan."

"Thank you ... what!" cried the musketeer.

"The handwriting of Sir Count," said Raoul.

"Yes, it is." D'Artagnan tore it open. "Dear friend, says Athos, I just received a request on behalf of the king to send for you ... Me?" said d'Artagnan and he let the paper fall onto the table. Raoul picked it up and continued to read it aloud: "Make haste. His Majesty wants to see you and awaits you at the Louvre."

"Me?" the musketeer repeated.

"Oh ho!" laughed Raoul.

"Oh, no," replied d'Artagnan. "What can this mean?"

317
The King

His first moment of surprise passed, d'Artagnan read the note from Athos again. "It's strange for the king to summon me," he said.

"Why?" said Raoul. "Don't you think, Sir, that the king misses a servant like you?"

"Ho-ho!" laughed the officer though through his teeth. "You throw my words back at me, Master Raoul. If the king missed me, he'd never have let me go. No, no, I see something more here – or less, if you like."

"Or less! What then, Sir Knight?"

"You are young, you are confident and optimistic ... how I'd love to be that way again! To be twenty-four, your brain occupied by thoughts of nothing by women, love, and good prospects. Ah, Raoul! Wait until you've received kings' smiles and queens' secrets, until you've had two cardinals shot out from under you, one a tiger, the other a fox, wait until – but what's the point of this blather? We must part, Raoul!"

"How you say that! Why so solemn?"

"Eh, because the situation warrants it. Listen to me; this is important."

"I'm listening, Sir d'Artagnan."

"You must inform your father of my departure."

"Your departure?"

"By God, yes! You must tell him that I've gone to England to take up residence in my house there."

"You, go to England? But what about the king's orders?"

"Don't be so naïve. Do you imagine that I'm going to report to the Louvre and put myself in the power of that little crowned wolf-cub?"

"Wolf-cub! The king? Are you mad, Sir Knight?"

"On the contrary, I've never been so sane. Don't you know what he wants with me, this worthy son of Louis the Just? God be with me, this is politics – he wants me in the Bastille surely and simply."

"The Bastille? For what?" cried Raoul, suddenly terrified.

"For what I said to him on a certain day in Blois. I was angry, and he hasn't forgotten."

"What did you say to him?"

"I told him he was selfish, cowardly, and a fool."

"Good God!" said Raoul. "Is it possible such words came out of your mouth?"

"Not those words exactly, perhaps but that was the gist of it."

"But the king would have had you arrested right then!"

"By who? I was the commander of the musketeers; I would have had to order myself to be taken to prison, and I would have resisted arresting myself. And then I was off to England, so no more d'Artagnan. But now the cardinal is dead, or as good as, and my return to Paris is known, so they put the grab on me."

"The cardinal protected you?"

"The cardinal knew me and knew what I was good for – and I knew him. We respected each other. But now before confiding his soul to the devil, he'll have advised Anne of Austria to have me safely put away. Go tell your father I've gone, and farewell!"

"No, Sir d'Artagnan," said Raoul with dismay, after glancing out the window. "You're going nowhere."

"Why is that?"

"Because there's an officer of the Swiss waiting for you below."

"So?"

"So, he'll arrest you!"

D'Artagnan burst out in Homeric laughter. "Oh, I know you'll resist him, you'll fight him, you'll even beat him – but then that's rebellion, and as an officer yourself, that's a line you can't cross."

"Devil child! You and your logic!" growled d'Artagnan.

"But I'm right, aren't I?"

"Yes. So instead of going down into the street where this simpleton is waiting for me, I'll duck out the back. I have a horse in the stable, a good one, too; I'll ride him to death, since I can afford to do that now, and by killing horse after horse, I can reach Boulogne in eleven hours. I certainly know the way ... just tell your father one thing."

"What's that?"

"That ... that a certain thing he knows about is hidden at Planchet's except for a fifth of it and that..."

"But, my dear Sir d'Artagnan, if you run, there'll be talk about you that you won't care for."

"Such as?"

"First of all, they'll say you were scared."

"Oh? Who will say that?"

"The king, for one."

"Well! That's no more than the truth. I am scared."

"Second, they'll say you must be guilty."

"Guilty of what?"

"Whatever crimes they accuse you of."

"Probably still true. So, you advise me to get thrown into the Bastille?"

"That's what the Count of La Fère would tell you."

"God's own truth!" said d'Artagnan, considering. "You're right, I won't run for it. But what if they do throw me in the Bastille?"

“Oh, we’ll get you out,” said Raoul with absolute confidence.

“God!” said d’Artagnan, gripping his hand. “I like the way you said that, Raoul – it’s pure Athos, through and through. All right, I’ll obey. Don’t forget my final words.”

“All but a fifth,” said Raoul.

“Indeed, you’re a fine lad, so let me add something to that.”

“Say it!”

“It’s that, if you don’t get me out of the Bastille and I die in there – oh, it could happen! I’d be a terrible prisoner, you know. Anyway, in that event, I leave three fifths to you and one fifth to your father.”

“Knight!”

“And if you want to pay to have some masses said for me, feel free. God be with you!”

That said, d’Artagnan put on his baldric, hung his sword from it, picked out a hat with a fresh feather, and extended his hand to Raoul who threw himself into his arms. On his way out through the store he glanced at the shop-boys, who were watching the scene with a mixture of pride and anxiety. Scooping up a handful of Corinthian raisins, he strolled out toward the officer who was waiting philosophically at the door of the shop. “That face! Can it be you, Herr Friedisch?” said the musketeer cheerfully. “So, now we arrest our friends?”

“Arrested!” whispered the shop-boys to each other.

“Ya, it’s me,” said the Swiss. “God morning, Sir d’Artagnan.”

“Should I give you my sword? I warn you, it’s long and heavy. Let me keep it till we get to the Louvre; I feel awkward walking the streets without a sword, and you’ll be even more awkward with two.”

“The könig said nothing about that,” replied the Swiss, “so taking it yourself.”

“Well, that’s very kind of the king. Let’s be on our way.”

Herr Friedisch wasn’t much of a talker, and d’Artagnan had too much to think about to chat. It wasn’t far from Planchet’s shop to the Louvre, and they were there within ten minutes. By then night had fallen. Friedisch wanted to go in the grand entryway but d’Artagnan said, “No, that’s the long way around; let’s take the King’s Little Stair.”

The Swiss did as he asked and escorted d’Artagnan up to the vestibule outside Louis XIV’s study. Once there, he saluted his prisoner and, without a word, left to return to his duty post. D’Artagnan scarcely had time to wonder why his sword hadn’t been taken from him when the study door opened and a valet announced, “Sir d’Artagnan!”

The musketeer marched in as if on parade, face calm but moustache bristling. The king was sitting at his desk and writing. He didn’t stop when the musketeer’s footsteps sounded on the parquet floor – did not even turn his head. D’Artagnan advanced to the middle of the room and then seeing that the king was paying no attention to him and realising that this was a pretence, a sort of cold preamble to the interrogation he was expecting, he turned his back on the prince and began to run his eyes over the frescoes lining the upper wall and the cracks above in the ceiling. This manoeuvre was accompanied by the following inner monologue: So, you wish to humble me – me who served you since you’re an infant as if you’re my own child and saint himself – that is, for nothing. Just wait then and you’ll see how a man behaves who’s been under fire from the Huguenots and tugged on the beard of the cardinal – the true cardinal!

Louis XIV turned at that moment. “Are you there, Sir D’Artagnan?” he said.

D’Artagnan imitated him and turned as well. “Yes, Sire,” he said.

“Good, wait a moment while I finish adding this up.”

D’Artagnan said nothing, only bowed. That’s polite enough, he thought. I can hardly complain about that. Louis underlined something with a violent stroke and then threw down his pen. Go ahead, work yourself up into a fury, thought the musketeer. That just puts me more at ease. I didn’t fire off all my shot on that day in Blois, as you’ll find out. Louis rose, drew a hand across his forehead, and then stepped forward to face d’Artagnan, giving him a look imperious yet benevolent. What does he want with me? The musketeer thought. Come on, get it over with.

“Sir,” said the king, “you’ve heard by now that the cardinal is dead?”

“Indeed, Sire.”

“And so, you know that I’m now the master in my house?”

“That’s not something that dates from the death of the cardinal, Sire; a man is master in his house whenever he decides to act like it.”

“Yes – but do you remember what you told me in Blois?”

Now we come to it, thought d’Artagnan. I wasn’t wrong. Well, all the better! That shows my wits haven’t gone entirely astray.

“You have nothing to say to me?” said Louis.

“Sire, I think I recall…”

“You only think so?”

“If you don’t remember, I certainly do. Here’s what you told me, so listen carefully.”

“I’m all ears, Sire, as this is a conversation I’m sure to find interesting.”

Louis paused to look again at the musketeer who stroked its feather with one hand, holding his hat in the other, and then turned up the ends of his moustache. Louis XIV continued, “You left my service after telling me what you thought, sir, did you not?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“That is, after giving me your opinion about my ways of thinking and acting. There’s merit in that. You started out by telling me that you’d been serving my family for thirty-four years, and you were tired.”

“I said that, yes, Sire.”

“And then you admitted that this exhaustion’s only a pretext and the real cause’s discontent.”

“I was discontented, it’s true – but this discontent’s never apparent as far as I know and if I spoke out before Your Majesty as a man of spirit, I never even thought those things in front of anyone else.”

“No need for excuses, d’Artagnan, just listen to what I have to say. After reproaching me with your discontent, I answered you with a promise – I said, ‘Wait.’ Isn’t that true?”

“Yes, Sire, as true as what I said.”

“And you replied to me, ‘Wait? No; right now, right away!’ Make no excuses, I tell you – it was natural. But you had no compassion for your prince, Sir d’Artagnan.”

“Sire! Compassion for a king from a poor soldier?”

“You know very well what I’m talking about; you knew I was in need of it. You understood that I wasn’t yet the master, my hope’s in the future. But you responded to me when I spoke of that future: Give me my leave and right away!”

D’Artagnan chewed on his moustache. “That’s true,” he murmured.

“You failed to serve me when I was in distress,” said Louis XIV.

“But,” said d’Artagnan, looking up with a certain nobility, “if I didn’t continue to serve Your Majesty, neither have I betrayed him. I’d shed my blood for nothing; I watched at the door like a dog, knowing I’d never be thrown a bone. But though I had nothing, I asked for nothing from Your Majesty but my leave.”

“I know you’re a good man but I was young and you spared me nothing. And what did you have to reproach your king for? Because he didn’t help Charles II? Or more to the point: because he didn’t marry Miss Mancini?”

And saying this, he fixed the musketeer with a penetrating look. Ah! The latter thought. The devil! He does more than just remember, he guesses.

“Your sentence fell on the king but also on the man,” continued Louis XIV. “But, Sir d’Artagnan, that weakness – you regarded it as a weakness, didn’t you?” D’Artagnan made no response. “You reproached me also in regard to the late cardinal but didn’t Sir Cardinal raise and support me? In the act raising and supporting himself, I’m well aware but still, I benefited from it. An ingrate or an egotist that would you have preferred me to be, to serve me?”

“Sire…”

“Don’t answer that, sir – it’d only cause you regret and further pain me.” D’Artagnan wasn’t convinced. The young king had not made his case by adopting a haughty tone with him. “Have you considered, then?” continued Louis XIV.

“About what, Sire?” asked d’Artagnan politely.

“About all that I’ve said to you, Sir.”

“Yes, Sire, certainly…”

“And you’re just waiting for the right moment before retracting your words?”

“Sire…”

“You hesitate, it seems to me.”

“I don’t understand quite what Your Majesty has the honour to tell me.”

Louis frowned.

“Pardon me, Sire but my mind is rather thick, and things penetrate into it only with difficulty … though it’s true that once they get in there, they stay.”

“Yes, you seem to have a good memory.”

“Almost as good as Your Majesty’s.”

“Then give me a quick summary, as my time is valuable. What have you been doing with your leave?”

“Raising my ransom, Sire.”

“A crude way to put it, Sir d’Artagnan.”

“Your Majesty may think so, certainly. I have nothing but respect for the king, and if I speak crudely, after a life spent in the camps and the barracks, His Majesty is too far above me to take offense at the blunt speech of a soldier.”

“In fact, I know that you pulled off a brilliant affair in England, Sir. I only regret that you broke your promise thereby.”

“Me?” cried d’Artagnan.

“No doubt about it. You pledged to serve no other prince once you left my service – but it was for King Charles II that you planned the amazing abduction of Sir Monck.”

“On the contrary, Sire, I did it for myself.”

“And did you succeed?”

“Like the mercenary captains of the fifteenth century, with a surprise attack.”

“What do you call success? A fortune?”

“A hundred thousand crowns, Sire, in my possession. It was, in one week, three times what I’d made in the previous fifty years.”

“A round sum indeed – but you’re ambitious, are you not?”

“Me, Sire? A quarter of that seems a treasure to me, and I swear I have no thought of increasing it.”

“Ah! You plain to remain idle?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Give up the sword?”

“I’ve already done it.”

“Impossible, Sir d’Artagnan,” Louis said firmly.

“But, Sire…”

“Well?”

“Why?”

“Because I don’t wish it!” said the young prince in a voice so grave, imperious that d’Artagnan started in surprise, and some anxiety.

"Will Your Majesty allow me a response?" he asked.

"Speak."

"I made my resolution when I was poor and destitute."

"Indeed. And after?"

"Now that I've acquired some wealth by my efforts, would Your Majesty take from me my freedom? Would Your Majesty condemn me to labour for what I've already earned?"

"Who gave you the right, Sir, to question my plans or define my purview?" replied Louis testily. "Who told you what I can do, and what you can do with yourself?"

"Sire," the musketeer said calmly, "it seems to me that frankness no longer orders our conversation, as it did on the day we cleared the air in Blois."

"No, Sir; everything is changed."

"I offer Your Majesty my sincere congratulations but..."

"But you don't believe it?"

"I'm not great statesman but I keep my eye on affairs, Sire, and I can't say I see things as Your Majesty does. The reign of Mazarin is over but that of the financiers now begins. They have all the money, and Your Majesty won't see much of it. To live under the jaws of these hungry wolves will be hard for a man who'd hoped for independence."

Just then someone scratched at the study door and the king raised his head proudly. "Excuse me, Sir d'Artagnan," he said, "but Sir Colbert's come to make his report. Come in, Sir Colbert."

D'Artagnan stepped back into a corner. Colbert entered, papers in his hand, and approached the king. It goes without saying that the Gascon didn't lose the opportunity to give this newcomer a close inspection. "Is the inquiry complete?" the king asked Colbert.

"Yes, Sire."

"And the conclusion of the magistrates?"

"Is that the accused merit confiscation and death?"

"Ah," said the king impassively but with a glance at d'Artagnan. "And your opinion, Sir Colbert?" the king asked.

Colbert looked at d'Artagnan in his turn. That intimidating figure froze the words on his lips. Louis XIV understood. "Don't worry," he said, "this is Sir d'Artagnan; surely you recognise Sir d'Artagnan?"

The two men regarded each other for a moment, d'Artagnan's bold eye open and almost challenging, Colbert's eyes half-closed, his expression veiled. The frank bravura of the first nettled the second, while the calculating caution of the financier irritated the soldier. "Ah!" said Colbert. "Sir is he who achieved that brilliant coup in England."

And he bowed slightly to d'Artagnan. "Ah!" said the Gascon. "Sir is he who trimmed the silver from the ribbons of the Swiss – a brilliant exploit of thrift!"

And he bowed deeply. The financier had thought to put the musketeer in his place but the musketeer had upstaged the financier. "Sir d'Artagnan," said the king who had not caught all the nuances of the exchange, none of which would have escaped Mazarin. "The accused are corrupt tax-farmers who have robbed me, have been caught, and whom I will sentence to death."

D'Artagnan started. "Oh!" he said.

"You have something to say?"

"Nothing, Sire; this is no business of mine."

The king was already holding the pen and applying it to the paper. "Sir," said Colbert in a low voice, "I must warn Your Majesty that these executions will be troublesome though an example's necessary."

"Explain," said Louis XIV.

"It must be taken into account," Colbert continued calmly, "that to accuse these traitors is to accuse the Office of the Superintendent. These two culprits in particular are friends of a powerful personage and the hanging of such, when they'd usually just serve a brief and comfortable confinement in the Châtelet, is bound to cause trouble."

Louis flushed and turned to d'Artagnan who gnawed lightly at his moustache and with a smile of pity for the financier but also for the king who had to listen to him. Then Louis seized the pen and affixed his signature to the bottoms of the 2 papers with a rapid movement of his trembling hand, presented them to Colbert, and then said, looking him in the face, "Sir Colbert, when you speak to me of affairs, leave out any mention of mere trouble – and as for the word impossible, never use it."

Colbert bowed, hurt and humiliated at have been given a lesson in front of the musketeer. He turned to leave but then, eager to repair his mistake, he said, "I forgot to announce to Your Majesty that the confiscations come to five million livres."

That's not bad, thought d'Artagnan.

"Which makes my total assets...?" asked the king.

"Eighteen million livres, Sire," replied Colbert with a bow.

"God be with you!" d'Artagnan grunted. "That's lovely!"

"Sir Colbert," added the king, "on your way out, please cross the gallery where Sir Lyonne is waiting and ask him to bring me the document I ordered him to draw up."

"Right away, Sire. Has Your Majesty any further need of me this evening?"

"No, Sir; farewell!"

"Let's return to our business, Sir d'Artagnan," said Louis XIV, as if nothing had happened. "You see that, as for money, the situation is considerably changed."

"From zero to eighteen million," replied the musketeer cheerily. "Ah, that's what Your Majesty would have needed on the day Charles II came to Blois. The two states wouldn't be at odds today, for I must say that there I see a stumbling block."

"In that I think you're unjust, Sir," Louis replied, "for if Providence had allowed me to give my brother a million on that day, you wouldn't have left my service and made your fortune, as you just explained. But there's more good news to relate, as my relations with England are in no state to worry you."

The valet entered, interrupting the king, to announce Sir de Lyonne. "Come in, Sir," said the king. "You're punctual – I like that in a servant. Let me see the letter to my brother Charles II." D'Artagnan pricked up his ears. "One moment, Sir," Louis said nonchalantly to the Gascon. "I must send to London my consent to the marriage of my brother Philippe, Sir Duke of Orléans with Lady Henrietta Stuart, sister of King Charles."

"He certainly is knocking me about," murmured d'Artagnan, while the king signed the letter and dismissed Sir de Lyonne, "but, my faith, the more he knocks me about this way, the better I like it."

The king followed Sir de Lyonne with his eyes until the door was shut behind him; he even took three steps as if to follow his minister but stopped, paused, and returned to the musketeer. "Now, Sir," he said, "let's wrap this up. You told me that day in Blois that you're not wealthy?"

"I am now, Sire."

"Yes but that doesn't concern me – that's money you earned on your account, not mine."

"I don't really understand what Your Majesty is trying to tell me."

"All right, since you mean to drag the words out of me, answer this then: will you take twenty thousand livres a year in cash as your salary?"

"But, sire..." said d'Artagnan, eyes widening.

"Add in four horses furnished and maintained, plus repayment of all expenses as they arise – or would you rather have forty thousand without expenses? Tell me."

"Sire ... Your Majesty..."

"Yes, you're surprised, that's natural, and I expected it – but answer me or I'll think you no longer have the quick wits I've always appreciated in you."

"Sire, twenty thousand livres a year is a fair salary, a fine sum but..."

"No but's. Yes or no: is this an honourable offer?"

"Oh, certainly..."

"Then you're satisfied! Well and good. You'd really be better off reckoning the expenses separately but you can arrange all that with Colbert. Now, let's move on to more important matters."

"But sire, I told Your Majesty..."

"That you want to rest, I'm well aware of it. But I told you that's not what I want. I'm the master here, aren't I?"

"Yes, Sire."

"All right, then. Now you're on your way to becoming Captain of the Musketeers?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Well! Here's your signed promotion. I'll just put it in this drawer. The day you return from a certain mission I'll entrust to you, you can take this promotion out yourself." D'Artagnan looked down, hesitating. "Come, Sir," said the king, "am I to think you don't know that the Captain-Lieutenant of Musketeers outranks all the Marshals of France at the Court of the Most Religious King?"

"I know it, Sire."

"Then, am I to take it that you don't trust my word?"

"Oh, Sire, never that!"

"I wanted to prove to you that you, a good servant, had lost a good master. Am I, now, more like the master you required?"

"I begin to think so, Sire."

"Then, Sir, you will resume your duties. Your company has declined since you left, the men swaggering about and fighting in the taverns, despite my edicts and those of my father. You will restore discipline to the company as soon as possible."

"Yes, Sire."

"You will not leave me again."

"Fine."

"You will march with me when the army marches, and camp beside my tent."

"Well, Sire," said d'Artagnan, "if all you want from me is that kind of service, there's no point in paying me twenty thousand livres a year; I'll scarcely earn it."

"I wish you to maintain a proper household; I wish you to entertain at your table; I want my Captain of Musketeers to be person of consequence."

"And I don't like found money," said d'Artagnan abruptly. "I prefer to earn it! Your Majesty offers me an idle living that any officer you choose would perform for four thousand livres. "

"Ever the Gascon, Sir d'Artagnan. Of course, there's more to it than that, and I see I must reveal my secret."

"What! Your Majesty has a secret?"

"Yes, Sir."

"That's different! In that case, I accept the twenty thousand, for I can keep a secret, and discretion is priceless. Would Your Majesty care to share it now?"

"Grab your boots, Sir d'Artagnan, and saddle your horse."

"Right now?"

"Within two days."

"That's as well, Sire, because I have affairs to settle before I depart, especially if the matter might come to blows."

"It very well might."

"I can handle that. But, Sire, you've addressed pay, and promotion, and you've spoken to d'Artagnan's heart but there's one thing you forgot."

"What's that?"

"You didn't address my vanity; when will I be a knight of a royal order?"

"That matters to you?"

"Well, yes. My friend Athos is encrusted with orders, and I'm envious."

"You'll be knighted at my command one month after your promotion to captain."

"Ah!" said the officer thoughtfully. "After the mission."

"Exactly."

"Where is Your Majesty sending me then?"

"Do you know Brittany?"

"No, Sire."

"Any friends there?"

"In Brittany? Faith, no!"

"All the better. Are you familiar with fortifications?"

D'Artagnan smiled. "You could say that, Sire."

"That is, you can tell a full fortress from a mere fortified château, such as we allow to our vassals?"

"I would no more mistake a fort for a rampart than I would confuse a cuirass with a pie crust. Will that do, Sire?"

"Yes, Sir. Then that's where you'll go."

"To Brittany?"

"Yes."

"Alone?"

"Completely alone. In this case, you can't even take a lackey."

"May I ask Your Majesty why?"

"Because, Sir, you may find it useful to assume the guise of a servant of a noble house. Your face is well known in France, Sir d'Artagnan."

"And then, Sire?"

"And then you will travel through Brittany and carefully examine the region's fortifications."

"Along the coast?"

"And the isles."

"Ah!"

"You will begin with Belle-Île-en-Mer."

"Meaning with Sir Fouquet?" said d'Artagnan in a serious tone and giving Louis XIV a significant look.

"I believe you're right, Sir – Belle-Île does, in fact, belong to Sir Fouquet."

"Then Your Majesty wishes me to determine if Belle-Île is being fortified?"

"Yes."

"If the fortifications are new or old?"

"Precisely."

"And if by chance the superintendent's retainers are numerous enough to form a garrison?"

"That's exactly what I wish, Sir – you've put your finger on it."

"And if it isn't being fortified, Sire?"

"You will travel around Brittany, keeping your eyes and ears open."

D'Artagnan twisted his moustache. "So, I'm a king's spy," he said slowly.

"No, Sir."

"Pardon but it seems so, Sire, since I'm spying on behalf of Your Majesty."

"This is a scouting mission, Sir. Would you lead your musketeers, sword in hand, toward an unknown enemy's position?"

At these last words d'Artagnan flinched imperceptibly. "Do you still think you're a spy?" continued the king.

"No," said d'Artagnan thoughtfully, "the nature of it changes when we're scouting an enemy; then we're just acting the soldier. And if Belle-Île is being fortified?" he quickly added.

"You will acquire an exact plan of the fortifications."

"Will I be able to get in?"

"That's not my affair, that's your business. Didn't you hear me offer you an extra twenty thousand livres a year if you want it?"

"All right, Sire. But what if no fortification is under way?"

"You'll come home quietly with a well-rested horse."

"Sire, I'm ready."

"You start tomorrow by going to the superintendent's estate to call for the first quarter of the salary I'm paying you. Do you know Sir Fouquet?"

"Not well, Sire but I should say to Your Majesty that it doesn't seem important that I meet him."

"Not so, Sir, because he'll refuse you the money I want you to demand, and that refusal is what I'm waiting for."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. "And afterwards, Sire?"

"Once your salary is refused, you'll go and get it from Sir Colbert. By the way, do you have a good horse?"

"An excellent one, Sire."

"How much did you pay for it?"

"One hundred fifty pistoles."

"I'll buy it from you. Here are two hundred pistoles. "

"But I'll need a horse to travel, Sire."

"Well?"

"Well! You just bought mine from me."

"Not at all – on the contrary, I give it to you. Only now that he's mine rather than yours, I'm sure you won't spare him."

"Your Majesty is in haste?"

"Great haste."

"Why should I wait two days then?"

"Two reasons that concern me."

"That's different. The horse can make up the two days in the first week and there's the post after that."

"No, using the post is too obvious, Sir d'Artagnan. Go, keep a low profile, and remember you belong to me."

"Sire, I've never forgotten it! At what time, the day after tomorrow, shall I take my leave of Your Majesty?"

"Where are you living?"

"Henceforth I live at the Louvre."

"Not at the moment. Keep your lodging in town and I'll pay for it. As for your departure, it should be at night, since you must leave unseen by anyone – or if seen, without anyone knowing you're travelling for me. Keep silent, Sir."

"Your Majesty spoils everything that's been said by giving such an order."

"I must ask where you're staying, because I can't always send for you through the Count of La Fère."

"I'm staying with Sir Planchet, grocer, Rue des Lombards, under the sign of the Golden Pestle."

"Go out very little, show yourself less, and wait for my orders."

"Yet I must go out some, Sire."

"That's true but only to the superintendent's; where so many others go, you can lose yourself among the crowd."

"I'll need a note to draw the salary, Sire."

"Here it is."

The king signed it. D'Artagnan looked it over to make sure it was in order. "That's real money," he said, "or at least the paper for it."

"Farewell, Sir d'Artagnan," the king added. "I think you understand me now?"

"I understand that Your Majesty sends me to Belle-Île-en-Mer, that's all."

"To find out?"

"To find out what Sir Fouquet is building – that's all."

"Good. What if you're captured?"

"I admit no such possibility," replied the Gascon boldly.

"What if you're killed?"

"Not likely, Sire."

"In the first case, say nothing; in the second case, make sure you have nothing written down."

D'Artagnan shrugged and took his leave of the king without ceremony, saying to himself, "The English rain continues! Let's stay under the downspout."

The Houses of Sir Fouquet

As d'Artagnan was returning to Planchet's house, his head bursting with recent events and new responsibilities, a scene of another sort was taking place, though it wasn't all that different from the conversation between the musketeer and the king. But this scene took place outside Paris in a house owned by Superintendent Fouquet in the village of Saint-Mandé. The minister had just arrived at this country house followed by his first clerk, who carried an enormous portfolio full of papers, some to examine and others to sign. As it was about five o'clock in the evening, the masters had already dined, and supper was being prepared for twenty lesser guests. The superintendent didn't pause upon alighting from his carriage; he hastened in through the front door, crossed the antechambers and reached his office, where he declared he was shutting himself in to work and no one was to disturb him for anything less than an order from the king. After giving this command, Fouquet closed the door behind him, and two footmen took their places as sentries at his door. Inside, Fouquet threw a bolt that slid a panel across the entry that prevented anything that took place in his office from being seen or heard. Surprisingly, Fouquet then began to follow through on his announcement, for he went straight to his desk, sat down, opened the portfolio, and began to sort through the enormous stack of papers it contained. After taking these precautions not to be disturbed, he'd been at work no more than ten minutes when he heard repeated knocks, equally spaced that seemed to attract his attention. Fouquet raised his head, cocked his ear, and listened. The knocking continued. Then the minister arose with a slight gesture of impatience and walked straight to a mirror from which the knocking emanated whether by hand or unseen mechanism. It was a tall mirror set in a wall panel. 3 other identical mirrors were placed symmetrically around the office walls. Nothing distinguished this one from the others but doubtless the taps from behind it were a signal and as Fouquet approached it, listening, the sound of evenly spaced rapping resumed. "Oh ho!" murmured the superintendent in surprise. "Who can be there? I was expecting no one today." Then apparently in response to the signal, the superintendent pulled thrice and released a golden knob on the mirror's mounting. Then he returned to his desk, sat back down, and said, "Faith, let them wait." And plunging himself back into the ocean of paper stacked in waves before him, he seemed to think of nothing but work. In fact, with incredible rapidity and marvellous clarity, Fouquet reviewed the longest reports, correcting and annotating them with pen flying, and, carried away as if by a fever, the work melted away before him, signatures, calculations, and notations made as if ten clerks at once, with a hundred fingers and ten brains, were doing the work instead of a single man. The only pause was when, from time to time, Fouquet looked up from his work to glance at a clock placed on the desk before him. The reason for this was that Fouquet had set himself the task of one hour's work, setting out to accomplish in that time what another would finish in an entire day. And so long as he wasn't disturbed, he felt confident of achieving that goal. But in the midst of this furious work, the regular taps from behind the mirror came again, more hurried this time, and therefore sounding more urgent. "Come, it seems the lady is impatient," said Fouquet. "Calmly now, let's see: it must be the countess. But no, the countess is at Rambouillet for three days. Madam President then. Ah but the President wouldn't presume to be so insistent, she'd knock humbly and then await my good pleasure. I don't know who it can be – but I know who it can't be, and since it isn't the marquise, devil take the others!" And he continued his work, despite the repeated calls of the knocker. However, impatience conquered Fouquet at last after another quarter of an hour. He raced through the remainder of his work, stuffed the papers back in the portfolio, and glaring at the mirror, whence the rapping came more urgently than ever, he said, "Oh! What's the source of this passion? What's happened and who's the Ariadne tugging so impatiently at that thread? Let's find out." And he pushed with the tip of his finger on a knob parallel to the one he'd pulled earlier. Immediately the mirror pivoted like a door, opening to reveal a deep closet into which the superintendent disappeared, as if into a magic box. Inside, he pushed another knob that opened, not a wooden panel but a slab of the wall, and he passed through this new doorway, leaving it to close itself behind him. Fouquet then descended about twenty steps down a spiral staircase, where below surface level he found a long underground passage, the way lit by hidden vents. The walls were faced with stone slabs and the floor was carpeted. This subterranean corridor passed under the street that separated Fouquet's house from the Park of Vincennes. At the end of the passage was a staircase matching the one by which Fouquet had descended. He climbed the second staircase, pressed a knob to open a door into a closet similar to the one in his office, and from this closet emerged into a room that was deserted, though furnished with great elegance. Once inside the room he examined its mirror door to make sure that it showed no trace of its function when closed, and then, seemingly satisfied, he unlocked, with a small vermeil key, the triple locks of a door in the opposite wall. This time the door opened onto a lovely and sumptuously furnished room in which sat on a cushioned chair a woman of supreme beauty who rose and ran toward Fouquet at the sound of his entry. "My God!" cried the latter, recoiling in astonishment. "Madam Marquise of Bellière, you – here!"

"Yes," murmured the marquise, "yes, it's me, Sir."

"Marquise, dear Marquise," said Fouquet, almost falling at her feet. "Ah! My God! But how did you come here? And I, I made you wait!"

"For a long time, Sir, oh! A very long time."

"I'm happy to think such a wait seemed long to you, Marquise!"

"An eternity, Sir. I rang more than twenty times – didn't you hear?"

"Marquise, you are pale, you're trembling."

"Didn't you hear me calling you?"

"Yes, I heard you, Madam but I couldn't come. And how could I imagine that it was you, after your harshness and refusals? If I'd been able to suspect the happiness that awaited me, believe me, Marquise, I would have left everything to fall at your knees, as I do at this moment."

The marquise looked around her. "Are we alone, Sir?" she asked.

"Oh, yes, Madam! I can answer for that."

"Really?" said the marquise sadly.

"You sigh? But why?"

"All these mysteries, all these precautions," said the marquise with some bitterness. "As if you were afraid of anyone suspecting your loves."

"Would you prefer their being conducted in public?"

"Oh, no – not for a man of such delicacy," said the marquise with a smile.

"Come, come, Marquise, no reproaches, I beg of you!"

"Reproaches! Do I have a right to make any?"

"No, unfortunately for me. But tell me, you who for a year I've loved without return and without hope..."

"You're mistaken: without hope, it's true but not without return."

"Ah but for me, with love, there's only one proof, and I still await it."

"I've come to bring it to you, Sir."

Fouquet tried to take the marquise in his arms but she disengaged herself with a gesture. "Will you always make that mistake and refuse to accept from me the only thing I can give you: my devotion, sir?"

"Ah, then you don't love me – for devotion is only a virtue, while love is a passion."

"Listen to me, Sir, I beg you, for I wouldn't have come here without a serious reason, as I'm sure you know."

"I don't care what the reason is so long as you're here, so long as I see you and talk with you."

"Yes, you're right, the important thing is that I'm here, where no one can see me, and where I can talk with you."

Fouquet fell on his knees before her. "Speak, speak, Madam," he said. "I listen!"

The marquise looked at Fouquet there on his knees, and in her expression there was a strange mixture of love and melancholy. "Oh!" she murmured at last. "If I could be the one who had the right to see you every minute, to speak with you whenever I wanted! How I wish I was the one to watch over you, that I didn't need to tug on wires to summon you and conjure up, like a sylph, the man she loves, though only for an hour before he disappears back into the shadows, a mystery even stranger when he leaves than when he came. Oh, she must be a very happy woman."

"Are you speaking, by chance, of my wife, Marquise?" said Fouquet with a smile.

"Yes, I speak of her."

"Well! Don't envy her, Marquise; of all the women with whom I have relations, Madam Fouquet is the one who sees me the least, speaks with me the least, and is the least in my confidence."

"At least, Sir, she's not reduced, as I am, to pulling a knob on a mirror to call for you; at least you don't reply to her summons by that awful clanging that comes from I know not where; at least you haven't forbidden her to seek the secret of those communications upon pain of never seeing you again, as you've forbidden those who came before me and will come here after me."

"Ah, you're unjust, dear Marquise, and mistaken in complaining about mystery when it's by mystery alone that one can love without trouble, and only by love without trouble can one be genuinely happy. But let's return to you, Marquise, to this devotion of which you spoke while trying to deceive me that devotion is actually love."

"A moment ago," replied the marquise, passing over her eyes a hand that modelled the perfect contours of antiquity, "I was ready to speak with clarity and boldness but now I'm confused, troubled, and trembling, afraid to bring you bad news."

"If it's bad news that brought you to me, Marquise, then that news, however bad, is welcome – but instead, since you're here, since you admit you're not completely indifferent to me, set aside the bad news and speak only of yourself."

"No, no, on the contrary, ask it of me, demand it immediately, so I won't be distracted by sentiment. Fouquet, my friend, it's of immense importance."

"You astound me, Marquise – more than that, you make me almost afraid, seeing you so serious, so preoccupied, you who understand so well the world in which we live. It's serious then?"

"Oh, very serious! Listen."

"But first, how did you come here?"

"I'll tell you later; first, to business."

"Speak, Marquise! Pardon my impatience, I beg."

"You know that Sir Colbert has been appointed a financial intendant?"

"Bah! Colbert, the little Colbert?"

"Yes, the little Colbert."

"The factotum of Sir de Mazarin?"

"Exactly."

"Well! What do you see frightening in that, dear Marquise? Little Colbert an intendant, that's surprising, I admit but it isn't terrible."

"Do you think that the king has given that man whom you call a little pen-pusher, such a position without an urgent reason?"

"First, is it really true the king gave him that appointment?"

"So they say."

"So who says?"

"Everyone."

"Everyone, that's the same as no one. Name me someone well informed who says it."

"Madam Vanel."

"Ah! Now you do begin to frighten me," said Fouquet with a smile. "If anyone is well informed, or ought to be, it's she."

"Don't speak ill of poor Marguerite, Sir Fouquet, not when she still loves you."

"Bah! Really? Unbelievable. I thought that little Colbert, as you called him, had trodden all over that love and covered it with his own tracks."

"Fouquet, Fouquet, is that how you are toward those you've given up?"

"Come, are you going to take the side of Madam Vanel, Marquise?"

"Yes, I am, because as I repeat, she still loves you – and the proof is she wants to save you."

"Through you, Marquise that is clever of her. No guardian angel could be more appealing to me and lead me more surely to salvation. But tell me, how do you know Marguerite?"

"We were at convent together."

"And you say she's the one who told you Sir Colbert had been appointed an intendant?"

"Yes."

"Well! Enlighten me, marquise: here is Sir Colbert, made an intendant; in what way can an intendant, in other words one of my subordinates, my clerk if you'll – how'd he be a threat to me even if he is Sir Colbert?"

"It seems to me you're overlooking something, Sir," replied the marquise.

"What?"

"This: that Sir Colbert hates you."

"Hates me!" cried Fouquet. "My God, Marquise, where have you been keeping yourself? Everyone hates me – he's just one of the many."

"This one more than the others."

"That's as may be."

"He is ambitious."

"Who isn't, Marquise?"

"Yes but his ambition knows no limits."

"So we see, since he tried to follow me with Madam Vanel."

"And he succeeded, so take care."

"Do you think he presumes to advance from intendant to superintendent?"

"Don't you already fear that?"

"Ho-ho!" laughed Fouquet. "To succeed me with Madam Vanel is all very well but to win favour with the king is another thing. France is not won over so easily as an accountant's wife."

"Everything has its price, Sir – if not in gold, then in power."

"You are evidence to the contrary, Madam – you, to whom I've offered millions."

"I don't need your millions, Fouquet, I need love, true and absolute – that I would have accepted. You see, everything can be bought, if not by one thing, then by another."

"So, Sir Colbert, as you see it, is bargaining to take my place as superintendent? Come, Marquise, don't be concerned, he's not nearly rich enough to buy that position."

"But what if, instead, he steals it?"

"Ah! That's another thing entirely. Unfortunately for him, before he can reach me in my central keep, he has to breach all the outer defences – and I'm devilishly well-fortified, Marquise."

"And what you call the outer defences are your retainers, aren't they? Your friends?"

"Exactly."

"And is Sir d'Emerys one of your retainers?"

"Yes."

"And is Sir Lyodot one of your friends?"

"Certainly."

"Sir de Vanin?"

"Oh, they can do what they like with Sir Vanin but..."

"But...?"

"But they'd better not touch the others."

"Well! If you don't want anyone to touch Gentlemen d'Emerys and Lyodot, you'd better stand to arms."

"Who's threatening them?"

"Will you listen to me now?"

"Intently, Marquise."

"Without interruption?"

"Speak."

"Well! This morning, Marguerite sent for me."

"Oh?"

"Yes."

"And what did she want?"

"I dare not go to Sir Fouquet myself," she said to me."

"Bah! Why? Did she think I'd reproach her? Poor woman, she's wrong, God knows."

"You go to him and tell him to beware of Sir Colbert."

"What, she wants to warn me about her own lover?"

"I told you she still loves you."

"And then, Marquise?"

"Sir Colbert," she added, 'visited me two hours ago to inform me he'd been made an intendant."

"I've already told you, Marquise, that Sir Colbert is no threat to me as my subordinate."

"Yes but that's not all: Marguerite is friends, as you know, with Madam d'Emerys and Madam Lyodot."

"Yes."

"Well! Sir Colbert asked her a lot of probing questions about those two gentlemen, and their degree of devotion to you."

"Oh, I'd answer for those two absolutely. You'd have to kill them to separate them from me."

"Then Madam Vanel was obliged to receive a visitor, leaving Sir Colbert for a few minutes, and since Colbert never wastes a moment, the new intendant took out a pencil and began making some notes on a pad on the table."

"Notes about d'Emerys and Lyodot?"

"Exactly."

"I'd be curious to know what those notes said."

"That's just what I've come to bring you."

"Madam Vanel got hold of Colbert's notes and sent them through you?"

"No but by a lucky chance that feels like a miracle, she got a copy of those notes."

"How?"

"Listen. I told you that Colbert had found a writing pad on the table?"

"Yes."

"And that he'd taken a pencil from his pocket?"

"Yes."

"And used it to write on the paper?"

"Yes."

"Well! This was a hard pencil, of graphite, and when it wrote on the top sheet it made an impression on the one below, an invisible imprint in white."

"And then?"

"Colbert, in tearing off the first sheet, didn't think about the second."

"Well?"

"Well! On the second, with care one could read what had been written on the first. Madam Vanel read it and then sent for me."

"Ah!"

"Then, after making sure I was devoted to your interests, she gave me the paper and explained to me the secret of this house."

"And this paper?" said Fouquet, anxious despite himself.

"Here it is, Sir; read it," said the marquise.

Fouquet continued: "The first two to death, the third to be dismissed, with Gentlemen d'Hautemont and de La Valette whose property will only be confiscated. Good God!" cried Fouquet. "To death – to death, Lyodot and d'Emerys! ... But even if the Court of Justice condemns them to death, the king would never authorise their condemnation and they couldn't be executed without the king's signature."

"But the king appointed Sir Colbert an intendant."

"Oh!" cried Fouquet, as if he suddenly saw an abyss opening beneath his feet. "Impossible! Impossible! But who has rubbed pencil lead across Sir Colbert's impressions?"

"Me. I was afraid the first line would fade."

"Now, I must know everything."

"You will learn nothing, Sir, as long as you continue to despise your enemy as you do."

"Pardon me, dear Marquise, excuse me. Yes, Sir Colbert is my enemy, I believe that now. Yes, Sir Colbert is a man to fear, I admit it. But ... but I still have time and since you're here, assure me of your devotion, show me your love, and we're alone..."

"I came here to save you, Sir Fouquet, not to lose myself," said the marquise, rising. "So, take care."

"Marquise, really, you're too frightened by this, unless your fright is just a pretext..."

"He's brilliant, this Sir Colbert, and very deep! Take care..."

Fouquet arose as well. "And I?" he asked.

"Oh, you! You have only a noble heart. Take care. Take care!"

"So, now?"

"Now, my friend, I've done what I had to do, at the risk of losing my reputation. Farewell!"

"Not farewell but au revoir!"

"Perhaps," said the marquise. And giving Fouquet her hand to kiss, she marched so resolutely toward the door that Fouquet didn't dare to bar her passage. As for Fouquet, he returned, head bowed and forehead clouded, through his underground passage along which ran the copper wires that communicated from one house to the other, transmitting, on either side of the matching mirrors, the calls and responses of the unseen correspondents.

Abbot Fouquet

Fouquet hurried home by the subterranean passage and triggered the spring to swing open the mirror. He was scarcely back in his office when he heard a knock at the door and a familiar voice called out, "Open up, My Lord, I beg you, open up."

Fouquet quickly restored some order to his desk so nothing would indicate his brief absence. He spread out some papers, took up a pen, and to gain a little time, said loudly, "Who's there?"

"What! My Lord doesn't recognise me?" the voice replied.

"Of course, I know you, my friend," Fouquet said to himself. Then aloud: "Isn't that Gourville?"

"But yes, my Lord."

Fouquet rose, glanced at himself in one of the mirrors, went to the door, slid the bolt open, and Gourville came in. "Ah, My Lord!" he said. "What cruelty!"

"Why?"

"I've spent a quarter of an hour begging you to open, and you never even answered me."

"Once and for all, you know quite well that I don't want to be disturbed when I'm working. Now, you may be an exception, Gourville but I want everyone else to respect that rule."

"My Lord, at this moment orders, doors, locks, and walls mean nothing to me, I'd smash them all."

"Oh? So, this is important?" asked Fouquet.

"I should say so, My Lord!" said Gourville.

"Tell me what's happened," said Fouquet, moved by the distress of Gourville, his closest confidant.

"There's a secret Court of Justice, My Lord."

"I know about that; but has it convened, Gourville?"

"It's not only convened, it's passed a sentence, My Lord."

"A sentence!" said the superintendent with a shudder and pallor he couldn't hide. "Against whom?"

"Against two of your friends."

"Lyodot and d'Emerys, isn't it?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"But sentenced to what?"

"Sentenced to death."

"Condemned! Oh but you must be mistaken, Gourville, it's impossible."

"Here's a copy of the sentence that the king is to sign today, if he hasn't already."

Fouquet grabbed the paper, read it, and returned it to Gourville. "The king will never sign it," he said.

Gourville shook his head. "Don't fool yourself, My Lord; that Sir Colbert is a bold official."

"Sir Colbert again!" cried Fouquet. "That! Why does his name keep tormenting my ears? He's too trivial a man, Gourville, to drive an affair of this weight. Let Sir Colbert appear, and I'll face him; let him raise his head, and I'll crush him; but you understand that I must have a light to see him by, and a platform upon which to stand."

"Steady, my Lord, you underestimate this Colbert. Watch out, for this grim financier's like one of those meteors that one barely glimpses before it strikes from above; by the time we see it coming, it's too late."

"Oh, Gourville, that's too much!" said Fouquet, smiling. "Pardon me, my friend, if I decline to panic. Sir Colbert, a meteor! God! We'll see him coming. Show me his words and deeds; what's he done?"

"He's ordered two gallows from the Paris Executioner," Gourville said simply.

Fouquet raised his head and his eyes flashed. "Are you sure about this?" he said.

"Here's the proof, my Lord."

And Gourville handed the superintendent a note copied by one of the secretaries at the Hôtel de Ville who was in Fouquet's pay. "Yes, it's true," murmured the minister. "The scaffold's ordered ... but the king's not signed, Gourville, and the king won't sign."

"We'll know that soon enough," said Gourville.

"How so?"

"If the king has signed the condemnations, the gallows will be delivered to the Hôtel de Ville tonight so they can be erected in the morning."

"But no, no!" Fouquet said, still in denial. "You're all wrong, and I'd be a fool to believe it. Lyodot came to see me just yesterday morning, and three days ago I received a cargo of Syracuse juice from our good d'Emerys."

"What does that prove?" Gourville replied. "Other than that the Court of Justice met secretly, deliberated in the absence of the accused, and then had them arrested."

"So, they've been arrested?"

"Indeed."

"But when and how were they arrested?"

"Lyodot, yesterday at dawn; d'Emerys, in the evening of the day before, when he was returning from his mistress's house. No one noticed their disappearance until Colbert lifted the mask and had it publicized; it's being shouted now in every street in Paris, and truly, My Lord, there's hardly anyone but you who hasn't heard it."

Fouquet circled the room, pacing ever more anxiously. "What have you decided, My Lord?" said Gourville.

"If this is so, I should go to the king," said Fouquet. "But on the way to the Louvre, I'll stop at the Hôtel de Ville. If the orders have been signed, we'll find out there!"

Gourville shrugged. "Incredulity!" he said. "It's the plague of all great minds."

"Gourville! Really!"

"Yes," he continued. "Too slow to believe, then the truth's upon you and it's all over in an instant."

"Let's go," said Fouquet. "On our way, Gourville."

"Not so fast," said the latter. "Abbot Fouquet* is outside."

"My brother's here?" replied Fouquet with some chagrin. "He's come to bring me more bad news as usual? Devil! If my brother has come, things are bad indeed. You'd have told me sooner, I'd have been more easily persuaded."

"My Lord slanders him," said Gourville, laughing. "If he's come, it's not with bad intent."

"Are you his apologist?" said Fouquet. "For a man without a heart, a head without ideas, and a belly that's never full?"

"He just knows you have money."

"And would spend it all if he could. He'd happily ruin me."

"No, he only wants to fill his own purse."

"A hundred thousand crowns a month for the past two years! Enough, already! God! That's what I pay, Gourville, and I know my own accounts."

Gourville laughed behind his hand. "Yes, I know what you mean – it's the king who pays, not the superintendent. But that's an ugly joke, Gourville, and this isn't the time for it."

"Don't be angry, my Lord."

"No? Then send Abbot Fouquet away, I don't have a sou to spare. He's left me alone for a month – why couldn't he leave me be for another?"

Gourville moved toward the door. "Perhaps he's tired of bad company," he said, "and prefers you to his bandits."

"When he needs to pay them! It's strange, Gourville, to hear you act as advocate for Abbot Fouquet."

"Eh, all things and all men have their good side, My Lord – that is, their useful side."

"The bandits who feed and drink at the abbot's trough are useful? I'd like to see some proof."

"When the time comes, My Lord, you'll be glad to have these bandits at hand."

"Then, you advise me to stay on the abbot's good side?" said Fouquet ironically.

"I advise you, My Lord, not to turn away a hundred or so ruffians who would make a cordon of steel that could surround three thousand men if they put their rapiers end to end."

Fouquet looked thoughtfully at Gourville for a moment, and said, "You're right, Gourville." Then he opened the door and said to the footman, "Invite in Abbot Fouquet."

2 minutes later, the abbot appeared in the doorway with a deep bow. He was a man aged 40 to 45, half man of the Church, half man of the sword, a swashbuckling abbot; when he was not wearing a rapier, it was because his belt held pistols. Fouquet saluted him more as an older brother than as a churchman, and said, "What can I do for you, Sir Abbot?"

"Oh! How coldly you greet me, my brother!"

"I greet you like a man in a hurry, Sir."

The abbot looked suspiciously at Gourville, anxiously at Fouquet, and said, "I must pay three hundred pistoles to Sir de Brégy tonight – a gambling debt, a debt of honour."

"What else?" said Fouquet brusquely for he knew Abbot Fouquet would not have disturbed him just for that.

"A thousand to my butcher who's cut me off."

"And?"

"Twelve hundred to my tailor," continued the abbot. "The clown's withholding seven of my men's outfits that is compromising my livery and my mistress is threatening to replace me with a tax-farmer that would be a humiliation for the Church."

"And beyond that?"

"You will notice, Sir," said the abbot humbly, "that I've asked for nothing for myself."

"It's a hard thing to do," replied Fouquet, "so I'll wait until you're ready, Sir."

"And though I've asked for nothing, I assure you, it's not for lack of need."

The minister looked thoughtful for a moment. "Twelve hundred pistoles to the tailor," he said. "Rather a lot of clothing, it seems to me."

"I maintain a hundred men!" said the abbot proudly. "That costs money, you know."

"A hundred men? Why?" said Fouquet. "Are you a Richelieu or a Mazarin who needs a hundred guards? What do these hundred men do for you? Tell me."

"Are you serious?" cried Abbot Fouquet. "How can you ask why I keep a hundred men?"

"I want to know. What do you need with a hundred men? Explain!"

"Ingrate!" said the abbot indignantly.

"What do you mean?"

"For myself, Sir Surintendant, I need only a single valet but you, who have so many enemies ... why, not even a hundred men are enough to defend you! One hundred men? It would take ten thousand! I maintain these men so that in public places and in gatherings no one raises a voice against you; without that, Sir, you would be publicly insulted, even torn to pieces. You wouldn't last a week, not a single week, do you hear me?"

"Ah! I didn't know you were such a champion of mine, Sir Abbot."

"You doubt it!" cried the abbot. "Listen to the latest, then. Just yesterday, in the Rue de la Huchette, a man was bargaining for a chicken."

"Was he? And how did that hurt me, Abbot?"

"Like this: the chicken was scrawny. The buyer refused to pay eighteen sous for it, saying he'd not pay that much for the skin of chicken from which Sir Fouquet had already robbed the flesh and fat."

"And so?"

"This remark was greeted with laughter," continued the abbot, "laughter at your expense by the rabble, death of all the devils! The joker continued, 'Give me a chicken fed by Sir Colbert, if you please, and I'll pay whatever you like.' And he was applauded! What a frightful scandal! It was the kind of thing that makes a brother want to hide his face."

Fouquet coloured. "And you hid it?" said the superintendent.

"I did not," continued the abbot, "because I had one of my men in the crowd – a new recruit from the provinces, a Sir de Menneville <sup>25</sup> whom I love. He burst through the crowd and said to the joker, 'You rogue, here's a thrust for Colbert, by thunder!' And here's one for Fouquet," the joker replied. And they both drew steel in front of the poultry shop, with a mob of the curious around them and five hundred more watching from the windows."

"Well?" said Fouquet.

"Well, Sir! My Menneville skewered the joker, to the amazement of the audience, and said to the poultry vendor, Take this turkey, my friend – he's fatter than your chicken. And that's, sir," finished the abbot triumphantly, "how I spend my income: to sustain the family honour!"

Fouquet looked down.

"And I have a hundred more like that," the abbot concluded.

"Very well," said Fouquet. "Give your bills to Gourville and await me here this evening."

"We'll sup together?"

"We shall."

"But isn't the treasury closed?"

"Gourville will open it for you. Au revoir, Sir Abbot."

The abbot bowed. “Then we’re still friends?” he said.
“Yes, we’re friends. Come, Gourville.”
“You’re leaving? You won’t be eating with us?”
“I should be back in an hour, don’t worry.” Then, in a whisper to Gourville: “Have them harness the team of English horses,” he said, “and we’ll head for the Hôtel de Ville in Paris.”

Juice for Sir de La Fontaine

The carriages bringing Fouquet’s guests to Saint-Mandé were already arriving, and the whole house was warming up with supper preparations, when the superintendent took the road to Paris behind his swift horses, following the river quays to avoid the street traffic on the way to the Hôtel de Ville. When he arrived, it was a quarter to eight; Fouquet got out at the corner of the Rue du Long-Pont and went into the Place de Grève on foot with Gourville. At the entrance to the square they saw a man dressed in black and violet with a dignified air just preparing to enter a coach, telling the driver to take the road to Vincennes. He had loaded before him a huge basket of bottles he’d just bought at the Our Lady’s Portrait cabaret. “Hey! That’s Vatel, my steward,” said Fouquet to Gourville.

“Yes, My Lord,” replied the latter.
“What’s he doing at Our Lady’s Portrait?”
“Buying juice, it looks like.”

“What, buying juice for me at a cabaret?” said Fouquet. “Is my cellar reduced to that?”
And he approached his steward as the man was arranging the juice in his coach with great care. “Hello! Vatel!” he said in a voice of authority. “Take care, my lord,” said Gourville, “you’ll attract attention.”
“Fine, what do I care? Vatel!”

The man dressed in black and purple turned around. He had a mild and preoccupied expression, like a mathematician without the professorial pride. Vatel often looked like a child or absent-minded man; his eye twinkled a bit and a smile played around his lips but an observer might notice that this sparkle and smile were personal rather than reflections of his surroundings. At the sound of the voice he turned to look. “Oh! Is it you, my Lord?”
“Yes, me. What the devil are you up to, Vatel? Juice? You’re buying juice at a cabaret in the Place de Grève? You might as well shop at the Pomme-de-Pin or the Barreaux Verts.”
“But, My Lord,” said Vatel calmly after shooting a hostile glance at Gourville, “why do you question me? Is my cellar not well maintained?”
“Yes, of course, Vatel but...”
“But what?” replied Vatel.

Gourville nudged the superintendent’s arm. “Don’t be upset, Vatel, I just thought my cellar – your cellar – sufficiently well stocked that we wouldn’t need to buy from Our Lady’s Portrait.”
“Because, Sir,” said Vatel, dropping from my Lord to Sir with a certain disdain, “your cellar was stocked such that when some of your guests came to dine with you, they found nothing to drink.”
Fouquet, surprised, looked at Gourville and then back at Vatel. “What do you mean?”

“I mean that your sommelier doesn’t stock juice for all tastes, sir, and Sir de La Fontaine, Sir Pellisson, and Sir Conrar find nothing to drink at your house. Those gentlemen don’t care for fine juices so what is to be done?”
“What, then?”

“I lay in a supply of this Joigny juice they like. I know they come every week to drink at Our Lady’s Portrait, so it’s there I make my purchase.”
Fouquet had nothing to say to this. He was impressed. Vatel, however, had plenty more to say, and it was clear he was just warming up. “You might as well reproach me, my Lord, for also going to Rue Planche-Mibray to bring back the cider that Sir Loret drinks when he dines at your house.”
“Loret drinks cider at my house?” said Fouquet, laughing.

“Why, yes, sir! That’s why he dines there with such pleasure.”
“Vatel,” cried Fouquet, shaking his steward’s hand, “you’re quite a man! And I thank you for recognising that at my house Gentlemen de La Fontaine, Conrart, and Loret are as important as dukes, peers, and princes, even more so than myself. Vatel, you’re a fine servant, and I’m doubling your salary.”
Vatel didn’t thank him, he just shrugged slightly and replied with this haughty sentiment: “To be thanked for doing one’s duty is a humiliation.”

“He’s right,” said Gourville and then drew Fouquet’s attention to another matter with a gesture. He was indicating a low tumbriI drawn by cart horses bearing a pair of gallows, lashed together and guarded by a bored archer who sat on the end of the beams while ignoring, as much as he could, the comments of a hundred onlookers as they remarked on their destination near the Hôtel de Ville. Fouquet shuddered. “It’s decided, as you see,” said Gourville.

“But it isn’t done yet,” replied Fouquet.
“Don’t deceive yourself with false hopes, my Lord – if they’ve gone this far, there’s nothing you can do to stop it.”

“I’ve not approved this.”
“Sir de Lyonne has approved it for you.”
“I’m going to the Louvre.”
“You’ll do no such thing.”
“What you advise is cowardice!” cried Fouquet. “You advise me to abandon my friends, to throw down my arms and surrender!”
“I advise nothing of the sort, My Lord. Think: can you afford to resign the post of superintendent right now?”
“...No.”
“Well! If the king plans to replace you...”
“Then he’ll replace me.”
“Certainly, if you choose to insult him.”
“Yes but at least I won’t have been a coward. I don’t want my friends to die, and they’ll not die.”
“And for that, you must go to the Louvre?”
“Gourville!”

“Take care. Once you go to the Louvre, you’ll have to defend your friends’ actions and support everything they’ve done, or else abandon them.”
“Never!”
“Forgive me but the king will either frame it in those terms or force you to do so.”
“...That’s true.”
“Which is why you need to avoid an open breach. Return to Saint-Mandé, my Lord.”
“Gourville, I’m not buding from this spot where the crime will be committed, to my eternal shame – I’m not moving, I say, until I find a way to combat my enemies.”
“My Lord,” replied Gourville, “I’d sympathize if I didn’t know you have one of the world’s sharpest minds and control a hundred and fifty million into the bargain. You’re equal to the king in position, and a hundred and fifty million times greater than him in funds. Sir Colbert didn’t even have the sense to have the king accept Mazarin’s bequest. Now, if you’re the richest man in the kingdom but refuse to spend your money, you might as well be poor. I say, let’s go back to Saint-Mandé.”
“To consult with Pellisson? Yes.”
“No, My Lord, to consult with your money.”
“Let’s go, then,” said Fouquet, his eyes stinging. “Yes! Back to Saint-Mandé!”

He returned to his carriage, followed by Gourville. On their way out of the Faubourg Saint-Antoine they passed Vatel’s little coach, packed with its Joigny juice. Fouquet’s black horses, given their head, thundered by at full speed, causing the steward’s coach horse to shy, and the steward to shout in alarm, “Careful of my bottles!”

The Gallery of Saint-Mandé

50 guests awaited the superintendent. He didn’t even take a moment with his valet to spruce up, he went straight into the main salon. There his friends were gathered and chatting. The staff was preparing to serve supper, while Abbot Fouquet was watching for the return of his brother and trying to maintain the honour of his house in his absence. The superintendent arrived to a general murmur of joy and welcome. Fouquet, the epitome of affability, good humour, and generosity was beloved by his poets, artists, and men of affairs. His face, from which his little court read, as if from a god, the climate of his soul, and governed their behaviour thereby – his brow that business never troubled, was paler that evening than usual, and more than one eye noticed his pallor. Fouquet took his place at the head of the table and cheerfully presided over supper. He described Vatel’s expedition to La Fontaine. He recounted the story of Menneville and the scrawny chicken to Pellisson so the entire table could hear. The guests erupted in a storm of laughter and mockery that was only quelled by a grave and sombre gesture from Pellisson. Abbot Fouquet, unsure why his brother had made that the subject of conversation, listened carefully and studied the faces of Gourville and the superintendent but found no explanation. Pellisson took the matter up. “So, now we’re talking about Sir Colbert?” he said.

“Why not?” replied Fouquet. “Especially if it’s true, as they say, that the king has made him his intendant.”
Fouquet said the word with a marked emphasis, and his guests instantly exploded with outrage. “That miser!” said one.
“That peasant!” said another.

“That hypocrite!” said a third.
Pellisson exchanged a significant glance with Fouquet. “Gentlemen, really,” he said, “we’re libelling a man we scarcely know. It’s uncharitable, it’s unseemly, and as you can see from Sir Surintendant, I’m sure he agrees.”
“Completely,” replied Fouquet. “Pay no mind to Sir Colbert’s fat chickens when tonight we have before us Sir Vatel’s pheasants with truffle.”
These words lifted the dark mood that had descended on the guests. Gourville plied the poets with the Joigny juice while the abbot, attentive as a man is who’s always short of funds, entertained the financiers and the military men, succeeding so well that, in the happy flow of conversation, their common anxiety was completely forgotten. The last will and testament of Cardinal Mazarin was the subject of discussion during the latter courses and dessert, and then Fouquet ordered the platters of sweets and decanters of liqueur carried into the salon next to the grand gallery. He led the way after them, taking the hand of a lady he’d selected as his queen of the evening. Then the guests began their promenades along the gallery as the violins played and out into the gardens under the soft and fragrant spring sky. Pellisson approached the superintendent and said to him, “My Lord’s troubled?”

“Deeply,” replied the minister. “Ask Gourville about it.”
Pellisson turning, found La Fontaine hard on his heels and had to listen to a Latin verse the poet had composed about Vatel. La Fontaine had spent the last hour in the corner refining this poem and now sought a proper audience for it. He thought he’d found it in Pellisson but the essayist evaded him. He settled on Loret, who in his turn had just composed a quatrain in honour of the supper and its host, whom he dubbed Amphitryon. La Fontaine tried to recite his verse but Loret insisted on declaiming his quatrain. La Fontaine turned and fixed his sights upon the Count of Charost but just then Fouquet took the count by the arm. Abbot Fouquet saw that the poet, oblivious as usual, was going to pursue the pair, and intercepted him. La Fontaine immediately seized upon him and began reciting his verse. The abbot, who knew no Latin, just nodded his head in time to La Fontaine’s delivery, following the rhythm of the poet’s dactyls and spondees. Meanwhile, behind the pastry table, Fouquet recounted the day’s events to his son-in-law, Sir Charost. “We can’t talk seriously here,” said Pellisson to Gourville. “We should send all those not of the inner circle out to watch the fireworks.”
“I’ll take care of it,” said Gourville, who went and said a few words to Vatel. Shortly thereafter they saw the latter leading the ladies, social butterflies, and gossipers outside. Meanwhile in the gallery, lit by three hundred wax candles and in full view of everyone in the garden, the key men talked while the frivolous enjoyed the fireworks. Gourville approached Fouquet and said to him, “Sir, everyone’s here.”
“Everyone?” said Fouquet.

“Yes; see for yourself.”

The superintendent looked along the gallery and counted eight persons. Pellisson and Gourville walked arm in arm conversing about trivial matters. Loret and two officers passed them, similarly engaged. Abbot Fouquet stood alone. Fouquet with Sir Charost, continued strolling as if absorbed in conversation with his son-in-law. “Gentlemen,” he said aloud, “don’t turn your heads; keep walking and don’t seem to pay me any attention but listen.”

A perfect silence fell, disturbed only by the distant voices of the happy guests as they moved about the gardens to find better spots from which to view the fireworks. Inside was the strange spectacle of men walking back and forth in groups as if occupied with each other but actually listening to only one of their number who spoke as if only to his companion, “Gentlemen,” said Fouquet, “you’ve probably noticed that two of our friends are missing, two who were with us only last Wednesday ... for God’s sake, Abbot, don’t stop and look around, just listen. Walk as nonchalantly as you can to the window, where, with your excellent vision, if you see anyone approaching the gallery, you can warn us by coughing.”

The abbot obeyed. “I haven’t noticed anyone missing,” said Pellisson though his back was turned to Fouquet and he was walking in the opposite direction.

Loret said, “I don’t see Sir Lyodot, who pays me my salary.”

“And I don’t see my friend d’Emerys,” said the abbot from the window, “who owes me eleven hundred livres from our last card game.”

“Loret,” said Fouquet, sombrely and with head bowed, “you’ll never again be paid your salary by Lyodot; and you, Abbot, will never get your eleven hundred livres from d’Emerys – for both are doomed to die.”

“To die?” everyone cried, pausing their play-acting despite themselves at the sound of the terrible word.

“Control yourselves, Gentlemen,” said Fouquet, “for we may be spied upon. But yes: to die.”

“To die!” repeated Pellisson. “Those men whom I saw within the last week, full of health, happiness, and plans for the future! Dear God, what is a man, that disease should carry him away so suddenly?”

“They die of no disease,” said Fouquet.

“Then, there must be a cure,” said Loret.

“No cure. Gentlemen Lyodot and d’Emerys are in the evening of their final day.”

“What are these gentlemen dying of, then?” cried an officer.

“Ask that of he who kills them,” replied Fouquet.

“Who kills them? Who is killing them?” the chorus cried in fright.

“Or even better, ask what? For they are to be hanged!” said Fouquet in a hollow voice that sounded like a death knell in that luxurious gallery, glittering with gold, candles, flowers, and embroidery.

Everyone stopped involuntarily, and the abbot left his window, as the first rockets of the fireworks rose above the treetops. The cries from the gardens seemed to draw the superintendent to the sight. He approached a window and his friends gathered behind him, attentive to every word and gesture. “Gentlemen,” he said, “Sir Colbert has arrested, tried, and sentenced to death two of my friends; what’ll I do?”

“God!” said the abbot. “We must have Colbert’s guts out.”

“My Lord,” said Pellisson, “you must speak to His Majesty.”

“The king, my dear Pellisson, has signed the order of execution.”

“Well!” said the Count de Charost. “This execution must be prevented, that’s all.”

“Impossible,” said Gourville. “...unless we could bribe the jailers.”

“Or the prison warden,” said Fouquet.

“This very night, so the prisoners can escape.”

“Which of you will take charge of this matter?”

“I’ll carry the cash,” said the abbot.

“I’ll handle the negotiation,” said Pellisson.

“Words and money,” nodded Fouquet. “Five hundred thousand livres to the Governor of the Conciergerie ought to be enough but we’ll go a million if we have to.”

“A million!” cried the abbot. “For far less than that, I’d sack half of Paris.”

“No sacking, no disorder,” said Pellisson. “We buy off the governor, the prisoners escape, and once out of the arms of the law, they rally Colbert’s enemies and prove to this young king that this reckless judgement was a mistake.”

“Therefore, go to Paris, Pellisson, bring back our two victims, and then tomorrow we’ll see,” said Fouquet. “Gourville, get the five hundred thousand livres for Pellisson.”

“You’ll want some help with that,” said the abbot. “What a responsibility, plague! Don’t get carried away by it.”

“Quiet!” said Fouquet. “Someone’s coming. Ah, what a magical effect those fireworks produce!” he announced as a shower of sparks fell, glittering, in the branches of a nearby grove. Pellisson and Gourville left together by the door of the gallery as Fouquet went down into the garden with the other conspirators.

The Epicureans

As Fouquet devoted, or seemed to devote, all his attentions to the sparkling lights, the gentle music of the violins and oboes, and glittering rain of the fireworks that, lighting up the sky with fiery flashes, outlined, behind the trees, the sombre silhouette of the Keep of Vincennes; as, we say, the superintendent was smiling upon the ladies and poets, the fête was as merry as usual, and even Vatel, whose anxious, almost jealous look continually queried Fouquet, showed no dissatisfaction with the unfolding of the soirée. The fireworks over, in the gardens and under the marble porticoes the guests of the master of the house relaxed with that feeling of freedom that reflects the master host’s courteous hospitality, casual grandeur, and magnificent nonchalance. The poets wandered, arm in arm, through the groves, where some of them stretched out on beds of moss, to the disservice of their velour suits and curled hair that picked up dry leaves and bits of greenery. The ladies, though few in number, gathered to hear the songs of the musicians and the verses of the poets; others listened to the artful oratory declaimed by men who were neither actors nor poets but to whom youth and melancholy granted an unusual eloquence. “Why,” said La Fontaine, “has our Epicurean master not come down into the gardens? It’s wrong of him, for Epicurus never abandoned his disciples so.”

“Sir,” Conrart said to him, “you’re wrong to persist in calling us Epicureans, for in truth, nothing here recalls the Philosopher of Gargettus.”

“Pfah!” replied La Fontaine. “Isn’t it written that Epicurus bought an expansive garden and lived there with his friends.”

“It is.”

“Well! Hasn’t Sir Fouquet bought a grand garden here at Saint-Mandé, and aren’t we living there peacefully with him and his friends?”

“Yes, quite so – but sadly neither the garden nor the friends at all resemble your example. What similarity is there between the philosophy of Sir Fouquet and that of Epicurus?”

“It is this: ‘Pleasure gives us happiness.’”

“So?”

“So, I think one could hardly call us unhappy. A fine meal with Joigny juice that they are as considerate as to import from my favourite tavern, and not a single embarrassing faux pas in an hour-long supper, despite the attendance of ten millionaires and twenty poets.”

“I’ll just stop you there: you mentioned fine food and Joigny juice – is that your evidence? Will you persist in that?”

“I will persist; antecho [I stand my ground] as they say at Port Royal.”

“Then I must remind you that the great Epicurus lived, and made his disciples live as well, on bread, beans, and spring water.”

“Are you sure of that?” said La Fontaine. “You might be confusing Epicurus with Pythagoras, my dear Conrart.”

“But it’s certain that the great philosopher was no follower of gods or monarchs.”

“I will not admit the certainty of that!” retorted La Fontaine. “I say that Epicurus was like Sir Fouquet.”

“Do not compare him to Sir Surintendant!” said Conrart with some emotion. “If you do, you’ll give credence to those who spread rumours about him ... and us.”

“What rumours?”

“That we are bad Frenchmen, indifferent to the monarch and scornful of the law.”

“I return to my original statement,” said La Fontaine. “Listen, Conrart, here’s the morality of Epicurus – whom I must say I consider something of a myth. Everything from that far back in antiquity’s myth. Jupiter, if you follow his historical development, is life while Alcides is strength. The origin of these names prove me right, for Zeus is zên, that is, to live while Alcides is alcé or vigour. Well! Epicurus stands for calm watchfulness or protection, and who protects our State and watches over us better than Sir Fouquet?”

“Mere wordplay is not moral philosophy. I say that we modern Epicureans make poor citizens.”

“Pfah!” cried La Fontaine. “If we make poor citizens, it’s not due to following the philosophy of our master. Listen to one of Epicurus’s most important aphorisms.”

“‘Desire to have good leaders.’”

“Well?”

“Well! What does Sir Fouquet say to us daily? ‘When shall we be properly governed?’ Doesn’t he, Conrart? Be honest!”

“He says that, it’s true.”

“Well! There’s your Epicurean philosophy.”

“Maybe but it’s more than a little seditious.”

“What! Is it seditious to want to be governed by good leaders?”

“Certainly, when the current government is bad.”

“Be patient! I have a reply to all of this.”

“Including what I just said?”

“Here: ‘Submit even to those who govern badly.’ Or as it’s written: Cacos politeuouisi. You’ll grant me that text?”

“By God! I should think so. Why, you speak Greek as well as Æsop, my dear La Fontaine.”

“Is there any sedition in that, my dear Conrart?”

“God forbid!”

“Then, let’s return to Sir Fouquet. What has he said a thousand times? Isn’t it, ‘What a peasant that Mazarin is! What a leech! What an ass!’ Come now, Conrart, did he say that, or didn’t he?”

“I admit he did say it, perhaps a bit too often.”

“Just like Epicurus, my friend, always like Epicurus. I repeat, we are Epicureans, and isn’t that amusing?”

“Maybe but I’m afraid that a faction like that of Epictetus <sup>32</sup> will just rise to oppose us. You know well that Philosopher of Hierapolis who called bread wasteful, beans a luxury, and spring water no better than juice; he who, when beaten by his master, though he did complain a bit, said otherwise calmly, ‘Do you want to wager you’ve broken my leg?’ And he won that bet!”

“Epictetus was an idiot.”

“True enough but such idiocy might become the fashion if it goes by the name of Colbert.”

“Pfah!” replied La Fontaine. “Impossible. Colbert will never have followers like Epictetus.”

“Perhaps, though he is as sneaky as ... Coluber the snake.”

“Ha! You’re beaten, Conrart, if you have to stoop to wordplay that low – admit it! Sir Arnault of Port Royal claims I lack logic but I have more than his patron Sir Nicole.”

“Oh, that’s something, all right,” retorted Conrart, “to be more logical than a Jansenist!”

This conclusion was greeted by an immense burst of laughter. One by one, the debaters had attracted the attention of those promenading around the grove, and the whole argument had been closely followed by this growing audience. Even Fouquet himself, the very model of self-control, had trouble holding himself in. But the dénouement of the scene was more than he could bear, and he burst out laughing. Everyone joined him, and the two philosophers were greeted with unanimous applause. La Fontaine was acclaimed the victor, thanks to his erudition and irrefutable logic but Conrart was deemed a worthy opponent, praised for the integrity of his convictions and the purity of his conscience. In the midst of these loud congratulations, as the ladies were reproaching the two adversaries for not having admitted women to be part of the system of Epicurean happiness, Gourville appeared at the end of the garden. Fouquet, who'd been watching for him, deftly detached himself from the group. The superintendent maintained his smiling laughter as he nonchalantly moved off but as soon as he was out of sight, he dropped the mask. "Well?" he said eagerly. "Where's Pellisson? How did it go?"

"Pellisson has returned from Paris."

"Did he bring the prisoners back with him?"

"He got no farther than the warden of the prison."

"What! Didn't he tell him he'd come from me?"

"He did but the warden said, 'If someone comes on behalf of Sir Fouquet, they should bring a letter from Sir Fouquet.'"

"Oh!" said the latter. "If it's just a matter of giving him a letter..."

"It's not," said Pellisson, appearing from the shadows of the little grove. "You must go personally, My Lord, and speak for yourself."

"Yes, you're right. I left everything ready as if I might go back to work, Pellisson; the horses are still hitched to the carriage. Look after my guests, Gourville."

"May I offer another opinion, My Lord?" asked the latter.

"Speak, Gourville."

"Don't go to the warden except as a last resort; it's bold but it isn't smart. Pardon me, Sir Pellisson, if I disagree with you but I think, my Lord, that you'd send the warden a letter rather than go yourself. He's a worthy man but don't tempt him too far."

"I'll think about it," said Fouquet. "We still have most of the night ahead of us."

"Don't count too much on time, because you never have as much as you think you have," said Pellisson. "It's never a mistake to strike early."

"All right," said the superintendent. "Let's go, Pellisson. Gourville, I commend my guests to you." And they departed. The Epicureans didn't notice that the head of their school of philosophy had gone; the violins played all night long.

15 Minutes' Delay

Fouquet, leaving his house for the second time that day, felt less troubled and anxious than one might have thought. He turned to Pellisson, who in his corner of the carriage was considering rebuttals to Colbert's more serious accusations. "My dear Pellisson," said Fouquet, "it's a shame that you're not a woman."

"On the contrary, My Lord," replied Pellisson, "I think it's lucky I'm not, considering how ugly I am."

"Oh, Pellisson!" said the superintendent, laughing. "You mention how ugly you are so often that it must be a painful thing for you to think about."

"It is indeed, My Lord, and no one is less happy about it than I am. I was a handsome youth but the smallpox made me hideous and stole away my main means of seduction. Now I'm your first secretary, or something like it, in charge of managing your interests – and right now, if I were a pretty woman, I could render you an important service."

"Like what?"

"I'd go to the warden of the Conciergerie and I'd seduce him, for he's a ladies' man, and I'd rescue our two prisoners."

"I hope to be able to manage that myself, though I'm not a pretty woman either," replied Fouquet.

"Agreed, My Lord, though by doing so you compromise yourself."

"Agh!" cried Fouquet suddenly, in an outburst of youthful blood, or at least a memory of what that was like. "Believe me, I know a woman who's what it takes to sway the Lieutenant Governor of the Conciergerie!"

"I know fifty, my Lord, all fifty of whom would announce such a victory to the world, praising everywhere your devotion to your friends and you'd win the battle as a result but lose the war."

"I don't speak of those women, Pellisson, I speak of a noble and beautiful creature who combines the spirit and energy of her sex with the wit and coolness of ours; I speak of a woman lovely enough that the walls of the prison would bow down before her but so discreet that none would ever suspect who'd sent her."

"A treasure," said Pellisson. "That would be a fabulous gift for the Governor of the Conciergerie, My Lord, and even if he lost his head for it, he'd go to his grave the luckiest of men."

"Not to mention," said Fouquet, "that the warden wouldn't have to lose his head, for he'd have some of my horses to escape upon, and half a million livres with which to live comfortably in England – and furthermore, my friend, the horses and money are the only things the lady would have to give him. Let's go find this lady, Pellisson."

The superintendent reached for the silk and golden cord that communicated with the driver. Pellisson stopped him. "My Lord," he said, "we could spend more time seeking this woman than Columbus took to find the New World. We have only two hours left to us, for after the warden goes to bed, how can you get to him without causing a commotion? Once the sun rises, how can we act in the shadows? Go now, My Lord, and don't spend the night looking for a woman, even if she is an angel."

"But, dear Pellisson, here we are before her door."

"Before the door of an angel?"

"Yes!"

"But ... this is the house of Madam de Bellière."

"Hush!"

"Oh, good Lord!" cried Pellisson.

"You have something to say against her?" asked Fouquet.

"Not a thing, alas! That's why I'm dismayed. There's absolutely nothing against her ... so what can I say to keep you from going in to see her?"

But Fouquet had already given his order and the carriage had stopped. "Keep me from going in?" said Fouquet. "No power in the world could stop me from paying a compliment to Madam du Plessis-Bellière – besides, who knows whether we might need her? Won't you go with me?"

"No, My Lord, no."

"But I don't want you to have to wait for me, Pellisson," replied Fouquet with sincere courtesy.

"All the better, My Lord; knowing that I'm waiting for you, you'll be quicker. But beware – there's a carriage in her courtyard already. Someone's visiting her." Fouquet leaned on the door and turned the handle. "Just one more word," said Pellisson. "In heaven's name, delay visiting this lady until our return from the Conciergerie."

"Eh! Five minutes, Pellisson," replied Fouquet, getting out at the hotel's steps.

Pellisson remained slumped in the carriage, scowling. Fouquet leapt up the stairs and gave his name to the footman who responded with a respectful eagerness that showed in what regard his name was held by the mistress of the house. "Sir Surintendant!" exclaimed the marquise, very pale as she approached Fouquet. "What an unexpected honour!" And then in a whisper, she added, "Beware! Marguerite Vanel's here."

"Madam," replied Fouquet urgently, "I come on business. Just one quick word."

And he went ahead into her salon. Madam Vanel rose from a chair, paler and more livid than Envy herself. Fouquet made her a most friendly and charming greeting but in vain; she replied only with a venomous look at the marquise and Fouquet. The piercing look of a jealous woman is a point that finds the chink in every armour, and Marguerite Vanel plunged it into the hearts of the two confidants. She made a bow to her friend, a deeper one to Fouquet and took her leave on the pretext that she had ever so many visits to make with the marquise saying nothing to stop her or Fouquet preoccupied with anxiety giving her another thought. She was scarcely gone before Fouquet was on his knees before her without saying a word, left alone with the marquise. "I was waiting for you," said the marquise with a gentle smile.

"If so, you'd have sent that woman away," he said.

"She hadn't been here a quarter of an hour, and I had no idea she was coming tonight."

"Do you love me a little, Marquise?"

"That's not what matters right now, Sir, when you're in danger. How are your affairs proceeding?"

"I'm going tonight to rescue my friends from the prisons at the Conciergerie."

"How will you do that?"

"By bribing and suborning the governor."

"He's a friend of mine; can I help you without harming you?"

"Marquise, that would be a very great help indeed! But how could you assist without compromising yourself? Nothing in my life is worth it, not my power nor my liberty, if it caused a single tear to fall from your eye, or a shadow to darken your brow."

"My Lord, don't talk that way, it makes my head spin. I've long dreamed of helping you without ever counting the cost. In truth, I love you as a dear friend, and as a friend I'm grateful for your delicacy but never, alas! Never will you find a mistress in me."

"Ah, Marquise!" cried Fouquet in a desperate voice. "But why?"

"Because you are too well loved by too many people," whispered the young woman, "because the gleam of fortune and glory hurts my eyes that are attracted only to melancholy and pain. Because I, who rejected you in your splendor and magnificence, who scarcely looked at you when you shone, came like a mad woman to throw myself into your arms when I saw dark clouds gather around you. Understand me, My Lord, you must become happy again so I can remain chaste in heart and mind – for your misfortune means my ruin."

"Oh, Madam!" said Fouquet with an emotion deeper than any he'd ever felt before. "If I plunge to lowest level of human misery and hear from you then those words you refuse me now, on that day, Madam, when you forget your noble pride, though you'll think you're consoling the most abject of men, you'll be saying 'I love you' to the most ecstatic, triumphant, and happy man in the world!"

He was still at her feet, bathing her hand in kisses, when Pellisson burst in and urgently cried, "My Lord! Madam! In God's name! Forgive me, My Lord but you've been here half an hour. Oh, don't look at me like that – Madam, I beg you, who was that lady who left your house when my Lord came in?"

"Madam Vanel," said Fouquet.

"There!" cried Pellisson. "I knew it!"

"Well? What of it?"

"She marched, pale as death, right into her carriage."

"Does it matter?" said Fouquet.

"What matters is what she said to her driver."

"In God's name, what's that?" said the marquise.

"To Sir Colbert's," "" said Pellisson hoarsely.

"Good Lord! Go, my Lord! Hurry!" gasped the marquise, almost pushing Fouquet from her salon, while Pellisson drew him by the hand.

"Come, now," said the superintendent. "Am I a child to be afraid of a shadow?"

"You are a giant," said the marquise, "with a viper trying to bite you on the heel."

Pellisson practically manhandled Fouquet into the carriage. "Drive hell for leather to the Conciergerie!" cried Pellisson to the coachman.

The horses took off like lightning, and at first nothing could stop them but in the Arcade Saint-Jean, where they were about to turn onto the Place de Grève, a line of horsemen barred the opening of the narrow street, blocking the superintendent's carriage. There was no way past them and they had to wait until the mounted guards cleared the way, riding after a heavy coach they were escorting toward the Place Baudoyer. Fouquet and Pellisson took little notice of this event other than to curse the brief delay. They arrived at the gates of the Conciergerie five minutes later. The lieutenant governor was on the steps of the courtyard but at the name of Fouquet, whispered in his ear by Pellisson, he quickly approached the carriage and, hat in his hand, bowed deeply and repeatedly. "What an honour for me, my Lord!" he said.

"A word with you, Sir Governor. Would you be so kind as to step into my carriage?"

The officer entered the carriage and sat down facing Fouquet. "Sir," said Fouquet, "I've a favour to ask of you."

"Speak, My Lord!"

"It's a favour that could compromise you, Sir but it will earn you my friendship and protection forever."

"Should you need me to throw myself into a fire, My Lord, I'm happy to do it!"

"Good," said Fouquet. "What I'm asking for is very simple."

"It's as good as done, My Lord. What do you need?"

"For you to lead me to the cells of Gentlemen Lyodot and d'Emerys."

"Would My Lord deign to tell me why?"

"I will tell you when we get there, Sir, at the same time I give you the wherewithal to compensate for their escape."

"Escape! Then My Lord doesn't know?"

"What?"

"Gentlemen Lyodot and d'Emerys are no longer here."

"Since when?" gasped Fouquet.

"Since about a quarter of an hour ago."

"Where did they go?"

"To the dungeon of Vincennes."

"By what means?"

"By order of the king."

"No!" cried Fouquet, striking his forehead. "It can't be!"

And he dismissed him from the carriage without saying another word to the governor, death in his face and despair in his soul. "What now?" asked Pellisson anxiously.

"What now? Our friends are lost. Colbert is taking them to the dungeons. They were in the coach that passed us at the Arcade Saint-Jean."

Pellisson fell back as if struck by lightning. He said nothing; a single reproach would have slain his master outright. "Where to, my Lord?" asked the coachman.

"To my house in Paris. You, Pellisson, will go back to Saint-Mandé and return with Abbot Fouquet within the hour. On, driver! On!"

The Plan of Battle

The night was well advanced when Abbot Fouquet arrived at his brother's Paris mansion. Fouquet, his brother, and Gourville, pale in the face of future events, looked less like three powerful aristocrats than like three conspirators united by the idea of violence. Fouquet paced for quite a while, his eyes fixed on the parquet floor, his hands clasped behind his back. Finally, summoning his courage after a great sigh, he said, "Abbot, didn't you speak to me about a certain group of men you maintain?"

"Yes, Sir," replied the abbot.

"Tell me, who are these people?" The abbot hesitated. "Come on! Don't worry, I'm not threatening you; give it to me straight, I'm not joking."

"Since you ask for the truth, Sir, here it is: I have a hundred and twenty soldiers of fortune who are as bound to me as a thief is to the gallows."

"And you can count on them?"

"Entirely."

"And they won't compromise you?"

"My name will never be mentioned."

"And these are men of firm resolve?"

"They would burn all Paris if I promised them they could get away with it."

"The thing I need to ask of you, Abbot," said Fouquet, wiping the sweat beading his face, "is to have your one hundred twenty men attack those I designate at a given moment. Is that possible?"

"It won't be the first time they've done such a thing, sir."

"Good; but would these bandits be willing to fight ... an armed force?"

"That's what they're used to doing."

"Then gather your hundred and twenty men, Abbot."

"Fine; just tell me where."

"On the road to Vincennes, tomorrow, at two o'clock sharp."

"To liberate Lyodot and d'Emerys? It will come to blows."

"Quite a few. Does that bother you?"

"Not me, though it might bother you."

"Will your men know their business?"

"They'll know what to do, and they'll know what it's about – they're too savvy not to. But a minister who incites a riot against his king ... is taking a risk."

"What do you care, so long as I pay for it? Besides, you go down with me if I fall."

"Then it might be wiser not to cause trouble, Sir, and to let the king have his little victory."

"You'd consider, Abbot, that Lyodot and d'Emerys imprisoned at Vincennes is the prelude to the ruin of my house. I repeat, when I'm arrested, you'll be imprisoned and when I'm imprisoned, you'll be exiled."

"Sir, I am at your orders. Do you have any to give me?"

"As I said: tomorrow I want the two financiers they intend to make scapegoats, when there are so many real criminals unpunished, liberated from the fury of my enemies. Take your measures accordingly. Is this feasible?"

"It's feasible."

"Tell me your plan."

"It is simplicity itself. At an ordinary execution, the guard is a dozen archers."

"Tomorrow there will be a hundred."

"My guess is it will be closer to two hundred."

"Then your hundred and twenty will be outnumbered?"

"Not at all. In every crowd of ten thousand spectators there are a thousand thugs and cutpurses but they dare start nothing."

"Well?"

"So, tomorrow on the Place de Grève that I choose for my field of battle, my one hundred and twenty will be joined by a thousand auxiliaries. We will start the attack and they will finish it."

"Good! But how will you get the prisoners from the Place de Grève?"

"We'll barricade them in one of the houses surrounding the square, so that getting them out again will take a siege. Now that I think of it, here's an even better idea: some of those houses have two exits, one onto the Place and the other onto the Rue de la Mortellerie, Vannerie, or Tixeranderie. The prisoners will go in one door and out the other."

"You'll need to pick the appropriate house."

"I'll find it."

"Ah but I've found it already!" said Fouquet. "Listen carefully to the details."

"I'm listening."

Fouquet made a sign to Gourville, who appeared to understand. "One of my friends occasionally lends me the keys to a house he rents on Place Baudoyer. It has gardens that extend behind a certain house on the Place de Grève."

"That sounds like the ticket," said the abbot. "Which house?"

"A busy little cabaret under the sign of Our Lady's Portrait."

"I know it," said the abbot.

"This cabaret has windows on the Place and a back door onto a courtyard that has a gate into my friend's garden."

"Good!"

"Burst into the cabaret, bring in the prisoners, then have your men defend the front door while you escort the escapees through the garden to the Place Baudoyer."

"Truly, Sir, if you're a general, you'd be the equal of Sir Prince."

"Have you got it?"

"Perfectly."

"How much cash do you need to juice your men with juice and grease their palms with gold?"

"Oh, Sir, how crude! Suppose they heard you? They're really quite sensitive, you know."

"They must be ready to storm the heavens from earth, for tomorrow I fight against the king, and when I fight, I intend to win, do you understand me?"

"It will be just as you say, Sir. Now, are there any other details?"

"I leave them up to you."

"Then open your purse, Sir."

"Gourville, issue the abbot a hundred thousand livres."

"Good! Spare no expense, I think you said?"

"Spare nothing and no one."

"As you command!"

"My Lord," warned Gourville, "if this gets out, it will cost us our heads."

"Don't be pathetic, Gourville," retorted Fouquet, purple with anger. "Speak for yourself, my dear. As for me, my head is firmly fixed on my shoulders. Let's see, Abbot, is that everything?"

"Everything."

"At two o'clock tomorrow, then?"

"At noon, because we now must make some preparations in advance."

"True enough. Don't spare the innkeeper's juice."

"I will spare neither his juice nor his house," sneered the abbot. "I've this covered, I tell you; leave me to do my work, and you'll see."

"Where will you be located?"

"Everywhere, and nowhere."

"And how will I stay informed?"

"By a courier whose horse will be posted in your friend's garden. By the way, what's your friend's name?"

Fouquet looked at Gourville, who came to his master's rescue. "The place is all that matters, Sir Abbot: Our Lady's Portrait in front and the only garden in the neighbourhood behind."

"Fine, fine. I'll tell my soldiers."

"Go with him, Gourville, and see that he gets his money," said Fouquet. "But wait a moment, Gourville – Abbot, what shall we call this uprising?"

"We'll call it just what it is, Sir: the Riot."

"Ah but whose riot? Because if there's any time the people of Paris love their king, it's when he hangs some tax collectors."

"I'll manage that," said the abbot.

"Yes but it's a key point, and I want to be assured of it."

"All right, one moment ... here's my idea."

"Tell me."

"My men will shout, 'Colbert! Long live Colbert!' and throw themselves on the prisoners as if to tear them to pieces because hanging is too good for them."

"Ah, now there's an idea indeed!" said Gourville. "Plague, what a mind you have, Sir Abbot!"

"It runs in the family, Sir," said the abbot proudly.

"Ass!" murmured Fouquet. Then aloud: "It's ingenious! Do it but minimise the bloodshed." Gourville and the abbot left to attend to their preparations. The superintendent laid down on soft cushions, at first mulling over the sinister plans for the morrow but then drifting into dreams of love.

The Cabaret of the Portrait of our Lady

By two o'clock the next day, twenty thousand spectators had gathered in the Place de Grève around the two gibbets that had been erected in the plaza between the Quai de la Grève and the Quai Le Pelletier, <sup>33</sup> next to each other with their backs toward the parapet along the river. That morning, all the municipal criers of the good city of Paris had gone back and forth through every quarter, especially the markets and the near suburbs, announcing in their hoarse but indefatigable voices that the king's justice was to be done upon two corrupt officials who'd stolen from the people. And the people, on whose behalf this was done, and who didn't wish to disrespect their king, left their stalls, studios, and workshops so they could show their appreciation for Louis XIV just like guests who feared it would be rude to turn down an invitation to a banquet. According to the indictments of the judgement that the criers pronounced incorrectly but enthusiastically, two thieving tax farmers, frauds, counterfeiters, and embezzlers of the royal funds, were sentenced to undergo capital punishment on the Place de Grève with Their Names Displayed Above their Heads. As to these names, the indictment didn't mention them that just inflamed the curiosity of the Parisians all the more, until an immense crowd awaited the hour of execution with feverish impatience. The news had already spread that the prisoners, transferred to the Château de Vincennes, would be paraded from that prison to the Place de Grève, so the Faubourg and Rue Saint-Antoine <sup>34</sup> were also lined with crowds. The population of Paris, in those days of public executions, was divided into two categories: those of mild or timid heart but philosophical mind who preferred to watch the condemned pass by, and those whose hearts hungered for sensation and wanted to see them die. That morning, Sir d'Artagnan, having received his final instructions from the king, and having bade farewell to his friends, the number of which was for the moment reduced to Planchet, had drawn up his plan for the day, as every man must do who counts his minutes as important and expends them accordingly. "Departure is fixed for tomorrow at the crack of dawn, at three in the morning," he said, "so I have fifteen hours ahead of me. Reckon first the six hours of sleep that are the minimum I require; one hour to dine makes seven; one hour to visit Athos, eight; then two hours slack for the unexpected that makes a total of ten. That leaves five hours: one hour to ask for money from Sir Fouquet and be refused; one hour to get the money from Sir Colbert and suffer his questions and grimaces; one hour to sharpen my sword, brush my clothes, and polish my boots. And I still have two hours left over – God be with you! I'm rich, with time to spare!" And saying this, d'Artagnan felt a strange joy, a youthful glee, a whiff of those happy and carefree times gone by that rose to his head and intoxicated him. "With those two extra hours," said the musketeer, "I'll go to collect my quarterly rent from the innkeeper of our Lady's Portrait. Three hundred seventy-five livres! God, how jolly! It continues to amaze me. If a poor man who had no more than a livre in his pocket found there a livre plus a dozen deniers, that would be fine and just but that never happens to the poor. The rich man, on the other hand, makes money with his money without ever touching it. Here come three hundred seventy-five livres as if fallen from the sky. So, I'll go to Our Lady's Portrait and drink a glass of Spanish juice with my tenant, who can scarcely fail to offer it to me. But all things in their time, Sir d'Artagnan, and everything in its order. Let's plan this out properly. Article One: Athos. Article Two: Our Lady's Portrait. Article Three: Sir Fouquet. Article Four: Sir Colbert. Article Five: supper. Article Six: clothes, equipment, horses, and baggage. Article Seventh and Last: sleep!" And having settled on his plan, d'Artagnan went straight to call upon the Count of La Fère, to whom, modestly and simply, he related his latest adventures. Since the day before, Athos had been more than a little concerned about d'Artagnan's visit to the king but two sentences of explanation settled his mind. Athos guessed that Louis had entrusted d'Artagnan with some important mission and didn't even try to get him to divulge its secret. He advised him to take care of himself and discreetly offered to go with him if that was advisable. "But, dear friend, I'm going nowhere," said d'Artagnan.

"Really! You come to say goodbye but you're not leaving?"

"Oh, all right, fine," replied d'Artagnan, colouring a little. "I'm going to look at some properties."

"Ah, that's another thing entirely. In that case, instead of don't get killed, I'll say: Don't get robbed."

"I'll let you know, old friend, if I find anything worth looking at, because in that case I'll want your advice."

"Yes, of course," said Athos, too considerate to allow himself the amusement of a smile.

Raoul imitated the paternal reserve. D'Artagnan understood that it would be overly mysterious to leave his friends for a journey without telling them which way he'd be going. "I'm going through Le Mans," he said to Athos. "Do you know that country?"

"I do, my friend," replied the count without mentioning that Le Mans was in nearly the same direction as the Touraine and if he waited a couple of days, he could travel that way with a friend.

But d'Artagnan was too embarrassed to continue, finding he just dug himself deeper into his hole with each new explanation. Finally, he said, "I'm leaving tomorrow at dawn. Until then, Raoul, will you spend the time with me?"

"Yes, Sir Knight," said the young man, "unless the count has something he wants me to do."

"No, Raoul, the only thing I have today is an audience with Sir, the king's brother," said Athos.

Raoul asked Grimaud for his sword, and he brought it right away. "Then, farewell, dear friend!" said d'Artagnan, opening his arms to Athos. They held for a long embrace, and then the musketeer, mindful of his friend's discretion, whispered in his ear, "An affair of State!"

Athos replied to this with a final, significant handshake. And so, they parted. Raoul took his old friend's arm and they went east down the Rue Saint-Honoré. "I will lead you to the altar of the god Pluto," said d'Artagnan to the young man. "Prepare yourself to see piles of coins. I'm a changed man, by God!"

"Oh! Look how many people there are on the street," said Raoul.

"Is there a parade today?" asked d'Artagnan of a passer-by.

"A hanging, Sir," replied the stroller.

"Really? A hanging, on the Grève?" said d'Artagnan.

"Yes, Sir."

"Devil take the rogue who gets hanged on the day I have to go to collect my rent!" cried d'Artagnan. "Raoul, have you ever seen a hanging?"

"Never, Sir – thank God!"

"That's youth speaking. Now if you were on guard in a trench, and you caught a spy ... but pardon an old soldier's rambling, Raoul. You're quite right, a hanging is an ugly thing ... if you please, sir, at what hour's the execution?"

"Sir," replied the burgher, charmed at being the object of conversation of two men of the sword, "it's set for three o'clock."

"Ah, then we still have an hour and a half. Let's pick up the pace and get there in time to collect my three hundred seventy-five livres and get away again before the hangman's customer arrives."

"Two customers, Sir," added the burgher. "They're hanging a pair."

"A thousand thanks to you, sir," said d'Artagnan who had become more careful about his manners as he had matured. And hustling Raoul along, he made his way rapidly toward the Place de Grève. Without the musketeer's experience of dealing with crowds, and a wrist of steel backed by strapping shoulders, neither of the 2 would have reached their destination. They abandoned the Rue Saint-Honoré, where Athos lived, and followed the quay along the river. D'Artagnan went first: his wrist, elbow, and shoulder formed three corners of a wedge that he knew how to thrust into a mob to get it to split apart like a block of wood. Occasionally he added the persuasion of the pommel of his sword, pushing it between the ribs of recalcitrant and using it to pry them apart, separating husband from wife, uncle from nephew, and brother from brother. The musketeer did all this so naturally and with such a friendly grin that one would have had to have a broken rib not to forgive him, or a heart of granite not to be charmed by his smile. When they arrived within sight of the pair of gallows, Raoul turned his head aside in disgust. But d'Artagnan had no eyes for the gibbets; all his attention was focused on his crooked-gabled house with its windows on the plaza. He saw in the square and around the houses lining it a number of off-duty musketeers, who, some with women on their arms, others with friends, were awaiting the hour of the ceremony. What delighted him most was that his tenant, the innkeeper, was so busy he hardly knew which way to turn. Three potboys weren't nearly enough to serve all the drinkers, who overflowed its common room, ground floor parlours, and court. D'Artagnan pointed out this flood of customers to Raoul and said, "That buffoon will have no excuse not to pay his quarterly rent. Look at all those drinkers, Raoul, spending freely. God be with you! What a prime location."

D'Artagnan nonetheless succeeded in catching the host by the corner of his apron and drawing attention to himself. "Ah, Sir Knight!" said the innkeeper, badly distracted. "Half a minute, if you will! I've got a hundred customers crazy to plunder my cellar."

"The cellar, fine but not the strongbox."

"Oh, Sir, your thirty-seven-and-a-half pistols are already counted out in my office but there are a dozen people lining the windows up there and emptying a cask of port I broke out this morning for them... Just give me a minute, a single minute."

"Go, do it."

"I'm leaving," said Raoul in an undertone to d'Artagnan. "This festival's ... ignoble."

"Sir," d'Artagnan replied severely, "you will do me the favour to stay right here. A soldier has to be familiar with such spectacles. Youth is the time to see such sights, for you won't know your true worth until you can view coarse and terrible things without letting them harden your heart. Besides, Raoul, would you abandon me to this? You'd just be sorry later. Here, let's go through to the courtyard in back, where there's a tree with some shade. Come sit with me where we can breathe air clear of the fumes of spilled juice."

The 2 latest guests of Our Lady's Portrait sat themselves where they could hear the ever-increasing noise of the crowd without losing sight of the drinkers seated at the cabaret's tables and overflowing its ground floor parlours. If d'Artagnan had been looking for a place from which to survey the field of battle, as he thought of his real estate, he could hardly have chosen better. The tree under which he and Raoul were sitting half-concealed them under its low boughs, shading a tumbledown table too broken for the drinkers to balance their glasses on it. As mentioned, from this post d'Artagnan could see everything. He watched the potboys passing back and forth, and the arrival of new drinkers, and the welcome – sometimes friendly, sometimes hostile – accorded to the newcomers by those already settled in place. He was watching at first just to pass the time, because his thirty-seven-and-a-half pistols were a long time in coming. Raoul brought up the delay: "Sir," he said, "if you don't get your tenant to make haste, the, er, customers will arrive, and after that we'll be hard pressed to get away again."

"You're right," said the musketeer. "Hello! Hey, someone! God be with you!" But though he shouted and pounded on the ramshackle table until it fell into splinters, no one came. D'Artagnan was preparing to get up and go demand an explanation from the innkeeper when the gate to the garden behind the courtyard opened, screaming on its rusty hinges, and a cavalier came through. He was carrying a sword, sheathed but not on his belt; he cast an anxious glance at d'Artagnan and his companion, and without closing the gate he crossed the courtyard and went into the cabaret, looking suspiciously at everybody and everything. "So, my two tenants communicate," said d'Artagnan. "It's probably just someone curious about the hanging." But just then the shouts and loud talk from the drinkers in the upper room came to a sudden halt. In this situation, silence was a far stranger circumstance than an increase of noise. D'Artagnan suddenly wanted to know the cause of this silence. He saw then that the man in the cavalier outfit had gone into the common room and was haranguing the drinkers, who listened to him attentively. D'Artagnan couldn't quite hear this speech due to the roar of the crowd that overwhelmed the words of the orator. But it soon came to an end, and then all the men in the common room went out in small groups, one after another, until only a half dozen remained upstairs. One of these six, the cavalier with the sword, took the innkeeper aside and engaged him in what looked like a serious talk, while the others built up the fire in the hearth – a strange thing to do, given the warmth of the weather. “It’s funny,” said d’Artagnan to Raoul, “but I think I recognise some of those men.”

“How, by their smell?” coughed Raoul. “All I can smell is smoke.”

“I think it smells more like a conspiracy,” said d’Artagnan.

He’d scarcely spoken when four of the men came out into the rear courtyard and, while maintaining a careless attitude, took up sentry positions by the garden gate, occasionally casting glances toward d’Artagnan that he found significant. “God,” he said to Raoul in a low voice, “there’s something going on here. Do you have a curious mind, Raoul?”

“Depending on the subject, Sir Knight.”

“Me, I’m as curious as an old woman. Let’s go inside and upstairs; I think we’ll see something to suit the curious.”

“But you know, Sir Knight, I have no desire to be a passive and indifferent spectator of the death of those two poor devils.”

“Do you think I do? What am I, a savage? Other business calls. Let’s go!”

They went into the cabaret and up to the common room, taking up positions at the front window that was strangely unoccupied. The two last customers in the room, instead of looking out the window, were still building up the fire. Upon seeing d’Artagnan and his friend come in, one whispered to the other, “Ah ha! Reinforcements.”

D’Artagnan nudged Raoul with his elbow. “Yes, mes Braves, reinforcements!” he said. “God’s noose, that’s a hell of a fire! What are you planning to cook with it?”

The two men burst into jovial laughter but instead of replying, just threw on more firewood. D’Artagnan continued to watch them. “Say,” remarked one of the fire-builders, “I guess you’re here to tell us when it’s time, is that it?”

“Exactly,” said d’Artagnan, in hopes of learning what was going on. “Why else would I be here?”

“In that case, you’d better go back to the window,” was the reply. D’Artagnan smiled into his moustache, made a sign to Raoul, and leaned casually on the windowsill.

Long Live Colbert!

The spectacle that presented itself on the Grève at that moment was frightful. The heads of the crowd, dwindling in perspective, extended across the plaza like ears of corn in a vast field. From time to time an unexplained noise or a distant roar made heads bob and thousands of eyes flash. Now and then there were great rolling waves like those on the ocean, sweeping from the edges toward the centre, moving like tides to splash on the breakwater of archers that surrounded the gibbets. Then the hafts of halberds fell on the heads and shoulders of the more reckless spectators, and sometimes it was even steel rather than wood, and in that case an empty circle opened around that guard, a gap that compressed those beyond its edge, pressing the crowd against the parapets along the Seine. From the upper window that overlooked the entire square, d’Artagnan saw, with inner satisfaction, that the off-duty musketeers and guards in the crowd knew how to make room for themselves with their fists and sword pommels. He noted with approval that they’d succeeded in forming a coherent group of about fifty men, thanks to the esprit de corps that doubles a soldier’s strength. And he was pleased to see that, beyond a dozen or so outliers scattered through the crowd, the group was holding together and was within range of his voice. But it wasn’t only the musketeers and guards who attracted d’Artagnan’s attention. Around the gallows, and especially near the Arcade Saint-Jean, swarmed a busy mass of burly roughnecks, men with tough faces purposefully gathering from among the distracted spectators; signals were exchanged as they met and shook hands. D’Artagnan noticed among the most active members of this group the cavalier he had seen come in through the garden gate and go upstairs to harangue the drinkers. This man was organising squads and issuing orders. “God be with you!” said d’Artagnan. “Now I recognise him, and no mistake: it’s Menneville. What the devil is he doing here?” A muffled roar, gradually increasing, drew his attention in another direction: the prisoners were arriving. A strong picket of archers preceded them and took up positions at the entrance of the arcade. The whole crowd cried out, their voices combining into an immense roar. D’Artagnan saw Raoul go pale and smacked him roughly on the shoulder. At the sound of this great cry, the fire-stokers turned and called to ask what was happening. “The condemned have arrived,” said d’Artagnan.

“Good,” they replied, building the fire even higher.

D’Artagnan cast a worried look at them; it was obvious that men who made such a huge fire for no apparent reason were up to something – but what?

The condemned prisoners entered the Place. They walked on foot, the executioner leading them, fifty archers marching to their left and right. Both were dressed in black and appeared pale but resolute. They lifted their heads as they walked, looking up and ahead. D’Artagnan noticed this: “God be with you!” he said. “They’re in a strange hurry to see the gallows.”

Raoul recoiled from the sight, though he lacked the strength to leave the window entirely. Even terror has its attractions. “Death! Death!” cried twenty thousand voices.

“Death to the thieves!” cried the hundred roughnecks, louder than anyone.

“To the rope! String them up!” cried the surging crowd. “Long live the king!”

“The king?” murmured d’Artagnan. “That’s funny, I’d think it’s Sir Colbert who’s hanging these men.”

Just then a great rolling wave in the crowd stopped for a moment the march of the condemned. The gang of toughs d’Artagnan had noticed had managed, by dint of pushing and pummelling, in nearly reaching the line of archers. The procession resumed its march. Suddenly to cries of “Long live Colbert!” the roughnecks d’Artagnan was watching threw themselves upon the escort who tried in vain to drive them back. Behind the toughs surged the crowd. Then came a frightful commotion with an awful din. This time, in addition to shouts of excitement there were cries of pain. The halberds began to come down, swords began to thrust, muskets to fire. D’Artagnan couldn’t make out what was going on in the middle of this confusion until suddenly the chaos began to resolve into purposeful action. The condemned had been torn from the guards’ hands and were being hustled toward Our Lady’s Portrait. The tough customers who dragged them along were shouting, “Long live Colbert!” The people hesitated, unsure whether to fall on the archers or the roughnecks. What decided them was when the men shouting, “Long live Colbert!” began crying, “No hanging! Down with the gallows! Burn the thieves! Burn the embezzlers!” These cries were greeted with a rising enthusiasm. The crowd had come to see an execution and now had the chance to perform one themselves. This was an agreeable change for the populace, so they quickly took the side of the ruffians against the archers, and the shout of the minority soon became that of the majority: “Yes, yes, burn the thieves! Long live Colbert!”

“God!” said d’Artagnan. “This is beginning to look serious.”

One of the fire-stokers came to the window carrying a flaming brand. “Ah ha!” he said. “Things are heating up!” he turned to his companion and called, “That’s the signal!”

And he suddenly plunged his firebrand against the wall’s wooden baseboard. Our Lady’s Portrait was no new structure, and its aged wood needed little persuasion to catch fire. Within seconds the boards were aflame, and sparks were rising and spreading. A roar from outside responded to the cries from the arsonists. D’Artagnan who had been engrossed by the scene out the window, suddenly felt the heat of the flames and choked on the smoke. “Hello!” he cried, turning around. “What’re you doing with that fire? Are you out of your minds?”

The two men stared at him in astonishment. “What do you mean?” they said to d’Artagnan. “Isn’t this the plan?”

“That’s the plan? To burn down my house?” shouted d’Artagnan.

And he grabbed the firebrand from the arsonist’s hand and smashed it into his face. The second thug started to come to his friend’s aid but Raoul grabbed him, lifted him up and threw him out the window, while d’Artagnan threw the first thug down the stairs. Raoul who had finished first, wrenched the burning baseboard from the wall and threw it smoking into the middle of the room. At a glance, d’Artagnan saw there was nothing more to fear from the fire and dashed back to the window. The riot was at its height; everywhere people were shouting, “Burn them! Kill them! Hang them! Burn them at the stake! Long live Colbert and long live the king!”

The group carrying the condemned away from the archers was approaching the cabaret that appeared to be their goal. Menneville was at the head of the group, shouting louder than anyone, “Into the fire! Into the fire! Long live Colbert!”

D’Artagnan began to understand: they intended to burn the condemned men and his house was to be the inferno. “Stop there!” he shouted, sword in hand and one foot on the windowsill. “Menneville, what are you trying to do?”

“Sir d’Artagnan!” cried the latter. “Make way, make way!”

“Into the fire! Burn the thieves! Long live Colbert!” cried the crowd.

These shouts exasperated d’Artagnan. “God be with you!” he snarled. “To burn those poor devils when they were only condemned to be hanged is monstrous!”

Menneville and his men, dragging the convicts, were only ten paces from the door but in front of the entrance, the mass of curious people pressed up against the wall was so thick that it barred the way. Menneville made a final effort, shouting “Make way! Make way!” and waving his pistol.

“Burn them!” chanted the crowd. “Set fire to Our Lady’s Portrait! Burn the thieves! Burn them both in Our Lady’s Portrait!”

There could no longer be any doubt: it was d’Artagnan’s house they planned to burn. D’Artagnan remembered the old rallying cry he had always been able to depend upon and shouted in a voice like a giant, “To me, Musketeers!” He had one of those voices that carry over cannon fire, the sea, and storms. “To me, Musketeers!”

And balancing on the windowsill, d’Artagnan leapt down into the crowd that began to draw back from this house that rained men. Raoul followed, also with sword in hand. All the musketeers in the Place heard his call, turned and recognised d’Artagnan. “The captain! To the captain!” they cried with one voice.

And the crowd opened before them as the sea does before the prow of a ship. At that moment d’Artagnan and Menneville found themselves face to face. “Make way! Make way!” shouted Menneville, seeing he was within arm’s-reach of the door.

“No one gets by,” said d’Artagnan.

“Take this, then!” said Menneville and levelled his pistol at point-blank range.

But before the hammer came down, d’Artagnan knocked up his arm with his sword’s forte, then turned the blade and ran the point through his body. “I told you to stay out of trouble,” d’Artagnan said as Menneville fell at his feet.

“Make way! Make way!” cried Menneville’s companions who were frightened at first but reassured when they saw they had only two men to deal with.

But those two men were like giants with a hundred arms, their blades flickering in their hands like the flaming sword of the archangel. They pierced with the point, struck with the flat, and cut with the edge. Every blow took down a man. “For the king!” cried d’Artagnan with every man he struck, and every man fell. That call became the watchword of the musketeers, who, guided by it, cut their way to d’Artagnan. Meanwhile the archers recovered from their reversal, charged the gang of roughnecks and, grinding like millstones, crushed and shot down all opposition. The crowd, seeing swords flashing and blood spattering, recoiled upon itself. And then the cries for mercy rose from the vanquished, and the convicts fell back into the hands of the archers. D’Artagnan then approached the condemned men; seeing them pale and terrified, he said, “Console yourselves, gentlemen, you’ll not be tortured by these ruffians. The king’s sentenced you to be hanged and hanging’s all you have to fear.” Our Lady’s Portrait was out of danger: for lack of water, the fire had been put out with 2 barrels of juice. The conspirators had fled through the garden, and the archers took the condemned back to the gallows. After that, the affair didn’t take long to reach its conclusion. The executioner, hurriedly skipping his usual routines, hastily sent the two wretches to their fates. Meanwhile, a crowd gathered around d’Artagnan, admiring and congratulating him. He wiped his forehead dripping with sweat, his sword dripping with blood, and shrugged his shoulders at seeing Menneville at his feet writhing in his final agonies. While Raoul looked compassionately away, d’Artagnan gestured from his musketeers toward the gallows, laden with their sad fruit. “Poor devils!” he said. “I hope they died blessing me for I saved them from a more dreadful fate.”

These words reached Menneville just as he drew his final breath. A dark and ironic response trembled on his lips, and he tried to reply but the effort cost him his life. He died. “Oh, this is frightful,” murmured Raoul. “Let’s go, Sir Knight.”

“Are you wounded?” asked d’Artagnan.

“No, thankfully.”

“Good! You’re a brave lad, God be with you! You have your father’s wits and Porthos’s arm. Ah, if Porthos had been here, then we’d have seen some fine fighting!”

Then, as if that brought the subject to mind, he murmured, “But where the devil is my brave Porthos?”

“Come, Knight, let’s go,” insisted Raoul.

“One more minute, my friend – just let me collect my thirty-seven-and-half pistoles and I’m yours. It’s a profitable property,” added d’Artagnan as he re-entered Our Lady’s Portrait, “but I wish it was in a different neighbourhood, even if it that would make it less profitable.”

While this cacophonous and bloody scene was playing out on the Grève, several men, barricaded behind the cabaret’s garden gate, slammed their swords back in their sheaths and helped one of their number leap onto a waiting horse. Then, like a flock of frightened birds, they scattered in all directions, some climbing the walls, others rushing through doors with the recklessness of panic. The one who mounted the horse plied his spurs with such brutality that the animal nearly broke through the wall before getting out the back gate. This rider then crossed the Place Baudoyer like a flash of lightning through the people crowding the neighbouring streets, trampling or overturning anyone who got in his way, and ten minutes later arrived at the gate of the superintendent’s house, more breathless than his horse. Abbot Fouquet, at the sound of horseshoes ringing on pavement, appeared at a window overlooking the courtyard, and before the rider’s foot even touched the ground he leaned out and asked, “Well, Danicamp?”

“It’s all over,” said the horseman.

“Over!” said the abbot. “Then they’re saved?”

“No, Sir,” replied the rider. “They’re hanged.”

“Hanged!” repeated the abbot, going pale.

A side door suddenly opened and Fouquet entered the room, pale, distraught, lips parted in a cry of pain and anger. Just inside the doorway he paused, listening to the conversation between the window and courtyard. “Dogs!” said the abbot. “Didn’t you fight?”

“Like lions.”

“Say rather like cowards.”

“Sir!”

“A hundred soldiers of fortune, sword in hand, are a match for a thousand archers in a surprise attack. Where is Menneville, that braggart, who boasted that he would return either victorious or dead?”

“Well, Sir, he kept his word! He’s dead.”

“Dead! Who killed him?”

“A demon disguised as a man, a giant armed with ten flaming swords, a madman who at once put out the fire, stopped the riot, and called up a hundred musketeers from the pavement of the Place de Grève.”

Fouquet lifted his head, his brow dripping with sweat. “Oh! Lyodot and d’Emerys!” he murmured. “Dead! Dead! And I, dishonoured.”

The abbot turned and, seeing his brother so livid and distressed, said, “Come, now. It’s a stroke of fate, Sir, and we mustn’t take it so hard. If the attempt failed, it’s because God…”

“Silence, Abbot! Shut up!” cried Fouquet. “Your excuses are blasphemies. Get that man up here to tell us the details of this horrible event.”

“But, Brother…”

“Obey me, Sir!”

The abbot beckoned, and a half-minute later the man’s footsteps could be heard on the stairs. Meanwhile, Gourville appeared behind Fouquet like the superintendent’s guardian angel, pressing a finger to his lips to enjoin him to get control of himself despite his grief. The minister composed his demeanour and assumed what calmness he could with a heart half broken with pain. Danicamp came in.

“Make your report,” said Gourville.

“Sir,” replied the messenger, “we’d received the order to abduct the prisoners while shouting ‘Long live Colbert,’ and the condemned were taken.”

“To burn them alive, right, Abbot?” interrupted Gourville.

“Yes! Exactly! The orders had been given to Menneville, Menneville knew what had to be done and Menneville’s dead.”

This news seemed to reassure Gourville rather than sadden him. “To burn them alive, yes?” repeated the messenger as if he doubted that this order could be what was meant.

“Yes, of course, to burn them alive,” the abbot brutally repeated.

“Right, Sir, right,” said the messenger, looking intently at the faces of his 2 interrogators to try to understand what they wanted to hear, and how much of the truth it would be to his advantage to recount.

“Now, tell us what happened,” said Gourville.

“The prisoners,” continued Danicamp, “were carried across the Grève, the people in a fury calling for them to be burned rather than hanged.”

“The people had it right,” said the abbot. “Continue.”

“But,” resumed the man, “just as the archers had been driven back, at the moment when the fire was catching in the house designated as the pyre to burn the convicts, a madman, a demon, that giant I spoke of, whom we were told was the owner of the house in question, helped by a young man who was with him, threw the arsonists out the window, summoned the musketeers in the crowd to his aid, and jumped down into the square. There he plied his sword so desperately that victory went to the side of the archers, the prisoners were recaptured, and Menneville was killed. Once recaptured, the condemned were executed within three minutes.”

Fouquet, despite himself, couldn’t keep from uttering a groan. “And this man, the owner of the house, what was his name?” demanded the abbot.

“I can’t tell you, since I never saw him. My post was to remain in the garden, and I stayed at my post until they came to tell me what had happened. I was ordered, once the thing was over, to report to you how it had ended as soon as possible. Following orders, I left at the gallop, and here I am.”

“Very well, Sir, we have nothing more to ask of you,” said the abbot shakily, increasingly afraid of the moment when he’d have to face his brother alone.

“Have you received your fee?” asked Gourville.

“Just the down payment, Sir,” replied Danicamp.

“Here are twenty pistoles. Go, Sir, and continue to defend, as was done this time, the true interests of the king.”

“Yes, Sir,” said the man, bowing and putting the coins into his pocket.

Then he went out. He was scarcely out of the room before Fouquet, who had stood immobile in the background, stepped quickly forward between the abbot and Gourville. Both simultaneously opened their mouths to speak. “No excuses!” Fouquet said. “No recriminations against anyone. If I hadn’t been a false friend, I’d not have trusted anyone else to liberate Lyodot and d’Emerys. I alone am guilty, and to me alone belong the reproaches and the remorse. Leave me, Abbot.”

“However, Sir,” replied the latter, “you won’t stop me from finding the wretch who interceded so effectively on the behalf of Sir Colbert. Because if it’s good policy to love one’s friends well, I think it’s no bad thing to pursue one’s enemies as fiercely.”

“That’s enough politics, Abbot; go, I say, and make sure I hear nothing about you until I send for you again. What we need now, with this terrible example before us, are silence and circumspection. No reprisals, Gentlemen – I forbid it.”

“There are no orders,” growled the abbot, “that can prevent me from avenging on the culprit an affront to my family.”

“And I tell you,” announced Fouquet in that voice of authority to which there is no reply, “that if you have one thought, a single thought, that is not in accord with my will, two hours after you have that thought you will find yourself in the Bastille. Guide your behaviour accordingly, Abbot.”

The abbot coloured but bowed. Fouquet made a sign to Gourville to follow him and was already on his way to his office when the usher announced in a loud voice, “Sir Knight d’Artagnan.”

“Who’s that?” said Fouquet negligently to Gourville.

“A former lieutenant in His Majesty’s Musketeers,” replied Gourville in the same tone. Fouquet didn’t even bother to pause, just continued on his way. “A moment, My Lord!” Gourville then said. “Now that I think of it, this brave fellow’s left the king’s service and has probably come to collect his quarterly pension.”

“The devil!” said Fouquet. “Why is he so ill-timed as to do it now?”

“Allow me, my Lord, to politely refuse him then; he’s a man of my acquaintance, and one who is better, under the current circumstances, to have as a friend than an enemy.”

“Answer him however you like,” said Fouquet.

“What? My God!” said the abbot angrily, as full of spite as a man of the Church could be. “Tell him there’s no money, especially for musketeers.”

But the abbot had scarcely uttered these imprudent words when the half-opened door swung wide and d’Artagnan appeared. “Eh, Sir Fouquet,” he said, “I was well aware there wasn’t any money for musketeers. Which is why I didn’t come to get it but to be refused – which you’ve done, thank you. I bid you good morning and am off to find Sir Colbert.”

And after a rather curt bow, he left. “Gourville,” said Fouquet, “go after that man and bring him back to me.”

Gourville obeyed, catching up with d’Artagnan on the stairs. D’Artagnan, hearing quick footsteps behind him, turned and saw Gourville. “God be with you, Sir,” he said, “it’s a sad way you gentlemen of finance have of receiving people these days. I come to Sir Fouquet to ask for a sum ordered by His Majesty and am received like a beggar come to ask for alms, or a burglar who comes to steal the silver.”

“But I thought I heard you mention the name of Sir Colbert, dear Sir d’Artagnan; did you say you’re going to Colbert’s office?”

“Of course, I’m going there, if only to demand satisfaction for people who try to burn my house while crying, ‘Long live Colbert!’”

Gourville perked up his ears. “Oh ho!” he said. “Are you referring to what just happened on the Grève?”

“Yes, exactly.”

“And how did those events concern you?”

“What! How did it concern me? How could it not concern me if Sir Colbert wants to turn my house into a funeral pyre?”

“Wait, your house … you say it was your house they wanted to burn?”

“Yes, by God!”

“You own the cabaret of Our Lady’s Portrait?”

“Since a week ago.”

“And you were that brave officer, that valiant sword that scattered those who wanted to burn the condemned?”

“My dear Sir Gourville, put yourself in my place: I’m a king’s officer and a property owner. As an officer, my duty is to see the king’s orders accomplished. As a property owner, my interest is to not let people burn my house. So, I followed the laws of interest and duty at the same time by restoring Gentlemen Lyodot and d’Emerys into the hands of the archers.”

“So, it was you who threw a man out the window?”

“I, myself,” replied d’Artagnan modestly.

“It was you who killed Menneville?”

“I had that misfortune,” said d’Artagnan, bowing like a man being congratulated.

“It was you, in short, who caused the condemned to be hanged?”

“In place of being burned, yes, Sir, and I glory in it. I saved those poor devils from a terrible fate. Do you know, Sir Gourville, that they wanted to burn them alive? It’s unbelievable.”

“Go, my dear Sir d’Artagnan, go,” said Gourville, hoping to spare Fouquet the sight of the man who had caused him such deep sorrow.

“No,” said Fouquet, who had listened from the door to the antechamber. “No, Sir d’Artagnan – on the contrary, come in.”

D’Artagnan wiped a drop of blood that he’d missed from his sword pommel and returned. There he found himself face to face with three men whose faces bore very different expressions: anger from the abbot, confusion from Gourville, and dejection from Fouquet. “Excuse me, Sir Minister,” said d’Artagnan, “but time is pressing. I must see the intendant to explain myself to Sir Colbert and collect my quarterly pay.”

“But sir,” said Fouquet, “there is money here.”

D’Artagnan, astonished, stared at the superintendent. “You’ve been mistreated, sir – I know, for I heard it,” said the minister. “A man of your merit should be well received by everyone.”

D’Artagnan bowed. “Do you have an order of payment?” added Fouquet.

“Yes, Sir.”

“Give it to me and I’ll pay it myself. Come.” He made a sign to Gourville and the abbot to remain in the antechamber and took d’Artagnan into his office. Once within, he said, “How much are you owed, Sir?”

“Well … five thousand livres, my Lord.”

"For a year's salary?"

"For one quarter."

"Five thousand livres for a quarter!" said Fouquet, giving the musketeer a much closer look than before. "Is the king paying you twenty thousand livres a year?"

"Yes, My Lord, twenty thousand livres. Do you think it's too much?"

"Me!" said Fouquet, and he smiled bitterly. "If I knew anything about men if I was, instead of being frivolous, inconsequential, vain, of a mind that's prudent, and wise – if I was, in short, able to arrange my affairs properly, you'd not receive twenty thousand livres a year but a hundred thousand, and you'd not belong to the king but to me!"

D'Artagnan blushed slightly. There is sometimes in the way that a compliment is paid, in the voice of the admirer, in his affectionate tone, a poison so sweet that even the strongest may succumb to it. The superintendent followed this speech by opening a drawer with a flourish and drawing out four rolls of coins that he placed before d'Artagnan. The Gascon opened one. "It's gold!" he said.

"It's easier to carry, Sir."

"But, Sir, this is twenty thousand livres. "

"Quite so."

"But I'm owed only five."

"I wanted to save you the trouble of making more trips to the superintendent."

"You overwhelm me, Sir."

"I do my duty, Sir Knight, and I hope you won't hold a grudge over my brother's rude reception. He's a creature of spite and whimsy."

"Sir," said d'Artagnan, "believe me, nothing would grieve me more than to have to accept your apologies."

"Then I will stop there, and content myself with asking a favour of you."

"Of me? Oh, Sir!"

Fouquet drew from his finger a diamond ring easily worth a thousand pistoles. "Sir," he said, "this stone was given to me by a childhood friend, a man you have rendered a great service."

His voice nearly choked as he said this. "A service!" said the musketeer. "Me? I rendered a service to one of your friends?"

"You can't have forgotten it, Sir, for it happened today."

"Your friend's name's...?"

"Sir d'Emerys."

"One of the condemned?"

"Yes, one of the victims ... well! Sir d'Artagnan, in recognition of the service you rendered him, I beg you to please accept this diamond. Do it for my sake."

"Sir..."

"Accept it, I say. Today is a day of mourning for me – later you may understand why. Today, I lost one friend but, well, perhaps I can find another."

"But, Sir Fouquet..."

"Farewell, Sir d'Artagnan, farewell!" said Fouquet, his heart in his mouth. "Or rather, see you shortly!"

And the minister left his office, leaving in the hands of the musketeer the ring and twenty thousand livres. "My faith!" said d'Artagnan after a moment of gloomy reflection. "How am I supposed to make sense of this? God be with you! All I know is that there goes a very gallant man. Now to go and sort things out with Sir Colbert." And he went out.

Concerning the Notable Differences d'Artagnan found between the Intendant & the Superintendent

Sir Colbert lived in Rue Neuve-des-Petits-Champs in a house that had once belonged to Bautru. On d'Artagnan's legs he made it in a quarter-hour. When he arrived at the new favourite's house, the courtyard was full of archers and neighbourhood watchmen come either to congratulate him or to make their excuses, depending on whether they thought he'd praise or blame them. The urge to flatter is a survival instinct in the oppressed; it's a natural sense, like that of hearing and smell in a wild animal. These watchmen or their leader sensed there was an opportunity to gratify Sir Colbert by reporting to him how his name had been invoked during the riot. D'Artagnan arrived and stood near the door, behind the archers, just as the Chief of the Watch was making his report. This officer drew Colbert aside, despite the intendant's reluctance and the furious frown of his beetling brows. "In the event, Sir," the chief said, "that you really wanted the people to inflict justice on the two traitors, it would have been a good idea to warn them, because, though we'd hate to displease you, Sir, we had our orders to go through with the execution."

"Triple fool!" replied Colbert angrily, shaking his mane of black hair. "What are you saying? That I wanted to cause a riot? Are you drunk, or are you mad?"

"But, Sir, everyone was shouting, 'Long live Colbert!'" replied the chief, deeply dismayed.

"A handful of conspirators..."

"No, much more, a huge crowd of people!"

"Oh, really, now," said Colbert, exasperated. "A crowd of people cried: Long live Colbert! Be certain of what you're saying, Sir."

"All one had to do was open his ears, or rather cover them, the cries were so terrible."

"And you say these were the people, the true people?"

"Absolutely, Sir – assuming the true people could beat us up."

"Ah, is that so?" said Colbert thoughtfully. "So, you thought those must have been citizens who wanted to burn the condemned?"

"Oh, yes, Sir!"

"That's different then ... and you fought back bravely?"

"Three of our men were trampled, Sir."

"You didn't kill anyone, I hope?"

"A few rioters were left on the square, Sir, including one who's not a commoner."

"Who?"

"A certain Menneville whom the police have had their eyes on for a while."

"Menneville!" cried Colbert. "The same man who, in the Rue de la Huchette, killed a brave fellow who'd asked for a plump chicken?"

"Yes, Sir, the same."

"And this Menneville was one of those who cried, 'Long live Colbert'? Wasn't he?"

"Louder than anyone – like a madman."

Colbert's forehead furrowed darkly. The glow of successful ambition that had lit up his face went out like a firefly crushed underfoot. "Why then did you say," continued the intendant slowly, "that the movement sprang from the people? Menneville's my enemy; I'd have hanged him if I could as well he knew; and Menneville belonged to Abbot Fouquet. This whole affair originated with Fouquet – did you not know the condemned were his childhood friends?"

That's true, thought d'Artagnan, and that makes matters clear. As clear as the fact that Fouquet, no matter what his actions, is still a gallant man.

"And you're sure," continued Colbert, "that this Menneville is dead?"

D'Artagnan decided the moment had come to make his entrance. "Quite dead, Sir," he said, stepping forward suddenly.

"So, Sir, it's you, is it?" said Colbert.

"In person," replied the musketeer calmly and deliberately. "It seems that you had in this Menneville a nasty little enemy."

"He wasn't my enemy, Sir," replied Colbert, "but the king's."

Two-faced animal, thought d'Artagnan, trying to play the haughty hypocrite with me. Aloud he said, "Well! I'm happy to have rendered the king a service, then. Would you mention it to His Majesty, Sir Intendant?"

"Are you giving me an assignment, Sir? What, exactly, are you directing me to say?" replied Colbert in a voice dripping with hostility.

"I give no assignments," responded d'Artagnan with that calm that is more infuriating than mockery. "I thought it might be convenient for you to inform His Majesty that it was I who, finding myself with the opportunity, rendered justice upon Sir Menneville and restored the situation to order."

Colbert turned wide-eyed upon the watchman. "It's true, quite true," the chief said. "Sir here's our saviour."

"Sir, if you'd come to tell me that, why didn't you say so?" Colbert said to d'Artagnan, oozing envy. "That explains everything and makes it better for you than anyone."

"You are mistaken, Sir Intendant, I didn't come to tell you that."

"It's a notable feat nonetheless, sir."

"Oh, not if one does it often enough," the musketeer said nonchalantly.

"Then to what do I owe the honour of your visit?"

"That's simple enough: the king ordered me to come see you."

"Ah!" said Colbert, regaining his aplomb as he saw d'Artagnan draw a paper from his doublet. "So, it was to ask me for money?"

"Exactly, sir."

"Wait a moment, if you please, sir, while I finish with the watchman."

D'Artagnan turned on his heel rather insolently, and then, finding himself once more facing Colbert after spinning around, he bowed theatrically like a Harlequin on a stage and then marched away toward the door. Colbert was amazed at this unexpected response. Usually men of the sword, when they came to his office, had such a desperate need for money that until they were paid they seemed rooted to the floor with inexhaustible patience. Was d'Artagnan on his way to the king? Was he going to complain about how badly he'd been received, or tell of today's exploit? It was a matter for urgent and serious thought. In any event, it had been an ill-chosen moment to dismiss d'Artagnan whether he came from the king or on his own account. He had rendered too great a service and too recently to be fobbed off like that so Colbert thought it would be better to drop his haughty tone and recall the musketeer. "Ahoy! Sir d'Artagnan!" he called. "Are you leaving so soon?"

D'Artagnan turned around. "Why not?" he said serenely. "We don't have anything more to talk about, do we?"

"Don't you at least have money to collect, since you have a bill of payment?"

"Me? Not at all, my dear Sir Colbert."

"But, Sir, you have a bill! And just as you deliver a sword-thrust when the king requires it, I deliver payment when presented with a royal bill. So, present it."

"No need, my dear Sir Colbert," said d'Artagnan, who was enjoying Colbert's discomfiture. "This bill's been paid."

"Paid! By whom?"

"Why, by the superintendent."

Colbert paled. "Explain, then," he said, almost choking, "if it's been paid, why show it to me?"

"As a consequence of the king's order to which I referred just now, dear Sir Colbert. The king ordered me to collect a quarter of the year's salary he's been good enough to offer me."

"Collect it ... from me?" said Colbert.

"Not exactly. The king said, 'Go see Sir Fouquet; the superintendent might not have the money, so then go to Sir Colbert.'"

Colbert's expression brightened for a moment but his face was like a permanently stormy sky that was only ever lit by a brief and occasional flash of lightning among the clouds. "And ... the superintendent had the money?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, no shortage of money," replied d'Artagnan. "That must be the case, because Sir Fouquet, instead of making my quarterly payment of five thousand livres..."

"A quarterly payment of five thousand livres!" cried Colbert, as surprised as Fouquet had been by so large a sum designated as a soldier's salary. "Meaning twenty thousand livres a year?"

"Right, Sir Colbert. Faith, you calculate like Pythagoras! Yes, twenty thousand livres. "

"Ten times the salary of an Intendant des Finances. My compliments to you," said Colbert with a poisonous smile.

"Yes, the king apologised that it wasn't more," said d'Artagnan. "But he promised to make it up later when he was better funded. But time presses so if we'd...?"

"To be clear, despite the king's expectations, the superintendent paid you?"

"Just as, despite the king's expectations, you refused to pay me."

"I didn't refuse you, Sir, I asked you to wait a moment. And you say Sir Fouquet paid you the entire five thousand livres?"

"Yes, just as you say you would have done ... but he did even better than that, my dear Sir Colbert."

"What did he do?"

"He politely counted out the entire year's salary, saying that for the king, the coffers were always full."

"The entire year's salary! You're saying Sir Fouquet paid you twenty thousand livres instead of five thousand?"

"Yes, sir."

"And why was that?"

"To spare me three more visits to the superintendent. So, I have all twenty thousand livres here, in my pocket, in lovely new-minted gold. You see, then, that I can go, since I have no need of you and came solely for form's sake."

And d'Artagnan slapped his ringing pockets with a laugh that showed Colbert thirty-two magnificent teeth as white as any twenty-five-year-old's, and which seemed to say in their toothy language, "Serve us up thirty-two little Colberts and we'll snap and grind up all of them."

The serpent is as brave as the lion, and the sparrow hawk as courageous as the eagle, it can't be denied. Even those animals we think of as cowards are brave when they must defend themselves, and Colbert wasn't afraid of d'Artagnan's thirty-two teeth. He stiffened and said sharply, "Sir, what the superintendent did today, he had no right to do."

"Why do you say that?" replied d'Artagnan.

"Because your bill ... may I see it, please, your bill?"

"Gladly; here it is."

Colbert grabbed the paper with an eagerness that worried the musketeer and made him regret having handed it over. "Well, Sir!" said Colbert. "Your royal order says the following: Upon presentation Sir d'Artagnan is to be paid five thousand livres that make up one quarter of the annual salary I grant him. "

"It says that, in fact," said d'Artagnan, feigning calm.

"Well! The king owed you only five thousand livres – why have you been paid more than that?"

"Because he had more than that and wanted to give it to me. It doesn't concern anyone else."

"It's no surprise that you should be ignorant of the rules of finance," said Colbert with smooth pride, "but tell me, Sir, when you owe a thousand livres, what do you do?"

"I never owe anyone a thousand livres," replied d'Artagnan.

"No matter," said Colbert irritably. "If you owe a payment, wouldn't you pay only what you owe?"

"That proves nothing," said d'Artagnan, "except that you have your rules of finance and Sir Fouquet has his."

"Mine, Sir, are the correct rules."

"I wouldn't argue that."

"And you have taken more than was owed you."

D'Artagnan's eyes flashed. "I was paid in advance that I'm sure is what you mean, Sir Colbert. For if I'd taken more than I was owed, that would be stealing."

Colbert didn't acknowledge this subtlety. "Thus, you have fifteen thousand livres that belong in the king's coffers," he said with jealous anger.

"You may record it as credit," replied d'Artagnan with a hint of irony.

"Not at all, Sir."

"What, then? Do you think to take back those three rolls of coins?"

"You will return them to my coffers."

"Me? Oh, Sir Colbert, I don't think so..."

"The king has need of his money, Sir."

"And I, Sir, have need of money from the king."

"Nonetheless, you will return it."

"Not a chance. I've always heard that under the rules of finance, as you put it, a good cashier neither gives back nor takes back."

"Then, Sir, we will see what the king says when I show him this bill that proves that Sir Fouquet not only pays for more than he owes, he doesn't even keep a receipt when he does it."

"Ah!" hissed d'Artagnan. "Now I understand why you took my bill from me, my dear Sir Colbert."

Colbert didn't remark the menace behind the way the musketeer pronounced his name. "You'll soon see how useful it is," he said, waving it between his fingers.

"Haha!" said d'Artagnan, snatching the paper away with a sudden movement. "I understand already, Sir Colbert, and don't need to wait to learn it."

And he stuffed away the paper he'd seized on the fly. "Sir, sir!" cried Colbert. "Such violence..."

"Come, now! Will you complain of the manners of an ignorant soldier?" replied the musketeer. "I kiss my hands to you, my dear Sir Colbert!"

And he went out, openly laughing at the future minister. "Now there was a man who was ready to befriend me," he said to himself. "It's a shame I had to put him in his place."

The Philosophy of the Heart & Mind

For a man who'd encountered so many men more dangerous than the intendant, d'Artagnan's clash with Colbert just seemed comical to him, so he didn't deny himself the pleasure of laughing at the intendant from the Rue Neuve-des-Petits-Champs all the way to the Rue des Lombards. This took some time, so d'Artagnan had a good, long laugh. He was still laughing when he came upon Planchet, at the door of his house, also laughing – for Planchet, since the return of his former master and the arrival of the English guineas, spent most of his time doing what d'Artagnan had only done between the Rue Neuve-des-Petits-Champs and the Rue des Lombards. "Are you home, then, my dear master?" said Planchet to d'Artagnan.

"No, my friend," replied the musketeer, "I'm away again as soon as I'm able, that is, after I eat and then sleep for five hours. At daybreak I jump into the saddle – did you give my horse a proper feeding?"

"Why, Master," replied Planchet, "you know very well your horse is the darling of the household. My boys indulge him all day long, sneaking him snacks from my sugar, hazelnuts, and biscuits. You ask if he's had enough to eat? Ask instead whether he's been fed to death."

"Fine, Planchet, fine. On, then, to my concerns: what about supper?"

"It's ready, mon maître : a roast joint, juice, steamed crayfish, and fresh cherries."

"You're a fine fellow, Planchet! Supper, then, and off to bed."

During supper, d'Artagnan noticed Planchet rubbing at his forehead, as if trying to focus his thoughts. He looked affectionately at his worthy companion of so many adventures, clinked his glass against Planchet's and said, "Come, friend Planchet, what are you having such a hard time putting into words? God be with you! Speak up and say your piece."

"It looks to me," said Planchet, "like you're going on an expedition of some sort."

"I wouldn't say no."

"Then you've got some new idea in mind?"

"It's possible, Planchet."

"Well, are you in need of capital to back this venture? I've fifty thousand livres to put behind whatever idea you're exploring."

And Planchet rubbed his hands together eagerly. "There's just one trouble with that, Planchet," replied d'Artagnan.

"What's that?"

"The idea isn't my own, so I can't profit from it." These words tore a heartfelt sigh from Planchet. Avarice is a seductive advisor; she leads her man as Satan led Jesus to the mountain, shows the unhappy fellow all the realms of the earth, and then retires with a smile, knowing she's leaving her companion, Envy, to gnaw at his heart. Planchet had tasted easy money and couldn't resist the desire for more of it. But as he was a good-hearted man despite his greed, and as he adored d'Artagnan, he couldn't keep from offering all sorts of careful advice and counsel. He wouldn't have been sorry to get a hint about the secret his master concealed so well but ruses, clever tricks, and artful questions were all to no avail; when d'Artagnan had a covert mission, his lips were sealed. And so, the evening passed. After supper, d'Artagnan turned his attention to his baggage, and then visited the stable, rubbing down his horse and inspecting its legs and tack. Then, having recounted his money, he went to bed, where, turning in like a twenty-year-old, without anxiety or remorse, he was asleep five minutes after blowing out his lamp. There was plenty that might have kept him awake: ideas filled his mind, there were possibilities to consider, and d'Artagnan was a great planner against contingencies but with that imperturbable calm that, to the man of action, is more valuable than genius, he put off all these considerations until the next day, in hopes, he told himself, of seeing them with fresh eyes in the morning. The day came. The Rue des Lombards received its share of caresses from rosy-fingered dawn, and d'Artagnan rose with the sun. He awoke no one, put his saddlebags under his arm, and crept down the staircase without a creak, unnoticed by all those still sonorously snoring from attic to cellar. Then having saddled his horse, he closed up both shop and stable and set off on his expedition to Brittany. He had had good reason the evening before not to think too much about all the political and diplomatic matters his mission touched upon, for now in the twilight and fresh air of morning he felt his ideas ripen and bear fruit. His first stop was in front of Fouquet's house where he threw into an open delivery box at the superintendent's door the blessed receipt that, the day before, he'd taken such pains to recover from the intendant's crooked fingers. Hidden in an envelope addressed to Fouquet, the note hadn't been noticed by Planchet, though in matters of divination he ranked with Calchas or Pythia of Apollo. D'Artagnan had thus returned the receipt to Fouquet without compromising himself, removing all further need to question his own honour. Having made his restitution, he said to himself, "Let's inhale deeply of the healthy morning air and breathe out all care! Let my horse Zephyr swell his lungs until he's a hemisphere, while I put my mind to ingenious calculations. It's time," continued d'Artagnan, "to devise a plan of campaign. Now, according to the methods of Sir de Turenne, who has a head positively swelling with ideas, before the plan of campaign it's advisable to consider the enemy generals with whom we'll be dealing. That brings us first to Sir Fouquet. And what's Sir Fouquet? Sir Fouquet," d'Artagnan replied to himself, "is a handsome man much loved by women, a gallant man much loved by poets, and a man of wit much hated by fools. As I'm not a woman, a poet, or a fool, I neither love nor hate the superintendent, so I find myself in the same position as Sir de Turenne before winning the Battle of the Dunes: he didn't hate the Spanish but he defeated them soundly anyway. Wait, God be with you, here's an even better example: I'm in the same position as Turenne when he faced the Prince de Condé at Jargeau, Gien, and Faubourg Saint-Antoine: he had nothing against Sir Prince but he was obeying the king. Sir Prince is a charming man but the king is the king; Turenne just gave a great sigh, said, 'Sorry, my Cousin,' and routed his army. Now, what does the king want? That's not my affair. Then, what does Sir Colbert want? Ah, that's another matter entirely! He wants whatever Sir Fouquet doesn't. And what does Sir Fouquet want? That's where it gets serious – because he wants to have everything the king wants." This monologue concluded, d'Artagnan laughed and twirled his riding crop merrily. He was already trotting along the high road, scattering the birds from the hedges, listening to his gold Louis jingle with every bounce, and we must confess when d'Artagnan was in that situation, timidity wasn't one of his vices. "Come," he said, "this mission isn't so dangerous! It'll be like that little show Sir Monck took me to see in London, the one titled Much Ado about Nothing."

Travel

For perhaps the fiftieth time since we began his life story, this man with a heart of bronze and limbs of steel once more left his home and his friends to seek fortune and face death. The one, that is to say, death, had constantly retreated before him as if afraid; the other, that is to say fortune, had been allied with him for only a month. Although he was no great philosopher, no Epicurus or Socrates, he had a capable mind, honed by a life of activity and thought. One is not as brave, as adventurous, and as adept as d'Artagnan without being at the same time a bit of a dreamer. He had retained a few of the maxims of Sir de La Rochefoucauld <sup>41</sup> deemed worthy of being put into Latin by the gentlemen of Port Royal, and he had collected, from the conversation of Athos and Aramis, a fair number of the sayings of Seneca and Cicero as translated by them and applied to the usages of everyday life. His contempt for wealth that our Gascon had considered an article of faith for the first 35 years of his career had long been regarded by him as the first commandment in the code of courage. "Article one," he would say, "we're brave because we've nothing and we've nothing because we despise riches." And with this leading principle as we've said, having guided his previous 35 years, a d'Artagnan suddenly rich had to wonder whether he was still brave despite his wealth. For anyone other than d'Artagnan, the events on the Place de Grève would have sufficed for an answer to that question. Another's conscience might have been satisfied with that but d'Artagnan was brave enough to inquire seriously into his bravery. "It seems to me I drew quickly enough and cut and thrust freely enough on the Place de Grève to be sure of my courage," he said to himself. Then, he replied, "That might sound good, Captain but it's no answer! I was brave because they threatened to burn my house, and it's a hundred, or even a thousand to one that if the rioters hadn't had that unfortunate idea, their plan of attack would have succeeded, or in any event it wouldn't have been me who thwarted it. And who do I have threatening me now? I have no house in Brittany to be burned, and no other treasure at risk. But no! I have my skin, the precious skin of Sir d'Artagnan that's worth more than all the houses and treasures in the world, the skin that's worth so much to me because, all things considered, it holds together a body around a warm heart that's always ready to fight, and therefore to live. So, I want to live, and in fact I live more fully and completely now that I'm rich. Who the devil said that money was the ruin of life? It's a lie, upon my soul! It seems to me, on the contrary, that now I enjoy the air and sun twice as much as before. God be with you! What if I double my fortune again, and trade in this riding crop I hold for a marshal's baton? If that happened, I don't think there'd be enough air and sun for me in the world! And that's by no means out of the question, for who the devil would oppose the king making me a duke and marshal, as his father, King Louis XIII, made a duke and constable out of Albert de Luynes? Aren't I as brave, and far smarter, than that imbecile de Vitry? Ah but that's just the thing that would hold me back – I'm too smart for my own good. Happily, if there's any justice in this world, then fortune will turn my way at some point. I'm certainly owed for everything I've done for Anne of Austria, given how little she's done in return. But now we're working for a king, and a king who seems to want to reign. God guide him to stay on that path! For if he wants to reign, he'll need me, and if needs me, he'll have to give me what he promised. Air and sun! So, I'm still marching, as I always have, from nothing to everything. Only the nothing of today is the everything of before and that's the thing that's changed. So, let's consider! Just what is the state of my heart? For that's what I was talking about, though I was only considering its former condition." And the Gascon placed his hand on his chest, as if seeking his heartbeat. "Why, you wretch!" he said with a bitter smile. "You dog! You hoped for a moment that you didn't have a heart but you do have one, and, terrible servant that you are, it's the heart of a traitor. For you have a heart that speaks to you on behalf of Sir Fouquet. And what is Sir Fouquet, now, in regard to the king? A conspirator, an actual conspirator, so much so that he didn't even bother to hide from you that he was conspiring. You could have been the blade to cut him down, if his good grace and noble spirit hadn't put you back in your sheath. An armed uprising! For that's no less than what Sir Fouquet devised. And if the king vaguely suspects Sir Fouquet of rebellion, I, in fact, could prove that Fouquet has already shed the blood of the king's subjects. So, let's summarize: I know all this and yet keep silent about it, and why? What more could I want from Sir Fouquet than an advance of fifteen thousand livres and a diamond worth a thousand pistoles, along with a smile in which there was as much bitterness as benevolence? Ah, it's that smile for which he owes me his life. But now, I hope that this fool of a heart will keep silent and speak to me no more of Sir Fouquet," continued the musketeer. "As of now, the king is my sun! We'll hear no more about Sir Fouquet, and anyone who comes between me and my sun must beware! Forward, forward, for His Majesty Louis XIV!" These reflections were the only impediment delaying d'Artagnan's travel. Now his reflections concluded, he picked up his mount's pace. But as perfect a horse as Zephyr was, he couldn't trot on indefinitely. The day after his departure from Paris he arrived at Chartres, where d'Artagnan left Zephyr with a friendly innkeeper he knew. From that point on, the musketeer travelled on post horses, employing that mode of locomotion to cross the distance from Chartres to Châteaubriand. In the latter town, far enough from the coast that no one would suspect d'Artagnan of aiming for the ocean, and far enough from Paris that no one might think he came from there as the messenger of Louis XIV, whom d'Artagnan had called his sun all unknowing that he who was still a poor star in the sky of royalty would one day take that day star as his emblem – that messenger of Louis XIV turned in his post horse and bought a swayback nag, a mount so disreputable that no cavalry officer would appear on it for fear of being dishonoured. Except for the colour of its coat, this new acquisition reminded d'Artagnan of the famous yellow horse on which he'd first made his entrance into the wide world. It would be fair to say that, once he'd mounted his new horse, it was no longer d'Artagnan who was riding forth but a man dressed in an iron-grey jerkin and brown knee breeches who could pass for either a priest or layman, though closer to a priest, for d'Artagnan had clapped on his head a velour skullcap and topped that with a round black hat. He wore no sword, just a thick stick hung by a cord from his forearm, with as backup a good ten-inch dagger hidden under his cloak. The nag bought at Châteaubriand completed the transformation, a mount called or rather that d'Artagnan named, "Ferret. And if Zephyr has been replaced by the lowly Ferret," d'Artagnan said, "then my name should diminish as well. So, instead of d'Artagnan I'll just be plain Agnan, a name that better suits my grey jerkin, round hat, and old skullcap." Sir Agnan thereafter travelled pretty comfortably upon Ferret, who could trot almost like a real horse, and even at his casual trot was able to make a good twelve leagues a day, thanks to his thin but sinewy shanks, whose virtues the experienced eye of d'Artagnan had detected beneath their coarse and furry coat. Along the way, the traveller made notes about the cold and severe country he rode across, while searching for a reasonable excuse to visit Belle-Île-en-Mer and take a look around without arousing suspicion. The more he thought about his mission, the more convinced he became of the importance of it. In that remote country, the formerly autonomous Duchy of Brittany that wasn't French at that time and is scarcely so today, the people knew nothing of the King of France. Not only didn't they know him, they did not want to know him. The only thing a Breton knew of politics was that his former dukes no longer governed him, leaving a void and nothing more. In place of the old sovereign duke, the parish lords ruled unchecked with above them only God, who has never been forgotten in Brittany. Among those lords of castles and convents, the richest, most powerful, and certainly the most popular was Sir Fouquet, Lord of Belle-Île. Even in that country, within actual sight of the mysterious isle, tradition made it the home of legends and wonders. Not everyone could go there: the island, 6 leagues long by 6 leagues wide was a lord-like property off-limits to the mainlanders who respected it all the more when it was ruled by the family of Rais, a name still dreaded in that country. Sometime after the lordship was elevated to a marquissate by Charles IX, Belle-Île had passed to Sir Fouquet. The isle's fame was no recent thing, dating back to farthest antiquity when it had been named Kalonese from two Greek words meaning beautiful island. Thus, even 1800 years earlier and in a different language, it had been called by the name it still bore. There was certainly something special about this property of the superintendent's beyond its position six leagues off the coast of France, a location that made it sovereign in its maritime solitude, like a majestic ship that scorned all harbours and cast its anchor in the open ocean. D'Artagnan learned all this without showing any apparent surprise or even interest. He also learned that the best place to hear news would be at La Roche-Bernard, a good-sized port town at the mouth of the Vilaine. Maybe there he could find a ship. Alternatively, he could cross the salt marshes to Guérande or Croisic and seek there for an opportunity to sail to Belle-Île. He had discovered, since his departure from Châteaubriand, that nothing seemed impossible to Ferret under the hand of Sir Agnan, and nothing Sir Agnan couldn't expect from the dependable Ferret. He therefore sat down to dine on some poultry and pie at an inn in La Roche-Bernard, washing them down from its cellar with some local cider that at first taste he recognised as the most Breton thing he had yet met.

How d'Artagnan Met a Poet who had become a Printer to Make Sure his Poems got Printed

Before sitting down to dine, d'Artagnan first, as was usual with him, gathered all the local information he could, following the axiom of curiosity that says a man who wants to ask questions must first be ready to answer questions himself. So, d'Artagnan sought, with his usual skill, a useful questioner in the inn at La Roche-Bernard. At the moment, there were two travellers up on the first floor who were either at supper or preparing for it. D'Artagnan had seen their horses in the stable and their baggage in the common room. One travelled with a lackey that placed him above the common, and 2 Perche mares, well-kept and well fed, served as their mounts. The other, a nondescript fellow of meagre means, wearing a dusty coat, threadbare stockings, and boots worn more by pavement than by the stirrup, had come from the direction of Nantes in a cart drawn by a horse so much like Ferret, except for its colour, that d'Artagnan would have had to search for a hundred leagues to find a closer match. This cart contained a number of bundles covered with old canvas. "That traveller there," said d'Artagnan to himself, "is the man for me. He suits me perfectly; now I just have to suit him. Sir Agnan, in his grey jerkin and drooping hat, is quite worthy of dining with the gentleman with the old boots and tired nag." That decided, d'Artagnan called the innkeeper and ordered him to carry his poultry, pie, and cider up to the room of the humble gentleman. Then plate in hand, he climbed the wooden staircase to the man's room and knocked on the door. "Enter!" said the stranger. D'Artagnan entered with a hopeful smile, his plate under his arm, his hat in one hand and a candle in the other. "Excuse me, sir," he said. "I'm a traveller like you, I know no one at this inn and I've the unfortunate habit of being bored when I must eat alone, so much so that my food seems flat and unappetizing. Your face that I saw just now when you went down to have your oysters opened for you, your face looks friendly – and besides, I noticed that you have a horse much like mine, and that the host, doubtless also noticing the resemblance, had placed them next to each other in the stable where they seemed to be getting along famously. I don't see, Sir, why the masters should be lonely when their horses are in good company. So, I came to ask the favour of sharing your table with you. My name is Agnan. Sir Agnan at your service, the unworthy steward of a wealthy lord who wants to buy into the local salt-drying works and sent me to inspect his investment. Truly, Sir, I hope my face pleases you as much as yours does me because I'd be honoured to make your acquaintance." The stranger whom d'Artagnan now saw closely for the first time having only glimpsed him before, had shining black eyes, a sallow complexion, a forehead lined by the passage of fifty years, and good-natured features with an intelligent look about them. You'd think this fellow never exercised anything but the upper part of his head, thought d'Artagnan. He's all eyes and brains; his mouth, nose, and chin are insignificant. "Sir," replied the person being considered so closely, "I'd be honoured as well, though I'm rarely bored, as my own company always amuses me," he added with a smile. "But no matter, I'm delighted to receive you." However, while saying this the man with the worn boots cast an anxious glance at his table, where his oysters had already disappeared, leaving behind only a slice of salted beef. "Sir," d'Artagnan said quickly, "the innkeeper is coming up with a pretty roast fowl and a fine pie." For d'Artagnan had read in his companion's eyes, however briefly, the fear of being taken advantage by a freeloader. He'd guessed rightly, and with his remark the humble traveller's expression softened. Right on cue, the innkeeper appeared in the doorway with a pair of dishes. The pie and the poultry having been added to the slice of salt bacon, d'Artagnan and his new acquaintance bowed to each other, sat down face to face, and shared the bacon and other dishes like two brothers. "Sir," said d'Artagnan, "you have to admit that having a dining companion is a wonderful thing." "How so?" asked the stranger around a mouthful of pie. "Well, I'll tell you," replied d'Artagnan. The stranger stopped chewing so he could hear better, "First of all," continued d'Artagnan, "instead of each of us dining by the light of only one candle, now we're lit by two." "That's true," said the stranger, nodding at the undeniable truth of this. "Then, I see that you're fond of my pie, while I, on the other hand, prefer your bacon." "That's also true." "Finally, even better than being well illuminated and eating what we prefer, is the pleasure of doing so in company." "Truly, you're a cheerful fellow, Sir," said the friendly stranger. "But yes, Sir! As cheerful as those of us with empty heads always are. Oh, I don't mean you!" continued d'Artagnan. "I see in your eyes the spark of genius." "Oh, Sir!" "Come now, admit something." "What?" "That you're a scholar." "Faith, Sir..." "Aren't you?" "Nearly." "Ah ha! Near in which direction?" "I'm an author." "There! I knew I was right!" cried d'Artagnan delightedly, slapping his knee. "It's almost miraculous." "Oh, Sir..." "Truly!" continued d'Artagnan. "That I should have the good fortune to spend the evening in the company of an author ... perhaps even a famous one?" "Oh!" said the stranger, blushing. "Famous, Sir, is hardly the word." "He's modest!" cried d'Artagnan, as if thrilled. "Modest and humble!" Then turning back to the stranger with an eager familiarity: "But please tell me, at least, the titles of your works, since you didn't tell me your name and I had to guess what you were." "My name is Jupenet, Sir," said the author. "A distinguished name!" said d'Artagnan. "Distinguished, upon my word. I'm not sure why, and pardon me if this is a mistake but I'm sure I've heard that name before." "I've written a few verses," said the poet modestly. "Well, there you go! I must've read them."

"Plus, a tragedy."
"I must have seen it performed."
The poet blushed again. "I don't think that can be it. My verses haven't yet been printed."
"In that case, I must know your name from that tragedy."
"You're mistaken, I'm afraid because the gentleman comedians of the Hotel of Bourgogne turned it down," said the poet with a sad smile of a solemnity known only to poets. D'Artagnan gnawed his lip.
"So, you see, Sir," continued the poet, "you can't have heard of me, as I'm still completely unknown."
"I can't account for it. It seems to me the name of Jupenet is a fine one, entirely worthy of being as well-known as those of Gentlemen Corneille, Rotrou, and Garnier. <sup>47</sup> I hope, Sir, that in place of dessert you will tell me a bit about your tragedy. It will be as good as pudding, God be with you! ...Ah, your pardon, sir, that's an oath I indulge in because it's the favourite of my master the lord, so sometimes I borrow it, as it must be in good taste. I allow myself that indulgence only in his absence, of course, because you understand that in his presence ... but really, sir, this cider is quite terrible. Don't you agree? And the carafe is so crooked it wobbles on the table."
"Shall we make it level?"
"Sure but with what?"
"With this knife."
"And then how will we cut up the roast fowl? Were you thinking of leaving this roast untouched?"
"Oh, by no means."
"Then how'll we...?"
"With this."

The poet fumbled in his pocket and drew out a rectangular bit of cast iron, about an inch and a half in length. But scarcely had the metal rectangle seen the light of day before the poet seemed to think he'd been incautious and made a move to return it to his pocket. But d'Artagnan had noticed it – he was a man who missed nothing – and reached for the bit of iron. "That's interesting. What's it?" he said. "May I see it?"
"Certainly," said the poet who repented of his urge to conceal it. "Of course – but if I let you see it," he said a trifle smugly, "you have to try to guess what it's for. Though you won't." D'Artagnan had taken the poet's hesitation and urge to hide the bit of iron as proof of its importance. His attention thus focused, he adopted a casual circumspection that gave him the advantage. And despite what Sir Jupenet had said, he'd recognised the function of the metal rectangle at first glance: it was a movable-type printing character. "Can't you guess what it is?" urged the poet.

"No!" said d'Artagnan. "My faith, no!"
"Well, Sir!" said Master Jupenet. "This little piece of metal is a printing character."
"Never!"
"An upper-case letter."
"Is it really?" said Sir Agnan, eyes wide and naïve.
"Yes, Sir, a capital J, the first letter of my name."
"That's a printing letter, right there?"
"Yes, Sir."

"Well! Can I ask something?"
"What's that?"
"No, never mind! It would sound too stupid."
"No, not at all!" said Master Jupenet, patronising.
"Well, all right, then. If this is just a letter, how do you make a word?"
"A word?"

"A whole word in printing, yes."
"That's very simple."
"Show me!"
"It interests you?"
"Very much!"
"Well, then! I'll explain it to you. Listen!"
"I'm listening."
"Pay attention."
"I shall."
"Watch closely."
"I'm watching." D'Artagnan did in fact seem completely absorbed. Jupenet drew from his pocket seven or eight other, smaller pieces of cast iron. "Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan.

"What?"
"You have a whole printing press in your pocket. Plague take me, it's fascinating!"
"Isn't it, though?"
"My God, the things you learn when you're travelling!"
"Your health, Sir," said Jupenet, delighted.
"And yours, God be with you! But not with any more of this cider – it's an abominable drink unworthy of a man who drinks à la Hippocrene. That is what you poets call your fountain, isn't it?"
"Yes, Sir, in fact that's what we call the poetic fountain. It comes from two Greek words, hippos that means horse, and..."
"Sir," interrupted d'Artagnan, "I'm going to pour you a drink that comes from a single French word, and none the worse for that: 'grape.' This cider nauseates and bloats me at once. Let me ask our host if he might not have a bottle of Beaugency or the vintage of Céran in the back of his cellar."
They called for the host, and he immediately appeared. "Sir," said the poet to d'Artagnan, "you should know, we might not have time to drink a bottle of juice unless we drain it quickly, for my boat has to sail with the tide."
"What boat?" asked d'Artagnan.
"Why, the boat I'm taking to Belle-Île."
"Ah! To Belle-Île!" said the musketeer. "How fine!"
"Bah! You'll have plenty of time, Sir," replied the innkeeper, uncorking the bottle. "The tide doesn't turn for an hour."
"But who will warn me when it's time?" asked the poet.
"Just watch your neighbour in the next room," replied the host.
"But I scarcely know him."
"When he prepares to depart, it's time to go."
"He's going to Belle-Île, too?"

"Yes."
"That gentleman with a lackey?" asked d'Artagnan.
"The gentleman with a lackey."
"Some lord, doubtless?"
"I have no idea."
"Really? No idea?"

"Yes. All I know is he ordered the same juice you did."
"Plague! That's quite an honour for us," said d'Artagnan, pouring a drink for his companion as the host departed.
"So," said the poet, returning to his earlier idea, "You've never seen a printing press?"
"Never."

"Here, I'll pick out some letters and with the J, we'll compose a word. O, R, my faith, here's a U, L, A, and N." And he assembled the letters with a speedy familiarity that didn't escape the eye of d'Artagnan. "There, you see? Journal."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. "I see the letters put together but how do they stay together?" And he refilled the poet's glass. Sir Jupenet smiled like a man who had an answer for everything. He drew from his pocket a small metal rectangle, adjusted its length, and dropped the letters into its slot. "And what do you call this little iron widget?" asked d'Artagnan. "I'm sure it has a name."
"It's called a composing stick," said Jupenet. "We stack and align them to form the rows of type."
"You see, it's just as I said – you've a printing press in your pocket," said d'Artagnan, laughing with such silly glee that the poet was completely taken in.

"No," he replied, "I'm just too lazy to write so when I've an idea for a verse I compose it right away for printing. It's a bonus of the job."
God! D'Artagnan thought. I must make sure of this. And making the usual excuse that didn't embarrass the musketeer in the least, he got up from the table, left the room, went down the staircase, and ran to the shed where he found the poet's little cart. There he poked under the canvas with the point of his dagger and opened one of the packages that he found full of cast-iron type like that in the poet's pocket. "Just so!" d'Artagnan said. "I don't know yet if Sir Fouquet plans to fortify Belle-Île but here's all the ammunition he could need to wage a war of words." Then pleased with his discovery, he returned to the table. D'Artagnan had learned everything he needed to know. Nonetheless, he stayed with his supper companion until they heard in the next room the sound of a man gathering his things. The printer had previously given orders for his horse to be harnessed, and immediately leapt to his feet. His cart was waiting at the door. The second traveller and his lackey were climbing into the saddle. D'Artagnan followed Jupenet to the port and watched him put his horse and cart onto the ferry. As for the well-dressed rider, he did the same with his horses and servant. But no matter who he asked about the traveller's name, he could learn nothing. However, he took careful notice of his face so it would remain engraved in his memory. D'Artagnan would have liked to have embarked with these 2 passengers but a higher goal than curiosity: that of success, kept him on the shore and returned him to the inn. He returned to his room with a sigh and went immediately to bed, the better to awake early the next day with fresh ideas and the good counsel of the night.

D'Artagnan Continues His Investigations

At daybreak d'Artagnan personally saddled Ferret, who'd been dining sumptuously all night on the feed left by his two companions. The musketeer had learned what little he could from the innkeeper, who was stubborn, defiant, and devoted body and soul to Sir Fouquet. Therefore, in order not to provoke the man's suspicion, he'd given him the story about looking for a salt-farm to invest in. After saying that, to embark for Belle-Île from La Roche-Bernard would excite sceptical commentary that might even be carried to the island. It was also notable that the identity of the gentleman traveller with the lackey remained a secret to d'Artagnan despite all the questions addressed to the innkeeper who pretended complete ignorance. The musketeer had to settle for directions to the salt marshes and took the road that led through them, leaving the shore on his right to pass into a vast and desolate plain that resembled nothing so much as a sea of mud crossed by narrow, salt-encrusted causeways. Ferret trod them carefully on his nervous little hooves, never more than a foot away from the salty muck. D'Artagnan, who knew that trying to manage the horse too closely would just result in a cold mud bath, let him choose his own route, contenting himself with looking ahead at the three sharp points, like spearheads, visible on the horizon of this broad, treeless plain. These were the steeple of Piriac, the town of Batz, and Le Croisic, nearly identical but the only objects to attract an observer's attention. If the traveller turned to orient himself by looking behind, he saw on the opposite horizon three other steeples, of Guérande, Le Pouliguen, and Saint-Joachim that, added to the circumference, delineated a giant game of skittles in which Ferret and his rider were the wandering ball. Piriac was the first small port on the right. D'Artagnan turned toward it, reminding himself of the names of the principal local salt-farmers in case he needed to mention them. When he rode up to Piriac's little harbour, five big barges loaded with stones were just putting out from it. It seemed strange to d'Artagnan that stone was being shipped from a region where there was none. It took all the affability of Sir Agnan to learn from the closemouthed folk of the port the reason for this. Finally, an old angler told Sir Agnan that the stones didn't come from Piriac, nor from the marshes either, of course. "Then where do they come from?" asked the musketeer.

"Sir, they come from Nantes and Paimbœuf."

"Where are they going?"

"To Belle-Île, Sir."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan in the same tone he'd used to persuade the printer that the metal type interested him. "Are they building, then, on Belle-Île?"

"Mais oui-da! Every year Sir Fouquet makes repairs to his castle."

"Is it ruined, then?"

"It's very old."

"Oh! I see."

In fact, thought d'Artagnan, nothing could be more natural. Every owner has the right to repair his property. If I was just improving the façade of Our Lady's Portrait, that wouldn't mean I was fortifying the place! Really, I think His Majesty has received false reports about this.

"You must admit," he continued aloud, addressing the angler, for his mission compelled him to be contrary, "you must admit, my good Sir, that these stones are taking an unusual route."

"How so?" said the angler.

"They come from Nantes or Paimbœuf at the mouth of the Loire, didn't you say?"

"Down from there."

"That doesn't sound very convenient to me. Why not go straight from Saint-Nazaire to Belle-Île?"

"Why? Because those flat-bottomed barges don't take the sea waves well," replied the angler.

"Why is that a reason?"

"Pardon me, Sir but one can see you're no sailor," said the angler with a touch of disdain.

"Then explain it to me if you'd, my good man. Why go from Paimbœuf to Piriac and then from Piriac to Belle-Île when one could go from La Roche-Bernard to Nantes and from Nantes to Piriac?"

"By water, the first route is shorter," replied the angler imperturbably.

"But doesn't that just add a dogleg?" The angler shook his head. "The shortest route from one point to another is a straight line," d'Artagnan continued stubbornly.

"You forget the currents, Sir."

"Even given currents."

"And the wind."

"That too?"

"But yes. The current of the Loire carries the boats nearly to Croisic. If they need to refit a bit or rest the crew, they come a little further along the coast to Piriac; from Piriac they pick up a reverse current that carries them to Île Dumet, two and a half leagues out."

"All right."

"From there, the current of the Vilaine takes them to the next island, Hoëdic."

"I see that."

"And then, Sir, from that island to Belle-Île is a straight shot. The sea, though choppy to left and to right, is as calm as a mirror between those two islands, and the barges glide across like ducks paddling on the Loire!"

"Maybe," said the stubborn Sir Agnan, "but it's still a long way around."

"But that's how Sir Fouquet wants it," replied the angler conclusively, removing his woollen cap as he pronounced the honoured name. A glance from d'Artagnan, with a look as sharp and piercing as a sword blade, discerned nothing in the old man's heart but naive devotion while his expression showed placid satisfaction. When he said, "That's how Sir Fouquet wants it," it was as if he had said, "God wills it to be so."

D'Artagnan had gone as far as he could in this direction; besides, the barges having gone, the only boat left in Piriac was the old man's, and it looked like it needed a lot of work before it could venture out to sea. So d'Artagnan patted Ferret, who gave a new proof of his charming character by heading right back into the salt marshes, following his nose across the plain as he sniffed the constant dry breeze that bent the gorse and stunted heather of that country. They arrived at Croisic around 5 o'clock. If d'Artagnan had been a poet, those broad strands, a league wide in places and covered by the sea at high tide, would have been an inspiring sight. At the ebb they were greyish, desolate, strewn with seaweed and algae over scattered white stones, like bones in a vast cemetery. But the soldier, now a politician and man of ambition, had no need to consider it, or look to the heavens for hope or a warning. A red sky meant for the locals wind and storm, while white and fluffy clouds on the azure horizon said the sea will be likewise soft and serene. D'Artagnan just looked at the blue sky and sniffed at the salt breeze and said to himself, "I'll sail on the first tide even if it's in nothing bigger than a nutshell." At Croisic as at Piriac, he noticed enormous heaps of stone lined up on the beach. These tumbled walls, demolished further at each tide by transports bound for Belle-Île, were in the eyes of the musketeer further proof of what he'd suspected at Piriac. Was it an old wall Sir Fouquet was repairing or was he building fortifications? To find out, he had to see for himself. D'Artagnan put Ferret in the local stable, supped, went to bed, and the next morning at daybreak he was strolling along the port, or rather across the shingle. The opening to Croisic harbour was fifty feet wide and overseen by a lookout tower that resembled an enormous sugarloaf on a plate. The strand was the plate and mounds of stones piled into a cone formed the loaf, mounted by a spiral path that served as both way to the top and lookout platform. That's how it is today, and that's how it was 180 years ago only the loaf was smaller, and the path probably didn't have a trellised railing now wound with pretty plantings. On the shingle, three or four anglers were discussing sardines and shrimp. Sir Agnan approached the anglers with a cheerful look and a smile on his lips. "Are we fishing today?" he said.

"Yes, sir," said one of them. "We're just waiting on the tide."

"Where do you go to fish, my friends?"

"Along the coast, Sir."

"What are the best fishing sites?"

"Ah, that depends! Around the islands, for example."

"Is it far to these islands?"

"Not too far; four leagues."

"Four leagues! But that's a voyage!"

The anglers laughed in Sir Agnan's face. "But listen," he said with naïve simplicity, "At four leagues you lose sight of the coast, don't you?"

"Well, not always."

"I still say it's far, much too far. Otherwise I'd have asked you to let me come aboard and show me something I've never seen."

"What's that?"

"A live deep-sea fish."

"Sir is from the provinces?" said one of the anglers.

"Yes, I'm from Paris."

The Breton shrugged his shoulders, then asked "Have you seen Sir Fouquet in Paris?"

"Often," Agnan replied.

"Often?" said the anglers, moving closer to the Parisian. "Do you know him?"

"A little; he's a close friend of my master."

"Ah!" said the anglers.

"And," added d'Artagnan, "I've seen all his châteaux at Saint-Mandé, Vaux, and his hôtel in Paris."

"Is it beautiful?"

"Superb."

"But not as beautiful as Belle-Île," said one angler.

"Ha!" replied Sir Agnan with a disdainful chuckle that irritated his audience.

"It's obvious you've never seen Belle-Île," said the most vocal of the anglers. "Don't you know that it's six leagues long and has trees on it bigger than on the Nantes promenade?"

"Trees! Out at sea!" laughed d'Artagnan. "Oh, I'd like to see that!"

"Easily done. We're going fishing off the island of Hoëdic; come with us. From there you can see the paradise of Belle-Île, with its trees towering against the sky. You'll see the white walls of the castle that cut like a line across the horizon."

"Oh!" said d'Artagnan. "That does sound beautiful. But Sir Fouquet's château at Vaux has a hundred turrets, did you know that?"

The Breton raised his head in tentative admiration but wasn't convinced. "A hundred turrets!" he said. "That's good – but Belle-Île is better. Would you like to see Belle-Île?"

"Is such a thing possible?" asked Sir Agnan.

"Yes, with the governor's permission."

"But I don't know the governor."

"Since you know Sir Fouquet, you'll just give him your name."

"Oh, my friends! I'm not a gentleman!"

"Anyone can enter Belle-Île," declared the angler in his pure Breton dialect, "provided he means no harm to Belle-Île or its lord."

The musketeer felt a slight shiver go through him. True enough, he thought. Then he said aloud, "If I could be sure I wouldn't be seasick..."

"What, on this?" said the angler, proudly showing off his pretty little round-bottomed boat.

"Let's go! I'm convinced," cried Sir Agnan. "I want to see Belle-Île even if they won't let me in."

"We can get in."

"You can? How?"

"Dame! We sell our fish to the corsairs."

"What, you say there are corsairs?"

"I do – Sir Fouquet is having two fast privateers built to chase the Dutch and the English, and we sell our fish to the crews of those vessels."

Well, thought d'Artagnan. Better and better! A printing press, fortifications, and now corsairs. It seems Sir Fouquet is no mean opponent after all, and I was wrong. It'll be worth the effort to see it up close.

"We sail at five-thirty," the angler added gravely.

"I'm all yours and will stay with you till then."

In fact, d'Artagnan went with them as the anglers rolled the boat over logs down to the edge of the advancing tide. As the sea rose, he was drenched to his neck, feigning some fear, to the amusement of the little children of the port who watched him with their big, bright eyes. He laid down on a folded sail to dry off and watch the preparations, and after two hours the boat took to the sea. The anglers, busy with their lines and nets as they sailed, didn't notice that their passenger didn't blanch, groan, nor suffer, and that despite the horrible pitching and brutal rolling of the boat that no one bothered to mitigate, the novice sailor maintained his presence of mind and even appetite. They were fishing, and the fishing was pretty good. The shrimp took their baited lines, as did, with sudden jolts, the sole and plaice. Two nets had been fouled by enormous congers and cod, and three sea-eels writhed and twisted in the hold in their dying agonies. D'Artagnan had brought them luck, or so they told him. The soldier found the work so pleasant that he put his own hand to the job, that is to say the lines, and every time a jolt struck the line, he uttered joyful cries and oaths that would have astounded his musketeers. In conquering this new prey, he strained all the muscles of his arms and used every bit of his strength and skill. This pleasant occupation had made him forget his diplomatic mission. He was wrestling with a frightful conger, clinging to the side with one hand while he fought his antagonist with the other, avoiding its gaping jaw, when the boss said to him, "Take care they don't see you from Belle-Île!"

These words had the same effect on d'Artagnan as the first whistling musket-ball of a battle; he dropped the line and the conger, and both returned to the sea. D'Artagnan looked up to see, a half-league off, the bluish, rocky silhouette of Belle-Île, dominated by the white line of its castle walls. Beyond was the rising land, with forests, green plains, and cattle in the pastures. That's what first attracted the musketeer's attention; the sun, at a low angle, glanced golden rays from the sea and limned the island in a glimmering aura. This made it hard to discern details, as every tree or wall threw a solid streak of shadow across the adjacent terrain. "Ho!" said d'Artagnan at the sight of the shore's cliffs of dark rock. "There, it seems to me, are natural fortifications that no engineer need improve to forestall a landing. Where on earth could one set foot on ground that God has so completely defended?"

"This way," the master of the boat replied, throwing over the helm and porting the rudder with a jolt, turning the bow in the direction of a pretty little port with a half-moon harbour newly encircled with battlements.

"What the devil do I see there?" said d'Artagnan.

"You see Locmaria," replied the angler.

"Up on the heights?"

"That's Bangor."

"And beyond?"

"Sauzon ... and Le Palais."

"God be with you! It's a whole world. Ah! Look at all the soldiers."

"There are seventeen hundred men on Belle-Île, Sir," replied the angler with pride. "Don't you know the garrison is twenty-two companies of infantry?"

"God be with you," d'Artagnan repeated, stamping his foot. His Majesty might be right.

In Which the Reader will Doubtless be as Astonished as d'Artagnan to Meet an Old Acquaintance

In a landing from the sea, even with the smallest boat, there's always a certain amount of trouble and confusion that doesn't give one the freedom to pay close attention to one's new surroundings. The swinging gangplank, the shouting sailors, the sound of the waves on the shingle, the eager shouts of those waiting ashore, all contribute to one result: hesitation. So, it was only after disembarking and spending a few minutes on shore that d'Artagnan noticed in the port and even more toward the island's interior, a moving mass of labourers. In front of him, d'Artagnan recognised the five barges of rubble that he had seen departing the port of Piriac. The stones were being transferred to shore by a human chain of 25 or 30 peasants. The largest boulders were being loaded onto carts and borne off in the same direction as the rubble, toward works the full extent of which d'Artagnan couldn't yet determine. The whole port seethed with activity like that which Telemachus saw when he landed at Salentum. D'Artagnan was aching to investigate further but he didn't dare to arouse distrust or suspicion by showing too much curiosity. So, he went further inland only little by little, barely venturing beyond the line of anglers on the beach, watching everything, saying nothing, and replying to all greetings or inquiries with a silly question or polite evasion. Meanwhile, as his companions plied their trade, selling and crying the virtues of their fish to the inhabitants of the town, d'Artagnan gradually gained ground until reassured by how little attention was paid to him, he began to make a sustained and intelligent examination of the locals and their surroundings. And the first thing d'Artagnan noticed was recent changes in the terrain whose purpose no soldier could mistake. At either end of the port, sited so their arcs of fire enfiladed the full sweep of the harbour, two shore batteries had been constructed and were nearly ready to receive their cannon. D'Artagnan could see the workmen completing the artillery platforms and finishing the half-circle rails upon which the pieces would rotate in their emplacements. Beside each outer battery, other workers were filling the rectangular wire baskets called gabions with rubble to build up the revetments before a second, inner battery. This one had embrasures for smaller guns and a foreman directed the men who bound the gabions into the gaps excavated for them in the turf around the embrasures with cables. Based on the activity visible at these terminal works, they looked to be nearly complete; they hadn't yet been furnished with guns but their platforms were filled and graded, and their planks fully installed. The surface of the earthworks had been carefully packed and compounded, and assuming the artillery was already on the island, in only two or three days the port's defences could be complete. What astonished d'Artagnan, when he turned his gaze from the shore batteries to the fortifications of the city, was his recognition that Belle-Île's defences were being built to a completely new system, an approach he'd heard about from the Count of La Fère as a great advance but which he'd never seen applied. These fortifications weren't built according to the Dutch method of de Marollois, nor the French method of Knight Antoine de Ville, nor even the system of Manesson Mallet, an able engineer who had recently left Portugal to take service with France. These works were remarkable in that, instead of rising from the ground like old-style ramparts designed to defend the town from escalades, these, on the contrary, sank into it, and what gave height to their walls was the depths of their moats. It didn't take d'Artagnan long to recognise the superiority of such a system that provides only a glancing target for cannon fire. In addition, because the moats were below sea level, their ditches could be flooded by opening their sea gates. Moreover, these works were almost completed, and a group of labourers, overseen by a man who appeared to be directing the job, was busy laying the final stones. A plank scaffold had been thrown over the ditch to connect the inside and outside and enable the passage of wheelbarrows. D'Artagnan asked, with naïve curiosity, whether he might be allowed to cross over this bridge and was told there was no order forbidding it. So, d'Artagnan crossed the planks and approached the group of workers. This group was dominated by the man d'Artagnan had already noticed, who appeared to be the engineer-in-chief. A plan was laid on a large flat stone that served as a table, and a few steps beyond that a crane was at work. This engineer, so obviously important, was the first to draw d'Artagnan's attention, partly because he wore a doublet that was so splendid it seemed at odds with the work he was doing that seemed to call for the outfit of a master mason rather than that of a noble lord. He was, moreover, a man of stature, tall, broad, and square-shouldered, and wearing a broad hat festooned with plumes. His gestures could not have been more majestic, and he seemed, from behind, to be chiding the workers for their laziness and weakness. D'Artagnan drew nearer. As he did the man with the plumes stopped gesticulating and with his hands on his knees, leaned forward to observe the efforts of six workers who were trying to lift a dressed stone above the height of a lumber roller so it could be brought to where the crane could grasp it. The six men, surrounding the stone, combined all their efforts to raise it eight or ten inches above the ground, sweating and panting, while a seventh prepared to slip the roller under it as soon as there was enough room. But already the stone had twice slipped from their hands before they could lift it high enough for the roller to slide under it. It goes without saying that every time the stone got away from them, they jumped back to avoid having their feet crushed, and each time the great stone fell it sank deeper into the slippery soil that made the workers' task that much more difficult. A third effort was made, the six men bending over the stone, the man with the plumes crying the word, "Heave!"

The exhortation always used in such affairs but with no better success that just discouraged the labourers even further. The chief straightened up. "Ho!" he said. "What's this? Am I dealing with men of straw? Ox-horn! Step aside, and I'll show you how it's done."

"Plague!" said d'Artagnan. "Does he think he can lift that rock himself? I'd like to see him try."

The workers, shamed by the engineer, stood back, eyes down and shaking their heads, all but the one manning the roller, who was preparing to do his job. The man with the plumes approached the stone, stooped, slipped his hands under its bottom side, flexed his Herculean muscles, and, without a jerk but moving slowly like a machine, lifted the great stone a foot off the ground. The worker with the roller took the opportunity to slide the lumber under the stone. "That's it!" said the giant, not dropping the stone, merely resting it on its support.

"God be with you!" cried d'Artagnan, "I know only one man capable of such a feat of strength."

"Eh?" said the colossus, turning around.

"Porthos!" whispered d'Artagnan in a stupor. "Porthos on Belle-Île!"

For his part, the man with the plumes took a close look at the pretended steward and recognised him, despite his disguise. "D'Artagnan!" he thundered.

But then a blush coloured his face. "Hush!" he said to d'Artagnan.

And, "Hush!" said the musketeer.

In fact, if Porthos had just been discovered by d'Artagnan, d'Artagnan had likewise been discovered by Porthos, and the first thought of both men had been to maintain their incognito. But their second thought was to rush into each other's arms, for what they wanted to conceal from those around them was their names, not their friendship. However, after the embrace came mutual reflection. Why the devil is Porthos on Belle-Île lifting giant stones? D'Artagnan thought.

But though d'Artagnan kept his question in his thoughts, his friend Porthos, who was not so diplomatic, spoke his question aloud. "Why the devil have you come to Belle-Île," he asked d'Artagnan, "and what are you doing here?"

It was necessary to reply without hesitation. To hesitate in answering Porthos's question would have been a blunder for which d'Artagnan could never forgive himself. "By God, my friend," he said, "I'm on Belle-Île because you are!"

"No!" said Porthos, visibly stunned by this statement and trying to process it with that clarity of thinking with which we're familiar.

"Absolutely," continued d'Artagnan, who had no intention of giving his friend time to think it through. "I went looking for you at Pierrefonds."

"Really?"

"Yes."

"And you didn't find me there?"

"No but I found Mousqueton."

"Is he all right?"

"By my troth, yes!"

"But I don't think Mouston would tell you where I was."

"Why wouldn't he? Have I become unworthy somehow of Mouston's confidence?"

"No, he just didn't know where I was."

"Ha! Did you think that was reason enough to stop me?"

"But then how did you find me?"

"How? My dear friend, a grand lord like you always leaves traces of his passage, and I wouldn't be the man I think I am if I couldn't follow my own friends' tracks."

This explanation, flattering though it was, didn't entirely satisfy Porthos. "But I didn't leave tracks because I travelled in disguise," he said.

"Oh, you came in disguise?" said d'Artagnan.

"Yes."

"As what?"

"As a miller."

"And you think a noble lord like you, Porthos, can imitate common manners well enough to fool people?"

"But yes! I swear to you, my friend, I played my part so well that everyone was deceived."

"Maybe not as well as you think, since I was able to follow and discover you."

"All right, how did you follow and discover me?"

"Hold on, I was about to tell you. Imagine that Mouston..."

"So! It was that clown Mouston," said Porthos, arching his mighty eyebrows.

"Wait, wait, and hear me out. It's not Mouston's fault, since he didn't know where you were."

"That's true. Which is why I don't understand."

"How impatient you are, Porthos!"
"When I don't understand, I'm a terror."
"You will understand, really. Aramis wrote to you at Pierrefonds, didn't he?"
"Yes."

"And he told you to arrive before the equinox, right?"
"That's right."

"Well! There you have it," said d'Artagnan, hoping that explanation would be enough for Porthos.
Porthos appeared to be thinking very hard. "Ah!" he said. "I do understand. Since Aramis said I was to arrive before the equinox, you knew that meant I should join him. You then asked yourself where Aramis was, saying, 'When I find Aramis, I find Porthos.' You learned that Aramis was in Brittany, so you said, 'Porthos is in Brittany.'"
"Exactly! Really, Porthos, you're practically a prophet. You'll understand, then, that when I arrived at La Roche-Bernard, I heard about the beautiful fortification work under way on Belle-Île. That piqued my curiosity. I took passage on a fishing boat, without having any idea you were here. I landed, and saw a fellow lifting a stone that Ajax couldn't have budged. I cried, 'Only the Baron de Bracieux is capable of such a feat of strength!' You heard me, turned, recognised me, we embraced, and faith! If you will, dear friend, we'll embrace again."
"Well, that explains everything," said Porthos.
And he embraced d'Artagnan with such sincerity that the musketeer could scarcely breathe for 5 minutes. "Come now, you're stronger than ever," said d'Artagnan, "and in your arms, fortunately for you!" Porthos saluted d'Artagnan with a gracious smile. But during the five minutes while he recovered his breath, the musketeer thought about the difficult role he had to play. He had to be the one who always asked and never answered. And by the time his breathing had recovered, his plan of campaign was laid.

In which the Ideas of d'Artagnan Begin to clear Up, Though Cloudy at 1st

D'Artagnan immediately took the offensive. "Now that I've told you everything, dear friend, or rather since you've guessed everything, tell me what you're doing here, getting covered in dust and mud?" Porthos wiped his brow, and looking around him with pride, said, "But it seems to me you can see exactly what I'm doing here!"
"Right, right – you're lifting stones."
"Oh, only to show these lazy folk what a real man is like!" Porthos said with contempt. "But, you understand..."
"Yes, it's not your station to lift stones, though there are many whose station it is who can't lift them like you. That's what made me ask you just now, 'What are you doing here, Baron?'"
"I'm studying topography, Knight."
"What? You're studying topography?"
"Yes. But you – why are you dressed as a bourgeois?"
D'Artagnan realised he'd made a mistake by showing his astonishment that had given Porthos a chance to riposte with a question. Fortunately, it was a question d'Artagnan expected. "Well, you know," he said, "I am a bourgeois these days, so my outfit isn't surprising, as it reflects my condition."
"Come, now, you're a musketeer!"
"I was, my good friend but I've given my resignation."
"Bah!"
"I have, by God!"
"You've quit the service?"
"Resigned."
"You've left the king?"
"Completely."
Porthos raised his arms to heaven as if this news was beyond belief. "Oh, I must confess," he said, "that bewilders me."
"And yet, it's so."
"But how'd such a thing happen?"
"The king displeased me. Mazarin had disgusted me for a long while as you know and I finally just threw my helmet over the wall."
"But Mazarin's dead."
"Oh, I know but by the time of his death my resignation had already been handed in and accepted for two months. It was then that, being free at last, I went to Pierrefonds to see my dear Porthos. I had heard of the brilliant way you organised your leisure time, and I wanted to try your methods for a week or two."
"My friend, you know that my house isn't open to you for just a week or two but for a year, ten years, or life."
"Thank you, Porthos."
"It's nothing! Do you need any money?" said Porthos, jingling a purse filled with fifty Louis. "You know, if you do..."
"No, I need nothing; I invested my savings with Planchet who pays me the interest."
"Your savings?"
"Of course," said d'Artagnan. "Why do you think I'd not have savings like other people, Porthos?"
"Me? I think no such thing. On the contrary, I always suspected ... that is, Aramis always suspected you'd savings. As for me, I know nothing of financial affairs, I just assumed a musketeer's savings wouldn't be that much."
"I'm not worth much compared to a genuine millionaire like you, Porthos but you be the judge. For starters, I'd twenty-five thousand livres."
"A nice amount," said Porthos affably.
"And then," continued d'Artagnan, "as of the twenty-fifth of last month, I added another two hundred thousand livres."
Porthos opened his eyes wide enough to ask without words: Where the devil did you steal a sum like that, old friend? He blinked and said, "Two hundred thousand livres!"
"Yes, and with the twenty-five thousand I'd and the twenty thousand I've on me, that makes me worth two hundred and forty-five thousand livres."
"But look here! Where did this fortune come from?"
"Ah, well! I'll explain that later, dear friend – it's just that you have so much to tell me about yourself, I wanted to get my story out of the way first."
"Bravo!" said Porthos. "Now we're all rich. But what's it I'd to tell you?"
"You'd to tell me how Aramis's appointed..."
"Oh, right! Bishop of Vannes."
"That's it," said d'Artagnan, "Bishop of Vannes. Dear Aramis! He always did know how to get ahead."
"Yes, yes! And he doesn't mean to stop there."
"Oh? You think he won't be satisfied with the purple robe of a bishop and would prefer the red hat of a cardinal?"
"Hush! But yes, it's been promised."
"Bah! By the king?"
"By someone more powerful than the king."
"The devil you say, Porthos! Your story's incredible, my friend."
"Why incredible? Isn't there always someone in France more powerful than the king?"
"Oh, true enough. In the time of King Louis XIII, it's the Duke Richelieu, and during the Regency it's Cardinal Mazarin. And in the reign of Louis XIV, it's Sir..."
"Go on!"
"It's Sir Fouquet."
"Bull's-eye! You hit it first shot."
"So, it's Sir Fouquet who's promised the red hat to Aramis?"
Porthos assumed an air of reserve. "Now, old friend," he said, "God forbid I should meddle in others' affairs, especially when it comes to secrets they'd prefer to keep. When you see Aramis, he'll tell you what he thinks he should tell you."
"You're right, Porthos, and you're as silent as a stone. Let's return to you."
"Sure," said Porthos.
"You told me you're here to study topography?"
"Exactly."
"Well, by God, what a fine study you've made of it!"
"How so?"
"These new fortifications are admirable."
"Is that your honest opinion?"
"No doubt about it. Really, to anything but a prolonged siege, Belle-Île looks impregnable."
Porthos rubbed his hands with satisfaction. "That's my opinion, too," he said.
"But who the devil has fortified this backwater so well?"
Porthos swelled with pride. "You mean I didn't tell you?"
"No."
"You don't suspect who it was?"
"No; all I can say is it's clearly a man who's studied every system of fortification and arrived at the best."
"Oh, hush!" said Porthos. "You make me blush, my dear d'Artagnan."
"Wait!" replied the musketeer. "You mean, all the time ... it's you! Oh!"
"By God's good grace, my friend."
"You're the one who imagined, planned, and constructed these bastions, these redoubts, those curtain walls and demi-lunes, and that covered approach?"
"Ah, please..."
"You, who built that outwork with its retiring and salient angles?"
"My friend..."
"You, who gave those gun embrasures that oblique slope that protects both the cannon and those who serve them?"
"Well, good Lord, yes."
"Ah, Porthos, we must bow to you in admiration! How carefully you've always hidden this special genius! I hope, my friend, that you'll show me all the details of your works."
"Nothing could be simpler. Here are the plans."
"Let me see." Porthos led d'Artagnan to the flat rock that served as a table and upon which the plan was laid out. Across the base of the plan was written these instructions in Porthos's square hand:

Instead of using the Square or Rectangle as was previously done, you'll Plot All Works using Regular Hexagons. This Polygon's the Advantage of offering More Angles than the Quadrilateral. Each Side of your Hexagon, the Length of which will be decided by the dimensions of the site will be divided into 2 Parts, and from the Centre you will Draw a Perpendicular to the Centre of the Polygon that will be Equal in Length to 1/6th of the Side. From the Ends on Each Side of the Polygon you will Draw 2 Diagonals that Cut the Perpendicular. These 2 Lines will form the Major Lines of Defence.

"The devil!" said d'Artagnan when he reached the end of these instructions. "But is this the basis of the complete system, Porthos?"

"Every bit," said Porthos. "Would you like to see more?"

"No, I've read enough. But since you're the one, my dear Porthos, who directs the work, why do you need to have the system written out?"

"Because of death, my friend."

"Death? What do you mean?"

"Eh! We are, after all, only mortals."

"That's true," said d'Artagnan. "You have an answer for everything, my friend." And he set the plan back on the stone. But before he did so, d'Artagnan looked closely at the writing and had been able to distinguish, under the enormous lettering of Porthos, a smaller and more elegant handwriting that reminded him of certain letters to Marie Michon <sup>51</sup> he'd seen in his youth. However, a gum eraser had almost entirely effaced this writing that would have escaped the notice of any eye less keen than that of our musketeer. "Bravo, my friend!" d'Artagnan said.

"And now you know everything you want to know, don't you?" said Porthos with a broad gesture at his surroundings.

"My God, yes – except, do me one favour, old friend."

"Speak; I am the master here."

"Tell me the name of that gentleman walking across over there."

"Where, over there?"

"Beyond the soldiers."

"Followed by a lackey?"

"That's the one."

"Accompanied by a sort of old crow dressed in black?"

"Exactly!"

"That's Sir Gétard."

"And what's Sir Gétard, my friend?"

"He's the architect for the house."

"For what house?"

"Sir Fouquet's house."

"Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan. "Are you also considered part of Sir Fouquet's household, Porthos?"

"Me? Why do you say that?" asked the topographer, blushing to the tips of his ears.

"Well, you say the house when speaking of Belle-Île the same way you might when speaking of the Château de Pierrefonds."

Porthos pursed his lips. "Belle-Île belongs to Sir Fouquet, doesn't it?"

"Yes."

"As Pierrefonds belongs to me?"

"Certainly."

"Did you go to Pierrefonds?"

"I told you, I was there not two months ago."

"Did you see a gentleman who was in the habit of walking around carrying drafting tools?"

"No, though I might have."

"Well! That gentleman is Sir Boulingrin."

"And what is Sir Boulingrin?"

"You see? At my place, when someone sees a gentleman carrying a ruler and asks me, 'What is Sir Boulingrin,' I answer, 'He's the architect for the house.' Well! Sir Gétard is Sir Fouquet's Boulingrin.

But he has nothing to do with the fortifications, that's solely my concern, do you understand? Absolutely nothing."

"Heavens, Porthos!" cried d'Artagnan, letting his arms fall limp as if defeated. "Old friend, you're not only a Herculean topographer, you're also a first-class logician."

"Aren't I, though?" replied Porthos. "Wasn't that profoundly reasoned?"

And he puffed up like the conger that d'Artagnan had let escape him that morning. "And now," continued d'Artagnan, "is that shabby crow who accompanies Sir Gétard also of the house of Sir Fouquet?"

"Him?" said Porthos with contempt. "That's a Sir Jupenet or Juponet, some kind of poet."

"Who's brought here?"

"I believe so."

"I should think Sir Fouquet had enough poets back home with Scudéry, Loret, Pellisson, and La Fontaine. Compared to them, I must say, Porthos, this poet doesn't reflect well on you."

"The saving grace, my friend, is that he isn't here as a poet."

"What is he then?"

"Some kind of printer – but since you mention him, I think I'd have a word with this shabby crow."

"Go ahead."

Porthos beckoned to Jupenet but the man had recognised d'Artagnan and was unsure if he should approach until Porthos beckoned to him again. This second gesture was so imperative that he had to obey and came over. "Here!" said Porthos. "You arrived just yesterday and already you're making a nuisance of yourself."

"How so, Sir Baron?" asked Jupenet, trembling.

"Your press was thumping and groaning all night, Sir," said Porthos, "and it kept me from sleeping, ox-horn!"

"But, Sir..." objected Jupenet timidly.

"You have nothing to print yet, so you have no excuse to run your press. What were you printing all night?"

"A little light poetry, sir, of my own composition."

"Light! Not light enough to keep your press from moaning piteously. See that it doesn't happen again, do you hear?"

"Yes, Sir."

"You're sure?"

"I'm sure."

"All right then, this once, I forgive you. Be gone!"

The poet withdrew even more humbly than he'd come. "Well! Now that that clown's been told off, let's have some lunch," said Porthos.

"Yes," said d'Artagnan, "let's eat."

"But I have to warn you, my friend," said Porthos, "that we have only two hours for our meal."

"We'll just have to make the best of it. But why do we have only two hours?"

"Because the tide turns at one o'clock, and I leave on the tide for Vannes. But I'll be back tomorrow, dear friend, so stay at my place, where your word will be law. I have a good cook and a better juice cellar."

"But no," interrupted d'Artagnan, "I have a better idea."

"What?"

"You're going to Vannes, you say?"

"That's right."

"To see Aramis?"

"Yes."

"Well, I came from Paris expressly to see Aramis..."

"That's true."

"So, I'll go with you."

"Yes! Of course!"

"I'd set out to see Aramis and then you but man proposes and God disposes, so I'll start with you and end with Aramis."

"Fine!"

"Now, how long does it take you to get from here to Vannes?"

"Lord love us, six hours at the most: three hours to cross the sea between here and Sarzeau, and then three hours on the road from Sarzeau to Vannes."

"Most convenient! And do you often go to Vannes, since you're so close to the bishopric?"

"Yes, once a week. Wait a moment while I get my construction plan."

Porthos picked up his plan, folded it carefully, and stuffed it inside his doublet. Good! D'Artagnan thought. I think I now know the true identity of the engineer who's fortifying Belle-Île. Two hours later, with the rising tide, Porthos and d'Artagnan sailed for Sarzeau.

The crossing from Belle-Île to Sarzeau was a quick one, thanks to one of those small corsair vessels d'Artagnan had heard about on the way over, and which, built for speed and made for pursuit, were temporarily sheltered in Locmaria harbour, where one of them, one-quarter crewed, was assigned to packet service between Belle-Île and the continent. The trip gave d'Artagnan an opportunity to convince himself once again that Porthos though serving as an engineer and topographer, had no knowledge of state secrets. His perfect ignorance might have seemed to others like clever deceit but d'Artagnan knew the ins and outs of his Porthos too well not to spot a secret if one was there, as a tidy and meticulous old man knows without looking where to find a book on the shelves of his library or the linen in the drawer of his dresser. So if he, the ingenious d'Artagnan had turned Porthos inside out and had found nothing, there was nothing to find. "It's likely," said d'Artagnan to himself, "that I'll learn more about Vannes in half an hour than Porthos's learned about Belle-Île in two months. But if I'm going to learn anything at all, I can't let Porthos use the only stratagem I've left to him – he mustn't warn Aramis of my arrival." Therefore, all the musketeer's attention was turned to keeping an eye on Porthos. It must be said that Porthos didn't deserve such suspicion; the giant didn't have a deceitful thought in his head. D'Artagnan's sudden appearance might have given him a moment of suspicion but d'Artagnan had quickly regained the position he had always occupied in that good, courageous heart, and no cloud of doubt obscured Porthos's gaze when he turned it from time to time with tenderness on his friend. Upon landing, Porthos asked if his horses were ready for him. In fact, he soon spotted them waiting with his equerry at the corner of the road that curves in a bypass around Sarzeau, and which, after passing the little town, leads to Vannes. These horses were 2 in number, 1 for Porthos and 1 for his equerry – for Porthos needed an equerry now that a cart was Mousqueton's only means of transportation. D'Artagnan expected Porthos to propose having his equerry ride ahead to fetch another mount, and planned to object to that idea but d'Artagnan's expectations were belied: Porthos simply ordered his equerry to dismount and wait for him at Sarzeau while d'Artagnan rode the equerry's horse, and that's how it was arranged. "Why, you've become a man of foresight, my dear Porthos," said d'Artagnan to his friend when he found himself riding the equerry's horse.

"I have but this is all thanks to Aramis; I don't have my mounts and tack here, so Aramis has put his stables at my disposal."

"And good mounts they are, too, for bishop's horses!" said d'Artagnan. "Though I'm sure Aramis is very particular, for a bishop."

"He's a saintly man," Porthos replied, looking up at the heavens, though with a smile.

"Then he's considerably changed," said d'Artagnan, "for we both know how worldly he used to be."

"He's been touched by efficacious grace!" said Porthos.

"Excellent!" said d'Artagnan. "In that case I'm twice as eager to see him."

And he spurred his horse to greater speed. "A plague on that!" said Porthos. "If we ride that fast, it'll take us only one hour instead of two."

"How far did you say it was, Porthos?"

"Four and a half leagues."

"That's not so far."

"We could have taken a boat up the canal but the devil with rowers and tow-horses! The former are like tortoises and the latter are slugs. If one can get a good horse between his knees that always beats such things as rowers."

"Quite right, especially for you, Porthos, who always look so magnificent on horseback."

"Though I've grown a little heavy, my friend; I weighed myself the other day."

"And how heavy are you?"

"Three hundredweight!" said Porthos with pride.

"Bravo!"

"So, you understand, I have to choose horses who are wide in the hindquarters, or in two hours I break them."

"Yes, horses for a giant, right, Porthos?"

"Good of you to say so, my friend," replied the engineer with affectionate majesty.

"In fact, my friend, it looks to me like your horse is sweating already," said d'Artagnan.

"Dame, it's hot, though. Ah but look! There's Vannes, can you see it?"

"Yes, indeed. It's a beautiful city, isn't it?"

"Charming, at least according to Aramis. I find it too dark but it seems that artists are partial to black. I wish they're not."

"Why's that, Porthos?"

"Because my château at Pierrefonds was grey with age, so I just had it whitewashed."

"I see," said d'Artagnan. "White is more cheerful."

"More cheerful but Aramis says it's less dignified. Fortunately, there are black plaster experts here, and I'll just have to hire some to redo Pierrefonds in black. If grey was worthy, then black will be superb."

"I can't fault your logic," said d'Artagnan.

"Have you ever been to Vannes, d'Artagnan?"

"Never."

"So, you don't know this city?"

"Not at all."

"Then look there," said Porthos, lifting himself in his stirrups, a movement that caused his horse to splay his forelegs. "Do you see, in the sun there, that tower?"

"I see it."

"That's the cathedral."

"What's it called?"

"Saint-Pierre. Now, there, in the lower town on the left, do you see another steeple?"

"Perfectly."

"That's Saint-Paterne, the parish preferred by Aramis."

"Is it?"

"Indeed! You see, Saint Paterne is said to have been the first Bishop of Vannes, though Aramis says he wasn't. But with the scholarly way he puts things, that might just be a paro... pari..."

"A paradox," said d'Artagnan.

"Exactly. Thanks, it's so hot, my tongue was sticking in my mouth."

"My friend," said d'Artagnan, "please continue your guided tour. What's that tall, white building dotted with windows?"

"Ah! That's the College of Jesuits. You still have a sharp eye, by God! Do you see, near the college, that large house with turrets and a belfry built in the finest Gothic style as that brute Sir Gétard says?"

"Yes, I see it. Well?"

"Well! That's where Aramis lives."

"What, he doesn't live in the bishop's palace?"

"No, the bishop's palace is in ruins. Besides, the bishopric is in the old town, and Aramis prefers the lower town. That's why, like I said, he prefers Saint-Paterne, as that church is in the lower town, along with a mall, a tennis court, and a house of the Dominicans. Do you see where that handsome steeple points to heaven?"

"Very well."

"The lower town, you see, is practically a separate city, with its own walls, towers, and moat; that's where the town docks are, and the boats come right up to the wharf. If our little corsair didn't have an eight-foot draft, we could have sailed right up under Aramis's window."

"Ah, Porthos, my friend," d'Artagnan enthused, "you're a well of knowledge and a fount of ideas both ingenious and profound. Porthos, I'm beyond surprised, and deeply impressed."

"Well, here we are, and this is it," said Porthos, diverting the conversation with his usual modesty.

And about time, too, thought d'Artagnan, for Aramis's mount's melting under him like a horse of ice.

They had just entered the lower town and had gone hardly a hundred paces before they were surprised to find the streets strewn with flowers and garlands. From the aged walls of Vannes were hanging the oldest and most curious tapestries in France. The wrought iron balconies were draped with white bunting accented by bouquets. However, the streets were deserted as if the entire population was gathered elsewhere. The shutters on the houses were all closed but they were cooled by the hanging tapestries and bunting that cast dark, heavy shadows on the walls. Suddenly, from around a street corner, music and song struck the ears of the newcomers. A crowd in their Sunday best appeared in a cloud of blue incense that rose from swinging censers, while a blizzard of rose petals fluttered down from the balconies. It was a procession. Waving above the crowds' heads were crosses and banners inscribed with the sacred signs of religion. Dancing beneath these crosses and banners, as if under their protection, was a troupe of young girls dressed in white and crowned with blue cornflowers. Down each side of the street, flanking the cortège, marched a file of soldiers from the garrison, with flowers in their musket barrels and tied to the tips of their pikes. While d'Artagnan and Porthos watched with expressions of respect that masked their impatience to press onward, a magnificent canopy approached, preceded by a hundred Jesuits and a hundred Dominicans, and escorted by two archdeacons, an almoner, a penitent brother, and twelve canons. A cantor with a thundering voice, surely one of France's leading singers and as carefully chosen as a drum major of the Imperial Guard, accompanied by four other singers, made the sacred songs resound from the walls and vibrate the very windows of the houses. Under the canopy appeared a pale and noble face, with dark eyes, black hair salted with silver, and a mouth thin-lipped and judicious above a prominent and angular chin. This graceful and majestic head was topped by a bishop's mitre that gave it a character, not just of sovereignty but of asceticism and holy meditation. "Aramis!" cried the musketeer involuntarily as this haughty figure passed before him. The prelate started and shuddered, like the risen dead hearing the voice of the Saviour. He raised his large, dark, long-lashed eyes and turned them unerringly on the source of the exclamation. At a glance he saw Porthos with d'Artagnan beside him. For his part, d'Artagnan, so keen-eyed, had instantly seen and understood all. The full portrait of the prelate was stamped in his memory, never to leave it. One thing especially struck d'Artagnan: upon seeing him, Aramis had flushed, and in a single moment had suppressed the burning gaze of the master and replaced it with the affectionate look of a friend. For he knew his friend d'Artagnan's discernment and intelligence, and feared he might guess the reason for his surprise and sudden colouring. It was the same old Aramis, always with a secret to conceal. So, the penetrating gaze of the inquisitor must be deflected at all costs, as a general must, at any price, silence an artillery battery pounding his vanguard. Aramis extended his handsome white hand, upon which sparkled the amethyst of the episcopal ring, divided the air with the sign of the cross, and bestowed upon his two friends his blessing. D'Artagnan, riveted, might not have reacted to this holy benediction but Porthos had noticed his distraction and, with an amiable press on his friend's back, pushed him to his knees. D'Artagnan buckled and nearly fell flat. Meanwhile, Aramis had passed by. D'Artagnan, as if strengthened like Antaeus by the touch of the ground, turned on Porthos almost angrily. But he'd misunderstood his good Hercules, who had nothing in mind but religious propriety. Besides, Porthos who always spoke his mind without deceit, said, "It was very kind of him to give us a personal blessing. He really is a good and holy man." D'Artagnan, less convinced of this than Porthos, said nothing. "Look, friend," Porthos continued, "now that he's seen us, instead of continuing the procession's slow march, he's picked up the pace. Do you see how everyone's doubling their speed? Dear Aramis, he's in a hurry to receive and embrace us."

"That's true," d'Artagnan replied aloud. But to himself he added, Moreover, now he's seen me, the sly fox, and will have time to prepare my reception. Then the procession had passed, and the street was clear. D'Artagnan and Porthos went straight to the episcopal mansion that was surrounded by a large crowd gathered to see the prelate when he returned. D'Artagnan noticed that this crowd consisted mainly of soldiers and wealthy citizens, and in the nature of his partisans he recognised the interests of his friend. In fact, Aramis wasn't the type to chase puerile popularity; he had no interest in being liked by people of no use to him. Women, children, and old men – in other words, those who would fill out the procession of the average bishop – were of no value to Aramis. Ten minutes after the two friends had arrived at the bishop's mansion, Aramis appeared back from the procession like a victorious conqueror; the soldiers presented arms as if to a superior officer, and the town burghers saluted him as a friend, like a merchant prince rather than a prince of the church. There was in Aramis a resemblance to those Roman senators whose doorways were always crowded with clients and retainers. At the foot of the grand stairway he had a half-minute conference with a Jesuit who, to speak more discreetly, extended his head under the canopy. Then he entered his mansion, and the crowd began to disperse, to the sound of songs and loud prayers. It was a beautiful day in Vannes, the aromas of the earth mingling with the scents of sky and sea. The city exhaled happiness, joy, and strength. D'Artagnan sensed the presence of an invisible perfumed hand that, all-powerful, guided this strength, joy, and happiness, its scent pervading everything. "Oh ho!" he said to himself. "Porthos may have grown heavy but Aramis's become great."

Porthos and d'Artagnan entered the bishop's mansion by a private door that opened only to friends of the household. It goes without saying that Porthos served as d'Artagnan's guide. The worthy baron behaved as if he was at home wherever he went but whether as a tacit recognition of the character and pious authority of Aramis, or a habit of respecting his moral ascendancy that had always made Porthos behave around him as a model soldier and good citizen, or for all these reasons, in the house of His Grandeur the Bishop of Vannes, Porthos maintained a marked reserve that d'Artagnan first noticed in his attitude toward the episcopal valets and footmen. However, this reserve didn't go so far as to stop Porthos from asking questions, and so inquiries were made. They learned that His Grandeur had just returned to his private rooms, where he was preparing to appear, among his friends, as less majestic than he had to his flock. And in fact, after a quarter of an hour that d'Artagnan and Porthos spent staring at each other and uselessly twiddling their thumbs, a door into the audience hall opened and there stood His Grandeur, dressed in a prelate's receiving robes. Aramis held his head high, like a man with the habit of command, his hand on his hip atop purple skirts gathered for ease of movement. He still wore the slender moustache and pointed royal goatee of the time of Louis XIII. He entered with a waft of that delicate perfume common to all elegant and highborn men and women, an aroma of power that seems to emanate from them as a natural part of their being. But in this case the perfume seemed to partake of the sublime sanctity of holy incense that quenched rather than intoxicated, and inspired respect rather than desire. Aramis, upon entering the hall, didn't hesitate a moment, and saying nothing, as no matter what he said would have felt cold given the occasion, he went straight to the musketeer so well disguised under the cloak of Sir Agnan and embraced him with a tender sincerity that no one could have thought either cool or affected. D'Artagnan, for his part, embraced him with equal ardour. Porthos squeezed Aramis's delicate hand between his great mitts, and d'Artagnan noticed that His Grandeur was careful to give him his left hand, probably knowing from experience that Porthos would grind the gemstones of his be-ringed right fingers into his flesh. Aramis, wary, had therefore presented only skin to be squeezed between those big hands rather than crushed against the facets of diamonds. After these embraces, Aramis looked searchingly into d'Artagnan's face, and then offered him a well-lit chair. He himself sat in shadow from where he could observe the light on his guest's face. This tactic, common to ladies and diplomats, resembled the advantage a duellist seeks by manoeuvring to face his opponent into the sun. D'Artagnan was familiar with this ploy but he pretended not to notice it. He felt he'd been caught but for that very reason he also felt he was on the road to discovery, and it didn't matter to the old soldier if by seeming to be outmanoeuvred he could still work his way around to victory. It was Aramis who began the conversation. "Ah, dear friend! Good old d'Artagnan!" he said. "What luck!"

"It wasn't luck, most reverend old scout but friendship," said d'Artagnan. "I was looking for you, as I always look for you when I have some great venture in hand, or even just a few hours to share."

"Really!" said Aramis, unruffled. "You were looking for me?"

"Of course, he was looking for you, dear Aramis," said Porthos, "and the proof is that he tracked me down at Belle-Île. Isn't that touching?"

"Ah," said Aramis, "of course, to Belle-Île..."

Good, thought d'Artagnan. There goes my loose cannon Porthos, unwittingly firing the first shot of the battle.

"To Belle-Île," said Aramis, "to that backwater, that edge of nowhere! That is touching, in fact."

"And so, it was I who told him you were at Vannes," continued Porthos in the same tone.

D'Artagnan smiled with a touch of irony. "I knew, of course," he said, "but I wanted to see for myself."

"To see what?"

"If our old friendship still held; if, seeing each other, our hearts, withered though they are by age, would beat with the old joy at meeting a friend."

"And now you're satisfied of that, aren't you?" asked Aramis.

"More or less."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, Porthos's first word to me was hush and you..."

"Well? And I?"

"You gave me your blessing."

"But my friend, what else would I do?" said Aramis with a smile. "That's the most precious thing a poor prelate like me can offer."

"Come now, old friend."

"No, seriously."

"You know, they say in Paris that the Bishopric of Vannes is one of the richest in France."

"Oh, you're speaking of worldly goods?" said Aramis nonchalantly.

"Of course, I'm speaking of that. Don't I always?"

"In that case, let's talk about it," said Aramis, smiling again.

"Then you admit you're one of the wealthiest prelates in France?"

"My dear, since you're auditing my accounts, I can tell you that Vannes is worth twenty thousand livres a year, more or less. It's a diocese that contains one hundred and sixty parishes."

"That's pretty good," said d'Artagnan.

"It's superb!" said Porthos.

"However," said d'Artagnan, with a direct look at Aramis, "I'll wager you're not planning to bury yourself here forever."

"Pardon me – I'd hardly call this being buried."

"But it seems to me anyone this far from Paris might as well be buried."

"I'm getting old, my friend," said Aramis. "The noise and bustle of the city suit me no more. At fifty-seven one must seek calm and meditation, and I've found them here. What could be more beautiful and yet austere than old Armorica? I've discovered here, dear d'Artagnan, everything that is the opposite of what I once loved, and that's what one needs toward the end of life, the opposite of its beginning. Some of my old pleasures do find me here from time to time but they don't distract me from the approach of salvation. I am still of this world, and yet, every step I take, I'm closer to God."

"Eloquent, wise, discreet: you are an accomplished prelate, Aramis, and I congratulate you."

"But," said Aramis, smiling, "you haven't come here, dear friend, just to compliment me. Tell me, what brings you? Would I have the happiness to find that, somehow, you need something from me?"

"Thank God, no, dear friend, it's nothing like that," said d'Artagnan. "I'm rich and I'm free."

"Rich?"

"Rich for me, that is, not like you or Porthos. I have about fifteen thousand livres a year."

Aramis gave him a sceptical look; it was hard to believe, especially when he saw his old friend in such humble attire, that he'd found such a fortune. So, d'Artagnan, seeing that the hour for explanations had come, told the story of his exploits in England. During this account, he saw the prelate's eyes shine and fingers twitch ten times over. As for Porthos, it was not admiration or enthusiasm he showed for d'Artagnan, it was rapturous delight. When d'Artagnan had finished his story, Aramis said, "Well, then?"

"Well, then!" said d'Artagnan. "You see I now have friends and property in England, and wealth laid by in France. If you so desire, I'll share it with you. That's why I came."

But as confidant as he seemed, at that moment he couldn't quite meet Aramis's eyes. He let his gaze turn toward Porthos, as the blade yields to overwhelming force and seeks another line of attack.

"In that case," said the bishop, "you've donned strange travelling clothes, dear friend. "

"Frightful, aren't they? But you'll understand that I preferred not to travel as a cavalier or a lord. Now that I'm rich, I'm miserly."

"And you say that you came to Belle-Île?" said Aramis without warning.

"Yes," d'Artagnan replied. "I knew that way I'd find Porthos – and you."

"Mel!" cried Aramis. "I haven't been across the water in a year."

"Oh?" said d'Artagnan. "I never thought to find you such a homebody."

"Ah, dear friend! I must tell you I'm not the man I used to be. Riding a horse is uncomfortable and sailing is exhausting – I'm just a poor, ailing priest, always groaning and complaining, regarding all expense as waste, gradually succumbing to old age and speaking always of death. I survive, my dear d'Artagnan, I merely survive."

"I'm glad of that, my friend, as we're probably going to be neighbours."

"What?" said Aramis with a surprise he did not even bother to conceal, "You, my neighbour?"

"Good lord, yes!"

"How's that?"

"I'm going to buy some very profitable salt farms located between Piriac and Le Croisic. Imagine this, dear friend, a clear twelve percent return on investment, ever steady, always dependable, as the ocean, faithful and regular, brings a new deposit to my account every six hours. I'm the first Parisian to invest in such a venture, so keep this to yourself, if you please, and in a little while I'll be able to share the details. I'm getting three leagues of the coast for thirty thousand livres. "

Aramis glanced at Porthos as if to ask if this was true, or if some snare was hidden in this apparent show of amiable confidence. But then, as if ashamed at having resorted to his poor auxiliary, he recouped his forces for a new assault on this novel defence. "I'd heard that you'd had some trouble at Court," he said, "but that you'd gotten out of it as you get out of everything, my dear d'Artagnan, with the honours of victory."

"Me?" cried the musketeer, following it with a burst of laughter that didn't quite cover his embarrassment, for Aramis's remark indicated he knew something of his relations with the king. "Me? Ha! Tell me what you heard, if you would, Aramis."

"Yes, I'd heard, this poor bishop lost in the provinces, that the king was having you assist with his love affairs."

"With whom?"

"With Miss Mancini."

D'Artagnan exhaled with relief. "Well, I wouldn't say no," he replied.

"It seems that one morning the king took you over the bridge at Blois to talk with his ladylove."

"It's true," said d'Artagnan. "So, you know that? Then you must also know that was the same day I turned in my commission."

"Truly?"

"My friend, it couldn't be more so."

"That's when you went to see the Count of La Fère?"

"Yes."

"And then me?"

"Yes."

"And then Porthos?"

"Yes."

"Was it just for a simple visit?"

"No; I wanted to see if you were at liberty to go with me to England."

"Ah, yes, I understand – and then you went and accomplished alone, like a hero, what you wanted to propose to all four of us. I suspected something like that when I'd heard you were involved in the Restoration, and were seen at the receptions for King Charles, where he spoke to you like a friend, or rather, like a person to whom he owed an obligation."

"But how the devil did you learn all that?" asked d'Artagnan who feared that Aramis's investigations might have extended further than he had thought.

"Dear d'Artagnan," said the prelate, "my friendship's like the solicitude of the old night-watchman who keeps the little lighthouse on the end of the pier. Every night he lights a lantern for the boats returning from the sea. He's unnoticed behind his shutters but he watches everyone with interest, calling them into harbour and keeping track of each one. I'm like that watchman; from time to time scraps of news come my way that remind me of all I once loved. I'm the solitary friend of those who still ride the world's stormy seas, a poor watchman whom God has granted shelter in my little tower."

"And what have I done since England?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Ah, there you went over my horizon!" said Aramis. "I know nothing of you since your return, d'Artagnan; my eyes were clouded. I regretted that you didn't think of me and wept at your forgetfulness. But I was wrong, for now I see you again, and it's wonderful, a time to celebrate, I solemnly swear. And how is Athos getting along?"

"Very well, thank you."

"And his young pupil?"

"Raoul?"

"Yes."

"He seems to have inherited the poise of his father Athos and the strength of his mentor Porthos."

"And on what occasion were you able to judge that?"

"Eh, my God! On the very eve of my departure."

"Really?"

"Yes, there was an execution on the Grève, and it provoked a riot. We found ourselves in the middle of that riot, and there was cause for some swordplay. He handled himself quite well."

"Oh? What did he do?" asked Porthos.

"First, he threw a man from a window as if he were no more than a cotton pillow."

"Ho! That's pretty good!" cried Porthos.

"Then he drew, pointed, cut, and thrust, just as we used to do back in the old days."

"And what caused this riot?" Porthos asked.

D'Artagnan noticed that Aramis's expression showed complete disinterest in Porthos's question. "Oh," he said, looking at Aramis, "it was on account of a couple of tax-farmers the king wanted hanged, two friends of Sir Fouquet."

Only a slight frown indicated that the prelate had heard this.

"Oh ho!" said Porthos. "And what were their names, these friends of Sir Fouquet?"

"Gentlemen d'Emerys and Lyodot," said d'Artagnan. "Do you know those names, Aramis?"

"No," said the prelate with disdain. "They sound like the names of coin-counters."

"Exactly."

"Wait. Sir Fouquet allows his friends to be hanged?" cried Porthos.

"And why not?" said Aramis.

"It just seems to me..."

"If those wretches were hanged, it was by the king's orders," said Aramis. "After all, Sir Fouquet, as Surintendant des Finances, doesn't have power over life and death."

"Just the same," grumbled Porthos, "in Sir Fouquet's place..."

Aramis realised that Porthos was about to say something foolish and interrupted. "But see here, dear d'Artagnan," he said, "that's enough talk about others; let's speak a bit about you."

"But you already know all there is to say about me. On the contrary, let's talk about you, dear Aramis."

"I told you, my friend, that there's nothing of Aramis left in me."

"What about the Abbot d'Herblay?"

"Even less. You see before you a man whom God has taken by the hand and led to a position he never expected nor even hoped."

"God?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Yes."

"Huh! That's strange; I'd been told it was Sir Fouquet."

"Who told you that?" said Aramis and not all his willpower could prevent a slight flush from rising to his cheeks.

"My faith! It was Bazin."<sup>54</sup>

"That do!t!"

"I wouldn't call him a man of genius, true but that's what he told me that is why I repeat it to you."

"I've never met Sir Fouquet," replied Aramis with a look as serene and pure as that of a young virgin who has never told a lie.

"But meeting him, or even knowing him, there's no harm in that," said d'Artagnan. "He's a very fine man, Sir Fouquet."

"Oh?"

"A great politician."

Aramis shrugged indifferently.

"An all-powerful minister."

"I report only to the king and the pope," said Aramis.

"Dame! Listen to this, then," said d'Artagnan in a tone of simple sincerity. "I'll tell you about it because everyone around here swears by Sir Fouquet. The land's Sir Fouquet's; the salt-farm I'm going to buy is Sir Fouquet's; the island where Porthos does topography is Sir Fouquet's; the garrison there's Sir Fouquet's; and the ships are Sir Fouquet's. So it'd scarcely surprise me if the appointment to your diocese came from Sir Fouquet. He's a different master than the king, of course but just as powerful."

"Thanks be to God, I owe nothing to anyone and belong to no one but myself," Aramis replied who watched d'Artagnan's every expression and Porthos's every nod and glance during this speech. But d'Artagnan was impassive and Porthos was immobile; all these skilful thrusts were parried by able adversaries, and none of them touched. Nonetheless, the strain of the struggle was beginning to tell on everyone, and the announcement of supper was received gratefully by all three. Dining together changed the tone of the conversation, and besides, now that everyone was on their guard, they knew they would learn nothing more. Porthos had understood none of the nuances; he'd stayed immobile because Aramis had asked him not to budge. For him, supper was only supper. But for Porthos, supper was enough, and the mealtime passed remarkably well. D'Artagnan overflowed with cheer. Aramis surpassed himself in easy amiability. Porthos ate like Pelops. War and finance were discussed, and love and the arts. Aramis seemed naïvely surprised at every mention of politics d'Artagnan dared risk. This unlikely naïveté increased d'Artagnan's mistrust, just as d'Artagnan's invincible nonchalance aroused the distrust of Aramis. Finally, d'Artagnan deliberately dropped the name Colbert into the conversation. He'd reserved this as his final shot. "Who's this Colbert?" asked the bishop. Oh, now that's going too far, thought d'Artagnan. God, that's too much. Careful!

And he told Aramis everything about Colbert that he might want to know. The supper or rather the conversation between d'Artagnan and Aramis lasted until 1<sup>AM</sup>. At 10 o'clock precisely, Porthos fell asleep in his chair and began snoring like an organ. At midnight he was awakened and sent to his bed. "Huh!" he said. "I seem to have fallen asleep. But your conversation's very interesting."

At one o'clock, Aramis led d'Artagnan to the room designated for him, the best in the episcopal mansion. 2 servants were placed at his orders. "Tomorrow at eight <sup>AM</sup>," said Aramis in taking leave of d'Artagnan, "we'll go riding with Porthos."

"At eight o'clock!" said d'Artagnan. "Why so late?"

"You know I need seven hours of sleep," said Aramis.

"You did say that."

"Goodnight, dear friend!"

And he embraced the musketeer warmly. Once the door was shut firmly behind Aramis, d'Artagnan said, "Good! By five o'clock I'll be up and around." Then that resolution taken, he went to bed and began to put two and two together as they say.

Porthos Begins to be Sorry he had Brought d'Artagnan with him

No sooner had d'Artagnan blown out his candle than Aramis, who'd been watching from behind his curtains for the last light to go out in his friend's room, tiptoed across the hall to Porthos's room. The giant, who'd been in bed for about an hour and a half, was sprawled across the quilt. He was in the happy calm of early sleep that, for Porthos, could resist the toll of bells and the thunder of cannon. His head moved as if to the gentle rocking of a ship at sea, and in another minute, he would start to dream. The door of Porthos's room opened slowly under the pressure of Aramis's delicate hand. The bishop approached the sleeper; a thick carpet swallowed the sound of his footsteps, and besides, Porthos snored loudly enough to drown out any lesser noise. Aramis placed a hand on his shoulder and said, "Come, we must go, dear Porthos."

The voice of Aramis was soft and affectionate but it wasn't asking, it was ordering. His touch was light but its firmness conveyed danger. In his sleep, Porthos heard the voice and felt Aramis's hand, and he trembled. "Who's there?" he said in his giant's voice.

"Hush! It's me," said Aramis.

"You, dear friend! And why the devil do you wake me?"

"To tell you that you've to go."

"Go?"

"Yes."

"Where?"

"Paris."

Porthos sat upright in bed and stared at Aramis in alarm. "Paris?"

"Yes."

"A hundred leagues!" Porthos gasped.

"A hundred and four."

"Dear God!" sighed Porthos, falling back into bed and rolling over, like a child who hopes his nanny will go away and let him sleep another hour.

"Thirty hours on horseback," Aramis continued resolutely. "You know there're good relays." Porthos kicked with one leg and groaned. "Come now, dear friend," insisted the prelate with a touch of impatience.

Porthos kicked with the other leg, then put both feet on the floor. "Must I go?" he said.

"It's essential." Porthos rose to his feet and stomped forward like a statue. "Hush!" said Aramis. "For the love of God, Porthos, you'll wake someone up."

"Ah! You're right," said Porthos in a voice of thunder. "I forgot. But don't worry, I'll be careful." And as he said this, he dropped a heavy belt laden with sword, pistols, and a purse whose crowns escaped and went bouncing across the floor in a prolonged clatter. The racket made Aramis's blood boil but it just provoked Porthos into a loud burst of laughter. "What a riot!" he rumbled.

"Not so loud, Porthos, please!"

"You're right," he said, lowering his voice half a notch. "I was just thinking," Porthos continued amiably, "that we're never as slow as when we're in a hurry and never as loud as when we want to be quiet."

"Yes, quite so but let's give the proverb the lie, Porthos, and hurry along quietly."

"You can see I'm doing my best," said Porthos, pulling on his breeches.

"Very well."

"Is it really so urgent?"

"It's not just urgent, Porthos, it's serious."

"Oh? All right."

"D'Artagnan questioned you, didn't he?"

"Me?"

"Yes, on Belle-Île."

"Not at all."

"Are you sure of that, Porthos?"

"Yes, by God!"

"Impossible. Think back."

"He asked me what I was doing, and I told him, 'Topography,' because I couldn't remember that other word you used."

"Castrametation?"

"That's the one! I never could remember it."

"All the better! What else did he ask you?"

"He asked who Sir Gétard was."

"What else?"

"Who was that Sir Jupenet."

"But he didn't see our plan of fortifications, I hope?"

"He did."

"The devil you say!"

"Don't worry, I'd rubbed out all your writing with a gum eraser. He couldn't possibly realise you'd been kind enough to advise me on the task."

"He has sharp eyes, our friend."

"What are you afraid of?"

"I'm afraid he's discovered everything, Porthos, and we must keep that from causing serious trouble. I ordered my people to close the house up tight so d'Artagnan can't get out before dawn. Your horse is saddled, you'll ride it hard to the first relay, and by five in the morning you'll be fifteen leagues from here. Come."

Aramis then dressed Porthos piece by piece as quickly as the most capable valet. Porthos, half groggy, half confused, just apologised and let him do what he wanted. When he was ready, Aramis took him by the hand and drew him along, leading him carefully down the stairs, keeping him from bumping into doorways, turning and steering him as if Aramis was the giant and Porthos a dwarf, his body animated by Aramis's soul. A horse was, in fact, waiting ready in the courtyard, and Porthos got into the saddle. Then Aramis himself took the horse by the bridle and led him through the yard across a scattering of manure, apparently intended to quiet its hoof-beats. At the same time, he was pinching its nostrils so it wouldn't blow or neigh. Then, having arrived at the outer gate, he beckoned Porthos, who was ready to leave without asking why, and said into his ear, "Now, friend Porthos, ride without pause to Paris, eating, drinking, and sleeping in the saddle so as not to lose a minute."

"As you say; we won't stop."

"Here's a letter for Sir Fouquet that, whatever the cost, he must have by noon tomorrow."

"He'll get it."

"And keep one thing in mind, dear friend."

"What's that?"

"That what you're racing after is your promotion to duke and peer."

"Oh ho!" said Porthos, eyes sparkling. "In that case, I'll do it in twenty-four hours."

"Try it."

"Then release the bridle and forward, Goliath!"

Aramis let go of both bridle and nose. Porthos took the reins, applied the spurs, and the animal took off at a furious gallop. As long as he could see Porthos disappearing into the night, Aramis followed him with his eyes; then, once he lost sight of him, he returned into the courtyard. He peeked in at d'Artagnan's door but nothing had changed. The footman posted outside had heard nothing and seen no lights. Aramis closed the door carefully, sent the footman to bed, and went to his own room. D'Artagnan really suspected nothing; when he awoke in the morning at half past four, he still thought he was ahead of the game. Dressed in his night-shirt, he looked out his window into the courtyard, where day was just breaking. It was deserted; even the hens were still in their coop. No servants were visible, and all doors were yet closed. All quiet; good! D'Artagnan thought. I'm the first of the household to awaken. Time to get dressed.

And d'Artagnan drew on his clothes. But this time he donned the costume of Sir Agnan in a way that avoided the bourgeois, almost clerical look he'd previously adopted, tightening, tucking, and buttoning it in a martial manner, cocking his hat with a bit of flair, and restoring the look of a cavalier whose lack had alarmed Aramis so. That done, as a friend of the house, or pretended friend, he presumed to let himself into Aramis's rooms, where he found his friend asleep – or pretending to sleep. A big book was open on his nightstand, and a reading candle still burned before its reflective silver plate. That was more than enough to prove to d'Artagnan how innocently the prelate had spent his evening, and how wise he'd been to rise early. The musketeer then did to the bishop what the bishop had done to Porthos: he touched him on the shoulder. Evidently Aramis was feigning sleep for instead of waking suddenly, he who slept so lightly required a second touch to arouse him. "Ah!" he said. "It's you. What a happy surprise! Faith, sleep had made me forget I'd the good luck to have you here. What time is it?"

"I'm unsure," said d'Artagnan, a little embarrassed. "Early, I think. It's my damned old military habits that make me rise with the day."

"Were you hoping, by chance, to ride out so soon?" asked Aramis. "It seems too early to me."

"We shall do as you like."

"I thought we'd agreed we'd mount up around eight."

"Perhaps so but I was so eager to see you, I thought, the sooner the better."

"And my seven hours of sleep?" said Aramis. "I'm warning you, I'd counted on that, and what I miss now I'll have to make up later."

"Maybe but it seems to me you weren't always such a slug-a-bed, old friend, and had more to do awake than asleep."

"And that's exactly why I treasure my sleep now."

"Oh, confess that it wasn't for more sleep that you wanted to delay till eight o'clock."

"I was afraid you'd mock me if I told you the truth."

"So, tell me."

"All right! From six till eight I usually make my devotions."

"Your devotions?"

"Yes."

"I didn't think a bishop had such strict obligations."

"A bishop, dear friend, must pay more attention to appearances than a lowly cleric."

"God be with you! Now there, Aramis, is a word that reconciles me to Your Grandeur. Appearances! That's a musketeer's way of looking at things. Long live appearances, Aramis!"

"Pardon me instead of congratulating me, d'Artagnan, for letting slip a word entirely too worldly."

"Must I leave you then?"

"I really must make my devotions, dear friend."

"All right, I'll leave you but for the sake of this pagan named d'Artagnan, make them as short as you can. I'm eager to see you."

"Very well, d'Artagnan, I promise that in just an hour and a half..."

"An hour and a half of devotions? Come now, old friend, be reasonable. You can do better than that."

Aramis laughed. "Ever charming, ever cheerful, ever young," he said. "When you come to my diocese, even divine grace must step aside."

"Bah!"

"And you know I could never resist your temptations; you'll cost me my salvation, d'Artagnan."

D'Artagnan pursed his lips. "Here," he said, "I'll take the sin on my account. Make the sign of the cross, say a few paters, and we'll go."

"Hush!" said Aramis. "We're no longer alone; I hear someone coming."

"Well, send them away."

"Impossible; I made the appointment yesterday. It's the Principal of the College of Jesuits and the Superior of the Dominicans."

"Your chiefs of staff. Very well."

"What are you going to do?"

"I'll go wake up Porthos and wait in his company until you've finished your conference."

Aramis didn't start, or stare, or show any emotion in gesture or speech. "Go ahead," he said. As d'Artagnan went toward the door, he added, "By the way, do you know the way to Porthos's room?"

"No but I'll find it."

"Go down the corridor and open the second door on the left."

"Thanks! See you shortly."

And d'Artagnan went off in the direction Aramis had indicated. Scarcely ten minutes passed before he returned. He found Aramis seated between the Principal of the College of Jesuits and the Superior of the Dominicans, in exactly the situation he'd found him before in the inn at Crèvecœur. This company didn't intimidate the musketeer. "What is it?" asked Aramis serenely. "Do you've something to ask me about, dear friend?"

"I do," replied d'Artagnan, looking closely at Aramis, "because Porthos isn't here."

"Not here?" said Aramis, no less calmly. "Are you sure?"

"Yes, by God! I just came from his room."

"Where can he be, then?"

"I'm asking you."

"Have you enquired after him?"

"I did."

"And what did they tell you?"

"That Porthos often goes out in the morning without telling anyone and had probably left."

"What did you do then?"

"I went to the stable," said d'Artagnan nonchalantly.

"What for?"

"To see if Porthos had left on horseback."

"And...?" asked the bishop.

"Well! One horse is missing, Goliath, from stall number five."

This entire dialogue, it should be understood, was conducted with a touch of suspicion on the part of the musketeer but with perfect complacency by Aramis. "Ah! I see what's happened," said Aramis, after thinking for a moment. "Porthos has gone out to bring us a surprise."

"A surprise?"

"Yes. The canal that links Vannes with the sea is teeming with game – snipe and teal. It's Porthos's favourite hunting ground, and he'll bring us a dozen for dinner."

"Really?" said d'Artagnan.

"I'm sure of it. Where else would he be? I'd wager he took a harquebus."

"It's possible," said d'Artagnan.

"Do yourself a favour, dear friend, mount a horse and go join him."

"You're right," said d'Artagnan, "I'll go."

"Do you want a guide?"

"No, thanks – Porthos is hard to miss. I'll ask around."

"Would you like a harquebus, as well?"

"Thank you."

"Have whichever horse you like saddled for you."

"I'll take the one I rode here from Belle-Île."

"Go ahead; my house's yours." Aramis rang and gave the orders to have the horse d'Artagnan wanted saddled. D'Artagnan followed the servant charged with executing this order. At the door, the servant stepped aside to allow d'Artagnan to pass, and as he did so he exchanged a glance with his master. A twitch of Aramis's brow informed this agent that d'Artagnan was to be given everything he wished. D'Artagnan mounted his horse, and Aramis heard the sound of the iron shoes clattering on the cobblestones. A moment later, the servant returned. "Well?" asked the bishop.

"My Lord, he's following the canal that leads to the sea," said the servant.

"Good!" said Aramis.

In fact, d'Artagnan putting aside all suspicion, was galloping toward the ocean, hoping at every moment to see in the dunes or on the beach the colossal silhouette of his friend Porthos. He imagined he saw hoof-prints in every puddle; occasionally he thought he heard a gunshot. This illusion lasted for three hours, for two of which d'Artagnan searched for Porthos. At the end of the third, he returned to the bishop's mansion. "Now I'll finally catch up with him," he said, "and I'll find my two friends awaiting my return."

D'Artagnan was deceived. He no more found Porthos at the mansion than he had along the canal. Aramis was waiting at the top of the stairs with a haggard look on his face. "Did my people fail to find you, my dear d'Artagnan?" he called as soon as he saw the musketeer.

"No; did you send someone after me?"

"I'm desolate, my dear friend, at having sent you on a wild goose chase but about seven o'clock the almoner of Saint-Paterne came by and told me he'd met du Vallon on his way out; he'd left quietly, not wanting to bother the household and told the almoner to tell me that he was afraid Sir Gétard would do something stupid in his absence so he was going to take advantage of the morning tide to make for Belle-Île."

"But I hardly think Goliath has carried him across four leagues of sea, do you?"

"It's more like six," said Aramis.

"Even less likely then."

"Which is why, dear friend," said the prelate with a soft smile, "Goliath's back in the stable, happy for the rest and pleased to be out from under Porthos."

In fact, the horse had been returned from the relay station on the orders of the bishop, who allowed no detail to escape him. D'Artagnan let himself appear to be satisfied by this explanation. He adopted a demeanour that quite hid the suspicions forming in his mind. He dined between Aramis and the Jesuit and across from the Dominican, smiling a great deal at the latter, whose jolly fat face amused him. The meal was long and sumptuous: excellent Spanish juice, fresh oysters from Morbihan, succulent fish from the mouth of the Loire, enormous prawns from Paimbœuf, and delectable game from the heather along the shore. D'Artagnan ate quite a bit and drank very little, while Aramis drank not at all, other than water. When they were done, d'Artagnan asked, "You offered me a harquebus?"

"Yes."

"Lend me one."

"Are you going hunting?"

"I think I might as well, while waiting for Porthos."

"Take whatever you like from the gun-room."

"Are you coming with me?"

"Alas, dear friend, that would be a great pleasure but bishops are forbidden to hunt."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. "I didn't know that."

"Besides," continued Aramis, "I have business until noon."

"I'm on my own, then?" said d'Artagnan.

"Alas, yes! But be back in time for dinner."

"By God! You eat too well here for me to miss it."

And with that d'Artagnan took his leave of his host, saluted his guests, and picked out a harquebus – but instead of going hunting, he rode straight to the docks at Vannes. He watched carefully to make sure he wasn't followed but saw no one. Convinced that he hadn't been trailed, he rented a small fishing boat for twenty-five livres and set off. And in truth, he hadn't been shadowed – but a Jesuit brother, posted in the steeple of his church, had followed his steps all morning with the aid of a telescope. At a quarter past eleven, Aramis was informed that d'Artagnan was headed for Belle-Île. With the help of a north-northeast wind, d'Artagnan made a quick crossing to Belle-Île. As he approached, his eyes scanned the coast, hoping to see, either on the shore or atop the fortifications, the splendid attire of Porthos, or his vast silhouette against the lightly clouded sky. D'Artagnan looked in vain; he landed without having seen anything and learned from the first soldier he questioned that Sir du Vallon had not yet returned from Vannes. Then, without losing a moment, d'Artagnan turned his little boat and set sail back to Sarzeau. The wind, of course, changes direction as the day passes, and had turned from north-northeast to southeast that was nearly as good for the return to Sarzeau as it had been for the trip to Belle-Île. In three hours d'Artagnan was back on the continent, and two hours after that he had reached Vannes. Despite the speed of this trip, the entire time d'Artagnan was eaten up with impatience, and the deck of the boat could testify to how he stamped and paced across it as he sailed. When he touched at the quay near the episcopal mansion, he disembarked with a bound. He hoped to surprise Aramis by the rapidity of his return, planning to reproach him for his duplicity while retaining enough wit to terrify him into revealing at least part of his secret. He hoped, in short, that with an onslaught of speech that was like a bayonet charge on a redoubt he could alarm the crafty Aramis into making an admission. But all he found at the entry hall of the mansion was the valet blocking the doorway and smiling smugly. "Where is my Lord?" cried d'Artagnan, trying to push past him.

He was nearly successful but then the valet found his feet and stood his ground. "My Lord?" he said.

"Yes, curse you. Don't you recognise me, fool?"

"Of course; you're the Knight d'Artagnan."

"Then, let me pass."

"It's pointless."

"Why?"

"Because His Grandeur is no longer at home."

"What do you mean, His Grandeur's not home! Where is he then?"

"Gone."

"Gone?"

"Yes."

"To where?"

"As to that, I know nothing – but perhaps this will inform Sir Knight."

"This? This what?"

"This letter that I was told to give to you."

And the valet drew an envelope from his lapel. "What? Give me that, you animal!" said d'Artagnan, snatching it from him. At the first line he read, he snarled, "Oh, yes! Now I see it all." He read the rest in an undertone:

Dear friend, an urgent matter has called me to one of the parishes in my diocese. I had hoped to see you before leaving but gave up that hope when it occurred to me that you'd probably spend two or three days on Belle-Île with our dear Porthos. Have a good time with him but don't try to out-drink him at the table; that's advice I'd have given even to Athos in his best days. Farewell, dear friend, and believe me when I say I'm sorry I didn't have the chance to spend more time in your excellent company.

"God!" cried d'Artagnan. "I've been played. Idiot, imbecile, triple fool that I'm! I've been tricked like a monkey handed an empty nut. But we'll see who laughs last!" And wiping the smug smile from the valet's face with a blow, he dashed out of the episcopal mansion. Ferret, good trotter though he was, wasn't the mount for these circumstances. D'Artagnan hired a post horse and soon taught it with a touch of the spurs and a flick of the hand that deer are not the fastest runners in creation.

In Which d'Artagnan Rides, Porthos Snores, and Aramis Counsels

30 hours or so after the events just recounted while Sir Fouquet having locked his door as usual was working in the office of his house at Saint-Mandé, a carriage drawn by 4 horses dripping with sweat galloped into its courtyard. This carriage must have been expected, for three or four lackeys rushed to its door and opened it as Sir Fouquet rose from his desk and went to his window. A man emerged painfully from the carriage, stepping with difficulty from the running board to the ground while leaning on the lackeys' shoulders. He'd no sooner said his name than the lackey he wasn't leaning on rushed up the stairs and into the vestibule. This man was running to inform his master but he didn't even have to knock on the door, for Fouquet was standing on the threshold. "My Lord the Bishop of Vannes!" said the lackey.

"Good!" said Fouquet. Then, leaning over the banister of the stairs as Aramis began to climb them, he said, "You, dear friend! So soon!"

"Yes, in person, sir; but battered and broken as you see."

"You poor man!" said Fouquet, offering Aramis his arm that he took and leaned upon, while the servants withdrew respectfully.

"Bah!" Aramis replied. "It's nothing, just so long as I'm here; the main thing is that I've made it and found you when I arrived."

"Speak quickly," said Fouquet, closing the door of the private office behind Aramis and himself.

"We're alone here?"

"Completely alone."

"No one can listen in? No one can hear us?"

"No, I assure you."

"Sir du Vallon's arrived?"

"Yes."

"And you received my letter?"

"Yes, and the matter must be serious if it requires your presence in Paris at a time when you're needed so urgently elsewhere."

"You're right, it couldn't be more serious."

"Thanks, now what's it all about? But by God, before everything, catch your breath, dear friend! You're pale and trembling."

"I'm in pain, yes but good Lord, pay no attention to me. Didn't Sir du Vallon tell you anything when he gave you the letter?"

"No, I heard a great noise, went to the window, and saw a giant on horseback at the foot of the stairs. I went down, he gave me the letter, and his horse fell over dead."

"And he?"

"He fell with the horse; they got him out from under it and carried him upstairs to a spare bedroom. Once I'd read the letter, I went up to see if he had further news but he'd fallen so heavily asleep it was impossible to wake him. I took pity on him, ordered that his boots be removed, and he be left to rest."

"Good; now here is what this is all about, My Lord. You met Sir d'Artagnan in Paris, didn't you?"

"Indeed, and he's a man of intelligence and courage, even though he was responsible for the death of my friends Lyodot and d'Emerys."

"Alas, so I'd heard; at Tours I met the courier who was bringing me Gourville's letter and Pellisson's dispatches. Have you reflected on that event, Sir?"

"Yes."

"And did you understand that it was a direct attack on your sovereignty?"

“You think so?”

“Oh, yes, I think so!”

“Well! I admit that dark idea had occurred to me, too.”

“Don’t ignore that idea, Sir, hearken to it, in the name of heaven. Now, back to d’Artagnan.”

“I’m listening.”

“Under what circumstances did you meet him?”

“He came to me for money.”

“With an order?”

“From the hand of the king.”

“Directly?”

“Signed by His Majesty.”

“See, there! Well! D’Artagnan came to Belle-Île disguised as a steward, on the pretext of buying some salt-farms. Now, d’Artagnan has no other master than the king, so he came on behalf of the king. And he saw Porthos.”

“Who is this Porthos?”

“Pardon, my mistake. He saw Sir du Vallon at Belle-Île and he now knows as well as you or I do that Belle-Île’s been fortified.”

“And you think it was the king who sent him?” said Fouquet thoughtfully.

“Assuredly.”

“And d’Artagnan, in the king’s hands, is a dangerous weapon?”

“The most dangerous there is.”

“So I thought, at first meeting.”

“How’s that?”

“I immediately wished he was mine.”

“If you judged him at first sight the bravest, cleverest, and most skilful man in France, you judged him well.”

“We must have him at any price!”

“D’Artagnan?”

“Don’t you agree with me?”

“I may agree with you but we can’t get him.”

“Why not?”

“Because we missed our chance. He was dissatisfied at Court, and we could have taken advantage of his dissatisfaction but instead he went over to England where he was instrumental in the Restoration. That earned him a fortune, after which he came back to the service of the king. And if he’s returned to that service how, he’s been well paid to do so.”

“We’ll just pay him more, that’s all.”

“Oh, no, Sir, pardon me! D’Artagnan lives by his word, and that word, once given, isn’t taken back.”

“So, what do you conclude from all this?” Fouquet asked anxiously.

“That this is the moment to parry a terrible blow.”

“And how will we parry it?”

“Think ... d’Artagnan must come back to report on his mission to the king.”

“Oh, we’ve got time, then!”

“What do you mean?”

“You had a good lead on him, I presume?”

“Ten hours, more or less.”

“Well, then, with ten hours...”

Aramis shook his head. “See the clouds racing across the sky, the swallow diving through the air? D’Artagnan is faster than those clouds and that bird; d’Artagnan is the wind itself.”

“Come, now!”

“I tell you there’s something superhuman about that man, sir. He’s my age and I’ve known him for thirty-five years.”

“So?”

“So! Listen to my calculations, Sir: I sent Sir du Vallon to you at two in the morning, so Sir du Vallon left eight hours ahead of me. When did he arrive?”

“Around four o’clock.”

“So, you see, I gained four hours on him, though Porthos is a hardy horseman who killed eight mounts on the road – I found their bodies. Me, I rode post for fifty leagues but I have the gout and the gravel and who knows what else? It was killing me, so I dismounted at Tours and rolled the rest of the way in a carriage, half dead, thrown this way and that, forward and back, always with four horses at a furious gallop, so that I gained four hours on Porthos. However, d’Artagnan doesn’t weigh three hundred pounds like Porthos, or have the gout and the gravel like me – he’s not a horseman, he’s a centaur. D’Artagnan, though he left for Belle-Île when I left for Paris, giving me ten hours’ lead, despite all that, d’Artagnan will arrive only two hours behind me.”

“What about the accidents of travel?”

“He will have no accidents.”

“What if he runs out of horses?”

“He’ll run faster than the horses would have.”

“Good God! What a man!”

“Yes, he’s a man whom I admire and love, because he’s good, loyal, and true; I admire him because he represents the culmination of his kind of human. But though I love him, though I admire him, I also fear him and would forestall him. In short, Sir, d’Artagnan will be here in two hours, so get ahead of him, ride to the Louvre, and see the king before the king sees d’Artagnan.”

“And what shall I say to the king?”

“Nothing – just give him Belle-Île.”

“Oh, Sir d’Herblay!” Fouquet cried. “To have such a plan crushed at a single blow!”

“If one plan is crushed, we’ll proceed with another! Never despair, Sir, just go – and quickly.”

“But that garrison so carefully assembled, the king will change it all!”

“That garrison, Sir, belonged to the king when you bought Belle-Île; within two weeks it was yours, and it will still be yours once it’s dispersed. Let it go, Sir. Do you see a problem with having an army in a year where now you have but two regiments? Dispersed, your garrison of today will win you new partisans from the garrisons at La Rochelle, Nantes, Bordeaux, Toulouse, or wherever they’re sent. Go to the king, Sir, time is passing, and as it passes d’Artagnan flies like an arrow along the high road.”

“Sir d’Herblay, you know your every word blossoms in the garden of my thought. I’ll go to the Louvre.”

“This very moment, right?”

“I ask only enough time to change my clothes.”

“Remember that d’Artagnan doesn’t need to pass through Saint-Mandé, he’ll go straight to the Louvre, and there’s another hour gone from the time we have left.”

“But d’Artagnan doesn’t have my English horses. I’ll be at the Louvre in twenty-five minutes.” And, without wasting another second, Fouquet gave the orders for his departure.

Aramis had only enough time to say to him, “Return as quickly as you go, before I die of impatience.”

Five minutes later, the superintendent was flying toward Paris.

Meanwhile, Aramis asked to be shown to the room where Porthos was sleeping. As he left Fouquet’s office, he was enveloped in the arms of Pellisson, who had just learned of his arrival and hurried to see him. Aramis returned the hasty embrace with friendly dignity, and then, on the landing, asked, “What’s that I hear from above?”

Indeed, they could hear a deep, dull rumble like the growl of a hungry tiger or impatient lion. “Oh, that’s nothing!” said Pellisson with a smile.

“But what...?”

“Of course,” said Aramis, “only he is capable of making such a noise. Allow me, Pellisson, to go see if he needs anything.”

“Can I go with you?”

“Please do!” They entered the room together. Porthos was lying on a bed, his face more purple than red, his eyes swollen and mouth gaping. The rumble escaping from the deep recesses of his chest rattled the windows. The sight of the mighty muscles tensing in his face and neck, his hair soaked with sweat, the energetic rise and fall of his chest and shoulders, couldn’t help but inspire a certain admiration, for here was strength that seemed nearly godlike. Porthos’s herculean legs and feet, in swelling, had split his stockings, as the might of his enormous body assumed the rigidity of stone. Porthos stirred no more than the granite giant on the plains of Agrigento. At Pellisson’s order, a valet had cut away Porthos’s boots, for no power in the world could have pulled them off. Four lackeys had tried in vain, pulling at them as if at a capstan. They hadn’t even managed to wake him. His boots cut away, his legs had fallen back on the bed. They removed the rest of his outer clothes, carried him into a bath where he soaked for an hour, dressed him in white linen, and carried him back to bed, all with effort and trouble that would have roused a dead man. But Porthos never opened an eye and didn’t stop for a moment the mighty organ of his snoring. As for Aramis, with his brave and restless nature, he tried to outface his fatigue and work with Gourville and Pellisson but passed out in the armchair he’d insisted they bring him. He was carried off and put to bed in a neighbouring chamber, where the repose of sleep soon calmed his nervous mind.

Sir Fouquet Takes Action

Meanwhile, Sir Fouquet raced to the Louvre in a carriage drawn at a gallop by his English horses. The king was working with Colbert when suddenly he became pensive. The two death sentences he’d signed upon assuming the throne occasionally came back to haunt him. They were two black veils of mourning that he looked through when his eyes were open, and two bloodstains he saw when they were closed. “Sir,” he said suddenly to the intendant, “it sometimes seems to me that those two men whom you had me condemn weren’t guilty of so great a fault.”

“Sire, they were chosen from among the corrupt tax-farmers, a herd that needed to be culled.”

“Chosen by whom?”

“By necessity, Sire,” Colbert replied coldly.

“Necessity! An imperious word!” murmured the young king.

“An imperious goddess, Sire.”

“They were close friends of the superintendent, weren’t they?”

“Yes, Sire, friends who would have given their lives for Sir Fouquet.”

“And thus, they gave them, Sir,” said the king.

“That’s true but fortunately they gave them in vain – though that’s not their intention.”

“How much money had those men embezzled?”

"Ten million, perhaps, six of which were recovered from them."

"And that money is now in my coffers?" asked the king with a certain repugnance.

"It is, Sire but that confiscation, though it threatened Sir Fouquet, did him no real damage."

"And you think, Sir Colbert...?"

"That if Sir Fouquet was willing to raise a troop of brigands against Your Majesty to rescue his friends from execution, he'd raise an army to escape his own punishment."

The king fixed his confidant with one of those looks that are like lightning in a storm, a glance that lights the very depths of a man's conscience. "I'm astonished," he said, "that, thinking Sir Fouquet capable of such things, you never gave me advance warning."

"A warning of what, Sire?"

"Tell me first, clearly and precisely, what you think, Sir Colbert."

"About what?"

"About the conduct of Sir Fouquet."

"I think, Sire, that Sir Fouquet, not content with gathering money to himself, as Sir de Mazarin did, thus depriving Your Majesty of part of his power, wants in addition to gather to him all those friends of pleasure and easy living who make what the lazy call poetry but what politicians call corruption. I think that, by buying the loyalty of Your Majesty's subjects, he is encroaching on the royal prerogative, and will inevitably end, if he's allowed to continue, by relegating Your Majesty to weakness and obscurity."

"And what are such projects called, Sir Colbert?"

"Sir Fouquet's projects, Sire?"

"Yes."

"They're considered crimes of lese-majesty."

"And what do we do to those who commit lese-majesty?"

"They are arrested, judged, and punished."

"Are you certain Sir Fouquet has the intention of committing the crimes you impute to him?"

"I'll say more than that, Sire – he is beginning to carry them out."

"Well, then! I return to my question, Sir Colbert."

"What was that, Sire?"

"What are you warning me about?"

"Pardon me, Sire but before I say that I have one more thing to add."

"Speak."

"We have clear, obvious, and palpable proof of treason."

"What?"

"I've just learned that Sir Fouquet is fortifying Belle-Île-en-Mer."

"Ah! Really!"

"Yes, Sire."

"You're sure of that?"

"Perfectly. Do you know, Sire, how many troops are on Belle-Île?"

"Faith, no. Do you?"

"I don't, Sire, so I propose that Your Majesty send someone to Belle-Île."

"Such as?"

"Me, for example."

"What would you do on Belle-Île?"

"Learn if it's true that Sir Fouquet, like the old feudal lords, is building siege-proof walls."

"And what reason would he have to do that?"

"No reason except someday to defend himself against his king."

"But if that's so, Sir Colbert," said Louis, "we must act immediately, as you say; we must arrest Sir Fouquet."

"Impossible!"

"I thought I told you, Sir, not to employ that word in my service."

"Suppressing that word in Your Majesty's service doesn't change the fact that Sir Fouquet is Superintendent of Finance."

"So?"

"And consequently, as holder of that office, he has in his hand all of parliament, the entire army is in his pay, he's the patron of every writer, and the nobles are at his beck and call."

"In other words, I can do nothing against Sir Fouquet?"

"Absolutely nothing – at least right now, Sire."

"You're a sad disappointment as an advisor, Sir Colbert."

"Not at all, Sire! From now on I won't stop at just pointing out threats to Your Majesty."

"All right, then! How do we topple the colossus? Just push?" And the king laughed bitterly.

"His power comes from money, Sire; kill him with money."

"What if I discharge him from office?"

"Too difficult, and it's not the way to go."

"Then what is?"

"Ruin him, Sire, as I said."

"How would I do that?"

"Opportunities will arise; seize those opportunities."

"Give me an example."

"Here's one: His Royal Highness Sir is to be married, and his wedding must be magnificent. This is a good opportunity for Your Majesty to ask Sir Fouquet for a million; Sir Fouquet, who pays twenty thousand livres up front when he owes only five thousand, will certainly find the million Your Majesty asks for."

"That's good," said Louis XIV. "I will ask him for it."

"If Your Majesty would be so good as to sign an order, I'll collect the money myself."

And Colbert presented the king with a paper and pen. At that moment, the usher opened the door and announced Sir Surintendant. Louis paled. Colbert dropped the plume and withdrew behind the king, as if to enfold him in the dark wings of an evil angel. The superintendent made his entry like a born man of the Court, for whom a single glance tells him all he needs to know of a situation. This situation wasn't encouraging for Fouquet, no matter how conscious he was of his strength. Colbert's small dark eyes, dilated with envy, and the glittering gaze of Louis XIV, inflamed with anger, warned him of urgent danger. Courtiers are as sensitive to the atmosphere of the Court as old soldiers who can distinguish, from the sounds of wind and foliage, the distant tramp of an armed troop, and can tell, just by listening, how many men are on the march, how many sabres are rattling and how many cannons are rolling. Fouquet therefore had only to note the quality of the silence that had fallen upon his arrival to find it fraught with menace. The king allowed him enough time to advance to the middle of the room, for his youthful uncertainty prevented him from taking the initiative. Fouquet seized the advantage, saying, "Sire, I was impatient to see Your Majesty."

"Why is that?" asked Louis.

"To bring him good news."

Colbert, though lacking Fouquet's grandeur of person and generosity of heart, otherwise resembled him in many ways. He had the same brilliance, the same insight into other men, plus that power of self-possession that gives hypocrites time to think and prepare their attacks. He guessed that Fouquet was attempting to forestall the blow he was preparing to unleash, and his eyes gleamed darkly.

"What news?" asked the king.

Fouquet placed a parchment scroll on the table. "If Your Majesty would just cast his eyes over this," he said.

The king unrolled the scroll. "These are plans?" he said.

"Yes, Sire."

"And what kind of plans?"

"For a new kind of fortification, Sire."

"Ah ha!" said the king. "So, you're concerning yourself with strategy and tactics, Sir Fouquet."

"I concern myself with everything that might be useful to Your Majesty's reign," replied Fouquet.

"Very pretty!" said the king, looking over the drawings.

"As Your Majesty can undoubtedly see," said Fouquet, indicating the sketches, "here are the walls with their fortified strongpoints, and there the advance outworks."

"And what is all this beyond, Sir?"

"The sea."

"The sea? All around?"

"Yes, Sire."

"And what is the name of this place of which you show me the plan?"

"Sire, it is Belle-Île-en-Mer," Fouquet simply replied.

At this name, Colbert made a movement so abrupt that the king turned to quell him with a cold stare. Fouquet didn't appear to react at all to Colbert's movement, nor to notice the king's look. "Then sir," continued Louis, "you've fortified Belle-Île?"

"Yes, Sire, and I've brought Your Majesty all the estimates and accounts," replied Fouquet. "I have spent sixteen hundred thousand livres in this operation."

"For what reason?" replied Louis coldly, imitating the sullen glare of his intendant.

"A reason easy enough to explain," responded Fouquet, "given that Your Majesty was at odds with England."

"Yes but since the restoration of King Charles II, I've made an alliance with her."

"Only a month ago, Sire, as Your Majesty well knows but the fortification of Belle-Île was begun six months before that."

"But now it's been rendered useless."

"Sire, fortifications are never useless. I had fortified Belle-Île against Monck, Lambert, and all those citizens of London who wanted to play soldier. Belle-Île is equally well fortified against the Dutch, whom Your Majesty and the English are bound to oppose."

The king fell silent, glancing at Colbert, and then said, "Belle-Île, I believe, belongs to you, does it not, Sir Fouquet?"

"No, Sire."

"To whom, then?"

"To Your Majesty."

Colbert felt a wave of vertigo, as if a great abyss had opened before his feet. Louis gaped in admiration, either at the genius of Fouquet or his apparent devotion. "Explain yourself, Sir," he said.

"Easily done, Sire. Belle-Île is one of my domains, and I fortified it with my own money but as nothing in the world forbids a subject from offering a humble present to his king, I offer Your Majesty the full usage of the domain, though the ownership remains mine. Belle-Île, fortified for war, ought to be occupied by the king, and Your Majesty should henceforth be able to retain a dependable garrison there."

Colbert nearly lost his balance and slid to the floor. He had to lean against a wooden column just to keep from falling. "This plan you place before me is an example of great skill in the art of war, Sir," said Louis XIV.

"The plans weren't drawn up by me, Sire," said Fouquet. "I was advised by many officers but the plans themselves are the work of a distinguished military engineer."

"His name?"

"Sir du Vallon."

"Sir du Vallon?" Louis replied. "I don't know him. It's unfortunate, Sir Colbert," he continued, "when I don't know the names of the men of talent who honour my regime." As he said these words he turned slowly toward Colbert who dwindled before the assault, sweat bursting from his brow, lips speechless, spirit crushed. "You'll remember that name," Louis XIV added.

Colbert bowed, paler than his cuffs of white Flemish lace. Fouquet continued, "The masonry is of Roman concrete; the architects mixed it using an ancient and most durable formula."

"And the cannons?" asked Louis.

"Oh, Sire, that's Your Majesty's business! I wouldn't presume to place artillery in my domain unless Your Majesty was in command of it."

Louis began to waver indecisively between the resentment he felt toward this powerful man and the pity he felt for the man he'd outmanoeuvred, the accountant who seemed a mere shadow of the powerful minister. But the awareness of his duty as a king prevailed over his feelings as a man. He waved a finger across the paper. "Execution of these plans cost you a lot of money?" he said.

"I believe I had the honour of telling Your Majesty the amount."

"Remind me, I forgot."

"Sixteen hundred thousand livres."

"Sixteen hundred thousand livres! You are enormously wealthy, Sir Fouquet."

"It's Your Majesty who's wealthy," said the superintendent, "since Belle-Île is Your Majesty's."

"Yes, and thank you; but wealthy as I am, Sir Fouquet..."

The king paused. "Well, Sire?" asked the superintendent.

"I foresee a moment when I'll run out of money."

"You, Sire?"

"Yes, me."

"And when will that be?"

"Tomorrow, I believe."

"Would Your Majesty do me the honour to explain?"

"My brother is going to marry the English king's sister."

"Well, Sire?"

"Well! I must give the young princess a reception worthy of the granddaughter of Henri IV."

"That's entirely fair, Sire."

"So, I need money."

"No doubt about it."

"I'm going to need..." Louis XIV hesitated. The sum he was going to name was the same that he'd had to refuse to Charles II. He turned to Colbert to deliver the blow. "Tomorrow I'll need..." he repeated while looking at his intendant.

"A million," Colbert said brutally, thrilled to be able to resume his revenge.

Fouquet turned his back on the intendant to better attend the king. He waited until the king repeated, or rather murmured, "A million."

"Oh, Sire!" replied Fouquet disdainfully. "A million! What will Your Majesty do with a million?"

"But, it seems to me ..." said Louis XIV.

"That's no more than is spent on the wedding of a minor German prince."

"But Sir..."

"Your Majesty will need at least two million. The horses alone will cost five hundred thousand livres! I shall have the honour of sending Your Majesty sixteen hundred thousand livres – tonight."

"What?" said the king. "Sixteen hundred thousand livres!"

"Patience, Sire," replied Fouquet without so much as a glance at Colbert. "I know that's still four hundred thousand short of the two million. But Sir Intendant here," he said, pointing with his thumb over his shoulder at Colbert, "has in his coffers nine hundred thousand livres of mine."

The king turned to look at Colbert but the latter could say only, "Uh..."

"Sir, here," continued Fouquet, still speaking of Colbert without looking at him, "has received in the last week another sixteen hundred thousand livres. He paid a hundred thousand to the French Guards companies, seventy-five thousand to the hospitals, twenty-five thousand to the Swiss Guards, one hundred thirty thousand for provisions, a thousand for arms, and ten thousand for general expenses; if I'm not mistaken, that leaves a balance of nine hundred thousand."

Then, half turning toward Colbert, Fouquet said, in the scornful tone of an executive to his inferior, "Make sure those nine hundred thousand livres are handed to His Majesty tonight. In gold."

"But," said the king, "doesn't that add up to two and a half million livres?"

"Sire, the extra five hundred thousand will be pocket money for His Royal Highness. Do you hear, Sir Colbert? Tonight, before eight o'clock."

And with these words, and a respectful salute to the king, the superintendent withdrew from the royal presence without a single glance at the envious man whom he'd just taken to the cleaners. Colbert tore his Flemish lace in a rage and bit his lips till they bled. Fouquet was barely out the door when the usher rushed in past him, announcing, "A courier from Brittany for His Majesty."

"Sir d'Herblay's right!" muttered Fouquet as he consulted his watch. "An hour and fifty-five minutes. I was just in time!"

D'Artagnan finally gets his Hands on the Commission of Captain

The reader already knows who the usher referred to when announcing a messenger from Brittany, for it was easy enough to recognise him. It was d'Artagnan, clothing dust-covered, face ruddy, hair dripping with sweat, legs stiff, painfully climbing the stairs, his bloody spurs ringing on every step. The moment he entered the doorway, he saw the superintendent. Fouquet greeted with a smile this man who, if he'd arrived one hour earlier, would have brought him ruin or death. D'Artagnan found within his greatness of soul and his inexhaustible vitality enough composure to remember how well the superintendent had received him; he returned the greeting, more from benevolence and compassion than from respect. On his lips was the word that had been repeated in vain so many times to the Duke Guise: "Fly!"

But to speak that word would have been to betray his oath; and moreover, to say that word on the threshold of the king's study in the presence of a Royal Guard would save no one. Thus, d'Artagnan contented himself with saluting Fouquet without speaking to him, and went on in, where he found the king torn between surprise at the final words of Fouquet and pleasure at the return of d'Artagnan. Though d'Artagnan was not a courtier, his eyes were just as sharp, quick, and upon entering he immediately read the painful humiliation printed on Colbert's face that was only exacerbated when he heard the king say, "So, Sir Colbert, you've nine hundred thousand livres at the ready according to the superintendent?"

Colbert, choking, bowed without answering. D'Artagnan's eyes and ears took in the entire scene at once. The first word Louis XIV directed at his musketeer as if in deliberate contrast to his previous utterance, was an affectionate, "Good morning!"

His next word was a dismissal of Colbert. The latter, livid and staggering, left the king's study, while d'Artagnan curled the ends of his mustachios. "Your disarray's just the kind of thing I love to see on my servants," said the king to d'Artagnan, admiring the wear and tear of the road on his envoy's clothing.

"In fact, Sire," said d'Artagnan, "I thought my presence at the Louvre sufficiently urgent to excuse presenting myself this way."

"You bring me important news, then, Sir?" asked the king with a smile.

"Sire, here's the entire story in three words: Belle-Île is fortified and well-fortified, too. It's a double wall, a citadel, two flanking forts, there are two swift corsairs in her port, and her shore batteries await only cannon."

"I know all that, Sir," replied the king.

"Er – Your Majesty knows all that?" said the musketeer, stupefied.

"I have the plan of Belle-Île's fortification," said the king.

"Your Majesty has the plan...?"

"Right here."

"Indeed, sire," said d'Artagnan, "that's it, the same one I saw there." D'Artagnan's face darkened. "Ah, I see now!" he said reproachfully. "Your Majesty didn't trust me to handle it alone and sent someone else as well."

"What does it matter, sir, how I learn what I know as long as I know it?"

"Maybe so, sire," said the musketeer, without even trying to disguise his discontent, "but I must say to Your Majesty that it's hardly fitting for me to ride so recklessly, risking my neck twenty times over, just to be received upon arrival with such news. Sire, when one distrusts people or thinks them insufficient, one shouldn't employ them."

And d'Artagnan with a distinctly military flourish, stamped his foot on the floor in a cloud of bloody dust. The king watched him calmly while inwardly enjoying this first triumph. "Sir," he said after a moment, "the state of Belle-Île isn't only known to me, Belle-Île is now mine."

"Fine, Sire, fine – I ask only one thing more," d'Artagnan replied. "My discharge!"

"What! Your discharge?"

"Absolutely. I'm too proud to take the king's silver without earning or worse, without deserving it. My discharge, Sire!"

"Oh ho!"

"My discharge, or I'll leave without it."

"Are you angry, Sir?"

"I have a right to be, God be with you! I cling to my saddle for thirty-two hours, riding day and night, breaking all records, I arrive stiff as a corpse, only to find someone else got here ahead of me. Enough! I'm clearly useless. My discharge, Sire!"

"Sir d'Artagnan," said Louis XIV, laying his white hand on the musketeer's dusty arm, "what I've just told you has no bearing on what I promised you. To give my word is to keep it."

And the young king, going to his desk, opened a drawer and removed a paper folded and sealed. "Here's your commission as Captain of the King's Musketeers," he said. "You've earned it, Sir d'Artagnan." D'Artagnan eagerly opened the letter and looked it over twice. He could scarcely believe his eyes. "And this commission," continued the king, "is awarded to you, not solely for your mission to Belle-Île but also for your brave intervention on the Place de Grève. There also, you served me bravely and well."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan, who despite his self-control couldn't prevent a blush from rising to his cheek. "You know about that, too, Sire?"

"Yes, I know it." The king had a penetrating gaze and infallible judgement when it came to reading a conscience. "You've something more to tell me," he said to the musketeer. "Come, speak frankly with me, sir. You know I said I always want you to be honest with me."

"Well, Sire! All I've to say is that I'd rather be named Captain of the Musketeers for having charged at the head of my company to silence a battery or take a town than for getting two sad wretches hanged."

"Is that true, what you just told me?"

"And why would Your Majesty suspect me of deceiving him, I must ask?"

"Because, if I've judged you at all well, Sir, I can hardly think you'd be sorry for having drawn your sword on my behalf."

"Well, this time you're wrong, Sire, and very much so. Yes, I am sorry about having drawn my sword this time because of what resulted; two poor people are dead, Sire, who couldn't defend themselves, and were neither your enemies nor mine."

The king was silent for a moment, then said, "And your companion, Sir d'Artagnan, is he sorry as well?"

"My companion?"

"Yes, you weren't alone, it seems to me."

"Alone? Where?"

"On the Place de Grève."

"No, Sire," said d'Artagnan, embarrassed that the king might suspect that he wanted all the glory that should be rightfully shared with Raoul. "No, God be with you! As Your Majesty says, I had a companion, and a good one."

"A young man?"

"Yes, Sire, a young man. I must compliment Your Majesty on how well informed he is, from first to last. Is it Sir Colbert who brings the king such thorough reports?"

"Sir Colbert has told me nothing but good of you, Sir d'Artagnan, and would have been ill received if he'd done otherwise."

"Ah! That's fine."

"He also spoke nothing but good of this young man."

"That's as it'd be," said the musketeer.

"In fact, he said the young man is a real hero," said Louis XIV to see if he could arouse some jealousy.

"A hero indeed, Sire," said d'Artagnan, delighted at the opportunity to speak well about Raoul before the king.

"Do you know his name?"

"I should think so!"

"So, you know him?"

"Only for about twenty-five years, Sire."

"But he's no older than that!" said the king.

"Well, Sire, that's because I've known him since birth."

"Really?"

"Sire," said d'Artagnan. "Your Majesty questions me with such suspicion that I think it must derive from someone else. Did Sir Colbert who informs you so well, forget to tell you that this young man's the son of my closest friend?"

"The Viscount of Bragelonne?"

"Exactly, Sire – the Viscount of Bragelonne's father is the Count of La Fère, who was instrumental in the restoration of King Charles II. Oh, Bragelonne springs from a valiant race, Sire!"

"Then he's the son of that lord who came to meet me, or rather to meet with Sir de Mazarin, to offer an alliance on the behalf of King Charles II?"

"Precisely."

"And you say this Count of La Fère is a brave man?"

"Sire, he's a man who drew his sword on the behalf of the king your father more times than there have been days in Your Majesty's life."

This time it was Louis XIV who was taken by surprise. "Very well, Sir d'Artagnan! And this Count of La Fère is your friend?"

"For about forty years, yes, Sire. I didn't just meet him yesterday, Your Majesty."

"Would you be pleased to see this young man, Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Delighted, Sire!"

The king struck a bell, and an usher appeared. "Call Sir de Bragelonne," said the king.

"What? He's here?" said d'Artagnan.

"He's on guard duty today at the Louvre with the gentlemen's company of Sir Prince."

The king had scarcely finished before Raoul presented himself, and, seeing d'Artagnan, smiled one of those charming smiles that appear only on the lips of youth. "Come, now," d'Artagnan said familiarly to Raoul, "the king will allow you to embrace me; only first give His Majesty your thanks."

Raoul bowed so graciously that Louis, who was pleased by all superiorities that didn't outdo his own, admired his good looks, vigour, and modesty. "Sir," said the king to Raoul, "I've asked Sir Prince to give you up to me; I've received his reply and as of this morning you belong to me. Sir Prince is a good master but I dare to hope you won't lose by the change."

"Yes, Raoul, don't worry, the king has his good points," said d'Artagnan who had divined Louis's character and could toy with his self-esteem – within limits of course, keeping to the proprieties and flattering when he seemed to be mocking.

"Sire," said Bragelonne in a soft and charming voice, with the easy eloquence inherited from his father, "it's not just from today that I belong to Your Majesty."

"Oh, I know that!" said the king. "You mean the exploit on the Place de Grève. On that day, indeed, you belonged to me, Sir."

"Sire, it's not of that day I speak; I wouldn't dare to recall such a trivial service in the presence of a man like Sir d'Artagnan. I speak of an experience of great significance to my life that consecrated me, at the age of sixteen, to the devoted service of Your Majesty."

"Oh ho!" said the king. "And what was this experience, Sir, tell me?"

"It was this: when I was leaving on my first campaign, on my way to join the army of Sir Prince, Sir Count of La Fère accompanied me as far as Saint-Denis, to the tomb of Louis XIII at the base of the steps in the basilica vault, where God will not, I hope, send his successor for many long years. There he made me swear on the ashes of our noble masters to serve our royalty, as represented by and incarnated in you, Sire – to serve it in thought, word, and deed. For the last ten years, Sire, I haven't had many opportunities to keep that oath but I am Your Majesty's sworn soldier, nothing less, and by calling me nearer I don't change my master, only my garrison."

Raoul fell silent and bowed. Though he was done, the king continued to listen. "God be with you!" cried d'Artagnan. "That's well said, wasn't it, Your Majesty? He comes of a noble race, sire, a grand race!"

"Yes," murmured the king, delighted but not daring to show his emotions, touched by contact with such a naturally aristocratic character. "Yes, sir, you speak the truth: wherever you're, you're the king's. But by changing your garrison, believe me, you'll find an advancement of which you're worthy." Raoul saw that was all the king had to say to him and with that perfect tact that characterised his refined nature, he bowed and withdrew. "Do you have anything more to report to me, sir?" said the king when he found himself alone with d'Artagnan.

"Yes, Sire, and I've kept this news for last because it's sad and will clothe the royalty of Europe in mourning."

"What are you telling me?"

"Sire, in passing through Blois, a sorrowful word echoed from the château to my ear."

"Really, you're frightening me, Sir d'Artagnan."

"Sire, that word was spoken by a footman who wore black crêpe on his arm."

"For my uncle Gaston of Orléans perhaps?"

"Sire, he's taken his last breath."

"And I uninformed!" cried the king who in his royal vulnerability felt insulted by not being told the news.

"Oh, don't be angry, Sire!" said d'Artagnan. "Not the couriers of Paris nor the messengers of the rest of the world can keep up with your servant; the courier from Blois won't be here before two o'clock and he's riding well, I assure you when I passed him just beyond Orléans."

"My uncle Gaston," murmured Louis, pressing his hand to his forehead, and expressing in those 3 words all the mixed feelings of a lifetime.

"Yes, sire. And so it goes," said d'Artagnan philosophically, responding to the royal thought. "The past escapes us."

"So true, Sir, so true. But we still have the future, thank God, and we can try to make it less sad."

"I count on Your Majesty for that," said the musketeer with a bow. "And now..."

"Yes, quite right, Sir – I forgot you just rode a hundred and ten leagues. Go, Sir, take good care of the best of my soldiers ... and when you're rested, return and receive my orders."

"Sire, absent or present, I'm always yours." D'Artagnan bowed and went out. Then as if he had only ridden from Fontainebleau, he went off through the Louvre to find Raoul of Bragelonne.

A Lover & his Mistress

While the wax-lights flickered in the Château de Blois around the dead body of Gaston d'Orléans, the last prince of the former reign; while the citizens of the town composed their epitaph for him that was far from complimentary; while Madam the dowager princess outside the funeral hall forgetting that in her youth she had so loved the dead man that she had fled her paternal palace to elope with him, considered her life, reckoning her calculations of interest and totalling her sacrifices of pride; meanwhile, elsewhere in the château, other interests and other prides were anxiously being reckoned in light of the prince's passing. Not the mournful tolling of the bells, nor the chants of the singers, nor the gleam of the candles through the windows, nor the preparations for the burial, none of these things had the power to distract two people who stood inside a window of the château's inner courtyard, a window we already know<sup>63</sup> that admitted light into a room in what was called the Little Apartments. A joyful ray of sunshine – for the sun didn't seem concerned about the loss France had just suffered – a ray of sunshine fell upon the pair, drawing perfume from the surrounding flowers and scattering reflections from the gold wallpaper. These two people who were occupied, not by the death of the prince but by the concerns that death provoked, were a young woman and a young man. The latter was a man in his mid-twenties favoured with two large and long-lashed eyes that could make his expression seem open or veiled depending on their play. He was small of stature and dark of skin and smiled with a wide and handsome mouth above a pointed and unusually mobile chin. He sometimes leaned very lovingly toward his companion, who, it must be said, didn't recoil nearly as quickly as strict propriety might require. This young woman, whom we already know, for we've seen her before at this same window by the light of the same sun, was comprised of a singular mix of finesse and intelligence, charming when she laughed and beautiful when she was serious – but we must admit, she was more often charming than beautiful. The pair seemed to have reached the climax of a half-mocking, half-serious discussion. "Come, Sir Malicorne,"* said the young woman, "are you finally prepared to be reasonable?"

"You think it's so easy, Miss Aure, to do what we'd like," replied the young man, "When we really do only what we can."

"Oh, fie! Always hiding behind your words."

"Me?"

"Yes, you. Leave behind your lawyer's logic, my dear."

"Another impossibility. I must be who I am, Miss Montalais."

"And I must be a lady, Sir Malicorne."

"Alas, I know it well, and your rank overwhelms me. I can tell you nothing."

"I, overwhelm you? Never! Now tell me what you came here to say. I've waited long enough."

"Very well! I must obey."

"I'm eager to hear it, in fact."

"First, 'Sir' is dead."

"Plague! Old news. Where do you come from with that?"

"I come from Orléans, Miss."

"And is that the only news you bring?"

"Not at all! I also come to tell you that Princess Henrietta of England is on her way to marry King Louis's brother and become the new Madam."

"Really, Malicorne, you're quite insufferable with your news of the last century. If you continue to mock me like this, I'll have you thrown out."

"Oh! Will you?"

"Yes, you're really quite exasperating."

"Now, now! Have patience, Miss."

"You're just pretending to have something important to say. If you don't, then be off."

"Tell me what you want to know, and I'll answer honestly. Well, as honestly as I can."

"You know what I want to hear! Am I to be appointed a maid of honour, a position I foolishly expected you to use your leverage to obtain?"

"Me?" Malicorne lowered his eyes, took her hands, and gave her an impish look. "And what leverage do you imagine a poor lawyer might have?"

"Your father's income can't be less than twenty thousand livres a year, Sir Malicorne."

"He doesn't do badly for a provincial, Miss Montalais."

"And he's deep in the confidence of the Prince de Condé."

"A confidence that comes of lending freely to my Lord."

"In short, you're the best-connected rogue in the province."

"You flatter me."

"Me?"

"Yes, you."

"How so?"

"Because you say I have leverage when I say I have none."

"Seriously, now – what of my appointment?"

"Well, then! Your appointment?"

"Will I have it or not?"

"You ... shall have it."

"But when?"

"Whenever you want."

"Where is it then?"

"In my pocket."

"What! In your pocket?"

"Yes."

And with a sly smile, Malicorne drew from his pocket a letter that Montalais pounced upon and read avidly. And as she read, her face lit up. "Malicorne!" she cried. "You're really a good lad."

"How so, Miss?"

"Because you could have made me pay for this appointment – but you didn't."

And to needle him, she burst out laughing. But Malicorne bravely withstood the attack. "I've no idea what you mean," he said.

Then it was Montalais who was taken aback. "I've declared my feelings to you," continued Malicorne. "You've told me three times, laughing that you don't love me – but you kissed me once without laughing, and that's all I need."

"All?" said the proud and enticing Montalais in a tone of wounded pride.

"Absolutely all, Miss," replied Malicorne.

"Fah!"

This single syllable conveyed as much in anger as the young man might have expected in gratitude. But he calmly shook his head. "Listen, Montalais," he said, seeming not to care whether this familiarity pleased his mistress or not, "there's no point in pretending."

"Isn't there?"

"Indeed not, since, in the year I've known you, you could have had me thrown out twenty times if I didn't please you."

"Really? Why would I do that?"

"I've certainly been impertinent enough to deserve it."

"Well, that's true enough."

"Therefore, you have to admit that I've pleased you," said Malicorne.

"Sir Malicorne!"

"Let's not fight about it. Since you kept me around, you must have had a reason for it."

"As long as you don't think it's because I love you!" hissed Montalais.

"Fine. I'm even sure that at this moment you hate me."

"Never have you spoken more truly!"

"Fine! I can't stand you, either."

"I'll make a note of it."

"I'm sure. You think I'm tactless and foolish, and that I find you shrill and short-tempered, always twisting up your face in anger. Right now, you'd rather jump out the window than let me kiss the tip of your finger, while I'd rather throw myself from the highest tower than touch the hem of your gown. And yet, five minutes from now you'll love me and I will adore you. That's just how it goes."

"I say you're wrong."

"And I swear it's the truth."

"Fah!"

"But none of this means a thing. The truth is, you need me, Aure – and I need you. When you want to be merry, I make you laugh, and when it suits me to be in love, I need only look at you. I've brought you the royal appointment you desired, and eventually you'll give me something that I want."

"Me?"

"Yes, you! But at the moment, my dear Aure, I don't want a single thing so relax."

"What an awful man you are, Malicorne! Here I was, ready to rejoice in my appointment, and you go and ruin it."

"No loss! You'll have plenty of time to rejoice in it after I've gone on my way."

"Go, then."

"I will – but first, a final word."

"What?"

"You should cheer up and find your good mood again. Sulking just makes you ugly."

"What a brute you are!"

"Look, we might as well be honest with each other."

"You're hard-hearted, Malicorne!"

"And you're ungrateful, Montalais!"

The young man turned, leaned on the windowsill, and stared out at nothing. Montalais picked up a book and opened it. Malicorne stood up, brushed his hat on his sleeve, and straightened his black doublet. Montalais, while pretending to read, watched him from the corner of her eye. "Fine!" she cried furiously. "Resume your phony air of respectability. Now you'll sulk for a week."

"Two weeks, Miss," said Malicorne with a bow.

Montalais shook her fist at him. "Monster!" she said. "Oh, if I was a man!"

"What would you do to me?"

"I'd strangle you!"

"Oh, excellent," said Malicorne. "You know ... I think I'm finally beginning to want something."

"And what do you want, Sir Demon? That I should lose my soul to anger?"

Malicorne turned his hat respectfully in his hands – and then suddenly he dropped it, grabbed the young woman by the shoulders, drew her to him and kissed her with two burning lips surprisingly ardent for a man who'd pretended indifference. Aure began to cry out but it was swallowed in the kiss. Annoyed and upset, the young woman pushed Malicorne back against the wall. "Suit yourself!" said Malicorne philosophically. "That kiss will hold me for a good six weeks. Farewell, Miss! Accept my humble farewell."

And he took three steps toward the door. "Ooh! No!" cried Montalais, stamping her foot. "You're not going anywhere! Stop! I command you!"

"You command me?"

"Yes. Am I not mistress here?"

"Of my mind and my soul, utterly."

"Fine things for me to have! The mind is bone dry and the soul is foolish."

"Careful, Montalais – I know you," said Malicorne. "You're going to fall in love with your humble servant."

"Well! ... Maybe I will," she said, draping her arms around his neck more with childish indolence than with voluptuous abandon. "Maybe I will. After all, I still have to thank you."

"For what?"

"My appointment! For isn't it my entire future?"

"And mine as well."

Montalais stared at him. "You know what's frightful?" she asked. "I can never tell when you're speaking seriously."

"I've never been more serious. I wanted to go to Paris, and now that you're going there – we are going there."

"So that's the real reason you did this, selfish one?"

"What would you have, Aure? I can't do without you."

"Well, to tell the truth, it's the same with me. But you're still a man with a heart of stone."

"Aure, dearest Aure, take care – you know your insults just make me adore you."

And saying this, Malicorne approached the young woman a second time. Just then a footstep echoed from the stair. The young folk were so close they'd have been surprised in each other's arms if Montalais hadn't violently shoved Malicorne against the door as it was opening. There was a thump, a loud cry, and curses from the other side. It was Madam de Saint-Rémy* who uttered the cry and the curses; the unlucky Malicorne had half crushed her in the doorway. "This rascal again?" shrilled the old woman. "It's always him!"

"On the contrary, Madam," replied Malicorne respectfully. "This is the first time it's been me in a week."

The True Heroine of This Tale Finally Appears

Behind Madam de Saint-Rémy on the stairs was her daughter, Miss Louise de La Vallière. She heard the explosion of maternal fury, and guessing the reason for it, she entered the room trembling. There she saw as expected the unhappy Malicorne, whose woeful expression would have aroused sympathy or amusement in anyone not already angry. He had entrenched himself behind a large chair to fend off Madam de Saint-Rémy's attacks. He couldn't reach her by words, as she was louder than he, so he had to rely on the eloquence of his gestures. But the old lady heard and saw nothing, as she'd long considered Malicorne an archenemy, and her anger was sufficient that it overflowed from Malicorne onto his accomplice, Montalais, who got her share. "And you, Miss, do you think I won't warn Madam about what's going on with one of her maids of honour?"

"Oh, no, Mother!" cried Miss La Vallière. "Please, spare her..."

"Hold your tongue, Miss, and don't waste effort on the behalf of the unworthy. That an honest girl like you is subject to such a bad influence's trouble enough, I'll not have you defending her into the bargain."

"But, really," said Montalais, rebelling at last, "I can't imagine why you should treat me this way. I've done nothing to injure you, have I?"

"Oh, Miss? And this lowborn loafer, what good is he doing here? I ask you!" retorted Madam de Saint-Rémy.

"He's not here for good or ill, Madam, he just comes to see me, that's all."

"So, so?" said Madam de Saint-Rémy. "Well, Her Royal Highness will be informed, and she will decide."

"Even so," replied Montalais, "I don't see why Sir Malicorne should be forbidden to have intentions toward me, if his intentions are honourable."

"Honourable intentions, with a face like that!" snapped Madam de Saint-Rémy.

"I thank you on behalf of my face, Madam," said Malicorne.

"Come, Louise," continued Madam de Saint-Rémy. "We must warn Madam that while she mourns for her husband, even as we all grieve for the loss of the master of our château, in this house of sorrow there are people who amuse themselves and rejoice."

"Oh!" cried the accused pair in a single voice.

"A maid of honour! A maid of honour!" cried the old lady, raising her hands to the heavens.

"Well! That's where you're wrong, Madam," said Montalais, exasperated. "I'm no maid of honour, at least not to Madam."

"Have you resigned your position, Miss? Very well! I'm surprised by your integrity but I can only applaud your honesty."

"I haven't resigned, Madam but I have taken service elsewhere."

"Among the bourgeoisie? Or the lawyers?" asked Madam de Saint-Rémy with disdain.

"You should know, Madam, that I'm not a young lady to serve citizens or clerks," said Montalais. "Instead of this miserable court in which you vegetate, I go to a court nearly royal."

"Haha! A royal court," said Madam de Saint-Rémy, choking on a laugh. "A royal court – what do you think of that, daughter?"

And she turned toward Miss La Vallière, whom she hoped to incite against Montalais but who, contrary to her mother's impulse, gave a look intended to conciliate Montalais and Madam de Saint-Rémy.

"I said a nearly royal court, Madam," replied Montalais, "as Princess Henrietta of England who's to be the wife of His Royal Highness Sir, isn't a queen. I said nearly royal and that's quite correct as she'll be sister-in-law to the king."

A lightning bolt striking the Château de Blois couldn't have stunned Madam de Saint-Rémy more than Montalais's words. "Wh-what's that you say about Her Royal Highness Madam Henrietta?" stammered the old lady.

"I say that I'm joining her household as a maid of honour. That's what I say."

"A maid of honour!" cried Madam de Saint-Rémy with despair and Miss La Vallière with joy.

"Yes, Madam. A maid of honour."

The old lady bowed her head as if this blow were too much for her. However, she straightened almost immediately to fire a final shot at her adversary. "Oh, yes," she said, "we often hear talk of such future promises, flattering ourselves with vain hopes until, at the last moment, we see what we counted upon disappear like mist and steam."

"Ah but Madam, the credit of my protector is rock solid, and a promise from him is a deed done."

"And this protector, oh so powerful, would it be indiscreet to inquire as to his name?"

"My God, not at all. It is Sir, here," said Montalais, indicating Malicorne who had maintained perfect sangfroid and an almost comical dignity throughout this scene.

"Sir, here!" cried Madam de Saint-Rémy with an explosion of hilarity. "Sir is your protector! The man whose credit's rock solid and promises are deeds done is Sir Malicorne?"

Malicorne bowed. As for Montalais, her only response was to draw the letter of appointment from her purse and present it to the old lady. "Here's the appointment," she said.

It was the final blow. As soon as she saw the official parchment, the good woman clasped her hands together, an indescribable expression of despair and envy distorted her face, and she had to sit down to avoid passing out. Montalais was not as petty as to rejoice overmuch in this victory by crushing her vanquished enemy, especially since this enemy was her friend's mother; she accepted her triumph but didn't revel in it. Malicorne was less generous; he leaned back in an armchair in a pose of insolent over-familiarity that, two hours earlier, would have gotten him a swift whack with a stick.

"Maid of honour to the young Madam!" repeated Madam de Saint-Rémy, still unable to believe it.

"Yes, Madam, thanks to the influence of Sir Malicorne, here."

"It's incredible!" repeated the old lady. "Doesn't it seem incredible, Louise?"

But Louise did not answer, distracted. She stood dreaming, one hand to her brow and sighed. "Tell me, sir," Madam de Saint-Rémy said suddenly, "however did you obtain such an appointment?"

"By asking for it, Madam."

"Asking who?"

"One of my friends."

"And you have such good friends at Court that you have that much credit with them?"

"Dame! Apparently."

"And might we know the names of these friends?"

"I didn't say friends, Madam, just a friend."

"And what's this friend called?"

"Plague, Madam, what are you thinking? When one has a friend as powerful as mine, you don't risk losing him by flaunting his name."

"You're quite right, Sir, not to mention a name that might not exist."

"In any case," said Montalais, "whether the friend exists or not, the appointment certainly does, and that's the point of the issue."

"Then I suppose," said Madam de Saint-Rémy with the grimace of a cat about to scratch, "that when I found Sir here just now..."

"Well?"

"He was bringing you your appointment."

"That's right, Madam – quite so."

"Nothing could be more proper, then."

"So I think, Madam."

"And I was wrong, it seems, to reproach you, Miss."

"Very wrong, Madam – but I'm so used to your reproaches that I forgive you."

"In that case, Louise, we should withdraw, don't you think?"

"What, Madam?" said La Vallière, with a shiver, "What did you say?"

"You weren't listening, my child?"

"No, Madam, I was thinking."

"About what?"

"A thousand things."

"You're not angry with me, are you, Louise?" said Montalais, taking her hand.

"And why would you think that, my dear Aure?" replied the young woman in a voice soft and musical.

"By Our Lady!" said Madam de Saint-Rémy. "If she's a bit angry at you, poor girl, she could hardly be blamed."

"Dear God, why's that?"

"It seems to me she's as pretty as you, and of as good a family."

"Mother!" Louise cried.

"A hundred times more beautiful, Madam, though not of a better family," said Montalais. "But that doesn't explain why she should be mad at me."

"Do you think it right for her to be buried in Blois while you go to shine in Paris?"

"But, Madam, I'm not stopping Louise from following me to Paris; on the contrary, I'd love for her to come."

"Yet it seems to me that Sir Malicorne, who is all-powerful at Court..."

"Alas, Madam," said Malicorne, "it's everyone for himself in this sad world."

"Malicorne!" warned Montalais. Then leaning over the young man, she whispered, "Keep Madam de Saint-Rémy busy, either by arguing with her or making up; I need to talk to Louise." And a gentle press of her hand rewarded him for his obedience. Malicorne groaned and turned toward Madam de Saint-Rémy while Montalais spoke to her friend, an arm draped around her neck, "Let's hear it. What're you thinking? Is it true you'll love me no more if I go away to shine, as your mother says?"

"Of course not!" replied the young woman, blinking back tears. "No, I'd be happy for your happiness."

"Happy! You look like you're ready to cry."

"Do we cry only from envy?"

"Ah, yes! I understand – I'm going to Paris, and the word Paris brings to mind a certain young cavalier."

"Aure!"

"A certain cavalier who formerly lived in Blois and now lives in Paris."

"I don't know what's wrong with me, really, I'm just overcome."

"Cry then since you can't find a smile for me." Louise raised a face streaming softly with tears, rolling one after another, glittering like diamonds. "Come, confess," said Montalais.

"What'd I confess?"

"To what's making you cry for we don't cry without a reason. I'm your friend; whatever you want me to do, I'll do it. Malicorne has more pull than you – or he – thinks! Do you want to come to Paris?"

"Oh, my heart!" said Louise.

"Do you want to come to Paris?"

"To stay here alone, in this old château, no more to hear your sweet songs, to press your hand, to run with you in the gardens – oh, it will be so tedious that I'll die in just days!"

"Do you want to come to Paris?"

Louise sighed. "That's not an answer."

"How am I supposed to answer you?"

"Yes or no; that's not so hard, it seems to me."

"Oh! You're going to be so happy there, Montalais!"

"Which means, I suppose, that you'd like to be where I'll be?"

Louise said nothing. "Stubborn thing!" said Montalais. "Do we keep secrets from our friends? Confess that you want to come to Paris, confess that you're dying to see Raoul de Bragelonne again!"

"I can't confess that."

"Then you're in the wrong."

"Why?"

"Because ... do you see this appointment?"

"Of course, I see it."

"Well! I'll get you one just like it."

"From who?"

"From Malicorne."

"Aure, are you serious? Is that even possible?"

"Dame! Here is Malicorne, and what he's done for me, he'll just have to do for you."

Malicorne had heard his name spoken twice and was delighted to have an excuse to turn away from Madam de Saint-Rémy. "What is it, Miss?"

"Come here, Malicorne," said Montalais with a commanding gesture. Malicorne obeyed. "Another appointment like this one," said Montalais.

"How's that?"

"Another appointment like this one. Did I mumble?"

"But..."

"I must have it!"

"Oh ho! You must?"

"Yes."

"It isn't possible, is it, Sir Malicorne?" said Louise in her soft voice.

"Dame! If it's for you, Miss..."

"For me. Yes, Sir Malicorne, it'd be for me."

"And if Miss Montalais asks for it as well..."

"Miss Montalais does not ask for it, she requires it."

"Well! I see I must obey, Miss."

"With her name on it?"

"We shall try."

"No weasel words. Louise de La Vallière shall be a maid of honour to Madam Henrietta within a week."

"Just as you say!"

"Within a week, or..."

"Or?"

"Or take back your appointment, Sir Malicorne. I won't go without my friend."

"Aure!" cried Louise.

"All is well, you can keep your appointment. Miss La Vallière shall be a maid of honour."

"Really?"

"Really."

"I can hope to go to Paris?"

"Count on it."

"Oh, Sir Malicorne, how grateful I'll be!" cried Louise, clapping her hands in joy.

"Little liar!" said Montalais. "Trying to make me think you were no longer in love with Raoul."

Louise blushed like a rose in May but instead of answering, she went to embrace her mother. "Madam," she said to her, "did you hear? Sir Malicorne's going to have me appointed a maid of honour!"

"Sir Malicorne is a prince in disguise," said the old lady. "He is all-powerful."

"Would you like to be a maid of honour as well?" Malicorne asked Madam de Saint-Rémy. "I might as well appoint everyone while I'm at it." And he went out on that note, leaving the old lady with mouth open but empty, as Tallemant des Réaux would say. "Here we go," murmured Malicorne as he went down the stairs. "This is going to cost me another thousand livres but there's no way around it; my friend Manicamp* does nothing for free."

Malicorne & Manicamp

The introduction of these two characters into the story and the connection between them deserves some explanation to the reader. We will therefore relate a few details about Sirs Malicorne and Manicamp. Malicorne, as mentioned, had come from Orléans to bring the appointment for Miss Montalais, the arrival of which had produced such a sensation in the Château de Blois. Orléans was where, at the moment, Sir de Manicamp was abiding. A singular person, this Sir de Manicamp: a young man of intelligence but always penniless, always needy, though he had free access to the purse of Sir Count de Guiche,* one of the deepest purses of the period. This access was due to Manicamp having been the childhood companion of the Count de Guiche, and though a poor dependent of the noble household of Marshal Grammont, <sup>65</sup> Sir de Manicamp had learned to make a way for himself despite having no prospects of his own. With a wisdom beyond his years, from early childhood he had taken the blame for all the follies of the young Count de Guiche. If his noble companion stole some fruit intended for Madam la Maréchale, or broke a window, or hurt a hunting dog, Manicamp declared himself guilty of the crime and suffered the punishment that was none the softer because it fell upon an innocent. But over time this system of loyal sacrifice had paid off. And now, instead of wearing the drab clothing compelled by his father's lack of fortune, Manicamp's wardrobe was brilliant, superb, like that of a young lord with an income of 50000 livres. Not that he was a man coarse of character or corrupt of will, no, his turn of mind was philosophical, or rather indifferent to personal ambition, unconcerned with rank or hierarchy. The only thing he cared about was having money to spend. But in that regard, Sir de Manicamp was a bottomless pit. About three or four times a year the Count de Guiche's purse ran empty, and when de Guiche was drained, his purse and pockets turned out, and he declared it would be a fortnight before the paternal generosity replenished them, Manicamp, drained like the purse, went to bed and stayed there. On these occasions he refused to eat and sold off his fine clothes on the pretext that, since he was in bed, he did not need them. During this low tide of exhaustion, the Count de Guiche's purse slowly refilled, and, once replenished, overflowed once more upon Manicamp, who bought new clothes, put them on, and resumed his former life. This eccentric habit of selling off his clothes for a quarter of what they were worth had made him a hero in certain circles in Orléans, a city that, in truth, we'd be hard pressed to say why he'd chosen it as the abode of his low tides. Provincial ne'er-do-wells with no more than six hundred livres a year were always waiting to take advantage of his sudden clothing sales. Among these local fops was our friend Malicorne, the son of an Orléans city alderman from whom the Prince de Condé, needy as the Condés always were, regularly borrowed money at ruinous interest. Sir Malicorne managed the paternal loans that meant, in those times of loose fiscal morality, that following the example of his father he also loaned out money for short terms at high interest, earning a good eighteen hundred livres a year on top of the six hundred afforded him by his father's generosity. With twenty-four hundred livres to squander on whatever follies he liked, this made Malicorne the king of the young dandies of Orléans. However, unlike Manicamp, Malicorne was frightfully ambitious. He loved from ambition, spent out of ambition, and might yet ruin himself through ambition. Malicorne was resolved to establish himself at any price, and his chosen means was to find for himself from the petty nobility both a mistress and a friend. The mistress was Miss Montalais, cruel in matters of amour but from a noble family, and that was what mattered to Malicorne. The friend lacked all friendship but he was the favourite of the Count de Guiche, himself a favourite of Sir, the king's brother and that sufficed for Malicorne. But ambition was expensive. Among such expenses, Miss Montalais cost him, in ribbons, gloves, and charming gifts, a thousand livres a year. Manicamp cost him, in cash loaned but never repaid, twelve to fifteen hundred livres a year. Taken together, that left nothing for Malicorne. Ah but we are mistaken! For he still had access to his father's treasury. Keeping a private side account, he advanced himself from the alderman's coffers a 6 years' allowance, about 15000 livres, vowing to himself of course, to repay it at the first opportunity. That opportunity would be his appointment to a prime position in Sir's royal household that would be established upon the prince's marriage. That time had come, and Sir's household was being assembled. A good position in the household of a Prince of the Blood, when backed by the recommendation of a close friend like the Count de Guiche, would be worth at least twelve thousand livres a year that Malicorne, with his fiscal practices, could easily increase to twenty thousand. Then, with an office and title, Malicorne would marry Miss Montalais, a lady of the petty nobility that would thus ennoble Malicorne. However, for Miss Montalais to have a proper dowry, because though she was an only child her family fortune wasn't much to speak of, she herself would have to be placed in the household of a grand princess, as generous as that of the Dowager Madam was frugal. And to make sure that the wife and the husband were in allied households, because to be in opposing houses would be a serious inconvenience, Malicorne had decided that both should be associated with the house of Sir, the king's brother. So, Miss Montalais would be maid of honour to the young Madam, just as Sir Malicorne would become an officer of Sir. Here was a plan clearly devised and boldly executed. Malicorne had therefore asked Manicamp to obtain a maid of honour appointment from the Count de Guiche. And the Count de Guiche had asked for such an appointment from Sir, who had signed the letter without hesitation. Malicorne's long-term plan – for a mind as active as his must see far into the future – was this: to place near Madam Henrietta a woman devoted to him, a lady who was witty, pretty, young, and intriguing, and thereby to learn all the feminine secrets of the princess's household, while he, Malicorne, together with his friend Manicamp, would divine all the masculine mysteries of the young prince's court. And by this means they would rapidly rise in rank and fortune. Now, Malicorne was an ill-sounding name, and he who bore it had no illusions on that score but if he could buy an estate somewhere, he could be Malicorne of some minor domain, or even de Malicorne that sounded much nobler. It might even be possible to discover an overlooked aristocratic heritage for the name of Malicorne: mightn't there be a provincial domain where an ancient bull with deadly horns had caused some great misfortune and baptized the ground with blood? Of course, the plan did have certain risks, the first of which was Miss Montalais herself. Capricious, changeable, evasive, free-spirited one moment and prudish the next, a grape-stained Erigone, she sometimes demolished, with a snap of her fingers or a silvery laugh, an edifice that Malicorne had laboured a month to build. Affection aside, Malicorne was pleased with his progress; but his love for Montalais that he couldn't help but feel, he nonetheless had the strength to conceal with care, convinced that if he revealed the true ties that bound him to this protean female, the demon would repudiate and mock him. So, he humbled his mistress by disdaining her. Though burning with desire, his demeanour was icy, because he was sure that if he opened his arms to her, she'd just laugh and run away. For her part, Montalais professed to be irritated by Malicorne but actually she loved him. Malicorne reflected her indifference back at her until she thought she believed it and felt she must detest him. If she tried to tempt him back by coquetry, Malicorne played even harder to get than she did. What made Montalais come back to Malicorne time and again was that he always arrived with fresh news of Court and the city, bringing to Blois a new fashion, scent, or secret, while never asking for anything in return, burning for favours though he was. For her part, Montalais repaid him with what stories she could. Through her, Malicorne knew all the gossip of the Dowager Madam's household, stories he slyly recounted until Manicamp nearly died laughing, before passing them on to de Guiche, who told them in turn to Sir. And that, in short, was the plot that united the petty intrigues of Blois to Orléans and Orléans to Paris, and which would draw to the latter city, where she would cause such a commotion, our poor little La Vallière, who was far from suspecting what her future held as she went joyfully home on her mother's arm. As for the worthy Malicorne, by which we mean the father, the alderman of Orléans, he saw the future no more clearly than the others and never suspected as he took his after-dinner walk from 3 o'clock to 5 around the Place Sainte-Catherine, wearing his grey cloak and beribboned shoes in the fashion of the time of Louis XIII, that it was he who was paying for all the stolen kisses, whispered secrets, and little surprise gifts that would lay a ribbon of love for 45 leagues from the Château de Blois to the Palais Royal.

Manicamp & Malicorne

Thus, Malicorne went to find his friend Manicamp, who was in temporary seclusion in the city of Orléans. He arrived just as the young nobleman was preparing to sell off the last of his fine clothing. A fortnight before, he'd extracted a hundred pistoles from the Count de Guiche on the pretext that he had to make a proper appearance when Madam Henrietta arrived at Le Havre. 3 days earlier, he had received 50 pistoles from Malicorne as the price of Montalais's appointment but having depleted all his resources, he had no expectations of further income unless he sold his handsome suit of organdie and satin, embroidered and laced with gold, an ensemble that had been admired by all the Court. However, to sell this outfit, the last in his wardrobe, Manicamp had been forced to don his sleepwear and take to his bed. No fire in his hearth, no money in his pocket, no funds for a promenade, he had nothing but sleep to take the place of food, friends, and fêtes. As the saying goes, "He who sleeps, eats," but no one says, "He who sleeps, converses," or "He who sleeps, revels." Manicamp, who for a week had been forced to give up dancing and playing cards, was therefore in a sad way. He was expecting a moneylender when instead Malicorne come in, and a cry of dismay escaped him. "What now?" he said in a tone of suffering and despair. "You, again, dear friend?"

"That's a fine reception," said Malicorne.

"It is, if you only knew the reason. I was expecting someone with money but instead of money, I got you."

"And what if I brought you some money?"

"Well! That's another thing entirely. Be welcome, dear friend."

And he extended his hand, not to take that of Malicorne but for his purse. Malicorne pretended to misunderstand and gave him his hand instead. "What about the money?" said Manicamp.

"My dear friend, if you want that, you'll have to earn it."

"What must I do?"

"Work for it, by God!"

"Work? How so?"

"I warn you, it's going to be rough."

"The devil!"

"You must get out of bed right away and go see the Count de Guiche."

"Me, get up?" said Manicamp, stretching luxuriously under the covers. "Not a chance."

"So, you've sold all your clothes?"

"No, I have one outfit left, the finest of all but I'm waiting for a buyer."

"And shoes?"

"I think you can see a pair on that chair."

"Well! Since you still have breeches and a doublet, put your legs in the one and your torso in the other, have them saddle a horse and take to the road."

"I think not."

"Why's that?"

"Morbleu! Don't you know Sir de Guiche is at Étampes?"

"No, I thought he was in Paris, so this is better: you have to go only fifteen leagues instead of thirty."

"How charming you are! But if I ride fifteen leagues in my best outfit it will be ruined, and instead of selling it for thirty pistoles, I'll be lucky to get fifteen for it."

"Do whatever you have to, because I must have a second appointment for a maid of honour."

"Really? Who for? Is La Montalais twins?"

"Reprobate! You must be twins, the way you squander two fortunes, mine and that of the Count de Guiche."

"You should say that of the Count de Guiche and yours."

"Quite so – all preference and deference to the lords. But let's return to my appointment."

"A waste of time."

"Why do you say that?"

"Mon ami, Madam can have no more than twelve maids of honour, and there are already twelve hundred women vying for those positions. Why, just to get one I had to deploy all my diplomacy..."

"Yes, I know you've made heroic efforts, my friend."

"We do know our business," said Manicamp.

"Oh, clearly! When I'm king, I promise you a great favour."

"What? To allow me to address you as Malicorne the First?"

"No, to be my superintendent of finance – but we're not at that point yet."

"Sadly."

"Which is why you need to get me a second maid of honour appointment."

"My friend, you can promise me heaven and earth later but right now I'm staying put."

Malicorne jingled his purse. "I've got twenty pistoles here," he said.

"My God! And what do you think you can get for twenty pistoles?"

"I think I could add them to the five hundred you owe me already," said Malicorne, a bit tartly.

"True enough," replied Manicamp, once more extending his hand. "And on that basis, I think I could accept them. Hand it over."

"Not so fast, devil take you! There's more to it than that. If I give you these twenty pistoles, will I get my appointment?"

"No doubt about it."

"Soon?"

"Today."

"Oh ho! Don't overpromise, Sir de Manicamp, I'm not that demanding! Riding thirty leagues in a day is too much, you'll kill yourself."

"In the service of a friend, I can do the impossible."

"You're a true hero."

"So, then, the twenty pistoles?"

"Here they are," said Malicorne, holding them out.

"Good."

"But, my dear Sir de Manicamp, you're going to spend the whole sum on post horses."

"Not at all; don't worry about a thing."

"Excuse me but it's fifteen leagues from here to Étampes..."

"Fourteen."

"Even so, fourteen leagues means seven posts. At twenty sous per post, that's seven livres, plus the postilion fee makes fourteen, twice that for the return makes twenty-eight, with food and lodging at least that much again; that's sixty livres all told."

Manicamp coiled like a serpent in his bed and looked with two heavy eyes at Malicorne. "You're right," he said, "I wouldn't be back before tomorrow."

And he took the twenty pistoles. "But now you have to go."

"Since I couldn't possibly get back before tomorrow, we've plenty of time."

"Plenty of time for what?"

"A card game."

"A card game? For what stakes?"

"For your twenty pistoles, by God!"

"No, thanks – you always win."

"How about a little wager, then?"

"For how much?"

"Twenty more pistoles. "

"And what's the wager about?"

"This: you said it's fourteen leagues to Étampes."

"So it is."

"And fourteen leagues back again."

"Yes."

"A total of twenty-eight leagues."

"Quite so."

"To cover these twenty-eight leagues, you'll grant me fourteen hours?"

"I would."

"Plus, an hour to find the Count de Guiche?"

"Fine."

"And an hour to get him to write the letter to Sir?"

"Very well."

"Sixteen hours in total."

"You calculate like Colbert."

"It's noon now?"

"Half past."

"My! That's a fine watch you have."

Malicorne hastily returned his watch to its pocket. "And so?"

"And so! I'll wager the twenty pistoles you loaned me against another twenty that you'll have the Count de Guiche's letter in..."

"In how long?"

"In just eight hours."

"Do you have a flying horse?"

"I might. Are you on?"

"I'll have the count's letter in eight hours?"

"Yes."

"Signed?"

"Yes."

"In my hand?"

"In your hand."

"All right, I'll take that bet!" said Malicorne, curious to see how this tailor's-dummy would manage it.

"You're on?"

"I'm on."

"Pass me that pen, ink, and paper."

"Here you go."

"Ah!" With a sigh, Manicamp half-raised himself onto his left arm, and then with beautiful penmanship traced the following lines: Good for one appointment of a maid of honour to Madam that Sir Count de Guiche will take care to obtain at the first opportunity. De Manicamp.

This exhausting task accomplished, Manicamp burrowed back into his bed. "Well?" asked Malicorne. "What does this mean?"

"It means that if you're really in a hurry to get your letter for Sir from the Count de Guiche, then I've won my wager."

"How so?"

"It's pretty clear, it seems to me. You take this note."

"All right."

"And you go in my place."

"Oh."

"You gallop hell for leather."

"I see."

"In six hours, you're in Étampes, by seven o'clock you have your letter from the count, and I've won my bet without ever leaving my bed that suits me perfectly – and you too, for that matter."

"Manicamp, I salute you; you're a great man."

"I suppose so."

"I leave, then, for Étampes."

"Indeed."

"Once there, I present the Count de Guiche with this note."

"And he'll give you one like it for Sir."

"Then I ride for Paris."

"Where you'll find Sir and give him the note from the Count de Guiche."

"Sir will approve the request."

"Instantly."

"And I'll have my appointment."

"So you shall."

"Ah!"

"I hope my behaviour has been proper in this?"

"Adorably proper!"

"Thank you."

"You get from the Count de Guiche pretty much anything you want, eh, my dear Manicamp?"

"Anything! Except money."

"The devil! That is an unfortunate exception. But suppose instead of money, you asked for..."

"What?"

"Something really important."

"And what do you call important?"

"Well, suppose one of your friends asked you for a favour?"

"I wouldn't do it."

"How selfish!"

"Not, that is, until I found out what I'd get in return."

"Now we're talking. The friend of which I speak is in front of you."

"You, Malicorne?"

"Me."

"Ah that! Are you so wealthy then?"

"If you call fifty pistoles wealth."

"Fifty pistoles is just the amount I need. Where are they?"

"Right here," said Malicorne, patting his money belt.

"Then tell me, my dear, what it is you need."

Malicorne took up the pen, ink, and paper, and presented them to Manicamp. "Write," he said.

"Dictate."

"Good for one appointment to an office in Sir's household. "

"Oh ho!" said Manicamp, putting down the plume. "An office in Sir's household – for a mere fifty pistoles?"

"Perhaps I misspoke."

"What did you mean to say?"

"I meant to say five hundred."

"And this five hundred?"

"Here they are."

And he took five rolls of coins from his money belt. Manicamp devoured the rolls of coins with his eyes – but this time, Malicorne held them at a distance. "So, what do you say? Five hundred pistoles..."

Malicorne clinked them in his hand. "I say it's a bargain, my dear," said Manicamp as he took up the pen, "though you're going to exhaust my credit. However, dictate."

Malicorne continued, "Which my friend the Count de Guiche will obtain from Sir for my friend Malicorne. "

"It's done," said Manicamp.

"Pardon me but you forgot to sign it."

"Why, so I did! ...Er, the five hundred pistoles?"

"Here are two hundred and fifty."

"And the other two hundred and fifty?"

"When I get my appointment."

Manicamp made a face. "In that case, give me back the note."

"To do what?"

"So I can add a word to it."

"A word?"

"Yes, a single word."

"Which is?"

"Quickly. "

Malicorne gave him the note, Manicamp added the word and signed. "Good!" said Malicorne, taking the paper.

Manicamp was counting the pistoles. "It's twenty short," he said.

"What do you mean?"

"It's short the twenty that I won."

"When?"

"When I wagered that you'd have the letter from the Count de Guiche in eight hours."

"That's only fair."

And Malicorne gave him twenty more pistoles. Manicamp gathered the gold in both hands and let it rain down on his bed. "The second maid of honour appointment," said Malicorne to himself, blowing the note dry, "seems, at first blush, to cost me more than the first but..." he paused, took up the pen, a fresh sheet, and wrote to Montalais:

Miss, tell your friend that her appointment won't be long in coming. I'm off to get it signed personally, riding 86 leagues for love of you...

Then, with his devilish smile, he resumed his internal monologue: "An appointment that, at first blush, seems to cost more than the first but I think it will be worth it, for if Miss La Vallière isn't an even better investment than Miss Montalais – well, my name isn't Malicorne!"

Then, aloud, he said, "Goodbye, Manicamp," bowed, and took his leave.

When Malicorne arrived at Étampes, he found that the Count de Guiche had departed for Paris. Malicorne took two hours to rest and then continued on his way. It was night by the time he arrived in Paris, so he went to a little inn where he always stayed on his visits to the capital, and at eight o'clock the next morning he presented himself at the Hôtel de Grammont. Malicorne arrived just in time, for the Count de Guiche was preparing to bid farewell to Sir before departing for Le Havre, where the elite of the French nobility were gathering to greet Madam on her arrival from England. Malicorne dropped Manicamp's name and was admitted instantly. The Count de Guiche was in the courtyard of the Hôtel de Grammont inspecting his carriage and horses that his equerries were passing in review before him. The count was doling out praise and blame regarding the horses, their caparisons and tack when this important activity was interrupted by the name of Manicamp. "Manicamp?" he cried. "Send him in, good Lord! Send him in!"

And he turned and walked toward the gate. Malicorne slid in through the half-open gate, causing the Count de Guiche to stop in surprise at the sight of an unknown face in place of the one he expected. "Pardon me, Sir Count," Malicorne said, "but there's been a slight mistake. I'm not Manicamp, I'm just his envoy."

"Ah!" said de Guiche a bit coldly. "And you bring me...?"

"A letter, Sir Count."

Malicorne presented the first note while carefully observing the count's expression. De Guiche read the note and laughed. "What?" he said. "Another maid of honour? Ah that! Is this madcap Manicamp the sponsor of every hopeful maiden in France?"

Malicorne just bowed.

"And why doesn't he come himself?" the count asked.

"He's ... in bed."

"The devil you say! Is he out of cash?" De Guiche shrugged and shook his head. "What does he do with all of his money?"

Malicorne answered with a shrug that implied that on this matter he was as ignorant as the count. De Guiche continued, "Why doesn't he just use his credit?"

"I might have an idea about that."

"Which is?"

"That Manicamp has no credit with anyone but you, Sir Count."

"Then he won't be coming to Le Havre?" Another shrug of ignorance from Malicorne. "But that's impossible. Everyone will be there!"

"I'd hope, Sir Count that he'd not pass up such an opportunity."

"He should be in Paris already."

"He might be able to cut across to make up the lost time."

"Where is he now?"

"At Orléans."

"Hmm. Sir," de Guiche said with a bow, "you appear to me to be a man of good taste."

Malicorne was wearing one of Manicamp's old outfits. He bowed in his turn, and said, "You honour me, Sir."

"With whom do I have the pleasure of speaking?"

"My name is Malicorne, Sir."

"Sir de Malicorne, give me your opinion: what do you think of these saddle holsters?"

Malicorne was a man of quick wits and understood what was called for. Besides, the de placed before his name raised him to a rank equal to the nobleman speaking to him. Looking over the holsters like a connoisseur, he said without hesitation, "They're a trifle heavy, Sir."

"You see?" said de Guiche to the saddler. "Sir, who is a man of taste, finds the holsters a trifle heavy. Isn't that what I just told you?"

The saddler apologised. "And this horse, what do you think?" asked de Guiche. "I've just purchased it."

"At first glance, it seems perfectly fine, Sir Count but I couldn't really say without riding it."

"Well! Mount up, Sir de Malicorne, and take two or three turns around the yard."

In fact, the courtyard of the hôtel had been set up like a riding ring. Malicorne, showing no embarrassment, took hold of the reins and bridle, gripped the mane with his left hand, placed his foot in the stirrup, and vaulted into the saddle. The first time around the yard he took the horse at a walk, the second time at the trot, and the third time around at the gallop. Then he stopped near the count, dismounted, and tossed the reins to a groom. "Well!" said the count. "What do you think, Sir Malicorne?"

"Sir Count," said Malicorne, "this horse is of the Mecklenburg breed. In checking how the bit rode in his mouth, I could see that he was rising seven, just the age at which a horse should be trained for war. The forehand is light; a horse that holds its head up, as they say, never tires the rider's hand. Its withers are a bit low; the droopy rump almost makes me doubt the purity of its German blood. I think it might have a touch of English in it. The animal stands well but trots a trifle high, and might cut itself; keep an eye on its shoes. Overall, though, it's quite manageable, and quick and easy in changing its gait."

"Well judged, Sir de Malicorne," said the count. "You're a connoisseur." Then, looking over the newcomer, he said, "You have a charming outfit. You didn't get that in the provinces, I imagine; they don't tailor clothes that way in Tours or Orléans."

"No, Sir Count, this suit was made in Paris."

"Yes, and it shows ... but back to business. Manicamp wants a second appointment for a maid of honour?"

"You saw what he wrote, Sir Count."

"Who was the first one, again?"

Malicorne coloured slightly. "A charming maiden," he answered hastily, "Miss Montalais."

"Ah! You know her, Sir?"

"Yes, she's my fiancée, or nearly so."

"Well, that's something. A thousand compliments!" said de Guiche, suppressing the bawdy jest that was on his lips before Malicorne naming Montalais as his fiancée reminded him to be respectful.

"And the second appointment, who's that for?" asked de Guiche. "Is it for Manicamp's fiancée? If so, I'm sorry for her, poor girl! She'll have a dreadful husband."

"No, Sir Count, the second appointment is for Miss La Baume Le Blanc de La Vallière."

"Never heard of her," said de Guiche.

"You will, Sir," said Malicorne, smiling in his turn.

"Fine! I'll speak of it to Sir. By the way, is she well born?"

"She's of a very good house and is maid of honour to the Dowager Madam."

"Excellent! Will you go with me to see Sir?"

"Gladly, if you'll do me the honour."

"Do you have a carriage?"

"No, I came on horseback."

"In that outfit?"

"No, Sir, I came from Orléans by post horse and changed my riding clothes before presenting myself to you."

"Oh, right, you said you'd come from Orléans."

And he stuffed the letter from Manicamp into his pocket. "Sir," said Malicorne timidly, "I think you didn't read everything."

"What do you mean?"

"There were two notes in that envelope."

"Ah! Are you sure?"

"Quite sure!"

"Let's take a look." And the count reopened the seal. "My faith, you're right," he said, unfolding the note he hadn't read yet. "As I thought," he said, "another request for an appointment in Sir's household. What a bottomless pit Manicamp is! Is he selling these now?"

"No, Sir Count, he wants to make a gift of it."

"To whom?"

"To me, Sir."

"But why didn't you say so right away, my dear Sir Mauvaisecome?"

"Malicorne!"

"Ah, pardon me! These Latin names always trip me up. Why do they teach it to us when it only leads to confusion? Mala, mauvaise, it's all one to me. You'll forgive me, won't you, Sir Malicorne?"

"Your kindness moves me, Sir, and I feel there's something else I'd tell you."

"What's that, Sir?"

"That I'm not a gentleman; I have a good heart and a fair amount of brains but my name is just plain Malicorne."

"Well!" said de Guiche, smiling at the sly features of his companion. "You seem like a pleasant enough fellow to me. I like your face, Sir Malicorne, and you must have more than a few good qualities if you please that snob Manicamp. In fact, you must be a very saint come to Earth."

"Why's that?"

"Blue death! Because he's willing to give you something for nothing. Didn't you say he wanted to get you an appointment to the royal household?"

"Pardon me, Sir Count but if I obtain this appointment, it'll be thanks to you, not him."

"And then won't he have gotten it for you for nothing?"

"Ah, Sir Count..."

"Wait a moment, isn't there a Malicorne in Orléans? One who lends money to Sir Prince?"

"I think you mean my father, Sir."

"Ah, just so! Sir Prince has the father, and that bottomless pit Manicamp has the son. Take care, Sir, I know him, and God, he'll pick you clean to your bones!"

"Except I lend money without interest, Sir," said Malicorne, smiling.

"Ha! I said you were a saint, or something like it, Sir Malicorne. You'll have your appointment, or my name isn't de Guiche."

"Oh, Sir Count, I'll be forever in your debt!" said Malicorne with delight.

"Come along, let's go see the prince, my dear Sir Malicorne."

And de Guiche started toward the gate, beckoning Malicorne to follow him. But as they were about to cross the threshold, a young man appeared on the other side. He was a cavalier of age 24 or 25 with a pale face, thin lips, bright eyes, brown hair, and eyebrows. "Well, hello!" he said, pushing his way through the gate.

"Ah! It's you, de Wardes." Booted, spurred, and with whip in hand!"

"The proper dress for a man about to ride to Le Havre. By tomorrow, no one will be left in Paris."

And the newcomer bowed politely to Malicorne, whose outfit was of almost princely quality. "Sir Malicorne," said de Guiche to his friend.

De Wardes bowed again. "Sir de Wardes," said de Guiche to Malicorne. Malicorne bowed in his turn. "Come, de Wardes," continued de Guiche, "you're always in the know on these things – what offices are still available in the court, or rather the household of Sir?"

"In Sir's household?" said de Wardes, gazing up as if searching his memory. "Let's see ... that of grand equerry, I think."

"Oh!" said Malicorne. "Such a post is entirely too high, Sir. I'm not nearly so ambitious."

De Wardes had a sharper eye than de Guiche and sized up Malicorne in an instant. "In fact," he said, "to occupy that post, you'd have to be a duke and peer."

"All I ask," said Malicorne, "is a very humble position. I'm not a great man and seek nothing beyond my rank."

"Sir Malicorne, here," said de Guiche to de Wardes, "is a charming fellow whose only misfortune is in not being born a gentleman. But, as you know, I care more about the man than I do about his birth."

"Of course," said de Wardes, "but I have to point out, my dear Count, that, without noble birth, it's not reasonable to hope to enter Sir's household."

"That's true," said the count. "Etiquette is so formal. Devil take it! We hadn't thought about that."

"Alas! That's quite a blow for me," said Malicorne, paling slightly. "Quite a blow, Sir Count."

"But I'm sure we can find a remedy," replied de Guiche.

"By my troth!" cried de Wardes. "That remedy is easily found – he can just be made into a gentleman! His Eminence Cardinal Mazarini did nothing else from morning till night."

"Oh, hush, de Wardes!" said the count. "That's not funny, and you should know better than to make such a joke. Yes, a title can be bought but it's bad enough for us in the noblesse that it's true without joking about it."

"My faith! You've become as stiff as a Puritan, like one of those English."

"Sir Viscount of Bragelonne," announced a valet at the courtyard gate as if at the entrance to a salon.

"Ah, dear Raoul! Welcome! Look at you, all booted and spurred. Ready to go?"

Bragelonne approached the group of young men and bowed with that grave but gracious air that was unique to him. His greeting was directed especially toward de Wardes, whom he didn't know, and whose expression had turned cold at the appearance of Raoul. "My friend," he said to de Guiche, "I come to ask to join your company. You leave soon for Le Havre, I presume?"

"Yes, that's great! Charming! We'll have a delightful journey. Sir Malicorne, this is Sir de Bragelonne. And allow me to present Sir de Wardes."

The young men exchanged formal bows. Their natures seemed opposed from the moment they met: de Wardes was smooth, facile, and insincere, while Raoul was serious, well-meaning, and forthright.

"Raoul," said de Guiche, "help decide this outstanding issue between de Wardes and me."

"What issue is that?"

"A matter of noblesse. "

"Who would know better than a Grammont?"

"I'm not asking for compliments, I'm asking for your opinion."

"Then explain to me the matter under discussion."

"De Wardes claims that the award of noble titles has been abused; I claim that the man is more important than the title."

"And you have the right of it," said Bragelonne quietly.

"But I, Sir Viscount," replied de Wardes stubbornly, "claim that I have the right of it."

"Your rationale, Sir?"

"My rationale is the fact that everything in France nowadays conspires to humiliate our noblemen."

"Where do you see that?" asked Raoul.

"I see it in the king himself. He surrounds himself with 'gentlemen' who don't have four quarters of nobility."

"Come, now!" said de Guiche. "I don't know how the devil you can say that."

"One example is enough."

And de Wardes looked directly at Bragelonne. "Say on."

"Do you know who has just been named Captain-Lieutenant of the Musketeers, a position worth more than a peerage, a title that takes precedence over all the Marshals of France?"

Raoul began to flush, for he saw where de Wardes was going. "No," said de Guiche. "Who is it? It must have just happened, as that position was vacant as recently as last week. I know because the king refused it to Sir, who wanted it for one of his protégés."

"Well, my dear! The king who refused it to the protégé of Sir, gave it to the Knight d'Artagnan, a younger son from Gascony who's dragged his sword through the antechambers for thirty years."

"Pardon me, Sir, if I interrupt," said Raoul, with a sharp look at de Wardes, "but you speak like a man who doesn't know what he's talking about."

"I, not know Sir d'Artagnan! My God! Who doesn't know him?"

"Those who know him, Sir," replied Raoul, calmly and coldly, "are bound to say that, if he isn't as good a gentleman as the king that isn't his fault, he equals every king in the world in courage and loyalty. That's my opinion, Sir, because I've known Sir d'Artagnan, thank God, since I was born." De Wardes drew breath to reply but de Guiche stopped him.

The Portrait of Madam

The conversation was taking a nasty turn, as de Guiche could clearly see. The look in Bragelonne's eye was hostile, while de Wardes's expression seemed calculated to offend. Without understanding what was behind the emotions agitating his two friends, de Guiche thought it best to parry the blow he sensed coming from one or perhaps both of them. "Gentlemen," he said, "the household must continue preparing to leave but also I must go see Sir. Let's manage it this way: you, de Wardes, can come with me to the Palais Royal, while you, Raoul, stay here and manage my retainers; make sure they do what you say and take a final look over all the preparations for departure."

Raoul, calm as a man who neither seeks nor avoids a conflict, nodded as a sign of assent, and took a seat on a bench in the sunlight. "Perfect," said de Guiche. "Stay there, Raoul, and have a look at those two horses I just bought; let me know what you think, because I took them only on condition that you ratified the purchase. Oh but excuse me, I forgot to ask for news of the Count of La Fère!"

As he spoke these final words, he glanced at de Wardes to see what effect the name of Raoul's father would have on him. "Thank you," replied Bragelonne, "the count is well."

A gleam of hatred flashed from de Wardes's eyes. De Guiche pretended not to notice this flicker of fury and instead shook hands with Raoul, saying, "Bragelonne, you'll catch up with us in the Palais Royal courtyard, won't you?"

Then, beckoning de Wardes, who was swaying agitatedly from one foot to the other, to follow him, he said, "We're off. Come along, Sir Malicorne."

This name made Raoul start. He had a feeling he'd heard that name before but couldn't remember when. While he was blinking, distracted by the half-memory, the other three young men left to head for the Palais Royal, where Sir was staying. Malicorne was thinking that it seemed the count's two friends had something to settle between them but also that he needed to remember his rank. He walked behind the young noblemen. "Are you mad?" said de Guiche to his companion, once they'd left the Hôtel de Grammont. "Attacking Sir d'Artagnan, and in front of Raoul!"

"Well? What of it?" said de Wardes.

"What do you mean, what of it?"

"Is attacking Sir d'Artagnan forbidden?"

"But you must know that Sir D'Artagnan is one of that famous quartet they called the Four Musketeers."

"Of course but I don't see why that should stop me from hating Sir d'Artagnan."

"What did he do to you?"

"To me? Nothing."

"Then why hate him?"

"Ask the ghost of my father that."

"Really, de Wardes? Sir d'Artagnan isn't the kind of man to leave unfinished business behind him. Your father carried on affairs in a high-handed manner, or so I've heard but there are no insults that can't be washed away by the honourable blood shed with a few sword strokes."

"What would you have, dear friend? This hatred between my father and Sir d'Artagnan was real; when I was very young, he told me the reason for it, and I regard its legacy as part of my heritage."

"And this hatred was solely for Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Oh, d'Artagnan was so closely associated with his three comrades that there's hatred enough for all. They'll have no need to complain about any shortage."

De Guiche was watching de Wardes closely and shuddered when he saw the young man's pale smile. Something like a premonition darkened his thoughts, and though he told himself that the time had passed when gentlemen settled their differences with swords, such heartfelt hatred, with no means of release, could only fester. Such a smile could be as threatening as a word – and then after the fathers, who had hated with their hearts and fought with their arms, would come the sons, who might hate as deeply but instead fight with intrigue and deceit. And as it wasn't Raoul whom he suspected of intrigue and deceit, it was for him that de Guiche shuddered. But while these dark thoughts passed behind de Guiche's brow, de Wardes had regained control of himself. "Anyway," he said, "I have nothing personal against Sir de Bragelonne; I don't even know him."

"In any case, de Wardes, remember this," said de Guiche a bit sharply. "Raoul is one of my closest friends."

De Wardes just bowed. The matter ended there, for though de Guiche tried to get him to say what he really felt, de Wardes seemed resolved to let it pass and remained impenetrable. De Guiche told himself he'd just have to get the full story from Raoul. Meanwhile, they arrived at the Palais Royal that was surrounded by a crowd of curious citizens. Sir's retainers were already on horseback, awaiting his orders to escort the ambassadors charged with bringing back the young princess. The spectacle of the household's magnificent horses, equipment, and livery, along with their respectful attachment to royalty, had to be enough to compensate the onlookers for this enormous expense their taxes supported. Mazarin had said, "Let them recite their angry poems so long as they pay."

Louis XIV just said, "Let them look."

Vision had replaced the voice; they could look all they wanted but they no longer sang. Sir de Guiche left de Wardes and Malicorne at the foot of the grand stairway while he went straight up to Sir's rooms, a privilege he shared with the Knight de Lorraine,* Sir's other favourite. He found the young prince putting on rouge and admiring himself. In the corner of the boudoir, stretched out on a pile of cushions was Sir Knight de Lorraine who had curled his long blond hair and now toyed with it as a woman would. He smiled at de Guiche, though he could not stand him. The prince turned at the sound of his entrance, saw the count, and said, "Ah, it's you, de Guiche! Come here and tell me the truth."

"Of course, My Lord. As you know, that's my greatest fault."

"De Guiche, you can scarcely believe how this wicked knight wounds me."

The knight shrugged.

"Wounds you?" asked de Guiche. "That seems out of character for the knight."

"Well!" continued the prince. "He claims that Miss Henrietta is better looking as a woman than I am as a man."

"Take care, My Lord," said de Guiche with a frown. "You asked me to tell the truth."

"I did," said Sir, almost trembling.

"Very well! In that case, I'll tell you."

"No rush, de Guiche," cried the prince. "Take your time. Look me over carefully and then recall our young Madam; if it will help, here's her portrait."

And he handed him a miniature, exquisitely detailed. De Guiche took the portrait and considered it at length. "My faith, My Lord but here's an adorable face," he said.

"But consider me as well – consider me!" cried the prince, trying to attract the count's attention.

"Really, it's quite wonderful," murmured de Guiche, absorbed by the portrait

"Ohé, Sir," huffed the prince. "It's almost as if you'd never seen the girl before."

"I have seen her, My Lord, yes but not for five years, and a lot can change between a girl of age twelve and a young woman of seventeen."

"Enough, let's have your opinion. Come, speak!"

"My opinion is that this is a very flattering portrait, My Lord."

"Well, of course it is!" said the prince, triumphant. "Of course it is. But if one supposes that it isn't flattering, then what do you think?"

"I think, My Lord, that Your Highness is blessed with a charming fiancée."

"Fine, I get your opinion of her – but what about me?"

"My opinion, My Lord, is that you're far too good-looking for a man."

The Knight de Lorraine burst out laughing. Sir found the Count de Guiche's opinion less than flattering and pouted. "I have the meanest friends," he said.

De Guiche looked once more at the portrait, and then after several seconds returned it with visible reluctance to sir, saying, “Decidedly, my Lord, , I’d rather look at Your Highness ten times over instead of one more look at Madam.”

The knight must have heard something in these words that the prince didn’t, for he said, “Maybe you’re the one who should be getting married!”

Sir continued applying his rouge, and when he was done, he glanced again at the portrait and then at his face in the glass. He seemed satisfied with the comparison. “Anyway, it was kind of you to come,” he said to de Guiche. “I was afraid you’d leave without saying goodbye to me.”

“My Lord knows me too well to think I’d ever do anything like that.”

“I imagine you have something to ask of me before leaving Paris.”

“Why, Your Highness has guessed right! I do, in fact, have a request to present to him.”

“Fine! Present it.”

The Knight de Lorraine was suddenly all eyes and ears; for the knight, every favour granted to others was something stolen from him. As de Guiche hesitated, the prince asked, “Is it for money? That would be well timed, for I’m simply rolling in it – the Surintendant des Finances gave me fifty thousand pistoles.”

“Thank you, Your Highness but it isn’t for money.”

“What then? Let’s hear it.”

“An appointment for a maid of honour.”

“Zounds! De Guiche, you’re practically a schoolmaster,” said the prince with disdain. “Will you ever speak to me of anyone but silly girls?”

The Knight de Lorraine smiled for he knew well that Sir cared little for ladies. “My Lord,” said the count, “I’m not the sponsor of the person for whom I ask, it’s a friend of mine.”

“Ah, that’s different! And what’s the name of your friend’s protégée?”

“Miss La Baume Le Blanc de La Vallière, currently maid of honour to the Dowager Madam.”

“Fie! She’s a cripple,” said the Knight de Lorraine from his nest of cushions.

“A cripple!” repeated the prince. “Should my wife Madam have that before her eyes? Faith, no, it would endanger her pregnancies.”

The Knight de Lorraine burst out laughing. “Sir Knight,” said de Guiche, “your remarks are ungenerous; I ask an honest favour and you do your best to confound it.”

“Oh, pardon me, Sir Count!” said Lorraine, alarmed by the edge in the count’s voice. “That wasn’t my intention, and now that I think about it, I must have mistaken that demoiselle for someone else.”

“In fact, I believe you were mistaken.”

“Come, is this important to you, de Guiche?” asked the prince.

“Very, My Lord.”

“Well, then, I agree! But no more appointments, the household is full.”

“Look!” cried the knight. “It’s noon already, the time set for departure.”

“Are you rushing me out, Knight?” asked de Guiche.

“Oh, Count! How severe you are with me today,” replied the knight in mock dismay.

“For God’s sake, Count and Knight!” said Sir. “No bickering! Can’t you see how it upsets me?”

“Your signature?” asked de Guiche.

“Take a brevet from the drawer and hand it to me.”

De Guiche picked up the appointment with one hand, and with the other presented Sir a plume dipped in ink. The prince signed. “Here,” he said, returning the brevet, “but it’s on one condition.”

“What’s that?”

“That you make up with the knight.”

“Gladly,” said de Guiche.

And he offered his hand to the knight with an indifference that was scarcely distinguishable from contempt. “Off with you, then, Count,” said the knight without appearing to notice the count’s evident disdain. “Go, and bring us back a princess who won’t spend as much time as you in looking at her portrait.”

“Yes, go and come back quickly,” said the prince. “By the way, who are you taking with you?”

“Bragelonne and de Wardes.”

“Two brave cavaliers.”

“Entirely too brave,” said the knight. “Try to bring back both of them, Count.”

“Black-hearted villain!” murmured de Guiche. “He smells trouble sooner than anyone.” Then with a bow to Sir, he took his leave. Coming out under the portico, he waved the signed appointment in the air. Malicorne rushed forward and greeted him, trembling for joy – but de Guiche could see he was hoping for something else as well. “Patience, sir, patience,” he said to his new friend. “The Knight of Lorraine’s there and I was afraid he’d upset the cart if I asked for too much. We’ll try again when I return. Farewell!”

“Farewell, Sir Count, and a thousand thanks,” said Malicorne.

“And send Manicamp to me. By the way, Sir, is it true that Miss La Vallière is lame?”

Just as he said these words, a horse pulled up behind him. He turned and saw Bragelonne, pale of face, having just re-entered the courtyard. With the quick ears of a lover, he’d overheard de Guiche – unlike Malicorne, who had already moved out of range of his voice. “Why are they talking about Louise?” Raoul said to himself. “Oh! If I hear her name from de Wardes, and if he says it with a smirk…!”

“Come, come, Gentlemen!” cried the Count de Guiche. “Let’s get moving.” At that moment the prince, having finished his makeup, appeared at the window. The whole cortège cheered and waved, and ten minutes later, banners, scarves, and plumes aflutter, the coursers left at the gallop.

347 Le Havre

This whole Court, so brilliant, so gay, so alive with differing desires, arrived at Le Havre <sup>71</sup> four days after its departure from Paris. It was about five o’clock in the evening but there was no news of Madam. Everyone was concerned about finding lodging, and arguments were breaking out between masters and their servants. In the midst of this chaos the Count de Guiche thought he recognised Manicamp. It was indeed him but as Malicorne had taken the last of his fine clothes, he was clad in all he had left, an outfit of purple velvet trimmed with silver. De Guiche recognised him as much from his clothing as from his features. He’d often seen Manicamp in this purple suit, his outfit of last resort. Manicamp presented himself to the count under a wall of torches that flamed on the archway over Le Havre’s city gate, the one near the tower of François I. The count, seeing Manicamp’s woeful expression, couldn’t help but laugh. “Oh, my poor Manicamp. Dressed again in purple! Are you in mourning?”

“I am, indeed, in mourning,” Manicamp replied.

“For whom or what?”

“For my fine blue and gold outfit that has vanished, leaving me only this one that I still had to pay solid coin to buy back.”

“Really?”

“By God! Are you surprised? You, who left me destitute?”

“Well, what matters is that you got here.”

“Over execrable roads.”

“Where are you staying?”

“Staying?”

“Yes.”

“I’m staying nowhere.”

De Guiche laughed. “Then where will you sleep?”

“Wherever you do.”

“I have no idea where that will be.”

“What do you mean, no idea?”

“You heard me; how should I know where I’m staying?”

“Haven’t you rented a hôtel?”

“Who, me?”

“You, or Sir.”

“It didn’t occur to either of us. Le Havre is big enough, I suppose, that I should be able to find a decent house in a good neighbourhood with stabling for twelve horses.”

“Oh, there are plenty of decent houses.”

“All right, then…”

“Just not for us.”

“What do you mean, not for us? For whom then?”

“For the English, good Lord!”

“For the English?”

“Yes, they’ve rented all of them.”

“Who would do such a thing?”

“Why, Sir Buckingham.”

“I beg your pardon?” said de Guiche, struck by the name.

“Yes, of course, my dear, Sir de Buckingham! His Grace was preceded by a courier who arrived three days ago and proceeded to rent every available house in town.”

“Come, come, Manicamp, talk sense.”

“Dame! Did I say something that was hard to understand?”

“But, devil take it, Sir de Buckingham can’t have rented every house in Le Havre!”

“He hasn’t occupied them yet, true but once he disembarks, they’re his.”

“But … but that…!”

“It’s clear you don’t know the English. They don’t like to share.”

“Really, come now! A man who has one house doesn’t need two.”

“But what if there are more men than two?”

“Two, four, six houses, what have you! There must be a hundred houses in Le Havre.”

“Indeed. And they’re all rented.”

“Impossible!”

“How stubborn you are. I tell you Sir de Buckingham has rented every house anywhere near those that are to be occupied by Her Majesty the Dowager Queen of England and the princess her daughter.”

“Well, now. Isn’t that telling?” said de Wardes, stroking his horse’s neck.

“You may well say so, Sir.”

“Are you completely sure of all this, Sir de Manicamp?” said de Wardes with a sly glance at de Guiche as if to question how far they could trust his friend’s reason.

Meanwhile night had fallen, and under the gate’s torches, the pages, lackeys, equerries, horses, and carriages all crowded the gate and the square beyond. The torchlight reflected from the harbour on the water of the rising tide, while along the jetty a thousand curious sailors and citizens stood taking in the spectacle. During this delay, Bragelonne, as if he had no part in it, sat on his horse a bit behind de Guiche and gazed out at the light playing on the water, enjoying the salt breeze as the waves rolled in on the shore, pebbles and seaweed tossing in the foam. “But why,” said de Guiche, “would Sir de Buckingham send ahead to rent every lodging?”

“Why, indeed?” asked de Wardes.

“For the best of reasons,” replied Manicamp.

“Do you know what it is?”

“I think I do.”

“Then tell us.”

“Shh. Lean closer.”

“The devil! Can you tell us only in a whisper?”

“You be the judge.”

“Fine.”

De Guiche leaned closer. “Love,” said Manicamp.

“I don’t understand.”

“Ah but you will.”

“Explain yourself.”

“So I shall! It’s sad to say it, Sir Count but His Royal Highness Sir will be the unhappiest of husbands.”

“What! Are you saying the Duke of Buckingham…?”

“I’m saying that name brings nothing but sadness to the Royal House of France.”

“So, the duke…?”

“Is madly in love with Madam, or so everyone says, and will allow no one near her but himself.”

De Guiche flushed. “Fine! Now I get it. Thank you,” he said, shaking Manicamp’s hand. Then he added, “But for God’s sake, Manicamp, make sure the Duke of Buckingham’s folly doesn’t spread to French ears, or we’ll see many a sword drawn that doesn’t fear English anger.”

“Don’t blame me! After all, I have no proof of this folly,” said Manicamp. “It’s only what I’ve heard.”

“No,” said de Guiche, “this rings true.”

And he ground his teeth in spite of himself. “Well, so what? Who cares if Buckingham is to Sir what his father was to the late king? Buckingham the father for the queen mother, and Buckingham the son for the young Madam. That’s how it goes.”

“Manicamp! Really!”

“What the devil! It’s the plain truth! …Or so they say.”

“Enough!” said the count.

“Enough? But why?” said de Wardes. “Such English attention honours the nation of France! Don’t you agree, Sir de Bragelonne?”

“Sorry. What?” said Bragelonne, distracted.

“Shouldn’t the English pay homage to the beauty of our princesses and queens?”

“I beg your pardon, please tell me what you’re talking about.”

“It was probably necessary for Sir de Buckingham the elder to come to Paris before His Majesty King Louis XIII realised that his wife was one of the most beautiful ladies at the Court of France – and now Sir de Buckingham the younger, in his turn, pays homage to the beauty of a princess of French blood. And it appears that loving homage is to come with him over the sea.”

“Sir,” replied Bragelonne, “I don’t like hearing jests about these matters. We gentlemen are the guardians our queens’ and princesses’ honour. If we stoop so low as to mock them, how will the commoners behave?”

“Is that so, Sir? Is that so?” snapped de Wardes, colouring to the tips of his ears. “How am I supposed to take that?”

“Take it however you please, Sir,” replied Bragelonne coldly.

“Bragelonne! Bragelonne!” whispered de Guiche.

“Sir de Wardes! Really!” cried Manicamp, seeing the young man press his horse toward Raoul’s.

“Gentlemen! Gentlemen!” said de Guiche. “Don’t be such bad examples here in a public street! De Wardes, you’re in the wrong.”

“Wrong! How so? Tell me.”

“Wrong because you’re always speaking ill of something or someone,” replied Raoul with his implacable coolness.

“Let it go, Raoul,” said de Guiche quietly.

“Yes, let it go. You could scarcely put on an entertaining fight until after you’ve had a rest,” said Manicamp.

“Enough! Come on!” said de Guiche. “Forward, Gentlemen, forward!”

And with that, pushing aside horses and servants, he made his way into the square through the middle of the crowd, drawing after him all the French cortège. A large gateway stood open into a courtyard, and de Guiche rode in, followed by Bragelonne, de Wardes, Manicamp, and three or four other gentlemen. There they had a kind of council of war, debating how to preserve the dignity of their ambassadorial company. Bragelonne advised them to respect the English rights of priority. De Wardes said they should sack the entire city. This proposal seemed a trifle extreme to Manicamp; he thought they ought to sleep on it first. Unfortunately, two things were lacking before they could follow this advice: housing and beds. De Guiche considered quietly for a few moments, and then said aloud, “Who loves me, follows me.”

“Servants, too?” asked a page who had approached the group of noblemen.

“Everyone!” cried the fiery young man. “Come, Manicamp, lead us to the house that Her Highness Madam will occupy.” Without knowing what the count had in mind, his friends went with him, followed by their retainers, loudly cheering to applaud whatever unknown project the ardent young man was pursuing. Meanwhile, the wind from the harbour was picking up, blowing in ever stronger gusts.

On the Sea

The next day dawned a bit quieter, though the gale continued to blow. The sun rose behind a red cloud and carved its bloody rays across the crests of black waves. The lookouts of Le Havre watched impatiently from the tops of the towers, until at about eleven in the morning, one signalled that a ship was approaching under full sail, followed at a distance by two others. They came on like arrows launched by a mighty archer but the cross-seas were so heavy that the speed of their approach was matched by the ships’ alarming rolls from starboard to port and back again. Soon the ships’ designs and the colour of their banners identified them as English. In the lead sailed the ship that bore the princess, flying the flag of the admiralty. Immediately the rumour spread that the princess was arriving. All the French nobility flocked to the harbour, and the quays and jetties were lined with people. Two hours later, the vessels following behind had caught up with the flagship, and all three, apparently unwilling to risk the narrow opening of the harbour, had dropped anchor between Le Havre and the headland of La Hève. This manoeuvre completed, the flagship gave France a twelve-gun salute that was repeated shot for shot from the tower of François I. At once a hundred boats put to sea, all brilliant with bright bunting and intended to bear the French gentility out to the anchored vessels. But it was immediately obvious from the way they were tossed about while still in the harbour that, if they ventured beyond the jetty, where the waves rose like mountains and crashed, roaring, on the shore, none of those boats would make it even a quarter of the way to the ships without capsizing. Only one boat: that of the harbour pilot seemed determined despite the wind and waves, to try to reach the English flagship. De Guiche, who’d been assessing the boats in the harbour to try to pick out the hardiest and most likely to reach the English ships, had spotted the harbour pilot preparing to set off.

“Raoul,” he said, “don’t you think it’s shameful for creatures as intelligent and brave as we to be daunted by the brute force of the wind and waves?”

“That’s just what I was telling myself,” Bragelonne replied.

“Well! What say we board the harbour pilot’s boat and take our chances? How about you, de Wardes?”

“Take care or you’ll drown yourselves,” said Manicamp.

“And all for nothing,” said de Wardes, “because with the wind like this, you’ve no chance of making it out to the ships.”

“So, you refuse?”

“Yes, by God! I’m happy to risk my life in a fight with other men,” he said, glancing sideways at Bragelonne, “but to lose it wrestling with the salt sea is not to my taste.”

“And as for me,” said Manicamp, “even if we made it to the ships, my last decent outfit would be ruined by the salt water, and that’s quite unthinkable.”

“So, you refuse as well?” asked de Guiche.

“I should say so; it’s entirely out of the question.”

“But de Wardes, Manicamp, just look,” cried de Guiche. “Can’t you see? Out there, on the flagship, the princesses are watching us.”

“All the more reason, dear friend, not to take a ridiculous dunking in front of them.”

“Is that your final word, Manicamp?”

“Indeed.”

“And you, de Wardes?”

“Yes.”

“Then I’ll go alone.”

“Not at all,” said Raoul. “I go where you go. I thought you knew that.”

In point of fact, Raoul, not driven by passion, had coolly assessed the danger and decided to risk what de Wardes would not. The boat was casting off; de Guiche called out to the pilot, “Ahoy, the boat! Two more coming aboard!”

And wrapping a handful of pistols in a sheet of paper, he tossed it into the craft. “So, you’re not afraid of a little salt water, my young masters?” called the pilot.

“We’re not afraid of anything,” replied de Guiche.

“Then come aboard, Gentlemen.”

The pilot steered the craft near the wharf, and the young men jumped lightly into the boat. “Come, courage, my lads,” said de Guiche to the crew. “There’re another twenty pistoles in this purse and when we reach the flagship, they’re yours.”

At once the rowers bent over their oars and the boat bounded across the waves. Everyone was watching this hazardous attempt, the whole population of Le Havre lining the jetties, every eye fixed on the pilot boat. Sometimes the frail craft was suspended for a moment atop a foamy crest before plunging to the bottom of a roaring abyss, seemingly lost. But she always reappeared, and after an hour of struggle she came into the lee of the flagship, where two ship’s boats were waiting to come to her aid. On the quarterdeck of the flagship, sheltered by a canopy hung with velvet and ermine and held up by taut and powerful stays, Madam Henriette* the Dowager Queen and her daughter, the young Madam Henrietta, with the admiral, the Duke of Norfolk at their sides, had watched apprehensively as the approaching boat was raised to heaven one moment and plummeted toward hell the next. Against the dark waves they could see, like luminous apparitions, the bright and noble figures of the two French gentlemen. The ship’s crew, leaning on the rail and hanging from the shrouds, had cheered the courage of the nobles, the pilot, and his sailors. A triumphant huzzah welcomed their arrival on board. The Duke of Norfolk, a handsome man of age twenty-six or twenty-seven, came forward to meet them. De Guiche and Bragelonne came bounding up the starboard ladder and conducted by

Norfolk, were escorted to greet the princesses. Out of respect and a certain hesitation that he barely acknowledged even to himself, the Count de Guiche delayed looking directly at the young Madam. But Henrietta on the contrary, picked him out right away and asked her mother, “Is this my Sir who’s coming aboard?”

Madam Henriette who was more familiar with Sir than her daughter, smiled at this error of self-importance and replied, “No, that’s just Sir de Guiche, his favourite.”

With this answer, the princess felt she’d best conceal her instinctive admiration of the count’s courage. It was just as she was controlling her expression that de Guiche finally dared to raise his eyes to her so he could compare the original to her portrait. When he saw that pale face, those lively eyes, that adorable chestnut hair, those trembling lips, and her gesture so eminently royal and yet at the same time encouraging, he was so overcome with emotion that, if he hadn’t been leaning on Raoul as he came over the rail, he would have staggered. At his friend’s astonished glance, and a benevolent nod from the queen, de Guiche recovered himself. In a few words, he introduced himself as Sir’s envoy, explained his mission, and saluted, according to their rank and precedence, the admiral and the various English lords who were grouped around the princesses. Raoul was presented in his turn and as the son of the Count of La Fère was graciously received as everyone knew the part the count had played in the restoration of King Charles II and it was the count who’d been charged with the negotiation of the marriage that returned to France the granddaughter of Henri IV. Raoul spoke English perfectly and made himself the interpreter between his friend and those young English lords who were unfamiliar with French. Just then there appeared a remarkably handsome young man garbed in rich and splendid raiment. He approached the princesses who were conversing with the Duke of Norfolk and said with barely contained impatience, “Come, ladies, it’s time we went ashore.”

At this invitation, the young Madam rose and moved to accept the hand the young man offered her with an eagerness born of several motivations but the admiral stepped between her and the newcomer. “A moment if you please, Milord Buckingham,” he said. “Getting the ladies to shore isn’t possible right now. The sea’s too unruly but by four bells it’ll probably settle and they can disembark this evening.”

“I must say, Milord,” said Buckingham with an irritation he did not even try to disguise, “that you’ve no right to detain these ladies aboard your ship. One of them now belongs to France, alas! And France as you see has sent their ambassadors to claim her.”

And he gestured toward de Guiche and Raoul, while bowing to them. “I scarcely think these gentlemen intend to risk the lives of the princesses,” the admiral replied.

“Milord, these gentlemen have arrived despite the wind in their faces; permit me to believe it’s no more dangerous for the ladies, who will travel with the wind behind.”

“These gentlemen were very brave,” said the admiral. “As you can see, the harbour is lined with hundreds who didn’t dare to follow them. Their chivalrous desire to present themselves to Madam as soon as possible led them to challenge the sea that today is terrible even for sailors. I’ll hold up these gentlemen as an example my crew should follow but these noble ladies must not.”

A sidewise glance from Madam spotted the blush that rose to the count’s cheeks, a look that escaped Buckingham. His eyes were fixed on Norfolk, and it was evident that he was jealous of the admiral, burning with the desire to remove the princesses from that floating realm where the admiral was king. “In that case,” said Buckingham, “I appeal to Madam in person.”

“And I, Milord,” replied the admiral, “appeal to my conscience and my responsibility. I promised to return Madam to France safe and sound, and I intend to keep my promise.”

“But, see here, Sir…”

“Milord Buckingham, permit me to remind you that I am in sole command here.”

“Milord Admiral, do you know whom you address?” replied Buckingham, voice rising.

“Perfectly, Milord, and I repeat: I am in sole command here, over the sea, the wind, the ships, and the sailors.”

He pronounced these words with nobility and grandeur. Raoul paid close attention to Buckingham, as the duke shuddered and grasped at one of the pavilion’s posts to keep from falling, his eyes red with rage, and his other hand creeping toward the hilt of his sword. “Milord,” said the queen, “permit me to say that I entirely agree with the Duke of Norfolk. Even if the wind, so unruly at the moment, were completely calm and favourable, we still owe a few hours to this officer who’s conducted us so pleasantly and carefully to within sight of the coast of France, where he must leave us.”

Buckingham looked for guidance from Madam instead of responding. But Henrietta, half hidden behind the gold and velvet curtains that sheltered her, wasn’t listening as her eyes were on the Count de Guiche, who was conversing with Raoul. This was a fresh blow to Buckingham, who thought he detected in Madam Henrietta’s gaze something more than mere curiosity. He reeled back against the mainmast. “Milord Buckingham still has no sea-legs,” said the queen mother in French. “Perhaps that’s why he’s so keen to go ashore.”

At these words, the young man turned pale, dropped his hands in discouragement to his sides, and withdrew, expressing with a single deep sigh both his old loves and his new hostilities. The admiral however, invited the princesses into the stern cabin where a farewell dinner had been laid out with a magnificence worthy of his guests. At the table, the admiral sat to the right of Madam and placed the Count de Guiche to her left – the place usually occupied by Buckingham. The duke, when he entered the cabin, felt another blow when he saw the secondary seat where, by etiquette, he was now relegated with respect to his princess. For his part, de Guiche, paler perhaps from happiness than his rival was from fury, trembled as he sat next to the princess, and when he brushed against her silk dress felt shudders of pleasure such as he’d never known. After the meal, Buckingham sprang forward to offer Madam his hand. But it was now de Guiche’s turn to give the duke a lecture. “Milord,” he said, “be as kind as to stop interposing yourself between Her Royal Highness Madam and me. From now on Her Royal Highness belongs to France, and it is the hand of Sir, the king’s brother who touches the hand of the princess when Her Royal Highness does me the honour to take my hand.” And having said these words, he offered his hand to the young Madam with a timidity so obvious and yet with such courageous nobility that the assembled English lords murmured in admiration while Buckingham sighed in anguish. Raoul, who knew what it meant to be in love, saw it all and understood completely. He gave de Guiche one of those looks that only a close friend or mother can give to one held dear who is about to go badly astray. Finally toward 2 o’clock, the sun came out, the wind fell, and the sea calmed to a sheet of crystal, and the fog shrouding the coast was shredded and torn away. Then the smiling hills of France appeared, its slopes dotted with white houses, bright against the green of the trees or the deep blue of the sky.

The Pavilions

The admiral, as we’ve seen, had decided to ignore Buckingham’s threatening glares and outbursts. It had been going on ever since they left England, and he’d learned to put up with the duke’s behaviour. De Guiche hadn’t yet paid much attention to the animosity the young lord seemed to feel toward him, though he instinctively felt no sympathy toward the favourite of Charles II. The queen mother, with greater experience and a cooler head, had a firmer grasp of the situation and, aware of its dangers, was ready to force a clean break when the right moment arrived. That moment had come. Calm had been restored to the entire company except in the heart of Buckingham, who implored the young princess in a low voice, “Madam, Madam, in the name of heaven, let’s go ashore, I beg you! Can’t you see how this insolent Duke of Norfolk is killing me with his impertinent attentions to you?”

Henrietta heard these words, smiled and without turning around, replied in that tone of languid reproach that coquettishly pushes back without pushing away, “Dear Milord, I’ve already told you that you must be quite mad.”

As we’ve said, none of the nuances of this scene escaped Raoul; he heard Buckingham’s plea, the princess’s response, watched Buckingham step back as if struck, sigh, and put a hand to his forehead – and Raoul understood the state of affairs and shuddered with an open heart behind his eyes and ears. The admiral finally gave the order to launch the ship’s boats after careful deliberation. When Buckingham heard these orders, he reacted with such unrestrained glee a stranger might think he’d lost his mind. At the Duke of Norfolk’s orders, a grand barge, elaborately decorated, large enough for twenty oarsmen and fifteen passengers, was lowered over the side of the flagship. Its deck was carpeted in velvet, banners sported the arms of England, and its rigging was garlanded with flowers, for at that time diplomacy was draped in decoration, and this was a vessel for royalty. The barge was scarcely in the water, the rowers standing by their oars like soldiers at attention awaiting the embarkation of the princess, when Buckingham hastened to the top of the ladder that led to the boat. But the queen stopped him. “Milord,” she said, “it’s improper for me and my daughter to go ashore before you’ve ascertained that our lodgings there are in order. Go ahead, Milord, I pray, to make sure that everything is prepared for our arrival.”

This was a new blow to the duke, all the more terrible because it was unexpected. He stammered, turned red, and was silent, crushed. He had thought to accompany Madam during the stately approach of the barge, savouring every last moment near her. But the order was clear. The admiral who had heard it, immediately cried, “Launch the longboat!”

The order was executed with the speed typical of a well-disciplined warship. Buckingham, stricken, sent a look of despair toward the princess, a look of entreaty toward the queen, and a look of fury toward the admiral. The princess pretended not to notice, the queen turned her head, and the admiral laughed. Buckingham, at this laugh, took a step toward Norfolk. The queen rose with a glare. “On your way, Milord,” she said with authority.

The young duke stopped short. Then making a final effort, he looked around and said in a voice choked with emotion, “Gentlemen! What of you, Sir de Guiche, and you, Sir Bragelonne? Do you go with me?”

De Guiche bowed. “I’m at the queen’s orders like Sir de Bragelonne,” he said. “What she commands, we’ll do.”

And he looked at the young princess who lowered her eyes. “Your pardon, Milord Buckingham,” said the queen, “but the Count de Guiche represents Sir in this; he must do for us the honours of France, as you have done the honours of England. It’s his duty to accompany us, and in any event, he’s earned that small favour by his courage in making his way to us through that foul weather.”

Buckingham opened his mouth as if to reply but whether he couldn’t think of anything to say or had lost the power to say it, no sound came from his lips. Turning as if in a delirium, he jumped down into the longboat. The rowers, surprised, were barely able to seat him and then settle themselves, as he’d almost capsized the boat. “Really, milord must be mad,” the admiral said to Raoul.

“I fear for him,” replied Bragelonne. As the longboat rowed away, the duke never stopped staring at the flagship like a miser who’d lost his gold or a mother leaving behind her child to march to the scaffold. But no one responded to his looks, his gestures, and his sad, silent pleas. Finally, stunned, he slumped on a thwart, hands clutching his hair, as the carefree sailors diligently drove the longboat over the waves. By the time they landed, he was in such a state of torpor that, if he hadn’t been met by a messenger from the steward he’d sent ahead to arrange the lodgings, he wouldn’t have known what to do. He was led to the house that had been rented for him, where he shut himself up like Achilles in his tent. Meanwhile, just as Buckingham went ashore, the barge bearing the princesses was leaving the flagship. It was followed by another longboat filled with officers, courtiers, and favoured friends. Half the population of Le Havre, in fishing boats or Norman barges, was in the harbour to greet them. The guns of the forts sounded their salutes, and the flagship replied shot for shot, the mounds of the cannons spilling flames and smoke that blew away into the azure sky. The princess stepped off the gangplank onto the stones of the quay, where joyful music greeted her and welcomed her ashore. As she advanced toward the city centre, she walked upon rich tapestries strewn with fresh flowers. Meanwhile de Guiche and Raoul ducked out of the English procession and made their way quickly along side streets toward the residence designated for Madam. “We’d better hurry,” Raoul said to de Guiche. “If I know Buckingham, he’ll cause trouble when he sees the results of yesterday’s preparations.”

“We’re ready no matter what,” said the count. “We left behind de Wardes, who is severity personified, and Manicamp, who is the essence of gentility.”

But de Guiche hurried nonetheless, and five minutes later they came in sight of the Hôtel de Ville. The first thing they saw was the crowd filling the municipal square. “Good!” said de Guiche. “Our lodgings are ready as planned.”

In fact, in the plaza before the grand hôtel had been erected eight elegant canvas pavilions sporting the united arms of France and England. The Hôtel de Ville was surrounded by these brightly coloured tents while 10 pages and 12 cavaliers ready to escort the ambassadors stood waiting before them. The resulting spectacle was curious, strange, and almost magical; these improvised lodgings had sprung up overnight, thrown together from the richest materials de Guiche had been able to buy in Le Havre, and stood in front of all the entrances to the Hôtel de Ville, the designated residence of the young princess. They were linked to each other by twisted garlands of silk behind which stood French guards, so that if Buckingham’s plan had been to control access to the Hôtel de Ville, it was completely foiled; the only way to approach the steps of the city building was to pass between the 2 grandest pavilions, the doors of which faced each other in front of the hotel’s entrance; these 2 tents were those of de Guiche and Raoul occupied in their absence by de Wardes in de Guiche’s pavilion and Manicamp in Raoul’s. Around these 2 pavilions and the 6 secondary tents, 100 officers, gentlemen, and pages, resplendent in shining golden silk, buzzed around like bees at a hive. There they waited, swords on their hips, ready to instantly obey a gesture from the chief ambassadors, de Guiche and Bragelonne. Just as those two young men appeared at the entrance to the square, they saw, crossing the plaza ahead of them at the gallop, a mounted gentleman clad in marvellous elegance. He rode through the curious crowd, and at the sight of the improvised lodgings he gave out a cry of anger and despair. It was Buckingham, recovered from his stupor to don a dazzling costume, and now come to await the arrival of Madam and the queen at the Hôtel de Ville. But at the two main pavilions his passage was blocked, and he had to pull up short. Exasperated, Buckingham raised his whip but two officers grabbed his arms. Only one of the wardens of the pavilions was there, as de Wardes was inside the Hôtel de Ville overseeing the preparations ordered by de Guiche. At the commotion caused by Buckingham, Manicamp who had been relaxing on a pile of cushions just inside Raoul’s pavilion, rose with his habitual nonchalance and sought the source of the disturbance. “Is there a problem?” he said suavely. “What’s all this fuss about?”

His questions happened to come between ducal outbursts, so that despite their mild tone everyone heard them. Buckingham turned and regarded the long, lean figure with the indolent face. Possibly the appearance of our gentleman, who was dressed quite simply, didn’t inspire his respect, for he replied with disdain, “Just who are you to ask, Sir?”

Manicamp leaned on the arm of a huge French guard standing like the pillar of a cathedral, and calmly replied, “You first, Sir.”

“!? I’m Milord the Duke of Buckingham. I rented all the houses around the Hôtel de Ville where I’ve affairs to conduct, as all these houses belong to me, and since I rented them in order to have free passage to the Hôtel de Ville, you have no right to deny me passage.”

“But, Sir, who denies you passage?” asked Manicamp.

“Why, your guards.”

“That’s because you come on horseback, Sir, and the orders are to allow only pedestrians to pass.”

"No one has the right to give orders here but me," said Buckingham.

"How so, Sir?" asked Manicamp in his soft voice. "Do me the honour to explain this mystery."

"Because, as I told you, I've rented all the houses around the square."

"We're well aware of that, since only the square itself was left to us."

"You are mistaken. Since the square is between my houses, it belongs to me."

"Oh, pardon me, Sir but it's you who are mistaken. Here in France we say that the roads belong to the king, so the square is the king's property – and as we're the king's ambassadors, the plaza belongs to us."

"Sir, I already asked once, who are you?" cried Buckingham, exasperated by this cool reception.

"My name is Manicamp," replied the young man in a voice as harmonious as the strum of an Aeolian harp.<sup>75</sup>

Buckingham shrugged. "Enough," he said as he dismounted. "When I rented these houses around the Hôtel de Ville, the square was empty. These shabby tents obstruct my view; remove them!"

The surrounding crowd responded to these words with a low and menacing murmur. Just then de Guiche arrived, stepping between the crowd and Buckingham on one side, while de Wardes, coming down the steps, did the same on the other. "Pardon me, Milord," said de Guiche, "but if you have any complaints, address them to me, as it was I who ordered these pavilions put here."

"And I would like to add, Sir, that the word shabby could be regarded as objectionable," said Manicamp smoothly.

"You were saying, Sir?" continued de Guiche to Buckingham.

"I was saying, Sir Count," replied Buckingham in a tone in which irritation was still detectable, though it was suppressed in the presence of an equal, "that it's impossible for these tents to remain where they are."

"Impossible?" said de Guiche. "Why is that?"

"Because they annoy me."

De Guiche started an intemperate gesture but restrained himself at a sharp glance from Raoul. He said, "They will bother you less, Sir, when you consider how they rectify an abuse of priority."

"An abuse!"

"Indeed. You sent an envoy who rented, on your behalf, the entire city centre of Le Havre without considering the French ambassadors who must come to receive Madam. For the representative of a friendly nation, Sir Duke, that was less than friendly."

"The right of first possession takes precedence," said Buckingham.

"Not in France, Sir."

"And why not in France?"

"Because in France we observe courtesy."

"Which means?" Buckingham barked, so angrily that the sentries stepped back, expecting an immediate outburst.

"Which means, Sir," replied de Guiche, turning pale, "that I had these pavilions constructed for myself and my friends as lodging for the ambassadors of France, as that was the sole recourse your actions had left us. And here, in this square in Le Havre, we remain, unless a will more powerful and with greater authority than yours makes us move."

"I believe until lawfully evicted is the legal term," said Manicamp sweetly.

"I know an authority, Sir, that I think you will respect," said Buckingham, putting his hand on the hilt of his sword.

At that moment, when the Goddess of Discord was about to put all their hands to their swords, Raoul gently placed his hand on Buckingham's arm. "A word, Milord," he said.

"My right and my honour come first!" cried the fiery young man.

"It is precisely upon the point of honour that I must speak to you," said Raoul quietly.

"Do so but keep it short, Sir."

"Just one question, so you see it couldn't be shorter."

"Speak, I'm listening."

"Is it you or Sir Duke of Orléans who is to marry the grand-daughter of King Henri IV?"

"What's that?" asked Buckingham, stepping back in surprise.

"Answer me, Sir, if you please," said Raoul calmly.

"Are you mocking me, Sir?" asked Buckingham.

"That question is answer enough for me, Sir. So, you admit that it isn't you who is to marry the Princess of England."

"You know that perfectly well, it seems to me."

"Pardon me but based on your conduct, it wasn't clear that you know it."

"What are you trying to say to me, Sir?"

Raoul stepped closer to the duke and lowered his voice. "Are you aware, Milord, that your angry behaviour looks a lot like jealousy? Jealousy of a woman from a man who is neither her lover nor her husband casts a shadow on all concerned, the more so when the woman is a royal princess."

"Sir!" cried Buckingham. "Do you insult Madam Henrietta?"

"If you're not careful, Milord," said Bragelonne coldly, "it is you who will subject her to insult. On the flagship, you tried the admiral's patience and pushed the queen to her limits. I watched you, Milord, and thought you must have taken leave of your senses – but since then I've guessed what it is that's really driving you."

"Sir!"

"Just one more word: I hope we can keep it so I'm the only one in the French delegation who's guessed the truth."

"Are you aware, Sir," said Buckingham, trembling from a mixture of anger and anxiety, "that that's the kind of language that must meet a certain reply?"

"Choose your words carefully, Milord," said Raoul with hauteur. "Those of my blood do not speak recklessly, while you, on the contrary, are of a heritage that makes all true Frenchmen wary. I say to you for the second time: take care, Milord."

"What's this? Are you threatening me?"

"I am the son of the Count of La Fère, Sir de Buckingham, and I never threaten because I strike first. So, listen, not to my threat but to my promise..."

Buckingham clenched his fists but Raoul continued as if he hadn't noticed. "If you say anything improper that reflects on Her Royal Highness, just one word, well ... show some patience, Sir Buckingham, and watch yourself, for I, too, will be watching."

"You?"

"Me. As long as Madam was under English protection, I held back; but now that her foot has touched French soil, now that she's been received in the name of the prince, at the first insult which you, in your unwise attachment, commit to the House of France, I will respond in one of two ways: either I will denounce your folly before the entire Court and prompt a shameful recall to England, or, if you prefer, I will simply run my dagger through your throat. Frankly, the second means would suit me the best."

Buckingham turned paler than the ruff of English lace around his neck. "Sir de Bragelonne," he said, "can this really be the speech of a gentleman?"

"It is, when the gentleman speaks to a madman. Get hold of yourself and this gentleman will speak to you quite differently."

"Oh but Sir Bragelonne," murmured the duke, voice breaking, "Sir Bragelonne, you must see that all this is killing me!"

"And if it killed you," said Raoul with his untouchable sangfroid, "I'd have to regard it as a lucky outcome as it would put an end to this folly and there'd be no more of this language and behaviour that threatens to compromise illustrious persons of high rank."

"Oh, you're right!" said the distraught young man. "You're right. Yes, better to die than to suffer what I'm going through now."

He put his hand on an ornamental dagger with a jewelled hilt and half drew it from his belt. Raoul shoved his hand aside. "Take care, Milord," he said. "If you failed to kill yourself, you'd look ridiculous, and if you succeeded your blood would stain the nuptial gown of the Princess of England."

Buckingham stood for a moment, gasping for breath, lips trembling, cheeks quivering, eyes staring as if in delirium. Then he suddenly breathed deeply, squared his shoulders, and said, "Sir Bragelonne, I've never met a nobler spirit than yours and you're a worthy son of the most perfect gentleman I know. Keep your pavilions!" And he threw his arms around Raoul's shoulders. All those watching, amazed by this embrace that upended all their expectations, given the fury of one adversary and the obduracy of the other, began to applaud, and a thousand cheers rose to the sky. De Guiche in his turn embraced Buckingham, who was reluctant at first but then returned it. And that was the signal. English and French who had regarded each other with suspicion a moment before, immediately fell to fraternising. Such was the situation upon the arrival of the procession of the princesses, who, without Bragelonne, would have come into a battle with blood raining on the banners and flowers. But to the eyes of the princess and the queen, everything was in perfect order.

The Night

Goodwill reigned in the plaza of the pavilions. English and French surpassed each other in gallantry and courtesies to the royal travellers. The English, who had purchased great quantities of flowers in advance, sent them to the French in honour of the young princess; the French invited the English to dine with them at a great feast planned for the next day. Madam was applauded wherever she passed. She seemed as regal as a queen in the eyes of all who respected her, and as holy as an idol to those who adored her. The queen mother returned the affectionate welcome of the French. France was her homeland, and she'd been too unhappy in England to ever forget France. She'd taught her daughter, through her own love, to love the country where both had found hospitality in a troubled past, and where they were now come to find the fortune of a brilliant future. The royal entrance complete, the spectators beginning to scatter, the fanfares finished and the sound of the crowd subsiding, night fell, enveloping under its starry veil the sea, the countryside, the harbour, and the city, still bustling in the aftermath of the great event. De Guiche returned to his pavilion and sat on a camp stool with such a pained expression that Bragelonne who followed him, paused until he heard him sigh and then approached. The count was leaning against the wall of the tent, his head in his hands, breath ragged, knees trembling. "Are you suffering, my friend?" asked Raoul.

"Cruelly."

"Physically in pain?"

"Oh, yes."

"It was an exhausting day," continued the young viscount, eyes fixed on his friend, assessing.

"It was. Maybe, with sleep, I'll recover."

"Do you want me to leave you?"

"No, I need to talk to you."

"Of course. But first, de Guiche, I have questions to ask."

"Ask then."

"Be honest."

"I always am."

"Do you know why Buckingham was so furious?"

"I have an idea."

"You think he's in love with Madam, am I right?"

"Hard to think otherwise, looking at him."

"Well! I think not."

"Oh! This time you're wrong, Raoul. I read the pain in his eyes, in his words, his every act from the morning onward."

"You're a poet, my dear Count, and see poetry wherever you look."
"More than that, I see love."
"Even where there is none."
"Where there is."
"Come, de Guiche, don't you think you're fooling yourself?"
"I know exactly what I'm saying!" the count said sharply.
"Tell me, Count," asked Raoul with a significant look, "why love is what you think you see."
"Well," said de Guiche, hesitating, "experience, I guess."
"Experience! So, you think you can trust your judgement."
"What are you trying to say?"
"I'm saying, my friend, that you're not usually as disturbed as you are tonight."
"I'm tired."
"You're tired?"
"Yes."
"Listen, dear friend, we've fought on campaign together, ridden eighteen hours at a stretch, killed our horses beneath us, fell down hungry and exhausted, and yet we laughed. It isn't because you're tired, Count, that you're sad."
"I'm upset, then."
"Upset? About what?"
"What happened tonight."
"Lord Buckingham's folly?"
"What else? Shouldn't it upset us as Frenchmen who represent our prince, to see an Englishman pay court to our future princess, the second lady of the realm?"
"Yes, I would be upset – if I thought Lord Buckingham an actual danger."
"Oh but he is. He came roaring in, stirring up trouble between us and the English, and if it wasn't for you, so calm and so firm, there'd have been swordplay in the plaza."
"But he did calm down, as you saw."
"Yes, he did, and it was astounding. You spoke quietly with him; what did you say? You could see that he loves her but somehow you talked him out of it. He must not really love her, then!"
De Guiche said this with such emphasis that Raoul looked at him sharply. The young noble's passion was easily read. "What did I say to him, Count?" said Raoul. "I'll repeat it to you. Listen closely, here it is: 'Milord, you look with an air of envy, of dangerous lust, upon the sister of your king, who is engaged to someone else and who can never return your love; and this is an affront to those, like us, who come to bring this young woman to her intended spouse.'"
"You said that?" asked de Guiche, colouring.

"Not just that but more than that." De Guiche flinched. "I said to him, 'What would you think if you saw one of us so improper, so disloyal, as to show inappropriate feelings toward the princess destined for our master?'" These words hit de Guiche so hard that he paled, shuddered, and stretched one hand out toward Raoul while the other covered his eyes and forehead. "'But,'" continued Raoul without appearing to notice his friend's reaction, "'the French, thank God, though accused of being frivolous, indiscreet, even reckless, know to rely on sound judgement and solid morality when faced with questions of such high importance. You should know, Milord Buckingham,' I added, 'that we gentlemen of France serve our kings by sacrificing our passions as well as our fortunes and our lives, and that if, by some chance, the Devil suggests one of those evil thoughts that inflames the heart, we extinguish that flame, even if we must quench it in blood. That way, we preserve three honours: our country's, our master's, and our own. That's how we behave, Milord Buckingham, and it's how every man of honour should behave.' And that, my dear de Guiche," continued Raoul, "is how I spoke to Milord Buckingham, and why he gave in to my reasoning without resistance."
De Guiche who had been cringing at Raoul's words, now looked up, eyes bright, and feverishly gripped Raoul's hand; his cheeks that had been pale as ice, now glowed red as flame. "And you spoke well," he said, voice choking. "Thank you, you're a good friend, Raoul. Now, please, leave me to myself."
"That's what you want?"
"Yes, I need rest. Today was a disturbing day for me, in both mind and body. But tomorrow, when I see you again, I'll be a new man."
"Well, then! I'll take my leave," said Raoul, withdrawing. The count stepped toward his friend and embraced him warmly. But behind this friendly embrace, Raoul thought he detected the trembling of a greater passion. The night was cool, starry, and splendid; after the storm, the warmth of the sun had brought a general return of life and joy. A few long, slender clouds trailed across the sky behind a breeze from the east, promising fine days ahead. In the square before the Hôtel de Ville, the dark shadows of the pavilions divided by bands of moonlight formed a vast mosaic of black and white. Soon the city was asleep ... but there was still a faint light in the window of Madam's chamber that overlooked the square, the soft light of a dim lamp just before it flickers out, a seeming symbol of the calm repose of a young woman who scarcely aware of life's anxieties, slowly sinks into deep sleep. Bragelonne emerged from his tent with the slow care of a man wishing to see while remaining unseen. From the opening between the door flaps he surveyed the entire square at a glance, and then, after a moment, saw the corners of the door to de Guiche's pavilion tremble and part. Behind the opening was the shadow of de Guiche, eyes glinting in the gloom as he fixed them on the window of Madam's chamber, still lit by the flickering glimmer from within. The soft glow that tinted that window was the count's pole star. In his eyes could be seen the aspirations of his entire soul. Raoul, hidden in the shadows, guessed at the passionate longings that formed between the young ambassador and the young princess behind the balcony a mysterious bond of sympathetic magic, a link forged of will and obsession that must have sent amorous dreams into the chamber the count gazed at, his soul in his eyes. But de Guiche and Raoul weren't the only ones who were awake. The window of one of the houses overlooking the square was open, in the house occupied by Buckingham. The silhouette of the duke, leaning on the carved and velvet-trimmed windowsill, was sending across to the light in Madam's window its own wild message of love. Bragelonne noticed and could not help but smile. Thinking of Madam, he said, "There is a poor heart thoroughly besieged." Then with a sympathetic thought for Sir, he added, "And there is a poor husband thoroughly threatened. He's lucky that he's a great prince with an army to watch out for him." Bragelonne gazed a while longer at the silent appeals of the two suitors, while listening to the indecorous snoring of Manicamp, who wheezed as proudly as if he were wearing his suit of blue and gold instead of just his purple doublet, nearly drowning out the breeze that brought the distant song of a nightingale; and with that added to his store of melancholy, Raoul returned to his bed, wondering if maybe 2 or even 3 pairs of eyes as ardent as those of de Guiche and Buckingham were turned upon the window of his beloved back in the château at Blois. "And Miss Montalais isn't the most dependable defender, alas," he whispered to himself with a sigh.

From Le Havre to Paris

The next day, the welcome festivities were celebrated with all the pomp and merriment the city and its residents could muster. And meanwhile, during the final hours the French cortège spent in Le Havre, they prepared for their departure. After the grand welcome, Madam first bid farewell to the English fleet, honouring the nation by saluting their flags; she then got into her carriage surrounded by a brilliant procession. De Guiche had hoped that Buckingham would return with the admiral to England but Buckingham had persuaded the queen that it would be improper to leave Madam without a ranking English noble to escort her to Paris. Buckingham, having scored the point that he would accompany Madam, chose a glittering entourage of gentlemen and officers with which to surround himself, so that it was almost an army that marched toward Paris, scattering gold and drawing excited crowds in the towns and villages through which they proceeded. The weather was perfect. France was beautiful to see, especially along the route the cortège had chosen. Spring tossed its flowers and sweet-smelling foliage at the feet of youth as it passed. Normandy, with its lush vegetation, blue horizons, and silvery streams, presented itself as a pastoral paradise for the king's new sister. The journey was an ongoing entertainment and festival, and de Guiche and Buckingham surrendered to it, de Guiche hoping to eclipse the efforts of the Englishman, and Buckingham trying to recall in the princess's heart recollections of happy days in the country she'd left behind. But alas, the poor duke could clearly see that the memory of his dear England was fading day by day in Madam's mind as she increasingly recalled her love of France. In fact, he saw that all his efforts awoke no longing in her for England, and that though he rode with skill and grace on a high-spirited Yorkshire charger, it was only occasionally and by accident that the princess's gaze lit upon him. In vain did he attempt, when one of those looks was turned toward him, to make his mount produce all it could from strength, spirit, force, and finesse: in vain did he drive the horse to risky extremes, to headlong, breakneck leaps over logs and ditches that did no more than cause Madam, attracted by the commotion, to turn her head for a moment and then, smiling slightly, return to her loyal guardians, Raoul and de Guiche, who rode calmly beside the doors to her carriage. Buckingham fell prey to all the torments of jealousy, a pain deeper than any he'd ever known, burning in his veins and besieging his heart; then, as if to show that he was aware of his folly, and that he wished to redeem his recklessness by humble submission, he tamed his foaming horse and forced it, dripping with sweat, into the crowd around the coach, among the throng of courtiers. Sometimes as a reward he was afforded a word of recognition from Madam, a word that seemed to him little more than a reproach. "There, Milord Buckingham," she would say, "that's much more reasonable."
Or Raoul would remark, "Don't kill your horse, Milord Buckingham."
Buckingham bore this patiently from Raoul, for he instinctively knew with no direct evidence that Raoul was also reining in de Guiche, and there would already have been some kind of clash between the count and Buckingham without Raoul on hand that might have gotten one or both of them exiled in disgrace. Since the confrontation between the young men among the pavilions of Le Havre, in which Raoul had forced the duke to acknowledge his inappropriate behaviour, Buckingham had, despite himself, come to respect Raoul. He often engaged him in conversation, usually to talk about his father or about d'Artagnan, their mutual friend, about whom Buckingham was almost as enthusiastic as Raoul. Bragelonne was always happy to talk about d'Artagnan, particularly in front of de Wardes, who during the entire trip was seething with resentment toward Raoul, especially regarding his influence over de Guiche. De Wardes had the sharp eye of the mean spirited and saw how de Guiche yearned for the attentions of the princess. Instead of addressing the subject with Raoul's reserve, treating it with the appropriate dignity and propriety, de Wardes deliberately aggravated the count by appealing to his youthful audacity and selfish pride. Thus it happened that one evening, when they were paused at Mantes, de Guiche and de Wardes were talking together, leaning on a fence, while Buckingham and Raoul were strolling up and down and conversing, and Manicamp was paying court to the princesses, who had already learned to enjoy his company without taking him seriously, thanks to his agile wit and his smooth manners that were as supercilious as they were obsequious. "Confess," said de Wardes to the count, "that you're suffering badly and your friend the pedagogue offers no cure."
"I don't know what you're talking about," said the count.
"But you do – you're smitten by love."
"That's crazy, de Wardes!"
"It would be crazy, I agree, if Madam was indifferent to your passion. But she's aware of it to the point of compromising herself, and I fear that when you arrive in Paris, your pedagogue will denounce the both of you."
"Oh, de Wardes! Yet another attack on Bragelonne!"
"Come, enough of this childish pretence," continued the count's cunning tempter in a low voice. "You know as well as I do what the truth is: you've seen how the princess's gaze softens when she speaks to you, you can tell from the sound of her voice that she likes to hear yours. You see how she hangs on the verses you recite to her, and then doesn't she say the next morning that she slept badly the night before?"
"Even if all that's true, de Wardes, what's the point of bringing it up?"
"Isn't it important to see the situation clearly?"
"Not when the sight would drive one mad."
And he turned to glance anxiously at the princess, as if, despite denying de Wardes's accusations, he sought confirmation of them from her eyes. "See there?" said de Wardes. "That look from her is as good as a summons! Come, take advantage of the opportunity while your pedagogue isn't around to interfere."
De Guiche couldn't resist; an invincible attraction drew him toward the princess. De Wardes looked on and smiled. "Ah but you're mistaken, Sir de Wardes," said Raoul suddenly, appearing around the fence on which the two had been leaning. "The pedagogue is here and heard what you said." De Wardes recognised Raoul's voice the moment he spoke, and half drew his sword. "Sheathe your sword," said Raoul. "You know perfectly well that on a mission like ours such a display is unthinkable. Sheathe your sword, and also your tongue. Why pour into the heart of one you call your friend a dose of the poison that eats at your own? It's the same as when you tried to turn him against another good man, my father's friend and mine. Now you're trying to get the count to pursue a woman who's destined for your master, the prince. Really, sir, I'd take you for a cowardly meddler, if you didn't seem more like a madman!"

"Sir," cried de Wardes, exasperated, "I was right to call you a pedagogue! This haughty tone you affect is more that of a Jesuit schoolmaster than the speech of a gentleman. Don't speak in a tone like that when you speak to a man like me. And Sir d'Artagnan earned my hatred because he dealt with my father in a cowardly fashion."

"That, Sir, is a lie," said Raoul coldly.

"What!" cried de Wardes, "Do you call me a liar, Sir?"

"Why not, if what you say is a lie?"

"You call me a liar, and yet you don't draw your sword?"

"Sir, I swore an oath to myself not to kill you until after we've turned Madam over to her bridegroom."

"You, kill me? You might slap my wrist with a ruler, Sir Pedagogue but no more."

"True, a ruler wouldn't kill," replied Raoul in voice of ice, "but the sword of Sir d'Artagnan would – and I not only have his sword, sir but he taught me how to use it. And it's with that sword, sir, that I'll in time avenge the lies you've spoken about him."

"Take care, Sir," snarled de Wardes. "If you don't give me immediate satisfaction, I'll use whatever means I must to get even."

"I think not, Sir," said Buckingham, suddenly appearing on stage. "That's a vow that sounds very much like a threat of assassination. Hardly proper for a gentleman."

"What are you saying, Sir Duke?" said de Wardes, turning on him.

"I'm saying that, to my English ears, what you said sounded very wrong indeed."

"Well, Sir!" said de Wardes, now furious. "If that's so, all the better. At least in you I won't find the kind of man who slips away from a fight. Take my words however you like."

"I take them as I hear them, and my hearing is excellent," said Buckingham in his haughty tone that gave every statement an air of defiance. "Sir Bragelonne's my friend; you insult Sir Bragelonne; you'll give me satisfaction for that insult."

De Wardes glanced at Bragelonne who sticking to his chosen role, remained cool and calm, even after the duke's challenge. "It seems to me I must not have insulted Sir Bragelonne," said de Wardes, "because Sir de Bragelonne who wears a sword doesn't act like a man who's been insulted."

"But you were certainly insulting someone."

"Yes, I insult Sir d'Artagnan!" replied de Wardes who had noticed that this was the only rowel he could use to spur Raoul's anger.

"That's something else entirely," said Buckingham.

"It is, isn't it?" said de Wardes. "And it's up to the friends of Sir d'Artagnan to defend him."

"I agree with you on that," said the Englishman, who'd regained his composure. "If Sir de Bragelonne were insulted, I couldn't reasonably come to the defence of Sir de Bragelonne, since he's right here. But once it's a question of Sir d'Artagnan..."

"You step aside, eh, sir?" said de Wardes.

"No, on the contrary, I draw," said Buckingham, sliding his sword from its scabbard. "For though Sir d'Artagnan may have offended your father, he rendered or at least tried to render a great service to mine." De Wardes shook his head as if stunned. "Sir d'Artagnan," continued Buckingham, "is the most gallant gentleman I know. Having obligations to him, I'd be delighted to repay them upon you with the point of a sword."

And Buckingham raised his sword, saluted Raoul, and placed himself on guard. De Wardes drew his own steel. "Come, come, Gentlemen," said Raoul, stepping forward and placing his own naked blade between the combatants. "This affair is scarcely worth spilling blood over right before the eyes of the princess. Sir de Wardes speaks ill of Sir d'Artagnan but he doesn't even know him."

"What?" said de Wardes, grinding his teeth and dropping the point of his blade to the toe of his boot, "You say I don't know Sir d'Artagnan?"

"That's right. You not only don't know him," Raoul said coldly, "you don't even know where to find him."

"I don't know where to find him?"

"Obviously, since you're picking a fight with strangers instead of with Sir d'Artagnan himself."

De Wardes paled. "Well, then! I'll tell you where to find him," continued Raoul. "Sir d'Artagnan is in Paris in the Louvre when he's on duty and in the Rue des Lombards when he's not. Sir d'Artagnan's easily found at either of these locations so with the grievances you bear against him, it'd be gallant of you to go where he can be found. That way he can give you the satisfaction you seem to ask of everyone but him." De Wardes wiped his forehead that dripped with sweat. "For shame, Sir de Wardes," continued Raoul. "It isn't right to go around provoking fights when we have edicts against duelling. Think about it: the king would be angry with us for our disobedience, especially given our current responsibilities, and the king would be in the right."

"Excuses!" murmured de Wardes. "Excuses and pretexts!"

"Besides," said Raoul, "you were talking nonsense, my dear Sir de Wardes. You're well aware that the Duke of Buckingham is a gallant man who's already fought ten duels and will certainly fight eleven. What the devil! His name practically requires it. As for me, you know that I'm a fighter as well. I fought at Lens, Bléneau, the Dunes, and not just in front of the gunners but a hundred paces in advance of the line – while you, it must be said, were a hundred paces behind it. Maybe in a battle, among so many other people, no one could notice your courage, and you'd like to show it off but this isn't the time or place for it. And don't count on me, Sir de Wardes, to help you with your little project, because I wouldn't give you the pleasure."

"You talk sense," said Buckingham, sheathing his sword, "and I apologise, Sir de Bragelonne, for allowing myself to be tempted into drawing first."

"No!" de Wardes shouted, leaping forward furiously and lunging toward Raoul who had only time enough for a parry in fourth. "Watch it, sir," said Bragelonne calmly. "You could put someone's eye out."

"Then you won't fight?" cried de Wardes.

"At the moment, I will not – but I'll tell you what I'll do when we reach Paris: I'll take you to Sir d'Artagnan, to whom you can recount what grievances you have against him. Sir d'Artagnan will ask the king for permission to cross swords with you, the king will grant it, and once you've met his sword, well, my dear Sir de Wardes! You will take more seriously the words of the Gospel that tell us to forgive others' trespasses."

"Agh!" cried de Wardes, inflamed by such coolness. "It's clear that you're at least half a bastard, Sir de Bragelonne!"

Raoul went as pale as the lace at his collar, and his eye flashed in a way that made de Wardes take a step back. When Buckingham saw that, he threw himself between the two adversaries, whom he expected to tear each other apart. De Wardes had saved this insult for the last; his sword trembled eagerly as he awaited an attack. "You're right, Sir," said Raoul, making a heroic effort to control himself. "I know only my father's name. But I know too well that the Count of La Fère is a man of honour and worth to fear for a moment that, as you imply, there's a stain upon my birth. My ignorance of my mother's name is therefore for me a misfortune but not a disgrace. The shame is on you, Sir, for your discourtesy in reproaching me for a misfortune. But no matter: the insult exists, and I must respond to it. So, if you please, after you settle your quarrel with Sir d'Artagnan, you will have me to deal with."

"Oh ho!" replied de Wardes with a bitter smile. "I admire your deliberation, Sir. Just now you promised me a thrust from Sir d'Artagnan's sword but I'm to take a thrust from yours only after one from him. Very prudent."

"Oh, never fear," replied Raoul, an edge to his voice. "Sir d'Artagnan is a master of arms, and I'll ask him to take the same care with you that he did with your father and refrain from killing you, so he'll leave me the pleasure, once you've recovered, of killing you myself. You are rotten to the core, Sir de Wardes, and one can't, in good conscience, take too many precautions against you."

"As I shall take my precautions against you," said de Wardes. "Count on it."

"Sir," said Buckingham, "allow me to interpret your words by giving a piece of advice to Sir de Bragelonne: Sir, under your everyday doublet, wear armour."

De Wardes clenched his fists. "Oh, I see," he said. "You gentlemen are waiting till you've taken that advice before you measure your swords against mine."

"Very well, then, Sir," said Raoul, "since you absolutely demand it, let's finish this."

And he took a step toward de Wardes, extending his sword. "What are you doing?" asked Buckingham.

"Nothing much," said Raoul. "This won't take long."

De Wardes came on guard, and their blades touched. De Wardes then lunged so hastily that, from Raoul's easy parry, it was obvious to Buckingham that Raoul was sparing his adversary. Buckingham took a step back and watched the duel. Raoul was as calm as if sparring with a foil rather than fighting with a sword; he freed his weapon that was pressed up to the hilt, with a back-step, and parried three or four more blows from de Wardes. Then, threatened by a low thrust, he parried de Wardes's sword with a circular bind, whipped the blade out of his hand and sent it flying over the fence. And then, as de Wardes stood there stunned and disarmed, Raoul sheathed his blade, grabbed him by the collar and belt, and threw him over the fence after his sword. "Next time! Next time!" snarled de Wardes as he picked up his sword and scrambled to his feet.

"No rush, by God," said Raoul. "Give it at least an hour." Then turning to Buckingham, he said, "Duke, I implore you not to say a word about this incident. I'm ashamed at having gone this far but anger got the better of me. Please forget all about it."

"My dear Viscount," said the duke, shaking his hand sincerely and long, "on the contrary, let's both remember it and watch out for your safety. That man is dangerous and will murder you in a heartbeat."

"My father lived for twenty years under the threat of a much more formidable enemy than him, and he still lives," Raoul replied. "God protects those of my blood, Sir Duke."

"Your father had some very good friends, Viscount."

"Yes," sighed Raoul, "but there are no such friends around now."

"Oh, never say that!" said Buckingham. "Not at the moment I offer you my own friendship!" And he spread his arms to embrace Bragelonne, who received the offer with joy.

"Men of my blood," added Buckingham, "will die for those we love. You know that, Sir Bragelonne."

"Yes, Duke," said Raoul. "I know it."

What the Knight of Lorraine Thought of Madam

Nothing disturbed the rest of the journey. Under the pretext of scouting the route, Sir de Wardes left and rode ahead. He was scarcely missed. With him he took Manicamp, whose congeniality and dreamy disposition served to balance his own temperament. High strung and quarrelsome types often seek out those of a soft and timid nature, as if the former sought relief from the contrast to their harsh moods, while the latter sought a defence for their weakness. Buckingham and Bragelonne formed a trio of friendship with de Guiche, singing a chorus of praises in honour of the princess. To counter the dangerous habits of de Guiche and his rival, Bragelonne had organised the perpetual concert so the three would sing in harmony instead of solo arias. These harmonious paeans pleased Madam Henriette the queen mother but were less appreciated by the young princess, who was a demon of coquetry and would have joined her voice to the solos in risky flirtation. She had one of those bold and reckless hearts who seek strong emotion, even at the cost of pain. So her glances, her smiles, her flicks of her fan, rained down on the three young men in crushing volleys, and this inexhaustible ammunition was likewise expended at longer range on the gentlemen and officers of the escort, the citizens and aldermen of the towns they passed through, even the pages and the servants; it was a general slaughter, an ongoing massacre. By the time Madam arrived in Paris she'd broken a hundred thousand hearts along the road and had in her train a dozen devotees and two absolute lunatics. Raoul alone was aware of her methods and immune to her seductions. His heart was already given to another and thus was no target for her arrows, so he arrived still cool and self-possessed at the capital of the realm. Once, along the way, he spoke with the Queen of England about the intoxicating effect Madam had on those around her and her mother who had learned wisdom from many misfortunes and disappointments, replied, "Henrietta was born to be brilliant, whether in the light of a throne or in darkness, for she is a woman of imagination, caprice, and infinite will."

De Wardes and Manicamp gone ahead as heralds, announced the coming of the princess. The procession was met in Nanterre by a brilliant escort of cavaliers and carriages. It was Sir himself who accompanied by the Knight de Lorraine and his other favourites, along with a company of the king's household troops, had come to greet his fiancée. Just before then, at Saint-Germain, the princess and her mother had exchanged their travel coach, heavy and road-worn, for a light and elegant carriage drawn by six horses caparisoned in white and gold. In this setting, on a mobile throne under a silk parasol edged with a fringe of long feathers, the young and beautiful princess was displayed to all, her radiant face glowing with rosy highlights that emphasized her mother-of-pearl skin. Sir upon seeing the carriage, was struck by Madam's radiance, and expressed his admiration in such enthusiastic terms that the Knight de Lorraine shrugged and sniffed, while Buckingham and de Guiche were struck to the heart. Once the ceremonies of reception were completed and the usual civilities had been exchanged, the procession, now enlarged, resumed making its slow way toward Paris. The introductions had been rushed and though Buckingham and the other Englishmen had been introduced to Sir, the prince had paid little notice. But along the way as he saw the duke paying his attentions with his usual ardour at the door of Madam's carriage, he asked his invariable favourite, the Knight de Lorraine, "Who's that cavalier?"

"He was presented to Your Highness just a few minutes ago," replied the knight. "He's the famously handsome Duke of Buckingham."

“Oh, right.”

“Madam’s ‘knight,’” added the favourite with that tone the jealous use to give significance to even the simplest statement.

“What does that mean?” replied the prince, ever alert to such nuances.

“It just means he’s her knight.”

“Does Madam have a designated knight then?”

“Dame! I would think you could see that for yourself. Look at them laughing and flirting, the pair of them.”

“You mean, the three of them.”

“Three? Why, what do you mean?”

“Can’t you see that de Guiche is joining in?”

“I do but so what? It just means Madam has not one personal knight but two.”

“You poison everything, you viper.”

“I don’t poison anything! Ah, My Lord, how ill-natured you are. Here we all are, paying the honours of the Kingdom of France to your wife but somehow you’re displeased.”

The prince dreaded the knight’s satirical tone once it turned bitter and cutting, so he changed the subject. “The princess is quite pretty,” he said lightly as if speaking of a stranger.

“Yes,” replied the knight in the same tone.

“The way you say yes sounds like no. Her dark eyes are quite lovely, it seems to me.”

“Small though.”

“Small but brilliant. She’s quite tall.”

“Tall enough to be awkward.”

“I don’t disagree. But she has an air of nobility.”

“Her features are too sharp.”

“Yet her teeth are admirable.”

“We see enough of them, God knows, given the size of her mouth. Really, My Lord, I was quite wrong: you are better-looking than your wife.”

“And do you think I’m more handsome than Buckingham? Tell me.”

“Oh, yes, and he’s well aware of it – see how he redoubles his attentions to Madam when you’re nearby.”

Sir flicked his reins in impatience but as he saw a triumphant smile pass over the knight’s lips, he dropped back into a walk. “But really,” he said, “why should I worry about my lady cousin at all? Don’t I know her? Wasn’t I brought up with her? Didn’t I see her in the Louvre as a child?”

“She’s changed a bit since then, my Prince, if you don’t mind my saying so,” said the knight. “She was less brilliant then, and considerably less proud, at the time of which you speak. Especially on that night that I’m sure you remember, My Lord, when the king refused to dance with her because he thought her ugly and ill-dressed.”

These words made the Duke of Orléans frown. It wasn’t very flattering to marry a princess whom the king had disdained in her youth. He was preparing an answer when de Guiche left the carriage and approached the prince. From a distance he’d seen the knight talking to the prince and seemed to guess at the nature of the conversation between Sir and his favourite – which the latter continued, from nastiness or impudence. “Count, you’re a man of excellent taste,” the knight said.

“Nice of you to say so,” de Guiche replied, “but why bring it up?”

“Dame! I’ll let His Highness answer that.”

“I’ll only say that de Guiche knows I consider him the perfect cavalier,” said Sir.

“And that said, Count, you’ve been with Madam for a week now, haven’t you?” said the knight.

“Quite so,” replied de Guiche, blushing in spite of himself.

“Well, then! Tell us frankly what you think of her appearance.”

“Of her appearance?” said de Guiche, dumbfounded.

“Yes, of her appearance, and of her personality – everything about her, really.”

Struck speechless by this question, de Guiche hesitated to answer. “Come now, de Guiche!” said the knight, laughing. “Tell us what you think – and be frank, Sir wants to know.”

“Yes, quite, be frank,” said Sir.

De Guiche stammered out something unintelligible. “I know it’s a delicate matter,” said Sir, “but you know you can say anything to me. What do you think of her?”

Caught by surprise, de Guiche fell back on the only defence he could muster: he lied. “I find Madam not so good but not so bad, either,” he said. “A bit more good than bad.”

“Really, my dear Count!” said the knight. “You, who were in such ecstasies at the sight of her portrait!”

De Guiche blushed to his ears. Fortunately, his horse that was a lively one, did a little caracole that served to hide his reaction. “Her portrait?” he muttered, drawing near again. “What portrait?”

The knight had never stopped watching him closely. “You remember the portrait. Doesn’t she resemble her miniature?”

“I ... don’t know. I don’t remember the portrait, it’s faded from my mind.”

“It made a strong impression on you at the time,” said the knight.

“That’s possible.”

“Does she have wit, at least?” asked the prince.

“I think so, my Lord.”

“And what about Buckingham?” asked the knight.

“I couldn’t say.”

“I think he must have some,” replied the knight, “for he makes Madam laugh, and she seems to take a great deal of pleasure in his company that doesn’t happen to a witty woman in the company of a fool.”

“Then he must be witty,” said de Guiche naively, turning with relief at the arrival of Raoul who had noticed him being subjected to this dangerous inquisition.

Raoul deftly changed the subject, and the interrogation was over. The entry to Paris was grand and jubilant. The king, to honour his brother, had ordered a magnificent reception. With a large and brilliant retinue, Madam and her mother were escorted to the Louvre – that same Louvre where, during their time in exile, they had suffered so painfully in obscurity, misery, and privation. That inhospitable lodging for the daughter of Henri IV, with its bare walls, cracked floors, ceilings draped with spider webs, cold chimneys and empty hearths barely warmed by the charity of parliament, had entirely changed: now it showed splendid draperies, thick carpets, new marble flooring, bright paintings in gilded frames, and mirrors that reflected candelabra everywhere. Light glinted from sumptuous furniture and the arms of the many ceremonial guards, plumes dancing above their heads, while behind them stood a crowd of servants and courtiers in the antechambers and on the staircases. In the courtyards, where formerly grass and weeds had been allowed to grow, as if the contemptuous Mazarin had thought it proper to show Parisians that neglect and disorder were, along with misery and despair, the lot of fallen monarchies – those vast and desolate courtyards were now thronged with brilliant mounted cavaliers whose horses’ hoofs struck sparks from the gleaming cobblestones. Bright carriages overflowed with beautiful young ladies waiting to greet that Daughter of France who, during her widowhood and exile, sometimes couldn’t find wood for her hearth or bread for her table, and whom the lowliest servants of the palace had treated with disdain. But Madam Henriette returned to the Louvre with a heart more wounded by grief and bitter memories than that of her daughter Henrietta, whose nature was less reminiscent and more spontaneous, and brimming now with triumph and joy. The queen was well aware that this brilliant welcome was addressed to the proud mother of a king now placed on the second throne of Europe, while the previous ungracious reception of the daughter of Henri IV had been a punishment for royal misfortune. After the princesses had been installed in their apartments to be given time for a rest, their escorting cavaliers, needing also to recover from the fatigue of travel, left to go about their business. Raoul began by going to see his father but Athos had left for Blois. He tried, then, to visit d’Artagnan but he, busy organising the young king’s military household, was impossible to find. So Bragelonne fell back on seeking out de Guiche. But the count, accompanied by Manicamp, was consulting his tailors, a conference that was liable to last all day. The Duke of Buckingham was even busier, buying horse after horse and diamond upon diamond, monopolizing every other tailor, embroiderer, and jeweller in Paris. Buckingham and de Guiche were conducting a courteous rivalry in which to ensure success, Buckingham was prepared to spend a million in gold, while de Guiche had only his allowance from the Maréchal de Grammont of sixty thousand livres. While Buckingham laughed and spent his million, de Guiche, egged on by de Wardes, groaned and tore out his hair. “A million!” he complained daily. “I’m doomed. Why won’t the marshal advance me a share of my inheritance?”

“Because you’d just squander it,” Raoul said.

“So? What does it matter to him? Maybe I should just die. Then I’d need nothing.”

“Why this talk of dying?” asked Raoul.

“Better that than to be outdone in elegance by an Englishman.”

“My dear Count,” put in Manicamp, “elegance is less a matter of expense than of effort.”

“Yes but making an effort costs money, and I have only sixty thousand livres.”

“By my troth!” said de Wardes. “That is embarrassing, to say the least. You just need to spend the same amount as Buckingham; it’s only a difference of nine hundred and forty thousand livres.”

“But where would I get it?”

“Go into debt.”

“I’m there already.”

“Then you might as well go deeper.”

This kind of advice aggravated de Guiche into further spending, until he was deep in extravagance while Buckingham was just incurring expenses. The merchants of Paris were all excited by this spending spree, as orders for miracles issued from Buckingham’s rented mansion and the Hôtel de Grammont. Meanwhile, as Madam was recovering from her travels, Bragelonne was writing to Miss La Vallière. Four letters had already flown from his pen with no answer forthcoming, when, on the very morning of the royal wedding that was to take place in the chapel of the Palais Royal, Raoul, grooming himself in preparation, heard his footman announce, “Sir Malicorne.”

What can this Malicorne want with me? Raoul thought. “Make him wait,” he told the footman.

“He’s a gentleman from Blois,” said the footman.

“Ah! Show him in!” said Raoul eagerly.

Malicorne entered, brilliant as the evening star and wearing a superb sword. After bowing gracefully, he said, “Sir Bragelonne, I bring you a thousand greetings from a lady.”

Raoul blushed. “From a lady,” he said. “A lady of Blois?”

“Yes, Sir, from Miss Montalais.”

“Ah, yes, thank you, Sir, I recognise you now,” said Raoul. “And what does Miss Montalais want with me?”

Malicorne drew four letters from his doublet and offered them to Raoul. “My letters!” said Bragelonne. “How can this be? And still sealed!”

“Sir, your letters couldn’t find the person they were intended for in Blois, and so we return them to you here.”

“Miss La Vallière has left Blois?” cried Raoul.

“The week before last.”

“Then, where is she?”

“I believe she’s in Paris, Sir.”

“But how did you know these letters came from me?”

“Miss Montalais recognised your handwriting,” said Malicorne.

Raoul blushed and smiled. “How kind of Miss Aure,” he said. “Always so thoughtful and charming.”

“Always, Sir.”

“But she ought to send me more precise information about Miss La Vallière. I don’t know where to look in the immensity of Paris.”

Malicorne drew another envelope from his doublet. “Perhaps,” he said, “you’ll find what you wish to know in this.”

Raoul hastily broke the seal. The note within was from Miss Aure, and it read, “Paris, Palais Royal, day of the blessed nuptials.”

“What does this mean?” Raoul asked Malicorne. “Do you know, Sir?”

“Yes, Sir Viscount.”

“Then, in heaven’s name, tell me!”

“Impossible, Sir.”

“Why?”

“Because Miss Aure forbade me to say.”

Raoul stared at this strange messenger, momentarily dumbstruck. “At least,” he finally said, “tell me whether this means good or ill for me.”

“You’ll find out.”

“This discretion is cruel!”

“A favour, if you will, Sir.”

“In exchange for the one you won’t do me?”

“Exactly.”

“Speak!”

“I have a powerful desire to see the wedding ceremony but I have no invitation, despite my best efforts to acquire one. Could you get me in?”

“Yes, I could.”

“Please do that for me, Sir Viscount, I beg you.”

“Willingly, Sir. Come with me.”

“Sir, I am your humble servant.”

“But wait, aren’t you a friend of Sir de Manicamp?”

“Yes, Sir. But this morning, as I was watching him dress, I knocked a bottle of lace whitener onto his new suit and he flew at me sword in hand. I was compelled to depart in haste. So, I could have asked him for an invitation but he’d have killed me.”

“Very possibly,” said Raoul. “I think Manicamp quite capable of killing someone for the crime you describe. But I’ll make up for your loss: just let me grab my half-cape and we’ll be on our way.”

The Surprise of Miss Montalais

Madam was married in the chapel of the Palais Royal before an audience of carefully chosen Court favourites. However, despite the exclusive criteria for admission, Raoul, faithful to his promise, contrived to get an invitation for Malicorne, who was eager to see the curious spectacle. Once they were both inside, Raoul approached de Guiche, who, belying his splendid clothes, wore an expression of such misery that only the face of the Duke of Buckingham could match him for dejection and despair. “Watch yourself, Count,” said Raoul, gently warning his friend just as the archbishop was blessing the bride and groom.

In fact, the Prince de Condé was visibly taking note of these twin statues of sorrow, standing like sad caryatids on either side of the nave. The count made an effort to get hold of himself. When the ceremony was over, the king and the queen progressed into the large salon, where they were to be introduced to Madam and her suite. It was remarked that the king who seemed quite taken with his new sister-in-law, reserved his most sincere compliments for her. It was also remarked that Queen Mother Anne after fixing Buckingham with a long and searching look, leaned toward Madam de Motteville and said, “Don’t you think he resembles his father?”

Others remarked that Sir looked anxiously at everyone and seemed unhappy with everything. After the reception of the princes and ambassadors, Sir asked permission of the king to present to him, as well as to Madam, the new members of his now expanded household. “Do you know, Viscount,” the Prince de Condé asked Raoul in a low voice, “if the household has been selected by a person of taste, and if we’ll see any faces worth looking at?”

“I have no idea, My Lord,” replied Raoul.

“Ha! That’s hard to believe.”

“Why so, My Lord?”

“Because you’re close friends with de Guiche, one of the prince’s favourites.”

“Quite so, My Lord but as I have no interest in the subject, I never asked him about it, and since I never asked him, he never told me.”

“What about Manicamp?”

“It’s true, Manicamp’s with us at Le Havre and on the road here but I spoke to him about it no more than I did to de Guiche. Besides, why would he know? He’s not exactly a noble of the first rank.”

“Really, my dear Viscount, is that what you think?” said the prince. “In matters like this, it’s people of the second rank who are the movers and shakers. I think you’ll find that Sir de Manicamp arranged everything with de Guiche, and de Guiche got it accepted by Sir.”

“Well, My Lord, I really had no idea,” said Raoul, “and I’m grateful to Your Highness for the lesson I had the honour to receive.”

“I’m willing to believe that, incredible though it is. Anyway, it won’t be long before we find out: here comes the Flying Squadron as Queen Catherine used to call them. God! What lovely faces!”

A troop of young ladies was advancing into the hall under the direction of Madam de Navailles,* and it must be said that their appearance was a triumph for Manicamp, if in fact he deserved the credit for their selection afforded him by the Prince de Condé. Even at first glance they were a delight to those who, like Sir Prince, were connoisseurs of beauty. A young blond woman of perhaps twenty or twenty-one years of age led the way, and was the first to be introduced: “Miss Tonnay-Charente,”** announced old Madam de Navailles.

“Miss Tonnay-Charente,” repeated Sir, bowing to Madam.

“Oh ho!” said the prince, leaning toward Raoul. “She’s certainly attractive enough.”

“She is pretty, in fact,” said Raoul, “though a trifle haughty.”

“Oh, we know those country airs, Viscount; less than three months will see her tamed. But look, here’s another beauty.”

“Indeed,” said Raoul, “and a beauty I know myself.”

“Miss Aure de Montalais,” said Madam de Navailles.

Name and surname were scrupulously repeated by Sir.

“Good God!” cried Raoul, staring at the doorway into the hall, eyes wide.

“What is it?” asked the prince. “Is it Miss Aure de Montalais that makes you call on God?”

“No, My Lord, no,” replied Raoul, suddenly pale and trembling.

“If it isn’t Miss Aure de Montalais, it must be this charming blond who follows her. Lovely eyes, my faith! Too thin by half but charming!”

“Miss La Baume Le Blanc de La Vallière,” said Madam de Navailles.

As that name resounded in the depths of Raoul’s heart, he felt a clutch in his chest and a cloud rose before his eyes. For long moments he saw and heard nothing, and Sir Prince, suddenly finding himself without an audience for his commentary, left him to get a closer look at the young ladies. “Louise, here! Louise, a maid of honour to Madam!” murmured Raoul.

And his eyes, as if seeking an explanation, wandered from Louise to Montalais. The latter had already abandoned her pretended shyness, having worn a demure expression just long enough to get her through the presentation and courtesies. Miss Montalais had perched herself on a corner from which she could observe the entire company with amusement, and having spotted Raoul, she was enjoying the lovelorn cavalier’s profound astonishment at the presence of herself and her friend. Raoul tried to avoid the mutinous, mischievous, mocking looks that put him through the wringer but desperate for an explanation, he kept helplessly turning back to her. As for Louise either from timidity or some other reason Raoul could not account for, she kept her eyes downcast. Dazzled, intimidated, breathing quickly and shallowly, she withdrew as far as she could into the background, ignoring even Montalais’s insistent elbows. For Raoul, all of this was a deep mystery, the solution to which the poor viscount would have given a great deal. But no one was there to give it to him, not even Malicorne, who, anxious at finding himself among so many gentlemen of high rank, and spooked by Montalais’s mocking glances, had drifted to the outside. Making the circuit, he eventually found himself within a few steps of Sir Prince, behind the collected maids of honour and almost within the sound of Miss Aure’s voice, a planet around which, like a humble satellite, he seemed fated to orbit. Regaining his self-possession, Raoul thought he recognised some voices to his left. In fact, it was de Wardes, de Guiche, and the Knight de Lorraine, in quiet conversation, talking so low one could hardly hear the breath of their words in that vast hall. To speak quietly but clearly in this place, maintaining a posture of attention without leaning or looking toward one’s interlocutor, was a skill achieved by only the most talented of courtiers. It took some attention and study to pick out the thread of conversation between these three who otherwise appeared to be statues. In fact, in that audience before the king and queens, apparently listening raptly to Their Majesties, there were a number of such conversations surreptitiously under way in which deference and respect were not the dominant notes. But Raoul was experienced in this mode of conversation, and even when he could not quite hear the words, he could often read the meaning from the movements of their lips. “Who is this Montalais?” asked de Wardes. “What’re we to make of this La Vallière? Have the provinces come to Paris?”

“I know this Montalais,” said the Knight de Lorraine. “She’s a clever girl who will amuse the Court. La Vallière is likewise charming, though a trifle lame.”

“Ugh!” said de Wardes.

“Don’t count her out, de Wardes; there are some very spicy Latin sayings about ladies who are lame.”

“Gentlemen, Gentlemen,” said de Guiche, glancing anxiously at Raoul, “a little restraint, if you please.”

But the count’s anxiety seemed misplaced, for Raoul’s expression remained calm and indifferent, though he hadn’t missed a word of what had been said. He was recording the insolence and insults of the two provocateurs for later settlement. However, de Wardes seemed to guess his thoughts and said, “Who then are these ladies’ lovers?”

“Do you mean Montalais?” said the knight.

“Yes, Montalais – for starters.”

“Who? Why, you, me, de Guiche ... anyone!”

“And ... the other?”

“Miss La Vallière?”

“Yes.”

“Hush, Gentlemen,” hissed de Guiche to cut off the knight’s answer. “Hush, Madam is listening to us.”

Raoul thrust his clenched right hand into his doublet, where it tore at the laces of his shirt. But this casual malice toward these young women drove him to a sudden decision. “Poor Louise,” he said to himself, “has certainly come here for an honourable purpose under honourable protection – but I must know this purpose, and who protects her.”

Then imitating Malicorne’s manoeuvre, he casually sidled toward the group of maids of honour. Soon the formal presentation was complete. The king, who had never ceased looking at and admiring Madam, left the reception hall with the 2 queens. The Knight de Lorraine resumed his place beside Sir, and while in his company dripped into his ear a few drops of the poison he had brewed over the past hour while looking at the new faces at Court and suspecting that some of them might have happiness in their hearts. The king, when leaving, had been followed by some of his entourage but those of his courtiers who professed independence or cultivated gallantry remained behind and approached the young ladies. Sir Prince complimented Miss Tonnay-Charente, while Buckingham paid court to Madam de Chalais and Madam de La Fayette, ladies of whom Madam was already fond. As for the Count de Guiche, abandoning Sir until he could approach Madam alone, he was talking animatedly with Madam de Valentinóis, his sister, and Mesdemoiselles de Créquy and de Châtillon. Alone in the midst of all this political and amorous socializing was Malicorne, who wanted only to spirit Montalais away but she preferred conversing with Raoul, if only to parry his questions and savour his surprise. Raoul had gone straight to Miss La Vallière and greeted her with the most profound respect. Seeing him, Louise only blushed and stammered, so Montalais had come to her rescue. “Well!” she said. “Here we are, sir Viscount.”

"So I see," said Raoul, smiling, "and your being here is just what I'm hoping you'll explain."

Malicorne approached, wearing his most charming smile. "Not so near, Sir Malicorne," warned Montalais. "Really, you're very indiscreet."

Malicorne pursed his lips and withdrew several steps without saying a word. But his expression changed from pleasant to the mocking smile of a jester.

"You'd like an explanation, Sir Raoul?" asked Montalais.

"Yes, I think one is in order; I mean, Miss La Vallière a maid of honour to Madam!"

"And why shouldn't she, or I, be a maid of honour?" asked Montalais.

"Please accept my congratulations, Mesdemoiselles," sighed Raoul who could see he wasn't going to get a direct answer.

"That didn't sound very congratulatory, Sir Viscount," said Montalais.

"It didn't?"

"Don't you agree, my lady?" she asked Louise.

"Maybe Sir de Bragelonne thinks the appointment is a-above my condition," stammered Louise.

"Oh, not at all, Miss!" Raoul quickly replied. "You know I don't feel that way – I think you're worthy to be not just a maid of honour but a queen! I'm just surprised I didn't learn of it till today."

"True enough," said Montalais in her usual teasing tone. "You didn't know about it, and there's no reason why you should have. Sir de Bragelonne had written you four letters, Louise but there was no one in Blois to receive them but your mother, and those letters couldn't be allowed to fall into her hands, so I had them intercepted and returned to Sir Raoul. Thus, he thought you were in Blois and was unaware you were actually in Paris, rising to your new level of dignity."

"What? You didn't notify Sir Raoul as I'd asked you?" gasped Louise.

"Why would I? So he could moralize, and meddle, and ruin everything we'd worked so hard to achieve? Certainly not!"

"Am I really that bad?" asked Raoul.

"Yes," said Montalais, "and anyway, this way suited me better. I was bound for Paris, you're nowhere around and Louise wept bitterly, interpret that however you like. I asked my sponsor who'd gotten me my appointment to get one for Louise and the appointment arrived. Louise went ahead to Paris to order her new wardrobe but I stayed behind because I already had my clothes; I received your letters and had them returned to you, adding a word or two promising you a surprise. Your surprise, my dear Sir, is right here, and I think she looks fine, so ask for nothing more from me. Now come, Sir Malicorne, it's time that we left these two young people alone, as I'm sure they have a lot to say to each other. You may take my hand, Sir Malicorne, and I hope you appreciate the honour."

"One moment, Miss," said Raoul, halting the young lady in her flight, and speaking in a serious tone in sharp contrast to that of Montalais. "Your pardon but could I please know the name of this sponsor? For if this sponsor lends you his protection, as he might for many reasons" – and he bowed – "then it seems to me that Miss La Vallière should have a protector as well."

"Good Lord, Sir Raoul," Louise said naively, "that's simple enough, and I don't see why I shouldn't tell you myself; my sponsor was Sir Malicorne."

Raoul stood speechless for a moment, wondering if he were still being teased, then turned to speak to Malicorne. But he was already far away and being driven farther by Montalais. Miss La Vallière moved as if to follow her friend but Raoul restrained her with gentle authority. "A word, Louise, I beg of you," he said.

"But, Sir Raoul," said Louise, blushing, "we're alone here, everyone else is leaving. They'll be looking for me."

"Don't worry about that," said the young man, smiling. "Neither of us are so important that our absence will be noticed."

"But my duties, Sir Raoul?"

"Fear not, Miss, I know the customs of the Court; your duties don't start until tomorrow, so you have a few minutes to answer the questions I have the honour to ask you."

"Sir Raoul, you're so very serious," said Louise, agitated.

"Because the circumstances are serious, Miss. Will you listen to me?"

"I'm listening, Sir but I must repeat, we're very alone here."

"You're right," said Raoul. And offering her his hand, he led the young woman to the gallery of the reception hall, where the windows looked out over the courtyard. Everyone still in the hall was hurrying to the middle window that opened onto a balcony from which one could see the departures of those of high rank. Raoul went to one of the side windows, where it was just the two of them, and said,

"Louise, you know that since childhood I've loved you like a sister; you've been the confidante of all my sorrows and the object of all my hopes."

"Yes," she quietly replied. "Yes, Sir Raoul, I know that."

"And on your side, you've always showed me the same friendship, the same confidence. Why, in this new matter, have you not confided in me? Why have you shut me out?" La Vallière made no answer. "I thought you loved me," said Raoul, voice beginning to tremble. "I thought you agreed to all our shared plans for happiness together, the plans we made walking the trails of Cour-Cheverny and under the poplars that line the lane that leads to Blois. You have no answer, Louise?" he paused. "Can it be," he asked, nearly choking, "that you no longer love me?"

"I didn't say that," Louise replied, almost whispering.

"Oh, tell me the truth, I beg you! All the hopes I've in life are centred on you, for you've always been so true, so sweet, and so simple. Please don't be dazzled by the Court, Louise, now that you're in the middle of it, here where all purity is corrupted, and all youth succumbs to age. Cover your ears, Louise, to avoid hearing their words, close your eyes against their seductions, and close even your lips not to breathe in the corrupting air! Now without falsehood or evasion, tell me, Louise: should I believe Miss Montalais? Louise, did you come to Paris because I no longer came to Blois?" La Vallière blushed and buried her face in her hands. "That's it, isn't it?" cried Raoul, exalted. "That is why you came! Oh, I love you as I've never loved you before! Oh, thank you, Louise, for your devotion! But now that you're here, I must protect you from the shadow of insult, be your shield against all dishonour. Louise, a maid of honour to a young princess, at a Court of loose morals and inconstant love, such a maid is always a target of attacks unless she has a defence. It's an untenable position; to be respected, you must be married."

"M-married?"

"Yes."

"My God!"

"Here is my hand, Louise; take it."

"But ... your father?"

"My father allows me the freedom to make my choice."

"Even so..."

"I understand your hesitation, Louise; I'll consult my father."

"Oh, Sir Raoul, reconsider. Wait."

"Wait? Impossible. Reconsider? About you, Louise? That would be an insult to you, unbearable. I'm the master of my own fate, and my father will consent, I promise you. Take my hand now, don't make me wait, or I might think that to change your nature it took only a single step into the palace, one breath of royal favour, a single smile from the queen, or a mere glance from the king." As Raoul uttered that final word La Vallière turned as pale as death, perhaps from fear at seeing the young man so agitated. Whatever the reason, with a movement as quick as thought, she placed her 2 hands between those of Raoul. Then she turned and ran away without speaking another syllable while Raoul's whole body shuddered from the touch of her hands. He took her brief touch as an oath, a solemn oath wrung from her virginal timidity by pure love.

The Consent of Athos

Raoul left the Palais Royal with urgent intentions that called for action without delay. He went to the courtyard, mounted his horse, and took the road to Blois, while behind him the marriage of Sir and the Princess of England was celebrated with joy by the courtiers and sorrow by de Guiche and Buckingham. Raoul rode hard and arrived at Blois after eighteen hours, having spent the journey preparing his arguments. A fever is also an argument, one to which there is no reply, and Raoul had a fever. Athos was in his study adding a few pages to his memoirs<sup>80</sup> when Raoul was brought in by Grimaud. At a glance, the astute nobleman saw something extraordinary in his son's expression. "You seem to have come on a matter of great consequence," he said, embracing Raoul and then urging him toward a chair.

"Yes, sir," replied the young man, "and I beg you to listen with that kind attention which has never failed me."

"Speak, Raoul."

"Sir, with a man like you I can go straight to the facts of the matter: Miss La Vallière is now in Paris in the capacity of maid of honour to Madam. I've thought hard about this, I love Miss La Vallière above all else and it is against my principles to leave her undefended in a position where her reputation and virtue are vulnerable. I wish to marry her, sir, and I've come to ask for your consent to this marriage." Throughout this speech, Athos had maintained a cool and silent reserve. Raoul had begun his speech with cool self-possession but his emotion had risen with every word. Athos regarded Raoul with a look both profound and veiled with a certain sadness. "So, you've thought about this?" he asked.

"Yes, Sir."

"I believe you're aware of how I feel about such an alliance."

"I know, Sir," Raoul replied, very low, "but you said that if I insisted..."

"Do you insist?"

Raoul stuttered a few words in which only yes was intelligible. "In fact, Sir," continued Athos quietly, "your passion must be strong for you to persist in desiring this union despite my opposition."

Raoul passed a trembling hand across his forehead to wipe away the sweat bursting from his brow. Athos looked at him and pity filled his heart. He rose and said, "Very well, my feelings in the matter are nothing, since they differ from yours. If you want something from me, it's yours. What can I give you?"

"Your indulgence, Sir, I need no more than that," said Raoul, grasping his hands.

"You underestimate my feelings for you, Raoul," said the count. "There's more for you in my heart than mere indulgence."

Raoul lifted his hands and kissed them like the most passionate lover. "Come, come," said Athos. "Tell me, Raoul, what must I sign?"

"Oh, nothing, Sir, nothing – only, it would be good if you could take the trouble to write to the king and ask His Majesty, to whom I belong, for his permission for me to marry Miss La Vallière."

"In fact, that's a fine idea, Raoul, for after me, or even before me, you have a master in the king, and it's your loyal duty to ask permission of both these masters."

"Oh, Sir!"

"I'll accede to your request this very moment, Raoul." The count approached the window, leaned out, and called, "Grimaud!"

Grimaud's head appeared beneath an arbour of jasmine he was pruning. "My horses!" called the count.

"What does this mean, Sir?" asked Raoul.

"That we leave within two hours."

"For where?"

"For Paris."

"For Paris! Are you coming to Paris?"

"Isn't the king in Paris?"

"Certainly."

"Well, then, isn't that where we need to go? Are you befuddled?"

"But, Sir," said Raoul, overwhelmed by this paternal zeal, "wouldn't a simple letter do just as well?"

"You exaggerate my importance, Raoul; it wouldn't do for a simple gentleman like me to write a letter to the king. I should make such a request of His Majesty personally, and that's what I mean to do. We'll go together, Raoul."

"Oh, Sir! You're too kind!"

"How do things stand with His Majesty?"

"You mean, regarding me, Sir?"

"Yes."
"Oh! Very well indeed."
"You know this for a fact?"
"I heard it from his own lips."
"On what occasion?"
"Upon being commended by Sir d'Artagnan in connection with an affair in the Place de Grève when I had the honour of drawing my sword on His Majesty's behalf. I've reason to believe therefore that His Majesty thinks well of me."
"All the better!"
"But please, don't be so distant and formal with me," continued Raoul. "Don't make me regret being overcome by these powerful emotions."
"To ask me again, Raoul, is quite unnecessary. You requested my formal consent. I agreed, you have it and there's no need to speak further about it. Now, Raoul, come see my new additions to the gardens."
The young man knew that once the will of the count had been spoken, there was no arguing with it. He lowered his head and followed his father to the gardens. Athos slowly led him around, pointing out recent grafts, green shoots, and new-laid paths. Raoul found the count's calm demeanour increasingly unsettling; the love that filled his heart felt so immense that the world could hardly contain it. How could the heart of Athos be so empty and closed to it? Finally, Bragelonne, unable to contain himself any longer, burst out, "Sir, there must be some hidden reason for you to disapprove of Miss La Vallière! She's so good, so sweet, so pure that your nature, so wise and just, should appreciate her many virtues. In the name of heaven, tell me, is there between our families some secret enmity, some hereditary hatred?"
"Look, Raoul, at this beautiful bed of lilies of the valley," said Athos. "See how well the light and moisture of this spot suit it, under the shade of this sycamore, whose canopy protects it from the direct heat of the sun while allowing its warmth to pass through."
Raoul stopped, biting his lips and then feeling the blood pounding in his temples, plucked up his courage to say, "Sir, give me an explanation, I implore you. You can't possibly forget that your son is also a man."
"Then prove you're a man," said Athos, drawing himself up stiffly, "for you refuse to act like a son. I implored you to await the arrangement of an illustrious alliance; I would have found you a wife from the highest ranks of the nobility, for I wanted you to shine with the double glory of wealth and family. By your heritage you deserve no less."
"Yet, Sir," cried Raoul, carried away by a sudden pang, "the other day, I was mocked for not knowing my mother's name."
Athos turned pale; then, frowning like the God of the Old Testament, he said majestically, "I can scarcely wait to hear how you replied, Sir."
"Oh! Forgive me!" murmured the young man, plunging from outrage to agony.
"How did you reply, Sir?" asked the count, with a stamp of his foot.
"Sir, I instantly drew my sword, he who insulted me came on guard, and I flung his sword over a fence and threw him after it."
"And why didn't you kill him?"
"His Majesty forbids us to duel, Sir, and at that moment I was His Majesty's ambassador."
"Very well," said Athos, "that's just one more reason for me to talk to the king."
"What else are you going to ask of him, Sir?"
"Permission to draw my sword against he who has offended us."
"Sir, if I didn't do what I should have, forgive me, I beg of you."
"I've not blamed you for anything, Raoul."
"But this permission you want to ask of the king..."
"Raoul, I will ask His Majesty to personally sign your marriage contract."
"Sir..."
"But on one condition."
"A condition, Sir, with me? Just give me an order and I'll obey it."
"On condition," continued Athos, "that you tell me the name of he who has spoken so about your mother."
"But, Sir, why do you need to know his name? The insult was against me, and once His Majesty grants his permission, it's on me to avenge it."
"His name, Sir?"
"I won't allow you to risk yourself!"
"Do you take me for a Don Diego <sup>81</sup> who would let another avenge him? His name!"
"You demand it?"
"I ... wish it."
"The Count de Wardes."
"Ah!" said Athos serenely. "Very good; I know him. But our horses are ready, Sir, so instead of leaving in two hours, we leave immediately. To horse, Sir – to horse!"

Sir is Jealous of the Duke of Buckingham

While the Count of La Fère was on his way to Paris with Raoul, the Palais Royal was the site of a scene so comical not even Molière could have improved upon it. It was four days after the marriage. Madam had taken breakfast in her rooms, while Sir, having eaten hastily in his own, marched into his outer chambers, lips pouting, brows contracted. Sir's morning meal had not been cheerful. He'd dined with a small entourage, just the Knight de Lorraine and Manicamp sharing his breakfast that lasted three quarters of an hour without a single word spoken between them. Manicamp, less familiar with the moods of His Royal Highness than the knight, tried vainly to read the prince's looks to figure out what was making him so sullen. The Knight de Lorraine, who wondered at nothing because he knew everything, ate with the hearty appetite he had when enjoying others' sorrows, savouring both Sir's spite and Manicamp's stress. He took pleasure in keeping everyone at the table, continuing to eat though the prince was obviously impatient to be away. Sometimes Sir regretted that he'd become so close with the knight that Lorraine was exempted from all etiquette. He was having one of those regrets now but he feared the knight's temper as much as he loved his company, so he settled for silently seething. He would stare up at the ceiling, then lower his eyes to glare at the slices of pâté the knight was attacking, until eventually, not daring to say what he thought, he gestured in a pantomime of frustration that would have been the envy of Harlequin. Finally, Sir could stand it no longer, and during the fruit course he stood up angrily and went off in a huff, leaving the Knight de Lorraine to finish his breakfast however he saw fit. Manicamp, seeing Sir get up, rose awkwardly, napkin in his hand. He watched as Sir dashed rather than walked out into the antechamber, where, finding a footman, he gave him an order in a low voice. Then, turning aside so as not to go back through the breakfast room, he passed through his chambers and went out, intending to seek out the queen mother in her oratory, where she usually was at this time. It was about ten o'clock in the morning. Anne of Austria was writing when Sir entered. The queen mother was very fond of her younger son, who was sweet-faced and affectionate. Compared to the king, Sir was gentler with her, almost effeminate. He always treated his mother with those little considerations that women find endearing. Anne of Austria would have loved to have had a daughter but found in this son the attentiveness and docility of a child of twelve. Sir spent his time with his mother admiring her famously lovely arms, giving her his opinion on powder and advice on perfumes that she very much enjoyed. He kissed her hands and forehead with a charming innocence, and always had some sweetmeat to offer her and some new fashion to recommend. Anne of Austria loved the king, or rather she loved the principle of royalty her eldest son represented, the divine right of kings to rule. To the king, Anne was the queen mother – but to Philippe, she was solely a mother. And he knew that, of all shelters, the mother's bosom was the sweetest and safest. As a small child, he would take refuge there whenever storms raged between he and his brother; and after the squalling insults that constituted the crime of juvenile lèse-majesté, after the scuffles when the king and his rebellious subject fought in their night-shirts over a disputed bed with their valet La Porte* as referee, Philippe, victorious but terrified by his victory, would flee to his mother for aid, or at least the assurance of a pardon that Louis XIV grudgingly granted. Anne had succeeded, by this habit of peaceful intercession, in reconciling all her sons' disputes and at the same time sharing in all their secrets. The king, a little jealous of the maternal solicitude that favoured his brother, often behaved more submissively to Anne of Austria than was consistent with his character. Anne of Austria practiced this same policy toward Marie-Thérèse, the young queen. She reigned like a despot over the king's household and was already arranging her forces to exert a similar rule over that of her younger son. Anne of Austria was almost proud when she saw someone come to her with a long face, pale cheeks, and red eyes, aware that by lending her aid to the weakest or most rebellious members of the house, she was strengthening her own hold. She was writing in her oratory when Sir entered, not with pale cheeks or red eyes but anxious, spiteful, and irritated. He kissed his mother's hand distractedly and sat down before she gave him permission. Given the rigid etiquette enforced in Anne of Austria's presence, this lapse was clear evidence of disorder, especially in Philippe, usually so meticulous in his respectful adulation. He wouldn't violate propriety in that way without serious cause. "What's wrong, Philippe?" asked Anne of Austria, turning to her youngest son.

"Ah, Mother! So many things," murmured the prince dolefully.

"You do look like a man with many things on his mind," said the queen, putting the pen down on her writing desk. Philippe frowned but said nothing. "In all those things on your mind," said Anne of Austria, "there must be one that occupies you more than the others."

"Yes, Mother, there is indeed one thing that concerns me most of all."

"I'm listening to you."

Philippe opened his mouth to release all the grievances fighting to make their way out. But he closed his mouth again, heart full, and could only breathe a sigh. "Come, Philippe, show some resolve," said the queen mother. "When we have such complaints on our mind, there's almost always someone to complain about, isn't there?"

"I don't disagree, Mother."

"Then who do you wish to complain about? Come now, pull yourself together."

"In truth, Mother, what I have to say is very confidential."

"Really? My God!"

"Yes, because it involves a woman..."

"Oh? You wish to speak about Madam Henrietta?" asked the queen mother with eager curiosity.

"About Madam?"

"About your wife, in fact."

"Yes. Yes, that's it."

"Well! If it's about Madam that you wish to speak to me, my son, don't be embarrassed. I'm your mother, and next to that Madam is to me little more than a stranger. However, as she is my daughter-in-law, I'm obliged to listen with interest for your sake – so tell me all."

"In that case, Mother, admit that you've ... noticed something," said Philippe.

"Noticed something? That's scary but vague. What kind of something?"

"Madam is pretty, I think."

"Indeed."

"But not quite a beauty."

"No but she's still maturing, and has time yet to bloom. You've already seen what a change a few years have made in her looks. Well, she will bloom – she's only sixteen. Why, at fifteen I myself was somewhat too slender but Madam is already rather pretty."

"Which means she attracts attention."

"Quite so, a pretty woman is always noticed, the more so when she's a princess."

"She was brought up well, wasn't she?"

"Her mother, Queen Henriette, is a trifle cold and pretentious but her heart is in the right place. The young princess's education may have been somewhat neglected but her principles seem proper enough. That at least was my opinion of her during her sojourn in France; I don't know what might have happened since her return to England."

"What could have happened?"

"Who can say? But some heads, if they're frivolous, are easily turned by sudden prosperity."

"That's the word exactly, Mother. Frivolous! That sums her up."

"It's not that simple, Philippe. She has wit, and a certain coquettishness quite natural in a pretty woman – and in a young lady of rank at Court, that flaw becomes an advantage. A charming young princess usually gathers a brilliant crowd around her; her smile excites dash and rivalry among the ardent cavaliers, and the nobles will fight with fervour for a prince who has a pretty wife."

"Oh, a thousand thanks, Mother!" Philippe said tartly. "You paint a pretty picture – I think not!"

"How so?" asked the queen with pretended naïveté.

"You know, Mother, how reluctant I was to marry," said Philippe. "And now..."

"Ah, you begin to alarm me. Do you have a serious grievance against Madam?"

"I wouldn't say ... serious."

"Then put aside this long face. If you go around your house looking like this, people will take you for an unhappy husband."

"In fact," replied Philippe, "I am an unhappy husband, and I don't care who knows it."

"Philippe! Philippe!"

"Faith, Mother, to be quite honest, I don't understand this new life and how I'm supposed to live it."

"Explain yourself."

"My wife doesn't seem to belong to me, she's always somewhere else. In the morning there are callers, clothiers, correspondence, in the evening it's off to dances, and concerts."

"Philippe! You're jealous!"

"Me? God forbid! I'll leave the stupid role of jealous husband to others. But I'm ... vexed."

"Philippe, you can't reproach a wife for such innocent behaviours as those. If that's all you have to complain about..."

"But listen, a wife, however innocent, can still make one anxious. There are certain visitors, over-frequent and over-familiar who can make even the least jealous husband apprehensive."

"Ah, now we're getting to it. Over-frequent and over-familiar, is it? It took you half an hour but at last you've come to the point."

"Well ... yes."

"This might be serious. So, you think Madam might be giving you cause to worry about her behaviour?"

"Precisely."

"Really? After only four days of marriage, you think your wife might be straying on you? Take care not to exaggerate, Philippe – you can't accuse a person of something if you can prove nothing."

The prince, abashed by his mother's serious tone, tried to reply but just stammered a few disconnected syllables. "You have nothing to say," said Anne of Austria. "Because there's nothing to it."

"Not so!" cried Philippe. "There is something, and I'll prove it. I said too frequent, didn't I? And too familiar? Well, listen."

Anne of Austria prepared herself to hear the kind of juicy gossip that every woman, even a mother and a queen, is eager to savour, especially if it's about the dependents in her household. "All right!" said Philippe. "First of all, explain one thing to me."

"What?"

"Why does my wife still maintain an English entourage? Eh?"

Philippe crossed his arms and regarded his mother with an air of triumph, as if she couldn't possibly have a response to this complaint. "But that's quite simple," said Anne of Austria. "The English are her compatriots, they spent a great deal of money to escort her to France, and it would be impolite, not to mention impolitic, to abruptly dismiss noblemen who haven't stinted at any devotion or sacrifice."

"Right, Mother, some sacrifice to leave behind an ugly land and come to this beautiful country where you can get more and better for a single crown than you can get anywhere else for four. And as for devotion, why not travel a hundred leagues with a woman you love?"

"Love, Philippe, really? Do you know what you're saying!"

"Yes, good Lord!"

"And who is in love with Madam?"

"That too-handsome Duke of Buckingham. Are you going to defend him, Mother?"

Anne of Austria simultaneously smiled and blushed. The name Buckingham stirred up memories both sweet and sad. "The Duke of Buckingham?" she whispered.

"Yes, one of those boudoir knights, as my grandfather Henri IV used to call them."

"The Buckinghams are loyal and brave," said Anne of Austria stoutly.

"Oh, this is too much! My mother takes the side of my wife's lover against me!" cried Philippe, voice breaking and eyes filling with tears.

"Son! Oh! Son!" cried Anne of Austria. "Such talk is unworthy of you! Your wife has no lover, and even if she did, it wouldn't be Sir de Buckingham – the men of his blood are loyal and discreet, I tell you. Hospitality is sacred to them!"

"Really, Mother?" sniffed Philippe. "Sir de Buckingham is an Englishman. Are the English really that respectful of the marital rights of French princes?"

Anne blushed again, this time to her hairline. She turned aside as if to pick up her pen from her writing desk but really to conceal her colour from the eyes of her son. "Truly, Philippe," she said, "you know too well how to find words that disturb me – but your anger blinds you as much as it alarms me. Take a breath and consider!"

"Mother, I don't need to consider – I see."

"And what do you see?"

"I see that Sir de Buckingham never leaves my wife's side. He dares to give her gifts, and she dares to accept them. Yesterday she mentioned violet sachets; our French perfumers can't get them, as you know so well, Mother, who've asked for them so many times in vain. Our perfumers can't reproduce that scent. Well! The duke was wearing just such a violet sachet, and shortly thereafter my wife was wearing it."

"Really, Sir," said Anne of Austria, "you're building pyramids out of pebbles; take care. What harm, I ask you, is there in passing along a perfume to a fellow compatriot? These strange suspicions remind me all too much of your father, who made me suffer so unjustly."

"Sir de Buckingham's father was probably more discreet and respectful than his son," said Philippe, unaware how his words lanced his mother's heart.

The queen turned pale and pressed a hand to her bosom but recovering quickly she said, "Well, do you intend to do anything about it?"

"Absolutely."

"Tell me your intentions."

"I intend to complain loudly about it, Mom. I tell you, I'll endure nothing from this Sir de Buckingham."

"You will endure nothing?"

"Nothing."

"What will you do?"

"I will complain to the king."

"And do you expect the king to respond?"

"If he does not," said Sir, with a fierce expression at odds with the usual softness of his features, "well, I will see justice done myself!"

"What justice would that be?" asked Anne of Austria with an edge of alarm.

"I would have Sir de Buckingham leave Madam; in fact, I would have Sir de Buckingham leave France; and I will inform him that such is my will."

"You will do no such thing, Philippe," said the queen. "If you do, and thereby violate our royal hospitality, I'll see to it that the king treats you most severely."

"You threaten me, my own mother!" cried Philippe, tears starting from his eyes. "You threaten me if I complain!"

"I don't oppose you, I oppose your anger. I tell you that to take such steps against Sir de Buckingham, or against any Englishman, even in a personal matter, will drag France and England into a painful clash. What! Is a Prince of France, the brother to the king, unable to ignore a slight, or even an insult, in the face of political necessity? For shame."

Philippe shrugged sullenly. "Besides," continued the queen, "this imagined insult isn't true or even possible, it's just ridiculous jealousy."

"I know what I know."

"Whatever you think you know, I must urge you to patience."

"I'm not a patient man, Mother."

The queen rose with stiff hauteur. "Then explain your demands."

"I make no demands, Mother but I do have desires. If Sir de Buckingham will not, of his own accord, stay away from my house, I will forbid his admittance."

"This is a matter we will refer to the king," said Anne of Austria, her voice nearly choking as her heart swelled within her.

"Please," cried Philippe, clasping his hands before her, "as your son, I beg you, act as my mother and not as a queen. I can settle this business between myself and Sir de Buckingham with a few brief words."

"It is exactly those words that I forbid you to say, Sir," said the queen, recovering her authority. "It's beneath you."

"So be it, then! Instead of talking to him, I'll talk to Madam."

"Never," said Anne of Austria, the past rising before her eyes. "Never tyrannize your wife, my son. Never command her from on high; a wife conquered in that way is never convinced."

"Then what am I to do? I'll have to ask my friends."

"Your council of hypocrites, with your Knight de Lorraine and your de Wardes? Leave this to me, Philippe. You want the Duke of Buckingham to go away, isn't that so?"

"As soon as possible, Mom."

"Well, then! Send the duke to me, my son. But do it smiling, and say nothing to your wife, to the king, or to your so-called friends. In this matter, listen only to me. Alas! I know what happens to a household when it's troubled by false advisors."

"I will obey, Mother."

"And you'll be glad you did, Philippe. Find me the duke."

"Oh, that won't be hard!"

"Where do you think he is?"

"At Madam's door, of course, waiting to attend her morning lever."

"Very well," said Anne of Austria calmly. "Please tell the duke that I beg him to come and see me." Philippe kissed his mother's hand and went to find the Duke of Buckingham.

Forever!

Lord Buckingham, at the invitation of the queen mother, presented himself at her chambers a half an hour after the departure of the Duke of Orléans. When his name was announced by the footman, the queen, who'd been leaning on her table, head in her hands, arose and received the duke's gracious and respectful greeting with a smile. Anne of Austria was still beautiful. It's well known that even at her age, now somewhat advanced, her long ashen hair, lovely hands, and rosy lips were still admired by all who saw her. At that moment, enlivened by past memories that warmed her heart, she was as beautiful as in the days of her youth, when her palace had welcomed the young and passionate father of this later Buckingham, that ill-fated father who had lived for this queen and had died whispering her name. Now Anne of Austria favoured Buckingham with so tender a look one could detect in it both the pleasure of maternal affection and something of the sweet coquetry of a lover.

“Your Majesty wished to speak with me?” asked Buckingham with respect.

“Yes, Duke,” replied the queen in English. “Please take a seat.”

This favour granted to the young man by Anne of Austria, as well as the compliment of addressing him in the language of his country that the duke had scarcely heard since he’d been in France, moved him to his soul. He immediately guessed that the queen had something to ask of him. After reverting for a moment to the oppression she’d felt earlier, the queen resumed her smiling demeanour. “Sir,” she said in French, “how are you finding your stay in France?”

“Have you been here before?”

“Once before, yes, Madam.”

“But, like any good Englishman, you prefer England?”

“I prefer my country to France,” said the duke, “but if Your Majesty asked me if I’d rather be in London or Paris, I would have to say Paris.”

Anne of Austria noted the emotion with which these words were spoken. She said, “I’m told, Milord, that you’ve a beautiful estate and live in a rich and ancient palace.”

“The palace of my father,” said Buckingham, nodding and looking down.

“A place to treasure, and a home of precious memories,” replied the queen, touching, despite herself, on memories of her own that were no less precious.

“In fact,” said the duke, falling under the influence of this melancholy reminiscence, “people of the heart live as much in a reverie of the past as in a dream of the future.”

“That’s true,” said the queen in a low voice. “So, it follows that you, Milord, who are a man of the heart, must soon leave France and return home to your reveries and your relics.”

Buckingham raised his head. “I think not, Madam,” he said.

“How’s that?”

“I think, on the contrary, that I will leave England and come to live in France.”

It was Anne of Austria’s turn to be astonished. “What!” she said. “Are you out of favour with your new king?”

“On the contrary, Madam, His Majesty showers me with benevolence.”

“You can’t have run out of money,” said the queen. “You’re said to have a considerable fortune.”

“My finances, Madam, have never been healthier.”

“Is there some secret reason then?”

“No, Madam,” said Buckingham, too quickly, “there’s no secret about the reasons for my decision. I’ve loved my time in France, I adore a court ruled by elegance and etiquette, and enjoy these French pleasures that aren’t pursued as seriously in my country.”

Anne of Austria smiled slyly. “Serious pleasures! Have you considered, Sir Buckingham, just how serious they really are?”

The duke stammered something senseless. “Is there no pleasure so serious,” continued the queen, “that it would prevent a man of your rank…”

“Madam!” interrupted the duke. “It seems to me Your Majesty makes too much of this.”

“Do you think so, Duke?”

“If Your Majesty doesn’t mind my saying so, it’s strange to extol the attractions of living in England to anyone who has experienced the charms of France.”

Anne of Austria approached the young man, placed her beautiful hand on his shoulder that trembled at her touch, and said, “Milord, believe me, nothing is worth the abandonment of one’s country of birth. Time and again I have regretted leaving Spain. I have lived a long life, for a woman, and I must confess that not a year has passed in which I haven’t missed Spain.”

“Not even one, Madam?” said the duke stiffly. “Not even those years when you reigned as Queen of Beauty, as you still do?”

“Ah, spare me the flattery, Duke. A woman my age could almost … be your mother.”

She said this in a tone so sweet it touched Buckingham’s heart. “Yes,” she went on, “I could almost be your mother, so I will give you some maternal advice.”

“To advise me to go back to London?” he cried.

“Yes, Milord,” she said.

The duke gasped and clutched his hands to his chest, a gesture that couldn’t fail to move this woman, already inclined toward tender feelings by precious memories. “That’s how it is,” she said.

“What?” he cried. “How can this be? Are you really telling me that I must go, I must exile myself, cut and run?”

“Can you call it exile, Milord? One would think that you considered France your native country.”

“Madam, the country of those who love is the country of those whom they love.”

“Not one more word, Milord!” said the queen. “You forget to whom you are speaking!”

Buckingham fell to his knees. “Madam, Madam, you are the wellspring of wisdom, of kindness, and of clemency. You are not only the first in this kingdom by rank but by those divine qualities I spoke of, the first lady in the world. I’ve said nothing, Madam, nothing that deserved so cruel a response. How have I betrayed you?”

“You have betrayed yourself,” said the queen in a low voice.

“I? I’ve said nothing! I’ve done nothing!”

“You forget that you’ve thought and spoken in the presence of a woman and more than that…”

“There need be no more!” he interrupted. “No one knows what I’ve spoken of with you.”

“On the contrary, Duke, the matter is known. Such are the flaws and qualities of youth.”

“I must have been betrayed! Denounced!”

“By whom?”

“By those who’d the infernal perception to read my heart like a book as early as at Le Havre!”

“I don’t know who you mean by that.”

“Sir de Bragelonne, for one.”

“I’ve heard the name but don’t know who it belongs to. No, it wasn’t Sir de Bragelonne.”

“But who then, who? Oh, Madam, if someone had the insolence to see in me what I do not wish to be seen…”

“What would you do, Milord?”

“There are secrets that kill those who discover them.”

“He who’s discovered your secret, young fool that you’re, is one who cannot be killed by it, and you cannot touch him, for he is within his rights. He’s a husband, a jealous husband, and the second man in all France, for he is my son, the Duke of Orléans.”

The duke paled. “Ah but you are cruel, Madam!” he said.

“You must see, Buckingham,” said Anne of Austria sadly, “that you’ve set yourself up to fight with the clouds when it would be so much easier to turn aside and be at peace.”

“But if it is war, then I will die on the battlefield,” said the young man gently, his face full of sadness and pain.

Anne reached out to him and took his hand. “Villiers, what is it you’re asking?” she said in English, with a vehemence that could not be denied. “Do you ask a mother to sacrifice her son? A queen to dishonour her house? Are you child enough to ask me that? To commit those crimes to spare you some tears, Villiers? You spoke of one who is dead but he, at least, was respectful and honourable. If he accepted exile and despair, he did so with a full heart because the order came from his beloved, and death, when it arrived, was a promise of peace that came as a gift or a favour.”

Buckingham rose with a grimace, hands over his heart. “You are right, Madam,” he said, “but the one you speak of had received the order from the mouth of his beloved. He was not expelled, he was asked to leave, and no one mocked him for it.”

“I remember,” whispered Anne of Austria. “But who says you are expelled or exiled? Who says that no one will remember your devotion? I speak on no one’s behalf but mine, Villiers, when I say, ‘Depart!’ Render me this service, grant me this grace, and allow me to owe one more debt to a man of your name.”

“It would be for you, Madam?”

“For me alone.”

“I won’t leave behind a man who laughs at me, or a prince who says, ‘I demanded it.’”

“Duke, listen to me.” And here the august features of the aging queen assumed a solemn expression. “I swear that here no one commands but I, and I swear to you that not only will no one laugh or brag, no one will fail to pay you the respect your rank deserves. Count on me, Duke, as I am counting on you.”

“But you don’t tell me why, Madam, and I’m left angry and in despair. The consolation you offer, sweet and compelling though it may be, isn’t enough.”

“Dear friend,” the queen replied with a gentle smile, “did you know your mother?”

“Alas! Very little, Madam, only as a noble lady who covered me with kisses and tears when I cried.”

“Oh, Villiers!” murmured the queen, putting her arm across the young man’s shoulder. “I am a mother to you, and believe me, no one will ever make my son cry.”

“Thank you, Madam, thank you,” said the young man, softened and suffocated by emotion. “It seems there was still room in my heart for a sweeter and nobler feeling than love.”

The queen mother looked tenderly at him and stroked his hand. “Go,” she said.

“When must I go? Command me!”

“The choice of time is yours, Milord,” the queen replied. “You will go but at the proper moment. So, instead of leaving today, as you might wish, or tomorrow morning, as might be expected, leave tomorrow evening – but announce your departure today as your own will.”

“My… will?” whispered the young man.

“Yes, Duke.”

“And… am I never to return to France?”

Anne of Austria thought for a moment, gravely and sadly. “It would mean much to me,” she said, “if you returned on the day I go to my eternal rest in Saint-Denis at the side of my husband, the king.”

“Who made you suffer so!” said Buckingham.

“Who was the King of France,” replied the queen.

“Madam, you are goodness itself, you live in prosperity and joy, and there are still many years ahead of you.”

“Well! Then it might be a while until your return,” said the queen, trying to smile.

“I will not return, young though I am,” said Buckingham sadly.

“Oh but God’s mercy …!”

“Death, Madam, is impartial, and pays no attention to age. Some live to old age but others die young.”

“None of these dark thoughts, Duke. Come, I’ll cheer you up – return in two years! I can tell from your features that the feelings that weigh you down today will be gone inside of six months. By the time of your return, they will be long forgotten.”

“I think, Madam, that you judged me better before when you said that the house of Buckingham was a house of dreams and reveries.”

“Hush! Oh, hush!” said the queen, kissing the duke on the forehead with a tenderness she couldn’t suppress. “Go! Go now, before you forget yourself further! I am the Queen of France, you are the subject of the King of England, and King Charles awaits you. Farewell, Villiers!” and she added in English, “Villiers, farewell. “

“Forever!” the young man replied.

And he fled, choking back tears. Anne rested her head in her hands and then looked at her reflection in a mirror. “All in vain,” she murmured. “A woman who’s been in love’s always in some corner of her heart just twenty years old.”

His Majesty Louis XIV Finds Miss La Vallière neither Rich Enough nor Pretty Enough for a Gentleman of the Rank of the Viscount of Bragelonne

Raoul and the Count of La Fère arrived in Paris on the evening of the day in which Buckingham had had his interview with the queen mother. As soon as he arrived, the count sent Raoul to request an audience with the king. The king had spent part of the day with Madam and the ladies of the Court admiring a shipment of fine Lyon fabric which he had presented to his sister-in-law. That was followed by dinner with the Court and then play at the tables, the king, as usual, leaving the game at eight o'clock to withdraw to his study to work with Sir Colbert and Sir Fouquet. Raoul entered the antechamber just as the two ministers went out, and the king saw him through the half-opened door. "What do you want, Sir de Bragelonne?" he asked.

The young man approached. "An audience, Sire, for the Count of La Fère," he replied, "who has come from Blois with a strong desire to speak to Your Majesty."

"The card games are over, and I have an hour until supper," said the king. "Is Sir de La Fère ready?"

"Sir Count is below, awaiting Your Majesty's orders."

"Send him up."

Five minutes later, the count was in the presence of Louis XIV welcomed by the monarch with that gracious benevolence that Louis with tact beyond his age, reserved for men who could not be won over with simple favours. "I hope you've come to ask me for something, Count," the king said.

"I won't hide it from Your Majesty," replied the count. "I do indeed come with a request."

"Let's hear it!" encouraged the king.

"It isn't anything for me, Sire."

"Too bad! But if I can't do something for you, Count, maybe I can for your protégé."

"Your Majesty gladdens me. As it happens, I do come to speak to the king on the behalf of the Viscount of Bragelonne."

"In that case, Count, it's the same as speaking for yourself."

"Not quite, Sire. What I hope to obtain from Your Majesty is of no use to myself. The viscount thinks of marrying."

"He's young for that but no matter. He's a man of distinction, and I'll find him a wife to match."

"He has found one on his own, Sire, and seeks only Your Majesty's consent."

"Ah! It's only a matter of approving a marriage contract?"

Athos bowed. "And has he chosen a fiancée whose wealth and quality suits you?"

Athos hesitated a moment. "The fiancée is noble enough," he said, "but not wealthy."

"That's an illness for which we have the cure."

"Your Majesty overwhelms me with gratitude – but perhaps he will allow me to make an observation."

"Do, Count."

"Your Majesty proposes to grant this young woman a dowry?"

"Yes, certainly."

"And my visit to the Louvre would be responsible for that? That, Sire, I would regret."

"No false delicacy, Count. What is the fiancée's name?"

"It is," said Athos coolly, "Miss La Vallière de La Baume Le Blanc."

"Ah," said the king, searching his memory. "I know that name; there's a Marquis of La Vallière."

"Yes, Sire. This is his daughter."

"He's dead?"

"Yes, Sire."

"And his widow remarried Sir de Saint-Rémy, major-domo to the Dowager Madam?"

"Your Majesty is well informed."

"Just so. And I now recall that the young lady is one of the new maids of honour to Madam the Younger."

"Your Majesty knows these matters better than I do myself."

The king considered, giving Athos's anxious face a sidelong glance. "Count," he said, "she's not very pretty, this young lady as I recall?"

"I couldn't say," replied Athos.

"I can, for I saw her, and I wasn't struck by her beauty."

"If not a beauty, Sire, she has a gentle and modest demeanour."

"Lovely blond hair, though."

"Yes."

"And pretty blue eyes."

"Quite so."

"In terms of beauty, then, the match is average. Let's move on to money."

"The dowry is fifteen to twenty thousand livres at the most – but the lovers are indifferent to that. I, myself, care little for money."

"In excess, you mean; a certain amount is a necessity. A lady can't live at Court on fifteen thousand livres without additional rent from an estate. I'll take care of that; I want to do it for Bragelonne."

Athos bowed again but with, the king noted, a certain coldness. "Let's move on from money to rank," said Louis XIV. "Daughter of the Marquis de La Vallière, that's all very well – but the connection to our worthy Saint-Rémy is unfortunate. I won't say it ruins the young woman, exactly but I know that you, Count, take pride in your house."

"I, Sire, have pride in nothing but my devotion to Your Majesty."

The king paused once more. "You know, sir," he said, "The course of this conversation has surprised me. You come for my approval for a marriage but seem not to approve of it yourself. Now, now I'm rarely wrong about such things, young as I'm for though I may often choose friendship over wisdom, my innate scepticism enables me to see things clearly. So, I repeat, you don't approve of your request."

"Well, Sire – you're right."

"Then what's the problem? Refuse them."

"No, Sire. I love Bragelonne with all my heart, and he is in love with Miss La Vallière. He's built castles in the air, and I'm not one to crush the illusions of youth. This marriage does displease me but I implore Your Majesty to approve it at once and ensure Raoul's happiness."

"Come, Count. Does she love him?"

"If Your Majesty requires me to speak frankly, I don't trust the love of Miss La Vallière. She's young, almost a child, dazzled by the Court, and I feel the honour of her service to Madam will turn her head and overcome the tenderness in her heart, and then their marriage will be typical of those Your Majesty sees at Court. But Bragelonne wishes it, and so be it."

"And yet you don't seem like one of those indulgent fathers who is a slave to his children," said the king.

"Sire, I have an iron will to resist the wicked but none to defy those I love. Raoul suffers and grieves; his thoughts, usually so light, have become heavy and dark. I don't want to deprive Your Majesty of the future services he can render the crown."

"I understand your mind," said the king, "and above all I understand your heart."

"In that case," the count replied, "I need not explain to Your Majesty that above all I desire the happiness of these children, or rather of this child."

"And like you, I desire Sir de Bragelonne's happiness."

"Then we needn't wait for Your Majesty's signature. Raoul will have the honour to appear before you and receive your immediate consent."

"You're mistaken, Count," the king said firmly. "I told you that I desire the viscount's happiness – so I'm opposed to his marriage at this time."

"But, Sire," cried Athos, "Your Majesty promised me..."

"No, Count, I made no such promise, because it's not what I want."

"I understand that Your Majesty intends to be considerate of my desires but I take the liberty of reminding you that I came here as an ambassador for another."

"An ambassador, Count, doesn't always get what he came to request."

"Ah, Sire! What a blow to Bragelonne!"

"I'll take it from here. Let me speak to the viscount."

"Love, Sire, is an irresistible force."

"Sometimes, Count, it is resisted, I can assure you."

"When one has the soul of a king – your soul, Sire."

"Don't give it another thought. I have plans for Bragelonne; I don't say that he won't marry Miss La Vallière but I don't want him to marry quite so young. I don't want him to marry a spouse without fortune, and he, for his part, deserves to earn my good graces, and I intend to see he gets them. In short, I want him to wait."

"Sire, once again..."

"Sir Count, you have come, you say, to ask me a favour?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Well! Grant me one instead, and let's speak of this no more. It's possible that before long I'll go to war, and I'll need free gentlemen around me. I hesitate to send in front of the bullets and cannon balls the father of a family. And for Bragelonne's sake, I would also hesitate to endow an unknown girl without good reason, as it would sow jealousy among the nobility."

Athos bowed and made no reply.

"Is that everything you needed to ask me?" added Louis XIV.

"Absolutely everything, Sire, and I take my leave of Your Majesty. But must I inform Raoul?"

"Spare yourself that care and vexation. Tell the viscount that I will speak to him tomorrow at my lever. As for tonight, Count, join me at the card table."

"Alas, I am in travelling clothes, Sire."

"I hope the day will come when you will not leave me. Before long, Count, the monarchy will be housed in such a way as to offer a dignified hospitality to men of your merit."

"Sire, if a king is great in the hearts of his subjects, it matters not if he lives in a palace, for he's worshiped as if in a temple."

And with these words, Athos withdrew to the antechamber, where he found Bragelonne waiting for him. "Well, Sir?" said the young man.

"Raoul, the king favours us, perhaps not in the way you hope but he means well to our house."

"You have bad news, Sir," said the young man, turning pale.

"The king will tell you in the morning that it is not bad news."

"But Sir, do you mean the king hasn't signed the proposal?"

"The king wants to write your marriage contract himself, and he wants to make the terms so good that it will take time to get it right. Mistrust your own impatience before you doubt the king's goodwill."

Raoul, who knew the count's frankness but was wary of his diplomatic eloquence, stood blinking, plunged into dark dismay. "Will you come home with me?" said Athos.

"Forgive me, Sir, I'm c-coming," he stammered.
And he followed Athos down the stairs. "Oh, while I'm here," Athos said suddenly, "could we stop and see Sir d'Artagnan?"
"Shall I lead you to his rooms?" said Bragelonne.
"Yes, absolutely."
"Then we need to take the other stairs," Raoul said, changing their direction. But when they arrived on the landing of the grand gallery, he met a footman in the livery of the Count de Guiche hurrying toward him. "What is it?" said Raoul.
"This note, Sir. The count heard you were back and wrote to you at once; I've been looking for you for an hour."
Raoul turned toward Athos before opening the envelope. "If I may, sir?"
"Go ahead." The Count de Guiche wrote:
Dear Raoul,
I've an important affair that demands urgent attention. I know you're back; come quickly.
He had scarcely finished reading it when a valet in the livery of the Duke of Buckingham appeared on the gallery and recognising him, approached respectfully. "On the behalf of Milord Duke," he said.
"Ah!" said Athos. "I see that you're as busy as a General of the Army. I'll leave you to it and find d'Artagnan on my own."
"Please excuse me," said Raoul.
"Yes, yes, you're excused. Farewell, Raoul; you'll find me at my lodgings until mid-morning tomorrow, after which I intend to leave for Blois, unless something interferes."
"Sir, I'll pay my respects to you in the morning." Athos left and Raoul opened Buckingham's letter. It read:
Sir Bragelonne, of all the Frenchmen I've met, I'm best pleased with you and now I must call upon your friendship. I've received a certain note and though it's written in good French, I'm an Englishman and fear I may misunderstand it. The only part I'm sure of is that it's signed by a good name. As I hear you've arrived from Blois, would you be so kind as to call upon me?
Your devoted etc.
Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.
"I'll find your master," Raoul said to de Guiche's footman, dismissing him. "And within the hour I'll call upon Sir de Buckingham," he added to the duke's messenger, dismissing him as well.

An Invitation to Cross Swords in the Surf

Raoul, when he arrived at de Guiche's rooms, found him conversing with de Wardes and Manicamp. De Wardes, since the incident at the fence, had treated Raoul as a stranger. It didn't seem as if there'd been a break between them, they just acted as if they didn't know each other. Raoul entered and de Guiche came to meet him. Raoul, while shaking his friend's hand, glanced at the other two young men, hoping to read on their faces what was moving their minds. De Wardes was cold and impenetrable; Manicamp seemed absorbed in adjusting his suit's lace trim. De Guiche took Raoul into a dressing room and bade him sit down. "You look well," he said to him.
"That's odd," replied Raoul, "because I certainly don't feel well."
"It's the same as with me, isn't it? Love goes wrong."
"All the better for your sake, Count. For you, I think good news in love would be the worst news of all."
"Don't worry, then, because not only am I miserable, I'm surrounded by people who are happy."
"Now you've lost me," said Raoul. "Explain, my friend, explain."
"I will, and then you'll understand. I've fought in vain against that feeling you saw born in me; it's grown to take complete hold of me, against all my wisdom and will. I've measured this misfortune, I know it for an abyss but it's my fate and I'll follow it through."
"Madman! One step over that edge and today it's your ruin, tomorrow maybe your death."
"Then so be it!"
"De Guiche!"
"I tell you, I've thought about this until I can think no more."
"And do you believe that if you tell her everything that Madam will love you?"
"I believe nothing, Raoul, I merely hope, because hope is the heart of man, and lives in him till he dies."
"But that happiness you grasp for, if you gained it, you'd be lost."
"Don't try to stop me, Raoul, I beg you. I tell you right out you can't convince me because I refuse to be convinced. I've suffered so much I'm past the point of no return, and even death would feel like a blessing. Not only do I love to delirium, I'm jealous to mad fury."
Raoul thumped his fist into his hand in a gesture that looked, at long last, like anger. "Great," he said.
"Great or terrible, it hardly matters. Here's what I ask of you, my friend, my brother. For the last three days Madam has been giddy with happiness. The first day I could scarcely look at her, I hated her so for not being as unhappy as I. The second day I couldn't look away, and on her side, Raoul, I thought I saw that she looked on me, if not with pity, then at least with some tenderness. But between her gaze and mine there arose a shadow as another's smile drew a smile from her. Always beside her horse was a horse that wasn't mine, always her ear turned toward a caressing voice that was not my own. Raoul, for three days my head has been on fire, my veins have run with flame. This shadow, I must banish it; that smile, I must smash it; that voice, I must strangle it."
"You want to kill Sir?" Raoul cried.
"What? No! I'm not jealous of Sir, not jealous of the husband. I'm jealous of the lover."
"Of the lover?"
"You mean you haven't noticed him here when he was so apparent to you before?"
"You're jealous of Sir de Buckingham?"
"Unto death!"
"Again? Or is it still?"
"Oh, this time we'll settle it properly! I took the initiative and sent him a challenge."
"Wait, you're the one who wrote to him?"
"How do you know about it?"
"I know because he told me. Here."
And he handed de Guiche the note he had received at the same time as his friend's. De Guiche read it eagerly. "He's a brave man, and more than that, a gallant man," he said.
"Of course, the duke is a gallant man, and I don't need to ask if your challenge was equally gallant."
"He'll show you my letter when you call on him on my behalf."
"But that's impossible."
"What is?"
"For me to call on him for you."
"Why?"
"Because both you and the duke summon me."
"Oh, I assume you'll give me the preference! Now listen, here's what I want you to tell His Grace, it's very simple: just pick a day, today, tomorrow, the day after, whatever suits him, and meet me at Vincennes."
"Think about this."
"I thought I told you I was done thinking."
"The duke is a foreign envoy here on a mission, he's untouchable ... and Vincennes is dangerously close to the Bastille."
"The consequences are my business."
"But the pretext for this meeting? What reason do you want me to give him?"
"He'll ask for no reason, trust me. The duke must be as sick of me as I am of him, must hate as much as I hate. I beg you to do this for me and if I've to beg him to accept my challenge, then I'll beg."
"This is pointless. Look, the duke said he wanted to speak to me. He's in the king's gaming party; come along with me. I'll talk to him in the gallery while you hang back. Two words are all it will take."
"Good, fine. I'm going to bring de Wardes along as support."
"Why not Manicamp? We can always call de Wardes if we need him, leave him here."
"True but I'd rather not."
"He knows nothing of this?"
"Absolutely nothing! ... You're so cold to him these days."
"Has he told you why?"
"No."
"I don't like that man and I never have so I'm no colder to him today than I was yesterday."
"Let's go then."
All 4 went down to the courtyard. De Guiche's carriage was waiting at the door to take them to the Palais Royal. On the way, Raoul was thinking furiously. Privy to both parties' secrets, he still hoped to find a way to reconcile them. He knew his influence with Buckingham and his sway over de Guiche so he was not ready to despair. Arriving in the gallery, resplendent with wax lights, where the most beautiful and illustrious ladies of the court were orbiting like stars through a sky of flame, Raoul couldn't help but forget de Guiche for a moment when he saw Louise, who stood, amid the other maids of honour, staring at the royal circle that was dazzling with diamonds and gold. The king was the only man who was seated, the other cavaliers were standing. Among them Raoul saw Buckingham. He was ten paces from Sir among a group of French and Englishmen admiring the duke's hauteur and the incomparable magnificence of his clothing. Some of the older courtiers remembered having seen his father, and their recollections did no harm to the son. Buckingham was conversing with Fouquet, who was speaking loudly of Belle-Île. "I couldn't possibly interrupt them," said Raoul.
"Wait and choose your moment but don't wait too long," said de Guiche. "I burn!"
"Ah, here comes our saviour," said Raoul, seeing d'Artagnan, who, resplendent in his new uniform as Captain of the Musketeers, had just made a triumphal entry into the gallery. He went straight to d'Artagnan. "The Count of La Fère was looking for you," Raoul said.
"Yes, I just left him," d'Artagnan replied.
"I expected you to spend most of the evening together."
"We've arranged to meet again."
While answering Raoul, d'Artagnan was looking right and left, preoccupied, scanning the crowd in the gallery for someone or something. Suddenly his eye fixed like that of an eagle spotting its prey. Raoul followed his look, and though he saw de Guiche and d'Artagnan nod to each other, he could not discern the target of the proud captain's piercing gaze. "Sir Knight," said Raoul, "there's a service that only you can render me."
"What would that be, my dear Viscount?"
"I need to say a couple of words to Sir de Buckingham but as he's speaking with Sir Fouquet, I'm not the person to interrupt them."
"Ah, Sir Fouquet is here?" asked d'Artagnan.

“Yes, do you see him? There.”
“Faith, so I do! And you think I carry more weight than you?”
“You’re a man of importance!”
“Why, so I am – I’m captain of the musketeers. I was promised the rank for so long, and have had it so briefly, that I quite forgot my dignity.”
“You’ll do this for me, won’t you?”
“Sir Fouquet, devil!”
“Do you have an issue with him?”
“No, he’s more likely to have an issue with me. But still, it has to be done one day or another...”
“There, I think he’s looking at you. Or could it be...?”
“No, you’re not wrong, it really is me he does the honour to look at.”
“Then this is a good moment.”
“You think so?”
“Go, then, I beg you.”
“I’m going.”

De Guiche had kept an eye on Raoul, and Raoul signalled him that everything was arranged. D’Artagnan walked straight up to the glittering group and bowed politely to Sir Fouquet. “Good morning, Sir d’Artagnan. We were just talking about Belle-Île-en-Mer,” said Fouquet with a meaningful glance and the social grace that it takes half a life to learn, and that some people, no matter how they study, never achieve.

“About Belle-Île?” said d’Artagnan. “I believe that’s your domain, isn’t it, Sir Fouquet?”
“Your servant, Sir d’Artagnan,” said Buckingham with a bow. “Sir Fouquet just informed me that he’s given Belle-Île to the king,”
“Do you know Belle-Île, Knight?” Fouquet asked the musketeer.
“I’ve been there only once, Sir,” replied d’Artagnan like a man born to wit and gallantry.

“Did you stay long?”
“Less than a day, My Lord.”
“But you got a good look at it?”
“As much as can be seen in a day.”

“One might see a lot in a day with eyes like yours, Sir.”
D’Artagnan bowed. Meanwhile, Raoul was signalling to Buckingham. “Sir Surintendant,” said Buckingham, “I’ll leave you with the captain, who knows so much more than I about bastions, scarps, and counterscarps. I leave only to join a friend who beckons to me. You understand...”
And Buckingham detached himself from the group and moved toward Raoul, only pausing for a moment by the table where Madam, the queen mother, the young queen, and the king were playing cards. “Quickly, Raoul,” said de Guiche, “there he is: be fast and firm!”
Buckingham indeed, after paying his compliments to Madam, continued toward Raoul. Raoul advanced to meet him; de Guiche hung back but followed him with his eyes. The manoeuvre was performed so that the young men met in the gap between the group around the card table and a band of gentlemen talking by the gallery windows. But just as the two were about to meet, they were joined by a third. It was Sir who was advancing on the Duke of Buckingham. Sir wore on his pink and perfumed lips his most charming smile. “My God,” he said, aggressively polite, “what’s this story I’ve heard, my dear Duke?”
Buckingham hadn’t seen Sir coming but turned suddenly at his voice. He shuddered despite himself, and a slight pallor appeared on his cheeks. “Why, my Lord,” he said, “what’d Your Highness have heard to cause such great astonishment?”

“A thing that fills me with despair, Duke,” said the prince, “and that will drive the whole Court into mourning.”
“Ah, Your Highness is too good,” said Buckingham, “for I see he wishes to speak of my departure.”
“Quite so.”

“Alas, My Lord, to spend only a week in Paris is more a matter of mourning for me.”
De Guiche heard all this from his nearby position and shuddered in his turn. “His departure!” he murmured. “Can it be?”
Philippe was continuing with the same gracious air, “If the King of England summons you, Sir, that I can understand; we all know that His Majesty Charles II, who loves his gentlemen, can’t do without you. But it shouldn’t be said that we lost you without regrets, so please accept mine.”
“My Lord,” said the duke, “believe that if I leave the Court of France...”
“It’s because they call you back, I understand that. But if you think my word has any weight with your king, I offer to beg His Majesty Charles II to leave you with us a while longer.”
“Such kindness overwhelms me, My Lord,” replied Buckingham, “but I have specific orders. My sojourn in France was limited, and I’ve prolonged it at the risk of displeasing my gracious sovereign. Only today did I remember that I should have left four days ago.”
“Oh!” Sir said.

“Yes, however,” added Buckingham, raising his voice loud enough to be heard by the princesses, “I’m like that man from the far east who was lost for several days in a beautiful dream, then woke one fine morning to find himself cured and restored to sanity. The Court of France has intoxications as strong as that dream but one day we awaken and must leave. I couldn’t prolong my stay even if Your Highness asked it of me.”
“And when do you depart?” Philippe asked, all solicitude.
“Tomorrow, My Lord. My carriages have been ready for three days.”
The Duke of Orléans gave a nod and a shrug that signified: If that’s how it is, Duke, there’s nothing more to say.
Buckingham raised his eyes to the queens and his gaze met that of Anne of Austria who nodded her thanks and approval. Buckingham returned the gesture, concealing behind a smile the tightening around his heart. Sir returned the way he’d come – but from the other direction the Count de Guiche approached. Raoul feared the impatient young man would deliver his challenge himself and hastened to intercept him. “No, no, Raoul, it’s all pointless now,” said de Guiche, extending his hands to the duke and drawing him behind a pillar. “Oh, Duke, Duke!” said de Guiche. “Forgive me for what I wrote to you, I was out of my mind. Give me back my letter!”

“Too true,” said the young duke with a melancholy smile. “You can’t hold a grudge against me now.”
“Oh, Duke, forgive me and take my friendship, my eternal friendship...”
“Why, indeed, should you object to me, Count, from the moment after which I’ll never see her again?”
Hearing these friendly words, Raoul realised his services were of no further use to these two young men and withdrew a few steps. This movement brought him closer to de Wardes, who was speaking of Buckingham’s departure to the Knight de Lorraine. “A wise retreat!” said de Wardes.
“Why is that?”

“Because the dear duke saves himself from a sword-thrust by it.”
And both of them laughed. Raoul indignant, turned toward them with a glare, lips curled disdainfully, and flushed to the temples. The Knight de Lorraine spun on his heel and faced away but de Wardes stood firm and waited. “Sir,” said Raoul to de Wardes, “you continue your practice of insulting the absent? Yesterday it was Sir d’Artagnan, and today it is Sir de Buckingham.”

“But you know, Sir,” said de Wardes, “that sometimes I insult those who are present.”
De Wardes prodded Raoul with a finger, their shoulders leaned toward each other, their faces bent together as if each would inflame the other with the fire of his anger. The first felt that he was at the crest of his hatred, the second at the end of his patience. Suddenly they heard a voice full of grace and civility say calmly, “I believe I heard my name mentioned.”
They turned: it was d’Artagnan who placed a hand on de Wardes’s shoulder with a smiling eye and a cheerful expression. Raoul stepped aside to make room for the musketeer. De Wardes shuddered all over and turned pale but didn’t retreat. D’Artagnan, still smiling, stepped into the space Raoul had made for him. “Thank you, my dear Raoul,” he said. “De Wardes, I need to talk to you. Don’t go away, Raoul; everyone can hear what I have to say to Sir de Wardes.”
Then his smile faded, and his eyes went as cold and as sharp as a steel blade. “I’m at your service, Sir,” said de Wardes.

“Sir, I’ve been looking for an opportunity to speak with you for quite a while but haven’t found it until today,” said d’Artagnan. “This isn’t the best place for it, I admit but if you will take the trouble to come to my rooms, they are just downstairs from this gallery.”
“I’m all yours, Sir,” said de Wardes.
“Are you by yourself, Sir?” said d’Artagnan.
“No, I with Gentlemen de Manicamp and de Guiche, two of my friends.”
“Fine,” said d’Artagnan, “but two isn’t enough; can you find a few more?”
“Certainly!” said the young man, who wasn’t sure what d’Artagnan had in mind. “As many as you like.”
“Friends?”

“Yes, Sir.”
“Good friends?”
“Absolutely.”
“Then arrange it, if you please. You too, Raoul – bring along Sir de Guiche and Sir de Buckingham, if you would.”

“My God, Sir, what a production!” said de Wardes, trying to smile.
The captain raised a hand to enjoin patience and said, “No rush. I’ll be waiting, Sir.”
“Give me a minute.”
“In a minute, then.”

And he went down to his chambers. His rooms weren’t empty; the Count of La Fère was waiting there, sitting in the embrasure of a window. “Well?” he asked d’Artagnan as he came in.
“Well!” said the latter. “Sir de Wardes does me the honour to pay me a visit, in the company of some of his friends and ours.”
In fact, de Wardes and Manicamp came in behind him, followed by de Guiche and Buckingham, surprised and unsure what was afoot. Raoul followed with three other gentlemen; he surveyed the room, spotted the count, and went to stand near him. D’Artagnan received his visitors with all courtesy, keeping his countenance calm and polite. All his guests were men of distinction well known at Court. He apologised to everyone for any inconvenience he’d caused, then turned to de Wardes, who, despite himself, couldn’t keep from showing some surprise and anxiety. “Sir,” d’Artagnan said, “now that we’re out of the king’s presence, where we can speak frankly without impropriety, I’ll tell you why I took the liberty of inviting you to my quarters, and to gather these gentlemen as well. I’ve learned, from my friend the Count of La Fère, of the insulting accusations you’ve made about me, and that you consider me your mortal enemy because I had fought with your father.”
“It’s true, Sir, I did say that,” hissed de Wardes, his pallor tinged with a slight flame.
“You accuse me of some crime, or fault, or act of cowardice. Please state your accusation.”
“In front of witnesses, Sir?”
“Yes, absolutely, in front of witnesses – and you see the witnesses I’ve chosen are experts in matters of honour.”
“I don’t think you properly appreciate my delicacy, Sir. I accused you, it’s true but I have kept confidential the details of my accusation. Rather than act indiscreetly, I chose to express my hatred before people who would be sure to let you know of it. You overlook my discretion, though you said nothing to my silence. This doesn’t seem to me like your usual careful prudence, Sir d’Artagnan.”
D’Artagnan gnawed on the end of his moustache. “Sir,” he said, “I’ve already had the honour to beg you to articulate your grievances against me.”

"Aloud?"

"Good Lord!"

"I will speak, then."

"So, speak, Sir," said d'Artagnan, bowing. "We're all listening to you."

"Well, Sir, it was not an injury to me but an injury to my father."

"You already said that."

"Yes but there are certain matters that can be handled only with circumspection."

"Do you imply that it was a shameful act?"

"In every way."

The witnesses began to glance at each other anxiously but they were reassured when they saw that d'Artagnan's face showed no emotion. De Wardes was silent. "Speak, Sir," said the musketeer.

"You see that you're keeping us waiting."

"Well, then, listen! My father loved a woman, a noble woman, and this woman loved my father."

D'Artagnan exchanged a glance with Athos. De Wardes continued. "D'Artagnan intercepted a letter appointing a tryst, and substituted himself, in darkness and disguise, for the invited lover."

"That's true," said d'Artagnan.

A slight murmur was heard from the listeners. "Yes, I did that disgraceful thing. You should have added, Sir, you who are so impartial, that at the time of the event you reproach me for I was not yet twenty-one years old."

"The act was no less shameful for that," said de Wardes, "and the age of reason is old enough for a gentleman not to commit an indelicacy."

A louder murmur was heard, of astonishment and almost doubt. "It was a shameful trick, indeed," said d'Artagnan, "and I didn't wait for Sir de Wardes's reproaches to reproach myself for it, and very bitterly, too. Age has made me more reasonable, and above all more honest, and I've expiated this shame by long and deep regrets. But I appeal to you, gentlemen: it happened in 1626, at a time that, luckily for you, you know only from history, a time when romance lacked scruples, and a man's conscience didn't choke him with poison and bitterness. We were young soldiers at war, sometimes winning, sometimes losing, with our swords rarely long in their sheaths; the hand of war made us hard, and the hand of the cardinal made us hasty. But I repented all that long ago, Sir de Wardes, and there are other things I'm still repenting."

"Yes, Sir, that's understandable, for the action required repentance – but you nonetheless brought a lady to ruin. She of whom you speak, overcome by shame, crushed by the insult, was driven from France, and we never knew what became of her..."

"But others did," said the Count of La Fère, raising his arm toward de Wardes with a grim smile. "Yes, Sir, others did, and there are still some who, having heard of her, will recognise her from the portrait I shall draw. She was a woman of twenty-five, slender, fair, and blond, who had married in England."

"Married?" said de Wardes.

"Ah, you didn't know she was married? You see, Sir de Wardes, that we are better informed than you. Did you know she was usually referred to as Milady, with no other name than that?"

"Yes, Sir, I knew that."

"My God," murmured Buckingham.

"Well! This Milady, having come from England, returned there, after having three times conspired at the murder of Sir d'Artagnan. Simple justice, you might say; after all, Sir d'Artagnan had insulted her. But it was not for justice that while in England, by her seductions, she enslaved a young man in the service of Lord de Winter, a man named Felton. Do you grow pale, Milord Buckingham? Your eyes kindle with anger and pain. Then finish the story, Milord, and tell Sir de Wardes about the woman who put the knife in the hand of your father's assassin."

A gasp came from every mouth. The young duke said nothing, only mopped his suddenly sodden forehead with a handkerchief. Silence fell upon all the listeners. "You see, Sir de Wardes," said d'Artagnan, unexpectedly moved as his memories were revived by Athos's words, "my crime caused no lady to lose her soul, for this woman's soul was lost long before my deceitful act. But it was still a matter that gnawed at my conscience. However, now that the fact has been established, it remains for me to ask you, Sir de Wardes, very humbly to pardon this shameful act, as I would have asked your father's forgiveness, if he still lived, upon my return to France after the death of Charles I."

"That's going too far, Sir d'Artagnan," several voices burst out.

"I think not, Gentlemen," said the captain. "Now, Sir de Wardes, I hope the matter is settled between us, and you will no longer speak ill of me. That heals the wound, does it not?"

De Wardes looked down and muttered something unintelligible. "I hope, too," said d'Artagnan, stepping closer to the young man, "that you will give up the unfortunate habit of speaking ill of others, for a man as upright and conscientious as you, who would reproach an old soldier with the sins of his youth thirty-five years before – you, I repeat, so upright and conscientious, must accept the duty to do nothing yourself that would violate honour and conscience. Listen to what I say to you, Sir de Wardes. Take care that no shameful story that involves your name should reach my ears."

"Sir, there's no point in threatening me over nothing," said de Wardes.

"Nothing? But I haven't finished, Sir de Wardes," said d'Artagnan, "and I'm afraid that I have more yet to say."

The circle of listeners, curious, closed in. "You spoke just now of the honour of a lady and the honour of your father, and that pleased us, for it's sweet to think that this feeling of delicacy and honour so rare in my generation's soul lives now in the soul of our children, and it's encouraging to see a young man at the age where one is usually the thief of a woman's honour instead respecting and defending them."

De Wardes pursed his lips and clenched his fists, clearly anxious about where a speech that started so ominously would end. "How is it, then," continued d'Artagnan, "that you allowed yourself to say to Sir de Bragelonne that he did not know his mother?"

Raoul's eyes flashed. "Oh, Sir Knight," he cried, rushing forward, "Sir Knight, that's a matter personal to me."

De Wardes smiled wickedly.

D'Artagnan's arm restrained Raoul. "Young man, don't interrupt me," he said. And looking down at de Wardes, he continued, "I'm dealing here with the kind of question that isn't solved by the sword. I bring it up before men of honour who have all had their swords in their hands more than once. I chose them deliberately, for these gentlemen all know that a secret one fights for cannot remain a secret. I repeat my question to you, Sir de Wardes: why did you offend this young man by insulting both his father and his mother?"

"It seems to me," said de Wardes, "that one may speak freely when one supports his words with the means at the disposal of a man of honour."

"Indeed, Sir? What are the means by which a man of honour can support dishonourable words?"

"By the sword."

"You're wrong, not only by logic but also by faith and by honour, and being wrong you would risk the lives of several men in addition to your own that seems reckless to me. All fashions pass away, Sir, and the fashion for such armed encounters has passed, not to mention that there are His Majesty's edicts that forbid duelling. So, to be consistent with your own ideas of chivalry, you will apologise to Sir Raoul de Bragelonne; you will tell him that you regret having made such a petty remark, and that the nobility and purity of his heritage are written, not just on his face but in all the actions of his life. You will make this apology, Sir de Wardes, as I made mine just now, me, an old captain to your downy lad's moustache."

"And what if I don't?" de Wardes demanded.

"Well! If it comes to that..."

"It will come to what you hoped to prevent!" said de Wardes with a laugh. "All of your logic of conciliation will just lead to a violation of the king's edicts."

"No, Sir, you're quite wrong," the captain said quietly.

"What will happen, then?"

"What will happen is that I will go to the king with whom I'm in pretty good standing; the king to whom I've had the happiness to render some service since before the time you were born; the king, in short, who, at my request, has just given me a carte blanche for Sir Baisemeaux de Montlezun, Governor of the Bastille. I will say to the king, 'Sire, a man has delivered a cowardly insult about the person of his mother to Sir Bragelonne. I've filled that man's name in the stamp letter that Your Majesty kindly gave me, and by it Sir de Wardes shall be confined in the Bastille for three years.'" And d'Artagnan, drawing from his pocket an order signed by the king, handed it to de Wardes. Then seeing that the young man was not entirely convinced and thought he was bluffing, he shrugged his shoulders and strode calmly to the table, where there was ink and a plume large enough even for Porthos. Then de Wardes saw that the threat was serious – and the Bastille, even in that time, was already a source of terror. He took a step toward Raoul and said, in an almost unintelligible voice, "Sir, I apologise to you in the terms which Sir d'Artagnan has dictated, and which I am forced to say to you."

"Now, now, Sir," said the musketeer with the utmost tranquillity. "I did not dictate, 'which I am forced to say to you.' I said that the apology was one that your conscience compelled you to make. That phrase is superior, believe me, and will be a more convincing expression of your feelings."

"I agree to that phrasing, then," said de Wardes, "though in truth, Gentlemen, you must admit that a sword thrust through the body, the former method, is better than this bullying."

"No, Sir," replied Buckingham, "for taking a sword thrust doesn't show whether you were right or wrong, it means only that you were less skilled."

"Sir..." cried de Wardes.

"Ah, ah!" interrupted d'Artagnan, cutting de Wardes off. "You're about to say something unwise, and I'm doing you the favour of stopping you."

"Is that all, Sir?" demanded de Wardes.

"Absolutely all," replied d'Artagnan, "and these gentlemen and I are satisfied with you."

"Believe me, Sir," said de Wardes, "your verbal expediences don't satisfy everyone!"

"And why is that?"

"Because I would wager that Sir de Bragelonne and I will part even greater enemies than before."

"You are mistaken about me, Sir," replied Raoul. "I don't have even an atom of enmity in my heart toward you."

D'Artagnan bowed graciously to the gentlemen who had been kind enough to attend this exhibition, and each one shook his hand as they departed. No one shook de Wardes's hand. "Oh!" cried the young man, succumbing to the rage devouring his heart. "Is there no one upon whom I can avenge myself?"

"Indeed there is, Sir, because there's still me," whispered a voice in his ear dripping with menace.

De Wardes turned to see the Duke of Buckingham, who, apparently remaining behind for just this purpose, had drawn near. "You, Sir!" cried de Wardes.

"Yes, me. I'm no subject of the King of France, and I'm not staying in his realm, since I'm leaving for England. And I, too, am consumed with rage and despair. Like you, I need to avenge myself on someone. I approve of the principles stated by Sir d'Artagnan but I'm not obliged to apply them to you. I'm English, and I'm here to propose to you what you have vainly proposed to others."

"Sir Duke!"

"Come, Sir de Wardes, since you're so angry, use me for your target dummy. I'll be in Calais in thirty-four hours. Ride with me, the road will seem shorter with company. We'll draw our swords on the strand that's covered by the tide, land which for six hours at a time is the territory of France and for the following six hours belongs only to God."

"Very well," replied de Wardes, "I accept."

"By God!" said the duke. "If you kill me, Sir de Wardes, I swear you'll be doing me a favour."

"I'll do what I can to make myself agreeable, Duke," said de Wardes.

"Then it's agreed, you're coming with me."

"I'm at your service. By my troth! I need to soothe my heart with some mortal danger."

"Well, I think we've found it for you! Your servant, Sir de Wardes; tomorrow morning, my footman will call upon you to name the time of our departure. We'll travel together as friends but understand that I like to travel fast. Farewell!" Buckingham bowed to de Wardes and returned to the king's gaming party. De Wardes, exasperated, left the Palais Royal and rode fiercely to his Paris address.

After the austere lesson administered to De Wardes, Athos and D'Artagnan together descended the staircase which led to the courtyard of the Palais Royal. "You perceive," said Athos to D'Artagnan, "that Raoul cannot, sooner or later, avoid a duel with De Wardes, for De Wardes is as brave as he is vicious and wicked."

"I know such fellows well," replied D'Artagnan; "I had an affair with the father. I assure you that, although at that time I had good muscles and a sort of brute courage—I assure you that the father did me some mischief. But you should have seen how I fought it out with him. Ah, Athos, such encounters never take place in these times! I had a hand which could never remain at rest, a hand like quicksilver,—you knew its quality, for you have seen me at work. My sword was no longer than a piece of steel; it was a serpent that assumed every form and every length, seeking where it might thrust its head; in other words, where it might fix its bite. I advanced half a dozen paces, then three, and then, body to body, I pressed my antagonist closely, then I darted back again ten paces. No human power could resist that ferocious ardor. Well, De Wardes the father, with the bravery of his race, with his dogged courage, occupied a good deal of my time; and my fingers, at the end of the engagement, were, I well remember, tired enough."

"It is, then, as I said," resumed Athos, "the son will always be looking out for Raoul, and will end by meeting him; and Raoul can easily be found when he is sought for."

"Agreed; but Raoul calculates well; he bears no grudge against De Wardes,—he has said so; he will wait until he is provoked, and in that case his position is a good one. The king will not be able to get out of temper about the matter; besides we shall know how to pacify his majesty. But why so full of these fears and anxieties? You don't easily get alarmed."

"I will tell you what makes me anxious; Raoul is to see the king to-morrow, when his majesty will inform him of his wishes respecting a certain marriage. Raoul, loving as he does, will get out of temper, and once in an angry mood, if he were to meet De Wardes, the shell would explode."

"We will prevent the explosion."

"Not I," said Athos, "for I must return to Blois. All this gilded elegance of the court, all these intrigues, sicken me. I am no longer a young man who can make terms with the meanness of the day. I have read in the Great Book many things too beautiful and too comprehensive to longer take any interest in the trifling phrases which these men whisper among themselves when they wish to deceive others. In one word, I am weary of Paris wherever and whenever you are not with me; and as I cannot have you with me always, I wish to return to Blois."

"How wrong you are, Athos; how you gainsay your origin and the destiny of your noble nature. Men of your stamp are created to continue, to the very last moment, in full possession of their great faculties. Look at my sword, a Spanish blade, the one I wore at La Rochelle; it served me for thirty years without fail; one day in the winter it fell upon the marble floor on the Louvre and was broken. I had a hunting-knife made of it which will last a hundred years yet. You, Athos, with your loyalty, your frankness, your cool courage, and your sound information, are the very man kings need to warn and direct them. Remain here; Monsieur Fouquet will not last as long as my Spanish blade."

"Is it possible," said Athos, smiling, "that my friend, D'Artagnan, who, after having raised me to the skies, making me an object of worship, casts me down from the top of Olympus, and hurls me to the ground? I have more exalted ambition, D'Artagnan. To be a minister—to be a slave,—never! Am I not still greater? I am nothing. I remember having heard you occasionally call me 'the great Athos'; I defy you, therefore, if I were minister, to continue to bestow that title upon me. No, no; I do not yield myself in this manner."

"We will not speak of it any more, then; renounce everything, even the brotherly feeling which unites us."

"It is almost cruel what you say."

D'Artagnan pressed Athos's hand warmly. "No, no; renounce everything without fear. Raoul can get on without you. I am at Paris."

"In that case I shall return to Blois. We will take leave of each other to-night; to-morrow at daybreak I shall be on my horse again."

"You cannot return to your hotel alone; why did you not bring Grimaud with you?"

"Grimaud takes his rest now; he goes to bed early, for my poor old servant gets easily fatigued. He came from Blois with me, and I compelled him to remain within doors; for if, in retracing the forty leagues which separate us from Blois, he needed to draw breath even, he would die without a murmur. But I don't want to lose Grimaud."

"You shall have one of my musketeers to carry a torch for you. Hola! some one there," called out D'Artagnan, leaning over the gilded balustrade. The heads of seven or eight musketeers appeared. "I wish some gentleman, who is so disposed, to escort the Comte de la Fere," cried D'Artagnan.

"Thank you for your readiness, gentlemen," said Athos; "I regret to have occasion to trouble you in this manner."

"I would willingly escort the Comte de la Fere," said some one, "if I had not to speak to Monsieur d'Artagnan."

"Who is that?" said D'Artagnan, looking into the darkness.

"I, Monsieur d'Artagnan."

"Heaven forgive me, if that is not Monsieur Baisemeaux's voice."

"It is, monsieur."

"What are you doing in the courtyard, my dear Baisemeaux?"

"I am waiting your orders, my dear Monsieur d'Artagnan."

"Wretch that I am," thought D'Artagnan; "true, you have been told, I suppose, that some one was to be arrested, and have come yourself, instead of sending an officer?"

"I came because I had occasion to speak to you."

"You did not send to me?"

"I waited until you were disengaged," said Monsieur Baisemeaux, timidly.

"I leave you, D'Artagnan," said Athos.

"Not before I have present Monsieur Baisemeaux de Montlezun, the governor of the Bastille."

Baisemeaux and Athos saluted each other.

"Surely you must know each other," said D'Artagnan.

"I have an indistinct recollection of Monsieur Baisemeaux," said Athos.

"You remember, my dear, Baisemeaux, the king's guardsman with whom we used formerly to have such delightful meetings in the cardinal's time?"

"Perfectly," said Athos, taking leave of him with affability.

"Monsieur le Comte de la Fere, whose nom de guerre was Athos," whispered D'Artagnan to Baisemeaux.

"Yes, yes, a brave man, one of the celebrated four."

"Precisely so. But, my dear Baisemeaux, shall we talk now?"

"If you please."

"In the first place, as for the orders—there are none. The king does not intend to arrest the person in question.

"So much the worse," said Baisemeaux with a sigh.

"What do you mean by so much the worse?" exclaimed D'Artagnan, laughing.

"No doubt of it," returned the governor, "my prisoners are my income."

"I beg your pardon, I did not see it in that light."

"And so there are no orders," repeated Baisemeaux with a sigh. "What an admirable situation yours is, captain," he continued, after a pause; "captain-lieutenant of the musketeers."

"Oh, it is good enough; but I don't see why you should envy me; you, governor of the Bastille, the first castle in France."

"I am well aware of that," said Baisemeaux, in a sorrowful tone of voice.

"You say that like a man confessing his sins. I would willingly exchange my profits for yours."

"Don't speak of profits to me, if you wish to save me the bitterest anguish of mind."

"Why do you look first on one side and then on the other, as if you were afraid of being arrested yourself, you whose business it is to arrest others?"

"I was looking to see whether any one could see or listen to us; it would be safer to confer more in private, if you would grant me such a favour."

"Baisemeaux, you seem to forget we are acquaintances of five and thirty years' standing. Don't assume such sanctified airs; make yourself quite comfortable; I don't eat governors of the Bastille raw."

"Heaven be praised!"

"Come into the courtyard with me; it's a beautiful moonlit night; we will walk up and down, arm in arm, under the trees, while you tell me your pitiful tale." He drew the doleful governor into the courtyard, took him by the arm as he had said, and, in his rough, good-humored way, cried: "Out with it, rattle away, Baisemeaux; what have you got to say?"

"It's a long story."

"You prefer your own lamentations, then; my opinion is, it will be longer than ever. I'll wager you are making fifty thousand francs out of your pigeons in the Bastille."

"Would to heaven that were the case, M. d'Artagnan."

"You surprise me, Baisemeaux; just look at you, acting the anchorite. I should like to show you your face in a glass, and you would see how plump and florid-looking you are, as fat and round as a cheese, with eyes like lighted coals; and if it were not for that ugly wrinkle you try to cultivate on your forehead, you would hardly look fifty years old, and you are sixty, if I am not mistaken."

"All quite true."

"Of course I knew it was true, as true as the fifty thousand francs profit you make;" at which remark Baisemeaux stamped on the ground.

"Well, well," said D'Artagnan, "I will add up your accounts for you: you were captain of M. Mazarin's guards; and twelve thousand francs a year would in twelve years amount to one hundred and forty thousand francs."

"Twelve thousand francs! Are you mad?" cried Baisemeaux; "the old miser gave me no more than six thousand, and the expenses of the post amounted to six thousand five hundred francs. M. Colbert, who deducted the other six thousand francs, condescended to allow me to take fifty thousand francs as a gratification; so that, if it were not for my little estate at Montlezun, which brings me in twelve thousand francs a year, I could not have met my engagements."

"Well, then, how about the fifty thousand francs from the Bastille? There, I trust, you are boarded and lodged, and get your six thousand francs salary besides."

"Admitted!"

"Whether the year be good or bad, there are fifty prisoners, who, on the average, bring you in a thousand francs a year each."

"I don't deny it."

"Well, there is at once an income of fifty thousand francs; you have held the post three years, and must have received in that time one hundred and fifty thousand francs."

"You forget one circumstance, dear M. d'Artagnan."

"What is that?"

"That while you received your appointment as captain from the king himself, I received mine as governor from Messieurs Tremblay and Louviere."

"Quite right, and Tremblay was not a man to let you have the post for nothing."

"Nor Louviere either: the result was, that I gave seventy-five thousand francs to Tremblay as his share."

"Very agreeable that! and to Louviere?"

"The very same."

"Money down?"

"No: that would have been impossible. The king did not wish, or rather M. Mazarin did not wish, to have the appearance of removing those two gentlemen, who had sprung from the barricades; he permitted them, therefore, to make certain extravagant conditions for their retirement."

"What were those conditions?"

"Tremble... three years' income for the good-will."

"The deuce! so that the one hundred and fifty thousand francs have passed into their hands."

"Precisely so."

"And beyond that?"

“A sum of one hundred and fifty thousand francs, or fifteen thousand pistoles, whichever you please, in three payments.”

“Exorbitant.”

“Yes, but that is not all.”

“What besides?”

“In default of the fulfilment by me of any one of those conditions, those gentlemen enter upon their functions again. The king has been induced to sign that.”

“It is monstrous, incredible!”

“Such is the fact, however.”

“I do indeed pity you, Baisemeaux. But why, in the name of fortune, did M. Mazarin grant you this pretended favour? It would have been far better to have refused you altogether.”

“Certainly, but he was strongly persuaded to do so by my protector.”

“Who is he?”

“One of your own friends, indeed; M. d’Herblay.”

“M. d’Herblay! Aramis!”

“Just so; he has been very kind towards me.”

“Kind! to make you enter into such a bargain!”

“Listen! I wished to leave the cardinal’s service. M. d’Herblay spoke on my behalf to Louviere and Tremblay—they objected; I wished to have the appointment very much, for I knew what it could be made to produce; in my distress I confided in M. d’Herblay, and he offered to become my surety for the different payments.”

“You astound me! Aramis became your surety?”

“Like a man of honour; he procured the signature; Tremblay and Louviere resigned their appointments; I have paid every year twenty-five thousand francs to these two gentlemen; on the thirty-first of May, every year, M. d’Herblay himself comes to the Bastille, and brings me five thousand pistoles to distribute between my crocodiles.”

“You owe Aramis one hundred and fifty thousand francs, then?”

“That is the very thing which is the cause of my despair, for I only owe him one hundred thousand.”

“I don’t quite understand you.”

“He came and settled with the vampires only two years. To-day, however, is the thirty-first of May, and he has not been yet, and to-morrow, at midday, the payment falls due; if, therefore, I don’t pay to-morrow, those gentlemen can, by the terms of the contract, break off the bargain; I shall be stripped of everything; I shall have worked for three years, and given two hundred and fifty thousand francs for nothing, absolutely for nothing at all, dear M. d’Artagnan.”

“This is very strange,” murmured D’Artagnan.

“You can now imagine that I may well have wrinkles on my forehead, can you not?”

“Yes, indeed!”

“And you can imagine, too, that notwithstanding I may be as round as a cheese, with a complexion like an apple, and my eyes like coals on fire, I may almost be afraid that I shall not have a cheese or an apple left me to eat, and that my eyes will be left me only to weep with.”

“It is really a very grievous affair.”

“I have come to you, M. d’Artagnan, for you are the only man who can get me out of my trouble.”

“In what way?”

“You are acquainted with the Abbe d’Herblay, and you know that he is a somewhat mysterious gentleman.”

“Yes.”

“Well, you can, perhaps, give me the address of his presbytery, for I have been to Noisy-le-Sec, and he is no longer there.”

“I should think not, indeed. He is Bishop of Vannes.”

“What! Vannes in Bretagne?”

“Yes.”

The little man began to tear his hair, saying, “How can I get to Vannes from here by midday to-morrow? I am a lost man.”

“Your despair quite distresses me.”

“Vannes, Vannes!” cried Baisemeaux.

“But listen; a bishop is not always a resident. M. d’Herblay may not possibly be so far away as you fear.”

“Pray tell me his address.”

“I really don’t know it.”

“In that case I am lost. I will go and throw myself at the king’s feet.”

“But, Baisemeaux, I can hardly believe what you tell me; besides, since the Bastille is capable of producing fifty thousand francs a year, why have you not tried to screw one hundred thousand out of it?”

“Because I am an honest man, M. d’Artagnan, and because my prisoners are fed like ambassadors.”

“Well, you’re in a fair way to get out of your difficulties; give yourself a good attack of indigestion with your excellent living, and put yourself out of the way between this and midday to-morrow.”

“How can you be hard-hearted enough to laugh?”

“Nay, you really afflict me. Come, Baisemeaux, if you can pledge me your word of honour, do so, that you will not open your lips to anyone about what I am going to say to you.”

“Never, never!”

“You wish to put your hands on Aramis?”

“At any cost!”

“Well, go and see where M. Fouquet is.”

“Why, what connection can there be—”

“How stupid you are! Don’t you know that Vannes is in the diocese of Belle-Isle, or Belle-Isle in the diocese of Vannes? Belle-Isle belongs to M. Fouquet, and M. Fouquet nominated M. d’Herblay to that bishopric!”

“I see, I see; you restore me to life again.”

“So much the better. Go and tell M. Fouquet very simply that you wish to speak to M. d’Herblay.”

“Of course, of course,” exclaimed Baisemeaux, delightedly.

“But,” said D’Artagnan, checking him by a severe look, “your word of honour?”

“I give you my sacred word of honour,” replied the little man, about to set off running.

“Where are you going?”

“To M. Fouquet’s house.”

“It is useless doing that; M. Fouquet is playing at cards with the king. All you can do is to pay M. Fouquet a visit early to-morrow morning.”

“I will do so. Thank you.”

“Good luck attend you,” said D’Artagnan.

“Thank you.”

“This is a strange affair,” murmured D’Artagnan, as he slowly ascended the staircase after he had left Baisemeaux. “What possible interest can Aramis have in obliging Baisemeaux in this manner? Well, I suppose we shall learn some day or another.”

The King’s Card-Table

Fouquet was present, as D’Artagnan had said, at the king’s card-table. It seemed as if Buckingham’s departure had shed a balm on the lacerated hearts of the previous evening. Monsieur, radiant with delight, made a thousand affectionate signs to his mother. The Count de Guiche could not separate himself from Buckingham, and while playing, conversed with him upon the circumstance of his projected voyage. Buckingham, thoughtful, and kind in his manner, like a man who has adopted a resolution, listened to the count, and from time to time cast a look full of regret and hopeless affection at Madame. The princess, in the midst of her elation of spirits, divided her attention between the king, who was playing with her, Monsieur, who quietly joked her about her enormous winnings, and De Guiche, who exhibited an extravagant delight. Of Buckingham she took but little notice; for her, this fugitive, this exile, was now simply a remembrance, no longer a man. Light hearts are thus constituted; while they themselves continue untouched, they roughly break off with every one who may possibly interfere with their little calculations of self comfort. Madame had received Buckingham’s smiles and attentions and sighs while he was present; but what was the good of sighing, smiling, and kneeling at a distance? Can one tell in what direction the winds in the Channel, which toss mighty vessels to and fro, carry such sighs as these? The duke could not fail to mark this change, and his heart was cruelly hurt. Of a sensitive character, proud and susceptible of deep attachment, he cursed the day on which such a passion had entered his heart. The looks he cast, from time to time at Madame, became colder by degrees at the chilling complexion of his thoughts. He could hardly yet despair, but he was strong enough to impose silence upon the tumultuous outcries of his heart. In exact proportion, however, as Madame suspected this change of feeling, she redoubled her activity to regain the ray of light she was about to lose; her timid and indecisive mind was displayed in brilliant flashes of wit and humor. At any cost she felt that she must be remarked above everything and every one, even above the king himself. And she was so, for the queens, notwithstanding their dignity, and the king, despite the respect which etiquette required, were all eclipsed by her. The queens, stately and ceremonious, were softened and could not restrain their laughter. Madame Henriette, the queen-mother, was dazzled by the brilliancy which cast distinction upon her family, thanks to the wit of the grand-daughter of Henry IV. The king, jealous, as a young man and as a monarch, of the superiority of those who surrounded him, could not resist admitting himself vanquished by a petulance so thoroughly French in its nature, whose energy more than ever increased by English humor. Like a child, he was captivated by her radiant beauty, which her wit made still more dazzling. Madame’s eyes flashed like lightning. Wit and humor escaped from her scarlet lips like persuasion from the lips of Nestor of old. The whole court, subdued by her enchanting grace, noticed for the first time that laughter could be indulged in before the greatest monarch in the world, like people who merited their appellation of the wittiest and most polished people in Europe. Madame, from that evening, achieved and enjoyed a success capable of bewildering all not born to those altitudes termed thrones; which, in spite of their elevation, are sheltered from such giddiness. From that very moment Louis XIV. acknowledged Madame as a person to be recognized. Buckingham regarded her as a coquette deserving the cruellest tortures, and De Guiche looked upon her as a divinity; the courtiers as a star whose light might some day become the focus of all favour and power. And yet Louis XIV., a few years previously, had not even condescended to offer his hand to that “ugly girl” for a ballet; and Buckingham had worshipped this coquette “on both knees.” De Guiche had once looked upon this divinity as a mere woman; and the courtiers had not dared to extol this star in her upward progress, fearful to disgust the monarch whom such a dull star had formerly displeased. Let us see what was taking place during this memorable evening at the king’s card-table. The young queen, although Spanish by birth, and the niece of Anne of Austria, loved the king, and could not conceal her affection. Anne of Austria, a keen observer, like all women, and imperious, like every queen, was sensible of Madame’s power, and acquiesced in it immediately, a circumstance which induced the young queen to raise the siege and retire to her apartments. The king hardly paid any attention to her departure, notwithstanding the pretended symptoms of indisposition by which it was accompanied. Encouraged by the rules of etiquette, which he had begun to introduce at the court as an element of every relation of life, Louis XIV. did not disturb himself; he offered his hand to Madame without looking at Monsieur his brother, and led the young princess to the door of her apartments. It was remarked, that at the threshold of the door, his majesty, freed from every restraint, or not equal to the situation, sighed very deeply. The ladies present—nothing escapes a woman’s glance—Mademoiselle Montalais, for instance—did not fail to say to each other, “the king sighed,” and “Madame sighed too.” This had been indeed the case. Madame had sighed very noiselessly, but with an accompaniment very far more dangerous for the king’s repose. Madame had sighed, first closing her beautiful black eyes, next opening them, and then, laden, as they were, with an indescribable mournfulness of expression, she had raised them towards the king, whose face at that moment visibly heightened in colour. The consequence of these blushes, of those interchanged sighs, and of this royal agitation, was, that Montalais had committed an indiscretion which had certainly affected her companion, for Mademoiselle de la Vallière, less clear sighted, perhaps, turned pale when the king blushed; and her attendance being required upon Madame, she tremblingly followed the princess without thinking of taking the gloves, which court etiquette required her to do. True it is that the young country girl might allege as her excuse the agitation into which the king seemed to be thrown, for Mademoiselle de la Vallière, busily engaged in closing the door, had involuntarily fixed her eyes upon the king, who, as he retired backwards, had his face towards it. The king returned to the room where the card-tables were set out. He wished to speak to the different persons there, but it was easy to see that his mind was absent. He jumbled different accounts together, which was taken advantage of by some of the noblemen who had retained those habits since the time of Monsieur Mazarin—who had a poor memory, but was a good calculator. In this way, Monsieur Manicamp, with a thoughtless and absent air—for M. Manicamp was the most honest man in the world, appropriated twenty thousand francs, which were littering the table, and which did not seem to belong to any person in particular. In the same way, Monsieur de Wardes, whose head was doubtless a little bewildered by the occurrences of the evening, somehow forgot to leave behind him the sixty double louis which he had won for the Duke of Buckingham, and which the duke, incapable, like his father, of soiling his hands with coin of any sort, had left lying on the table before him. The king only recovered his attention in some degree at the moment that Monsieur Colbert, who had been narrowly observant for some minutes, approached, and, doubtless, with great respect, yet with much perseverance, whispered a counsel of some sort into the still tingling ears of the king. The king, at the suggestion, listened with renewed attention and immediately looking around him, said, “Is Monsieur Fouquet no longer here?”

“Yes, sire, I am here,” replied the superintendent, till then engaged with Buckingham, and approached the king, who advanced a step towards him with a smiling yet negligent air. “Forgive me,” said Louis, “if I interrupt your conversation; but I claim your attention wherever I may require your services.”

“I am always at the king’s service,” replied Fouquet.

“And your cash-box, too,” said the king, laughing with a false smile.

“My cash-box more than anything else,” said Fouquet, coldly.

“The fact is, I wish to give a fête at Fontainebleau—to keep open house for fifteen days, and I shall require—” and he stopped, glancing at Colbert. Fouquet waited without showing discomposure; and the king resumed, answering Colbert’s icy smile, “four million francs.”

“Four million,” repeated Fouquet, bowing profoundly. And his nails, buried in his bosom, were thrust into his flesh, but the tranquil expression of his face remained unaltered. “When will they be required, sire?”

“Take your time,—I mean—no, no; as soon as possible.”

“A certain time will be necessary, sire.”

“Time!” exclaimed Colbert, triumphantly.

“The time, monsieur,” said the superintendent, with the haughtiest disdain, “simply to count the money; a million can only be drawn and weighed in a day.”

“Four days, then,” said Colbert.

“My clerks,” replied Fouquet, addressing himself to the king, “will perform wonders on his majesty’s service, and the sum shall be ready in three days.”

It was for Colbert now to turn pale. Louis looked at him astonished. Fouquet withdrew without any parade or weakness, smiling at his numerous friends, in whose countenances alone he read the sincerity of their friendship—an interest partaking of compassion. Fouquet, however, should not be judged by his smile, for, in reality, he felt as if he had been stricken by death. Drops of blood beneath his coat stained the fine linen that clothed his chest. His dress concealed the blood, and his smile the rage which devoured him. His domestics perceived, by the manner in which he approached his carriage, that their master was not in the best of humors: the result of their discernment was, that his orders were executed with that exactitude of maneuver which is found on board a man-of-war, commanded during a storm by an ill-tempered captain. The carriage, therefore, did not simply roll along—it flew. Fouquet had hardly time to recover himself during the drive; on his arrival he went at once to Aramis, who had not yet retired for the night. As for Porthos, he had supped very agreeably off a roast leg of mutton, two pheasants, and a perfect heap of cray-fish; he then directed his body to be anointed with perfumed oils, in the manner of the wrestlers of old; and when this anointment was completed, he had himself wrapped in flannels and placed in a warm bed. Aramis, as we have already said, had not retired. Seated at his ease in a velvet dressing-gown, he wrote letter after letter in that fine and hurried handwriting, a page of which contained a quarter of a volume. The door was thrown hurriedly open, and the superintendent appeared, pale, agitated, anxious. Aramis looked up: “Good-evening,” said he; and his searching look detected his host’s sadness and disordered state of mind. “Was your play as good as his majesty’s?” asked Aramis, by way of beginning the conversation.

Fouquet threw himself upon a couch, and then pointed to the door to the servant who had followed him; when the servant had left he said, “Excellent.”

Aramis, who had followed every movement with his eyes, noticed that he stretched himself upon the cushions with a sort of feverish impatience. “You have lost as usual?” inquired Aramis, his pen still in his hand.

“Even more than usual,” replied Fouquet.

“You know how to support losses?”

“Sometimes.”

“What, Monsieur Fouquet a bad player!”

“There is play and play, Monsieur d’Herblay.”

“How much have you lost?” inquired Aramis, with a slight uneasiness.

Fouquet collected himself a moment, and then, without the slightest emotion, said, “The evening has cost me four millions,” and a bitter laugh drowned the last vibration of these words.

Aramis, who did not expect such an amount, dropped his pen. “Four millions,” he said; “you have lost four millions,—impossible!”

“Monsieur Colbert held my cards for me,” replied the superintendent, with a similar bitter laugh.

“Ah, now I understand; so, so, a new application for funds?”

“Yes, and from the king’s own lips. It was impossible to ruin a man with a more charming smile. What do you think of it?”

“It is clear that your destruction is the object in view.”

“That is your opinion?”

“Still. Besides, there is nothing in it which should astonish you, for we have foreseen it all along.”

“Yes; but I did not expect four millions.”

“No doubt the amount is serious, but, after all, four millions are not quite the death of a man, especially when the man in question is Monsieur Fouquet.”

“My dear D’Herblay, if you knew the contents of my coffers, you would be less easy.”

“And you promised?”

“What could I do?”

“That’s true.”

“The very day I refuse, Colbert will procure the money; whence I know not, but he will procure it: and I shall be lost.”

“There is no doubt of that. In how many days did you promise the four millions?”

“In three days. The king seemed exceedingly pressed.”

“In three days?”

“When I think,” resumed Fouquet, “that just now as I passed along the streets, the people cried out, ‘There is the rich Monsieur Fouquet,’ it is enough to turn my brain.”

“Stay, monsieur, the matter is not worth so much trouble,” said Aramis, calmly, sprinkling some sand over the letter he had just written.

“Suggest a remedy, then, for this evil without a remedy.”

“There is only one remedy for you,—pay.”

“But it is very uncertain whether I have the money. Everything must be exhausted; Belle-Isle is paid for; the pension has been paid; and money, since the investigation of the accounts of those who farm the revenue, is scarce. Besides, admitting that I pay this time, how can I do so on another occasion? When kings have tasted money, they are like tigers who have tasted flesh, they devour everything. The day will arrive—must arrive—when I shall have to say, ‘Impossible, sire,’ and on that very day I am a lost man.”

Aramis raised his shoulders slightly, saying:

“A man in your position, my lord, is only lost when he wishes to be so.”

“A man, whatever his position may be, cannot hope to struggle against a king.”

“Nonsense; when I was young I wrestled successfully with the Cardinal Richelieu, who was king of France,—nay more—cardinal.”

“Where are my armies, my troops, my treasures? I have not even Belle-Isle.”

“Bah! necessity is the mother of invention, and when you think all is lost, something will be discovered which will retrieve everything.”

“Who will discover this wonderful something?”

“Yourself.”

“! I resign my office of inventor.”

“Then I will.”

“Be it so. But set to work without delay.”

“Oh! we have time enough!”

“You kill me, D’Herblay, with your calmness,” said the superintendent, passing his handkerchief over his face.

“Do you not remember that I one day told you not to make yourself uneasy, if you possessed courage? Have you any?”

“I believe so.”

“Then don’t make yourself uneasy.”

“It is decided then, that, at the last moment, you will come to my assistance.”

“It will only be the repayment of a debt I owe you.”

“It is the vocation of financiers to anticipate the wants of men such as yourself, D’Herblay.”

“If obligingness is the vocation of financiers, charity is the virtue of the clergy. Only, on this occasion, do you act, monsieur. You are not yet sufficiently reduced, and at the last moment we will see what is to be done.”

“We shall see, then, in a very short time.”

“Very well. However, permit me to tell you that, personally, I regret exceedingly that you are at present so short of money, because I myself was about to ask you for some.”

“For yourself?”

“For myself, or some of my people, for mine or for ours.”

“How much do you want?”

“Be easy on that score; a roundish sum, it is true, but not too exorbitant.”

“Tell me the amount.”

“Fifty thousand francs.”

“Oh! a mere nothing. Of course one has always fifty thousand francs. Why the deuce cannot that knave Colbert be as easily satisfied as you are—and I should give myself far less trouble than I do. When do you need this sum?”

“To-morrow morning; but you wish to know its destination?”

“Nay, nay, chevalier, I need no explanation.”

"To-morrow is the first of June."
"Well?"
"One of our bonds becomes due."
"I did not know we had any bonds."
"Certainly, to-morrow we pay our last third instalment."
"What third?"
"Of the one hundred and fifty thousand francs to Baisemeaux."
"Baisemeaux? Who is he?"
"The governor of the Bastille."
"Yes, I remember. On what grounds am I to pay one hundred and fifty thousand francs for that man."
"On account of the appointment which he, or rather we, purchased from Louviere and Tremblay."
"I have a very vague recollection of the matter."
"That is likely enough, for you have so many affairs to attend to. However, I do not believe you have any affair in the world of greater importance than this one."
"Tell me, then, why we purchased this appointment."
"Why, in order to render him a service in the first place, and afterwards ourselves."
"Ourselves? You are joking."
"My lord, the time may come when the governor of the Bastille may prove a very excellent acquaintance."
"I have not the good fortune to understand you, D'Herblay."
"My lord, we had our own poets, our own engineer, our own architect, our own musicians, our own printer, and our own painters; we needed our own governor of the Bastille."
"Do you think so?"
"Let us not deceive ourselves, my lord; we are very much opposed to paying the Bastille a visit," added the prelate, displaying, beneath his pale lips, teeth which were still the same beautiful teeth so much admired thirty years previously by Marie Michon.
"And you think it is not too much to pay one hundred and fifty thousand francs for that? I thought you generally put out money at better interest than that."
"The day will come when you will admit your mistake."
"My dear D'Herblay, the very day on which a man enters the Bastille, he is no longer protected by his past."
"Yes, he is, if the bonds are perfectly regular; besides, that good fellow Baisemeaux has not a courtier's heart. I am certain, my lord, that he will not remain ungrateful for that money, without taking into account, I repeat, that I retain the acknowledgements."
"It is a strange affair! Usury in a matter of benevolence."
"Do not mix yourself up with it, my lord; if there be usury, it is I who practice it, and both of us reap the advantage from it—that is all."
"Some intrigue, D'Herblay?"
"I do not deny it."
"And Baisemeaux an accomplice in it?"
"Why not?—there are worse accomplices than he. May I depend, then, upon the five thousand pistoles to-morrow?"
"Do you want them this evening?"
"It would be better, for I wish to start early; poor Baisemeaux will not be able to imagine what has become of me, and must be upon thorns."
"You shall have the amount in an hour. Ah, D'Herblay, the interest of your one hundred and fifty thousand francs will never pay my four millions for me."
"Why not, my lord?"
"Good-night, I have business to transact with my clerks before I retire."
"A good night's rest, my lord."
"D'Herblay, you wish things that are impossible."
"Shall I have my fifty thousand francs this evening?"
"Yes."
"Go to sleep, then, in perfect safety—it is I who tell you to do so." Notwithstanding this assurance, and the tone in which it was given, Fouquet left the room shaking his head, and heaving a sigh.

M. Baisemeaux de Montlezun's Accounts

The clock of St. Paul was striking seven as Aramis, on horseback, dressed as a simple citizen, that is to say, in coloured suit, with no distinctive mark about him, except a kind of hunting-knife by his side, passed before the Rue du Petit-Musc, and stopped opposite the Rue des Tournelles, at the gate of the Bastille. Two sentinels were on duty at the gate; they made no difficulty about admitting Aramis, who entered without dismounting, and they pointed out the way he was to go by a long passage with buildings on both sides. This passage led to the drawbridge, or, in other words, to the real entrance. The drawbridge was down, and the duty of the day was about being entered upon. The sentinel at the outer guardhouse stopped Aramis's further progress, asking him, in a rough tone of voice, what had brought him there. Aramis explained, with his usual politeness, that a wish to speak to M. Baisemeaux de Montlezun had occasioned his visit. The first sentinel then summoned a second sentinel, stationed within an inner lodge, who showed his face at the grating, and inspected the new arrival most attentively. Aramis reiterated the expression of his wish to see the governor; whereupon the sentinel called to an officer of lower grade, who was walking about in a tolerably spacious courtyard and who, in turn, on being informed of his object, ran to seek one of the officers of the governor's staff. The latter, after having listened to Aramis's request, begged him to wait a moment, then went away a short distance, but returned to ask his name. "I cannot tell it you, monsieur," said Aramis; "I need only mention that I have matters of such importance to communicate to the governor, that I can only rely beforehand upon one thing, that M. de Baisemeaux will be delighted to see me; nay, more than that, when you have told him that it is the person whom he expected on the first of June, I am convinced he will hasten here himself." The officer could not possibly believe that a man of the governor's importance should put himself out for a person of so little importance as the citizen-looking visitor on horseback. "It happens most fortunately, monsieur," he said, "that the governor is just going out, and you can perceive his carriage with the horses already harnessed, in the courtyard yonder; there will be no occasion for him to come to meet you, as he will see you as he passes by." Aramis bowed to signify his assent; he did not wish to inspire others with too exalted an opinion of himself, and therefore waited patiently and in silence, leaning upon the saddle-bow of his horse. Ten minutes had hardly elapsed when the governor's carriage was observed to move. The governor appeared at the door, and got into the carriage, which immediately prepared to start. The same ceremony was observed for the governor himself as with a suspected stranger; the sentinel at the lodge advanced as the carriage was about to pass under the arch, and the governor opened the carriage-door, himself setting the example of obedience to orders; so that, in this way, the sentinel could convince himself that no one quitted the Bastille improperly. The carriage rolled along under the archway, but at the moment the iron-gate was opened, the officer approached the carriage, which had again been stopped, and said something to the governor, who immediately put his head out of the door-way, and perceived Aramis on horseback at the end of the drawbridge. He immediately uttered almost a shout of delight, and got out, or rather darted out of his carriage, running towards Aramis, whose hands he seized, making a thousand apologies. He almost embraced him. "What a difficult matter to enter the Bastille!" said Aramis. "Is it the same for those who are sent here against their wills, as for those who come of their own accord?"
"A thousand pardons, my lord. How delighted I am to see your Grace!"
"Hush! What are you thinking of, my dear M. Baisemeaux? What do you suppose would be thought of a bishop in my present costume?"
"Pray, excuse me, I had forgotten. Take this gentleman's horse to the stables," cried Baisemeaux.
"No, no," said Aramis; "I have five thousand pistoles in the saddle-bags."
The governor's countenance became so radiant, that if the prisoners had seen him they would have imagined some prince of the royal blood had arrived. "Yes, you are right, the horse shall be taken to the government house. Will you get into the carriage, my dear M. d'Herblay? And it shall take us back to my house."
"Get into a carriage to cross a courtyard! Do you believe I am so great an invalid? No, no, we will go on foot."
Baisemeaux then offered his arm as a support, but the prelate did not accept it. They arrived in this manner at the government house, Baisemeaux rubbing his hands and glancing at the horse from time to time, while Aramis was looking at the bleak bare walls. A tolerably handsome vestibule and a staircase of white stone led to the governor's apartments, who crossed the ante-chamber, the dining-room, where breakfast was being prepared, opened a small side door, and closeted himself with his guest in a large cabinet, the windows of which opened obliquely upon the courtyard and the stables. Baisemeaux installed the prelate with that all-inclusive politeness of which a good man, or a grateful man, alone possesses the secret. An arm-chair, a footstool, a small table beside him, on which to rest his hand, everything was prepared by the governor himself. With his own hands, too, he placed upon the table, with much solicitude, the bag containing the gold, which one of the soldiers had brought up with the most respectful devotion; and the soldier having left the room, Baisemeaux himself closed the door after him, drew aside one of the window-curtains, and looked steadfastly at Aramis to see if the prelate required anything further.
"Well, my lord," he said, still standing up, "of all men of their word, you still continue to be the most punctual."
"In matters of business, dear M. de Baisemeaux, exactitude is not a virtue only, it is a duty as well."
"Yes, in matters of business, certainly; but what you have with me is not of that character; it is a service you are rendering me."
"Come, confess, dear M. de Baisemeaux, that, notwithstanding this exactitude, you have not been without a little uneasiness."
"About your health, I certainly have," stammered out Baisemeaux.
"I wished to come here yesterday, but I was not able, as I was too fatigued," continued Aramis. Baisemeaux anxiously slipped another cushion behind his guest's back. "But," continued Aramis, "I promised myself to come and pay you a visit to-day, early in the morning."
"You are really very kind, my lord."
"And it was a good thing for me I was punctual, I think."
"What do you mean?"
"Yes, you were going out." At which latter remark Baisemeaux coloured and said, "It is true I was going out."
"Then I prevent you," said Aramis; whereupon the embarrassment of Baisemeaux became visibly greater. "I am putting you to inconvenience," he continued, fixing a keen glance upon the poor governor;
"if I had known that, I should not have come."
"How can your lordship imagine that you could ever inconvenience me?"
"Confess you were going in search of money."
"No," stammered out Baisemeaux, "no! I assure you I was going to—"
"Does the governor still intend to go to M. Fouquet?" suddenly called out the major from below. Baisemeaux ran to the window like a madman. "No, no," he exclaimed in a state of desperation, "who the deuce is speaking of M. Fouquet? Are you drunk below there? Why am I interrupted when I am engaged on business?"
"You were going to M. Fouquet's," said Aramis, biting his lips, "to M. Fouquet, the abbe, or the superintendent?"
Baisemeaux almost made up his mind to tell an untruth, but he could not summon courage to do so. "To the superintendent," he said.
"It is true, then, that you were in want of money, since you were going to a person who gives it away!"
"I assure you, my lord—"
"You were afraid?"
"My dear lord, it was the uncertainty and ignorance in which I was as to where you were to be found."

"You would have found the money you require at M. Fouquet's, for he is a man whose hand is always open."

"I swear that I should never have ventured to ask M. Fouquet for money. I only wished to ask him for your address."

"To ask M. Fouquet for my address?" exclaimed Aramis, opening his eyes in real astonishment.

"Yes," said Baisemeaux, greatly disturbed by the glance which the prelate fixed upon him,—“at M. Fouquet's certainly."

"There is no harm in that, dear M. Baisemeaux, only I would ask, why ask my address of M. Fouquet?"

"That I might write to you."

"I understand," said Aramis smiling, "but that is not what I meant; I do not ask you what you required my address for: I only ask why you should go to M. Fouquet for it?"

"Oh!" said Baisemeaux, "as Belle-Isle is the property of M. Fouquet, and as Belle-Isle is in the diocese of Vannes, and as you are bishop of Vannes—"

"But, my dear Baisemeaux, since you knew I was bishop of Vannes, you had no occasion to ask M. Fouquet for my address."

"Well, monsieur," said Baisemeaux, completely at bay, "if I have acted indiscreetly, I beg your pardon most sincerely."

"Nonsense," observed Aramis calmly: "how can you possibly have acted indiscreetly?" And while he composed his face, and continued to smile cheerfully on the governor, he was considering how Baisemeaux, who was not aware of his address, knew, however, that Vannes was his residence. "I shall clear all this up," he said to himself; and then speaking aloud, added,—“Well, my dear governor shall we now arrange our little accounts?"

"I am at your orders, my lord; but tell me beforehand, my lord, whether you will do me the honour to breakfast with me as usual?"

"Very willingly, indeed."

"That's well," said Baisemeaux, as he struck the bell before him three times.

"What does that mean?" inquired Aramis.

"That I have some one to breakfast with me, and that preparations are to be made accordingly."

"And you rang thrice. Really, my dear governor, I begin to think you are acting ceremoniously with me."

"No, indeed. Besides, the least I can do is to receive you in the best way I can."

"But why so?"

"Because not even a prince could have done what you have done for me."

"Nonsense! nonsense!"

"Nay, I assure you—"

"Let us speak of other matters," said Aramis. "Or rather, tell me how your affairs here are getting on."

"Not over well."

"The deuce!"

"M. de Mazarin was not hard enough."

"Yes, I see; you require a government full of suspicion—like that of the old cardinal, for instance."

"Yes; matters went on better under him. The brother of his 'gray eminence' made his fortune here."

"Believe me, my dear governor," said Aramis, drawing closer to Baisemeaux, "a young king is well worth an old cardinal. Youth has its suspicions, its fits of anger, its prejudices, as old age has its hatreds, its precautions, and its fears. Have you paid your three years' profits to Louvivre and Tremblay?"

"Most certainly I have."

"So that you have nothing more to give them than the fifty thousand francs I have brought with me?"

"Nothing."

"Have you not saved anything, then?"

"My lord, in giving the fifty thousand francs of my own to these gentlemen, I assure you that I gave them everything I gain. I told M. d'Artagnan so yesterday evening."

"Ah!" said Aramis, whose eyes sparkled for a moment, but became immediately afterwards as unmoved as before; "so you have been to see my old friend D'Artagnan; how was he?"

"Wonderfully well."

"And what did you say to him, M. de Baisemeaux?"

"I told him," continued the governor, not perceiving his own thoughtlessness; "I told him that I fed my prisoners too well."

"How many have you?" inquired Aramis, in an indifferent tone of voice.

"Sixty."

"Well, that is a tolerably round number."

"In former times, my lord, there were, during certain years, as many as two hundred."

"Still a minimum of sixty is not to be grumbled at."

"Perhaps not; for, to anybody but myself, each prisoner would bring in two hundred and fifty pistoles; for instance, for a prince of the blood I have fifty francs a day."

"Only you have no prince of the blood; at least, I suppose so," said Aramis, with a slight tremor in his voice.

"No, thank heaven!—I mean, no, unfortunately."

"What do you mean by unfortunately?"

"Because my appointment would be improved by it. So fifty francs per day for a prince of the blood, thirty-six for a marechal of France—"

"But you have as many marechals of France, I suppose, as you have princes of the blood?"

"Alas! no more. It is true lieutenant-generals and brigadiers pay twenty-six francs, and I have two of them. After that, come councilors of parliament, who bring me fifteen francs, and I have six of them."

"I did not know," said Aramis, "that councilors were so productive."

"Yes; but from fifteen francs I sink at once to ten francs; namely, for an ordinary judge, and for an ecclesiastic."

"And you have seven, you say; an excellent affair."

"Nay, a bad one, and for this reason. How can I possibly treat these poor fellows, who are of some good, at all events, otherwise than as a councilor of parliament?"

"Yes, you are right; I do not see five francs difference between them."

"You understand; if I have a fine fish, I pay four or five francs for it; if I get a fine fowl, it cost me a franc and a half. I fatten a good deal of poultry, but I have to buy grain, and you cannot imagine the army of rats that infest this place."

"Why not get half a dozen cats to deal with them?"

"Cats, indeed; yes, they eat them, but I was obliged to give up the idea because of the way in which they treated my grain. I have been obliged to have some terrier dogs sent me from England to kill the rats. These dogs, unfortunately, have tremendous appetites; they eat as much as a prisoner of the fifth order, without taking into account the rabbits and fowls they kill."

Was Aramis really listening or not? No one could have told; his downcast eyes showed the attentive man, but the restless hand betrayed the man absorbed in thought—Aramis was meditating.

"I was saying," continued Baisemeaux, "that a good-sized fowl costs me a franc and a half, and that a fine fish costs me four or five francs. Three meals are served at the Bastille, and, as the prisoners, having nothing to do, are always eating, a ten-franc man costs me seven francs and a half."

"But did you not say that you treated those at ten francs like those at fifteen?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Very well! Then you gain seven francs and a half upon those who pay you fifteen francs."

"I must compensate myself somehow," said Baisemeaux, who saw how he had been snapped up.

"You are quite right, my dear governor; but have you no prisoners below ten francs?"

"Oh, yes! we have citizens and barristers at five francs."

"And do they eat, too?"

"Not a doubt about it; only you understand that they do not get fish or poultry, nor rich wines at every meal; but at all events thrice a week they have a good dish at their dinner."

"Really, you are quite a philanthropist, my dear governor, and you will ruin yourself."

"No; understand me; when the fifteen-franc has not eaten his fowl, or the ten-franc has left his dish unfinished, I send it to the five-franc prisoner; it is a feast for the poor devil, and one must be charitable, you know."

"And what do you make out of your five-franc prisoners?"

"A franc and a half."

"Baisemeaux, you're an honest fellow; in honest truth I say so."

"Thank you, my lord. But I feel most for the small tradesmen and bailiffs' clerks, who are rated at three francs. They do not often see Rhine carp or Channel sturgeon."

"But do not the five-franc gentlemen sometimes leave some scraps?"

"Oh! my lord, do not believe I am so stingy as that; I delight the heart of some poor little tradesman or clerk by sending him a wing of a red partridge, a slice of venison, or a slice of a truffled pasty, dishes which he never tasted except in his dreams; these are the leavings of the twenty-four-franc prisoners; and as he eats and drinks, at dessert he cries 'Long live the King,' and blesses the Bastille; with a couple bottles of champagne, which cost me five sous, I make him tipsy every Sunday. That class of people call down blessings upon me, and are sorry to leave the prison. Do you know that I have remarked, and it does me infinite honour, that certain prisoners, who have been set at liberty, have, almost immediately afterwards, got imprisoned again? Why should this be the case, unless it be to enjoy the pleasures of my kitchen? It is really the fact."

Aramis smiled with an expression of incredulity.

"You smile," said Baisemeaux.

"I do," returned Aramis.

"I tell you that we have names which have been inscribed on our books thrice in the space of two years."

"I must see it before I believe it," said Aramis.

"Well, I can show it to you, although it is prohibited to communicate the registers to strangers; and if you really wish to see it with your own eyes—"

"I should be delighted, I confess."

"Very well," said Baisemeaux, and he took out of a cupboard a large register. Aramis followed him most anxiously with his eyes, and Baisemeaux returned, placed the register upon the table, and turned over the leaves for a minute, and stayed at the letter M.

"Look here," said he, "Martinier, January, 1659; Martinier, June, 1660; Martinier, March, 1661. Mazarinades, etc.; you understand it was only a pretext; people were not sent to the Bastille for jokes against M. Mazarin; the fellow denounced himself in order to get imprisoned here."

"And what was his object?"

"None other than to return to my kitchen at three francs a day."

"Three francs—poor devil!"

"The poet, my lord, belongs to the lowest scale, the same style of board as the small tradesman and bailiff's clerk; but I repeat, it is to those people that I give these little surprises."

Aramis mechanically turned over the leaves of the register, continuing to read the names, but without appearing to take any interest in the names he read.

"In 1661, you perceive," said Baisemeaux, "eighty entries; and in 1659, eighty also."

“Ah!” said Aramis. “Seldon; I seem to know that name. Was it not you who spoke to me about a certain young man?”

“Yes, a poor devil of a student, who made—What do you call that where two Latin verses rhyme together?”

“A distich.”

“Yes; that is it.”

“Poor fellow; for a distich.”

“Do you know that he made this distich against the Jesuits?”

“That makes no difference; the punishment seems very severe. Do not pity him; last year you seemed to interest yourself in him.”

“Yes, I did so.”

“Well, as your interest is all-powerful here, my lord, I have treated him since that time as a prisoner at fifteen francs.”

“The same as this one, then,” said Aramis, who had continued turning over the leaves, and who had stopped at one of the names which followed Martinier.

“Yes, the same as that one.”

“Is that Marchiali an Italian?” said Aramis, pointing with his finger to the name which had attracted his attention.

“Hush!” said Baisemeaux.

“Why hush?” said Aramis, involuntarily clenching his white hand.

“I thought I had already spoken to you about that Marchiali.”

“No, it is the first time I ever heard his name pronounced.”

“That may be, but perhaps I have spoken to you about him without naming him.”

“Is he an old offender?” asked Aramis, attempting to smile.

“On the contrary, he is quite young.”

“Is his crime, then, very heinous?”

“Unpardonable.”

“Has he assassinated any one?”

“Bah!”

“An incendiary, then?”

“Bah!”

“Has he slandered any one?”

“No, no! It is he who—” and Baisemeaux approached Aramis’s ear, making a sort of ear-trumpet of his hands, and whispered: “It is he who presumes to resemble the—”

“Yes, yes,” said Aramis; “I now remember you already spoke about it last year to me; but the crime appeared to me so slight.”

“Slight, do you say?”

“Or rather, so involuntary.”

“My lord, it is not involuntarily that such a resemblance is detected.”

“Well, the fact is, I had forgotten it. But, my dear host,” said Aramis, closing the register, “if I am not mistaken, we are summoned.”

Baisemeaux took the register, hastily restored it to its place in the closet, which he locked, and put the key in his pocket. “Will it be agreeable to your lordship to breakfast now?” said he; “for you are right in supposing that breakfast was announced.”

“Assuredly, my dear governor,” and they passed into the dining-room.

XXIV. The Breakfast at Monsieur de Baisemeaux’s.

Aramis was generally temperate; but on this occasion, while taking every care of his constitution, he did ample justice to Baisemeaux’s breakfast, which, in all respects, was most excellent. The latter on his side, was animated with the wildest gayety; the sight of the five thousand pistoles, which he glanced at from time to time, seemed to open his heart. Every now and then he looked at Aramis with an expression of the deepest gratitude; while the latter, leaning back in his chair, took a few sips of wine from his glass, with the air of a connoisseur. “Let me never hear any ill words against the fare of the Bastille,” said he, half closing his eyes; “happy are the prisoners who can get only half a bottle of such Burgundy every day.”

“All those at fifteen francs drink it,” said Baisemeaux. “It is very old Volnay.”

“Does that poor student, Seldon, drink such good wine?”

“Oh, no!”

“I thought I heard you say he was boarded at fifteen francs.”

“He! no, indeed; a man who makes districts—distichs I mean—at fifteen francs! No, no! it is his neighbor who is at fifteen francs.”

“Which neighbor?”

“The other, second Bertaudiere.”

“Excuse me, my dear governor; but you speak a language which requires quite an apprenticeship to understand.”

“Very true,” said the governor. “Allow me to explain: second Bertaudiere is the person who occupies the second floor of the tower of the Bertaudiere.”

“So that Bertaudiere is the name of one of the towers of the Bastille? The fact is, I think I recollect hearing that each tower has a name of its own. Whereabouts is the one you are speaking of?”

“Look,” said Baisemeaux, going to the window. “It is that tower to the left—the second one.”

“Is the prisoner at fifteen francs there?”

“Yes.”

“Since when?”

“Seven or eight years, nearly.”

“What do you mean by nearly? Do you not know the dates more precisely?”

“It was not in my time, M. d’Herblay.”

“But I should have thought that Louviere or Tremblay would have told you.”

“The secrets of the Bastille are never handed over with the keys of the governorship.”

“Indeed! Then the cause of his imprisonment is a mystery—a state secret.”

“Oh, no! I do not suppose it is a state secret, but a secret—like everything that happens at the Bastille.”

“But,” said Aramis, “why do you speak more freely of Seldon than of second Bertaudiere?”

“Because, in my opinion, the crime of the man who writes a distich is not so great as that of the man who resembles—”

“Yes, yes; I understand you. Still, do not the turnkeys talk with your prisoners?”

“Of course.”

“The prisoners, I suppose, tell them they are not guilty?”

“They are always telling them that; it is a matter of course; the same song over and over again.”

“But does not the resemblance you were speaking about just now strike the turnkeys?”

“My dear M. d’Herblay, it is only for men attached to the court, as you are, to take trouble about such matters.”

“You’re right, you’re right, my dear M. Baisemeaux. Let me give you another taste of this Volnay.”

“Not a taste merely, a full glass; fill yours too.”

“Nay, nay! You are a musketeer still, to the very tips of your fingers, while I have become a bishop. A taste for me; a glass for yourself.”

“As you please.” And Aramis and the governor nodded to each other, as they drank their wine. “But,” said Aramis, looking with fixed attention at the ruby-coloured wine he had raised to the level of his eyes, as if he wished to enjoy it with all his senses at the same moment, “but what you might call a resemblance, another would not, perhaps, take any notice of.”

“Most certainly he would, though, if it were any one who knew the person he resembles.”

“I really think, dear M. Baisemeaux, that it can be nothing more than a resemblance of your own creation.”

“Upon my honour, it is not so.”

“Stay,” continued Aramis. “I have seen many persons very like the one we are speaking of; but, out of respect, no one ever said anything about it.”

“Very likely; because there is resemblance and resemblance. This is a striking one, and, if you were to see him, you would admit it to be so.”

“If I were to see him, indeed,” said Aramis, in an indifferent tone; “but in all probability I never shall.”

“Why not?”

“Because if I were even to put my foot inside one of those horrible dungeons, I should fancy I was buried there forever.”

“No, no; the cells are very good places to live in.”

“I really do not, and cannot believe it, and that is a fact.”

“Pray do not speak ill of second Bertaudiere. It is really a good room, very nicely furnished and carpeted. The young fellow has by no means been unhappy there; the best lodging the Bastille affords has been his. There is a chance for you.”

“Nay, nay,” said Aramis, coldly; “you will never make me believe there are any good rooms in the Bastille; and, as for your carpets, they exist only in your imagination. I should find nothing but spiders, rats, and perhaps toads, too.”

“Toads?” cried Baisemeaux.

“Yes, in the dungeons.”

“Ah! I don’t say there are not toads in the dungeons,” replied Baisemeaux. “But—will you be convinced by your own eyes?” he continued, with a sudden impulse.

“No, certainly not.”

“Not even to satisfy yourself of the resemblance which you deny, as you do the carpets?”

“Some spectral-looking person, a mere shadow; an unhappy, dying man.”

“Nothing of the kind—as brisk and vigorous a young fellow as ever lived.”

“Melancholy and ill-tempered, then?”

“Not at all; very gay and lively.”

“Nonsense; you are joking.”

“Will you follow me?” said Baisemeaux.

“What for?”

“To go the round of the Bastille.”

“Why?”

“You will then see for yourself—see with your own eyes.”

“But the regulations?”

"Never mind them. To-day my major has leave of absence; the lieutenant is visiting the post on the bastions; we are sole masters of the situation."

"No, no, my dear governor; why, the very idea of the sound of the bolts makes me shudder. You will only have to forget me in second or fourth Bertaudiere, and then—"

"You are refusing an opportunity that may never present itself again. Do you know that, to obtain the favour I propose to you gratis, some of the princes of the blood have offered me as much as fifty thousand francs."

"Really! he must be worth seeing, then?"

"Forbidden fruit, my lord; forbidden fruit. You who belong to the church ought to know that."

"Well, if had any curiosity, it would be to see the poor author of the distich."

"Very well, we will see him, too; but if I were at all curious, it would be about the beautiful carpeted room and its lodger."

"Furniture is very commonplace; and a face with no expression in it offers little or no interest."

"But a boarder at fifteen francs is always interesting."

"By the by, I forgot to ask you about that. Why fifteen francs for him, and only three francs for poor Seldon?"

"The distinction made in that instance was a truly noble act, and one which displayed the king's goodness of heart to great advantage."

"The king's, you say."

"The cardinal's, I mean. 'This unhappy man,' said M. Mazarin, 'is destined to remain in prison forever.'"

"Why so?"

"Why, it seems that his crime is a lasting one; and, consequently, his punishment ought to be so, too."

"Lasting?"

"No doubt of it, unless he is fortunate enough to catch the small-pox, and even that is difficult, for we never get any impure air here."

"Nothing can be more ingenious than your train of reasoning, my dear M. Baisemeaux. Do you, however, mean to say that this unfortunate man must suffer without interruption or termination?"

"I did not say he was to suffer, my lord; a fifteen-franc boarder does not suffer."

"He suffers imprisonment, at all events."

"No doubt; there is no help for that, but this suffering is sweetened for him. You must admit that this young fellow was not born to eat all the good things he does eat; for instance, such things as we have on the table now; this pasty that has not been touched, these crawfish from the River Marne, of which we have hardly taken any, and which are almost as large as lobsters; all these things will at once be taken to second Bertaudiere, with a bottle of that Volnay which you think so excellent. After you have seen it you will believe it, I hope."

"Yes, my dear governor, certainly; but all this time you are thinking only of your very happy fifteen-franc prisoner, and you forget poor Seldon, my protege."

"Well, out of consideration for you, it shall be a gala day for him; he shall have some biscuits and preserves with this small bottle of port."

"You are a good-hearted fellow; I have said so already, and I repeat it, my dear Baisemeaux."

"Well, let us set off, then," said the governor, a little bewildered, partly from the wine he had drunk, and partly from Aramis's praises.

"Do not forget that I only go to oblige you," said the prelate.

"Very well; but you will thank me when you get there."

"Let us go, then."

"Wait until I have summoned the jailer," said Baisemeaux, as he struck the bell twice; at which summons a man appeared. "I am going to visit the towers," said the governor. "No guards, no drums, no noise at all."

"If I were not to leave my cloak here," said Aramis, pretending to be alarmed, "I should really think I was going to prison on my own account."

The jailer preceded the governor, Aramis walking on his right hand; some of the soldiers who happened to be in the courtyard drew themselves up in a line, as stiff as posts, as the governor passed along. Baisemeaux led the way down several steps which conducted to a sort of esplanade; thence they arrived at the drawbridge, where the sentinels on duty received the governor with the proper honours. The governor turned toward Aramis, and, speaking in such a tone that the sentinels could not lose a word, he observed,—"I hope you have a good memory, monsieur?"

"Why?" inquired Aramis.

"On account of your plans and your measurements, for you know that no one is allowed, not architects even, to enter where the prisoners are, with paper, pens or pencil."

"Good," said Aramis to himself, "it seems I am an architect, then. It sounds like one of D'Artagnan's jokes, who perceived in me the engineer of Belle-Isle." Then he added aloud: "Be easy on that score, monsieur; in our profession, a mere glance and a good memory are quite sufficient."

Baisemeaux did not change countenance, and the soldiers took Aramis for what he seemed to be. "Very well; we will first visit la Bertaudiere," said Baisemeaux, still intending the sentinels to hear him. Then, turning to the jailer, he added: "You will take the opportunity of carrying to No. 2 the few dainties I pointed out."

"Dear M. de Baisemeaux," said Aramis, "you are always forgetting No. 3."

"So I am," said the governor; and upon that, they began to ascend. The number of bolts, gratings, and locks for this single courtyard would have sufficed for the safety of an entire city. Aramis was neither an imaginative nor a sensitive man; he had been somewhat of a poet in his youth, but his heart was hard and indifferent, as the heart of every man of fifty-five years of age is, who has been frequently and passionately attached to women in his lifetime, or rather who has been passionately loved by them. But when he placed his foot upon the worn stone steps, along which so many unhappy wretches had passed, when he felt himself impregnated, as it were, with the atmosphere of those gloomy dungeons, moistened with tears, there could be but little doubt he was overcome by his feelings, for his head was bowed and his eyes became dim, as he followed Baisemeaux without a syllable.

XXV. The Second Floor of la Bertaudiere.

On the second flight of stairs, whether from fatigue or emotion, the breathing of the visitor began to fail him, and he leaned against the wall. "Will you begin with this one?" said Baisemeaux; "for since we are going to both, it matters very little whether we ascend from the second to the third story, or descend from the third to the second."

"No, no," exclaimed Aramis, eagerly, "higher, if you please; the one above is the more urgent." They continued their ascent. "Ask the jailer for the keys," whispered Aramis. Baisemeaux did so, took the keys, and, himself, opened the door of the third room. The jailer was the first to enter; he placed upon the table the provisions, which the kind-hearted governor called dainties, and then left the room. The prisoner had not stirred; Baisemeaux then entered, while Aramis remained at the threshold, from which place he saw a youth about eighteen years of age, who, raising his head at the unusual noise, jumped off the bed, as he perceived the governor, and clasping his hands together, began to cry out, "My mother, my mother," in tones which betrayed such deep distress that Aramis, despite his command over himself, felt a shudder pass through his frame. "My dear boy," said Baisemeaux, endeavoring to smile, "I have brought you a diversion and an extra,—the one for the mind, the other for the body; this gentleman has come to take your measure, and here are some preserves for your dessert."

"Oh, monsieur!" exclaimed the young man, "keep me in solitude for a year, let me have nothing but bread and water for a year, but tell me that at the end of a year I shall leave this place, tell me that at the end of a year I shall see my mother again."

"But I have heard you say that your mother was very poor, and that you were very badly lodged when you were living with her, while here—upon my word!"

"If she were poor, monsieur, the greater reason to restore her only means of support to her. Badly lodged with her! Oh, monsieur, every one is always well lodged when he is free."

"At all events, since you yourself admit you have done nothing but write that unhappy distich—"

"But without any intention, I swear. Let me be punished—cut off the hand which wrote it, I will work with the other—but restore my mother to me."

"My boy," said Baisemeaux, "you know very well that it does not depend upon me; all I can do for you is to increase your rations, give you a glass of port wine now and then, slip in a biscuit for you between a couple of plates."

"Great heaven!" exclaimed the young man, falling backward and rolling on the ground.

Aramis, unable to bear this scene any longer, withdrew as far as the landing. "Unhappy, wretched man," he murmured.

"Yes, monsieur, he is indeed very wretched," said the jailer; "but it is his parents' fault."

"In what way?"

"No doubt. Why did they let him learn Latin? Too much knowledge, you see; it is that which does harm. Now I, for instance, can't read or write, and therefore I am not in prison." Aramis looked at the man, who seemed to think that being a jailer in the Bastille was not being in prison. As for Baisemeaux, noticing the little effect produced by his advice and his port wine, he left the dungeon quite upset.

"You have forgotten to close the door," said the jailer.

"So I have," said Baisemeaux; "there are the keys, do you do it."

"I will solicit the pardon of that poor boy," said Aramis.

"And if you do not succeed," said Baisemeaux, "at least beg that he may be transferred to the ten-franc list, by which both he and I shall be gainers."

"If the other prisoner calls out for his mother in a similar manner," said Aramis, "I prefer not to enter at all, but will take my measure from outside."

"No fear of that, monsieur architect, the one we are now going to see is as gentle as a lamb; before he could call after his mother he must open his lips, and he never says a word."

"Let us go in, then," said Aramis, gloomily.

"Are you the architect of the prisons, monsieur?" said the jailer.

"I am."

"It is odd, then, that you are not more accustomed to all this."

Aramis perceived that, to avoid giving rise to any suspicions, he must summon all his strength of mind to his assistance. Baisemeaux, who carried the keys, opened the door. "Stay outside," he said to the jailer, "and wait for us at the bottom of the steps." The jailer obeyed and withdrew.

Baisemeaux entered first, and opened the second door himself. By the light which filtered through the iron-barred window, could be seen a handsome young man, short in stature, with closely cut hair, and a beard beginning to grow; he was sitting on a stool, his elbow resting on an armchair, and with all the upper part of his body reclining against it. His dress, thrown upon the bed, was of rich black velvet, and he inhaled the fresh air which blew in upon his breast through a shirt of the very finest cambric. As the governor entered, the young man turned his head with a look full of indifference; and on recognizing Baisemeaux, he arose and saluted him courteously. But when his eyes fell upon Aramis, who remained in the background, the latter trembled, turned pale, and his hat, which he held in his hand, fell upon the ground, as if all his muscles had become relaxed at once. Baisemeaux, habituated to the presence of his prisoner, did not seem to share any of the sensations which Aramis experienced, but, with all the zeal of a good servant, he busied himself in arranging on the table the pasty and crawfish he had brought with him. Occupied in this manner, he did not remark how disturbed his guest had become. When he had finished, however, he turned to the young prisoner and said: "You are looking very well,—are you so?"

"Quite well, I thank you, monsieur," replied the young man.

The effect of the voice was such as almost to overpower Aramis, and notwithstanding his control over himself, he advanced a few steps towards him, with his eyes wide open and his lips trembling. The movement he made was so marked that Baisemeaux, notwithstanding his preoccupation, observed it. "This gentleman is an architect who has come to examine your chimney," said Baisemeaux; "does it smoke?"

"Never, monsieur."

"You were saying just now," said the governor, rubbing his hands together, "that it was not possible for a man to be happy in prison; here, however, is one who is so. You have nothing to complain of, I hope?"

"Nothing."

"Do you ever feel weary?" said Aramis.

"Never."

"Ha, ha," said Baisemeaux, in a low tone of voice; "was I right?"

"Well, my dear governor, it is impossible not to yield to evidence. Is it allowed to put any question to him?"

"As many as you like."

"Very well; be good enough to ask him if he knows why he is here."

"This gentleman requests me to ask you," said Baisemeaux, "if you are aware of the cause of your imprisonment?"

"No, monsieur," said the young man, unaffectedly, "I am not."

"That is hardly possible," said Aramis, carried away by his feelings in spite of himself; "if you were really ignorant of the cause of your detention, you would be furious."

"I was so during the early days of my imprisonment."

"Why are you not so now?"

"Because I have reflected."

"That is strange," said Aramis.

"Is it not odd?" said Baisemeaux.

"May one venture to ask you, monsieur, on what you have reflected?"

"I felt that as I had committed no crime, Heaven could not punish me."

"What is a prison, then," inquired Aramis, "if it be not a punishment."

"Alas! I cannot tell," said the young man; "all that I can tell you now is the very opposite of what I felt seven years ago."

"To hear you converse, to witness your resignation, one might almost believe that you liked your imprisonment?"

"I endure it."

"In the certainty of recovering your freedom some day, I suppose?"

"I have no certainty; hope, I have, and that is all; and yet I acknowledge that this hope becomes less every day."

"Still, why should you not again be free, since you have already been so?"

"That is precisely the reason," replied the young man, "which prevents me from expecting liberty; why should I have been imprisoned at all if it had been intended to release me afterwards?"

"How old are you?"

"I do not know."

"What is your name?"

"I have forgotten the name by which I was called."

"Who are your parents?"

"I never knew them."

"But those who brought you up?"

"They did not call me their son."

"Did you ever love any one before coming here?"

"I loved my nurse, and my flowers."

"Was that all?"

"I also loved my valet."

"Do you regret your nurse and your valet?"

"I wept very much when they died."

"Did they die since you have been here, or before you came?"

"They died the evening before I was carried off."

"Both at the same time?"

"Yes, both at the same time."

"In what manner were you carried off?"

"A man came for me, directed me to get into a carriage, which was closed and locked, and brought me here."

"Would you be able to recognize that man again?"

"He was masked."

"Is this not an extraordinary tale?" said Baisemeaux, in a low tone of voice, to Aramis, who could hardly breathe.

"It is indeed extraordinary," he murmured.

"But what is still more extraordinary is, that he has never told me so much as he has just told you."

"Perhaps the reason may be that you have never questioned him," said Aramis.

"It's possible," replied Baisemeaux; "I have no curiosity. Have you looked at the room? it's a fine one, is it not?"

"Very much so."

"A carpet—"

"Beautiful."

"I'll wager he had nothing like it before he came here."

"I think so, too." And then again turning towards the young man, he said, "Do you not remember to have been visited at some time or another by a strange lady or gentleman?"

"Yes, indeed; thrice by a woman, who each time came to the door in a carriage, and entered covered with a veil, which she raised when we were together and alone."

"Do you remember that woman?"

"Yes."

"What did she say to you?"

The young man smiled mounfully, and then replied, "She inquired, as you have just done, if I were happy, and if I were getting weary."

"What did she do on arriving, and on leaving you?"

"She pressed me in her arms, held me in her embrace, and kissed me."

"Do you remember her?"

"Perfectly."

"Do you recall her features distinctly?"

"Yes."

"You would recognize her, then, if accident brought her before you, or led you into her person?"

"Most certainly."

A flush of fleeting satisfaction passed across Aramis's face. At this moment Baisemeaux heard the jailer approaching. "Shall we leave?" he said, hastily, to Aramis.

Aramis, who probably had learnt all that he cared to know, replied, "When you like."

The young man saw them prepare to leave, and saluted them politely. Baisemeaux replied merely by a nod of the head, while Aramis, with a respect, arising perhaps from the sight of such misfortune, saluted the prisoner profoundly. They left the room, Baisemeaux closing the door behind them.

"Well," said Baisemeaux, as they descended the staircase, "what do you think of it all?"

"I have discovered the secret, my dear governor," he said.

"Bah! what is the secret, then?"

"A murder was committed in that house."

"Nonsense."

"But attend; the valet and nurse died the same day."

"Well."

"And by poison. What do you think?"

"That is very likely to be true."

"What! that that young man is an assassin?"

"Who said that? What makes you think that poor young fellow could be an assassin?"

"The very thing I was saying. A crime was committed in his house," said Aramis, "and that was quite sufficient; perhaps he saw the criminals, and it was feared that he might say something."

"The deuce! if I only thought that—"

"Well?"

"I would redouble the surveillance."

"Oh, he does not seem to wish to escape."

"You do not know what prisoners are."

"Has he any books?"

"None; they are strictly prohibited, and under M. de Mazarin's own hand."

"Have you the writing still?"

"Yes, my lord; would you like to look at it as you return to take your cloak?"

"I should, for I like to look at autographs."

"Well, then, this one is of the most unquestionable authenticity; there is only one erasure."

"Ah, ah! an erasure; and in what respect?"

"With respect to a figure. At first there was written: 'To be boarded at fifty francs.'"

"As princes of the blood, in fact?"

"But the cardinal must have seen his mistake, you understand; for he canceled the zero, and has added a one before the five. But, by the by—"

"What?"

"You do not speak of the resemblance."

"I do not speak of it, dear M. de Baisemeaux, for a very simple reason— because it does not exist."

"The deuce it doesn't."

"Or, if it does exist, it is only in your own imagination; but, supposing it were to exist elsewhere, I think it would be better for you not to speak of about it."

"Really."

"The king, Louis XIV.—you understand—would be excessively angry with you, if he were to learn that you contributed in any way to spread the report that one of his subjects has the effrontery to resemble him."

"It is true, quite true," said Baisemeaux, thoroughly alarmed; "but I have not spoken of the circumstance to any one but yourself, and you understand, my lord, that I perfectly rely on your discretion."

“Oh, be easy.”
“Do you still wish to see the note?”
“Certainly.”

While engaged in this manner in conversation, they had returned to the governor’s apartments; Baisemeaux took from the cupboard a private register, like the one he had already shown Aramis, but fastened by a lock, the key which opened it being one of a small bunch which Baisemeaux always carried with him. Then placing the book upon the table, he opened it at the letter “M,” and showed Aramis the following note in the column of observations: “No books at any time; all linen and clothes of the finest and best quality to be procured; no exercise; always the same jailer; no communications with any one. Musical instruments; every liberty and every indulgence which his welfare may require; to be boarded at fifteen francs. M. de Baisemeaux can claim more if the fifteen francs be not sufficient.”

“Ah,” said Baisemeaux, “now I think of it, I shall claim it.”
Aramis shut the book. “Yes,” he said, “it is indeed M. de Mazarin’s handwriting; I recognize it well. Now, my dear governor,” he continued, as if this last communication had exhausted his interest, “let us now turn over to our own little affairs.”

“Well, what time for repayment do you wish me to take? Fix it yourself.”
“There need not be any particular period fixed; give me a simple acknowledgement for one hundred and fifty thousand francs.”
“When to be made payable?”

“When I require it; but, you understand, I shall only wish it when you yourself do.”
“Oh, I am quite easy on that score,” said Baisemeaux, smiling; “but I have already given you two receipts.”
“Which I now destroy,” said Aramis; and after having shown the two receipts to Baisemeaux, he destroyed them. Overcome by so great a mark of confidence, Baisemeaux unhesitatingly wrote out an acknowledgement of a debt of one hundred and fifty thousand francs, payable at the pleasure of the prelate. Aramis, who had, by glancing over the governor’s shoulder, followed the pen as he wrote, put the acknowledgement into his pocket without seeming to have read it, which made Baisemeaux perfectly easy. “Now,” said Aramis, “you will not be angry with me if I were to carry off one of your prisoners?”

“What do you mean?”
“By obtaining his pardon, of course. Have I not already told you that I took a great interest in poor Seldon?”
“Yes, quite true, you did so.”

“Well?”
“That is your affair; do as you think proper. I see you have an open hand, and an arm that can reach a great way.”
“Adieu, adieu.” And Aramis left, carrying with him the governor’s best wishes.

XXVI. The Two Friends.

At the very time M. de Baisemeaux was showing Aramis the prisoners in the Bastille, a carriage drew up at Madame de Belliere’s door, and, at that still early hour, a young woman alighted, her head muffled in a silk hood. When the servants announced Madame Vanel to Madame de Belliere, the latter was engaged, or rather was absorbed, in reading a letter, which she hurriedly concealed. She had hardly finished her morning toilette, her maid being still in the next room. At the name—at the footsteps of Marguerite Vanel, Madame de Belliere ran to meet her. She fancied she could detect in her friend’s eyes a brightness which was neither that of health nor of pleasure. Marguerite embraced her, pressed her hands, and hardly allowed her time to speak. “Dearest,” she said, “have you forgotten me? Have you quite given yourself up to the pleasures of the court?”

“I have not even seen the marriage fetes.”
“What are you doing with yourself, then?”
“I am getting ready to leave for Belliere.”
“For Belliere?”

“Yes.”
“You are becoming rustic in your tastes, then; I delight to see you so disposed. But you are pale.”
“No, I am perfectly well.”

“So much the better; I was becoming uneasy about you. You do not know what I have been told.”
“People say so many things.”
“Yes, but this is very singular.”
“How well you know how to excite curiosity, Marguerite.”

“Well, I was afraid of vexing you.”
“Never; you have yourself always admired me for my evenness of temper.”
“Well, then, it is said that—no, I shall never be able to tell you.”
“Do not let us talk about it, then,” said Madame de Belliere, who detected the ill-nature that was concealed by all these prefaces, yet felt the most anxious curiosity on the subject.

“Well, then, my dear marquise, it is said, for some time past, you no longer continue to regret Monsieur de Belliere as you used to.”
“It is an ill-natured report, Marguerite. I do regret, and shall always regret, my husband; but it is now two years since he died. I am only twenty-eight years old, and my grief at his loss ought not always to control every action and thought of my life. You, Marguerite, who are the model of a wife, would not believe me if I were to say so.”
“Why not? Your heart is so soft and yielding,” she said, spitefully.

“Yours is so, too, Marguerite, and yet I did not perceive that you allowed yourself to be overcome by grief when your heart was wounded.” These words were in direct allusion to Marguerite’s rupture with the superintendent, and were also a veiled but direct reproach made against her friend’s heart.
As if she only awaited this signal to discharge her shaft, Marguerite exclaimed, “Well, Elise, it is said you are in love.” And she looked fixedly at Madame de Belliere, who blushed against her will.

“Women can never escape slander,” replied the marquise, after a moment’s pause.
“No one slanders you, Elise.”

“What!—people say that I am in love, and yet they do not slander me!”
“In the first place, if it be true, it is no slander, but simply a scandal-loving report. In the next place—for you did not allow me to finish what I was saying—the public does not assert that you have abandoned yourself to this passion. It represents you, on the contrary, as a virtuous but loving woman, defending yourself with claws and teeth, shutting yourself up in your own house as in a fortress; in other respects, as impenetrable as that of Danae, notwithstanding Danae’s tower was made of brass.”

“You are witty, Marguerite,” said Madame de Belliere, angrily.
“You always flatter me, Elise. In short, however, you are reported to be incorruptible and unapproachable. You cannot decide whether the world is calumniating you or not; but what is it you are musing about while I am speaking to you?”

“I?”
“Yes; you are blushing and do not answer me.”
“I was trying,” said the marquise, raising her beautiful eyes brightened with an indication of growing temper, “I was trying to discover to what you could possibly have alluded, you who are so learned in mythological subjects, in comparing me to Danae.”

“You were trying to guess that?” said Marguerite, laughing.
“Yes; do you not remember that at the convent, when we were solving our problems in arithmetic—ah! what I have to tell you is learned also, but it is my turn—do you not remember, that if one of the terms were given, we were to find the other? Therefore do you guess now?”

“I cannot conjecture what you mean.”
“And yet nothing is more simple. You pretend that I am in love, do you not?”
“So it is said.”

“Very well; it is not said, I suppose, that I am in love with an abstraction. There must surely be a name mentioned in this report.”
“Certainly, a name is mentioned.”

“Very well; it is not surprising, then, that I should try to guess this name, since you do not tell it.”
“My dear marquise, when I saw you blush, I did not think you would have to spend much time in conjectures.”
“It was the word Danae which you used that surprised me. Danae means a shower of gold, does it not?”

“That is to say that the Jupiter of Danae changed himself into a shower of gold for her.”
“My lover, then, he whom you assign me—”

“I beg your pardon; I am your friend, and assign you no one.”
“That may be; but those who are ill disposed towards me.”

“Do you wish to hear the name?”
“I have been waiting this half hour for it.”
“Well, then, you shall hear it. Do not be shocked; he is a man high in power.”

“Good,” said the marquise, as she clenched her hands like a patient at the approach of the knife.
“He is a very wealthy man,” continued Marguerite; “the wealthiest, it may be. In a word, it is—”

The marquise closed her eyes for a moment.
“It is the Duke of Buckingham,” said Marguerite, bursting into laughter. This perfidy had been calculated with extreme ability; the name that was pronounced, instead of the name which the marquise awaited, had precisely the same effect upon her as the badly sharpened axes, that had hacked, without destroying, Messieurs de Chalais and de Thou upon the scaffold. She recovered herself, however, and said, “I was perfectly right in saying you were a witty woman, for you are making the time pass away most agreeably. This joke is a most amusing one, for I have never seen the Duke of Buckingham.”

“Never?” said Marguerite, restraining her laughter.
“I have never even left my own house since the duke has been at Paris.”

“Oh!” resumed Madame Vanel, stretching out her foot towards a paper which was lying on the carpet near the window; “it is not necessary for people to see each other, since they can write.” The marquise trembled, for this paper was the envelope of the letter she was reading as her friend had entered, and was sealed with the superintendent’s arms. As she leaned back on the sofa on which she was sitting, Madame de Belliere covered the paper with the thick folds of her large silk dress, and so concealed it.

“Come, Marguerite, tell me, is it to tell me all these foolish reports that you have come to see me so early in the day?”
“No; I came to see you, in the first place, and to remind you of those habits of our earlier days, so delightful to remember, when we used to wander about together at Vincennes, and, sitting beneath an oak, or in some sylvan shade, used to talk of those we loved, and who loved us.”
“Do you propose that we should go out together now?”

“My carriage is here, and I have three hours at my disposal.”
“I am not dressed yet, Marguerite; but if you wish that we should talk together, we can, without going to the woods of Vincennes, find in my own garden here, beautiful trees, shady groves, a green sward covered with daisies and violets, the perfume of which can be perceived from where we are sitting.”

"I regret your refusal, my dear marquise, for I wanted to pour out my whole heart into yours."

"I repeat again, Marguerite, my heart is yours just as much in this room, or beneath the lime-trees in the garden here, as it would be under the oaks in the woods yonder."

"It is not the same thing for me. In approaching Vincennes, marquise, my ardent aspirations approach nearer to that object towards which they have for some days past been directed." The marquise suddenly raised her head. "Are you surprised, then, that I am still thinking of Saint-Mande?"

"Of Saint-Mande?" exclaimed Madame de Belliere; and the looks of both women met each other like two resistless swords.

"You, so proud!" said the marquise, disdainfully.

"I, so proud!" replied Madame Vanel. "Such is my nature. I do not forgive neglect—I cannot endure infidelity. When I leave any one who weeps at my abandonment, I feel induced still to love him; but when others forsake me and laugh at their infidelity, I love distractedly."

Madame de Belliere could not restrain an involuntary movement.

"She is jealous," said Marguerite to herself.

"Then," continued the marquise, "you are quite enamored of the Duke of Buckingham—I mean of M. Fouquet?" Elise felt the allusion, and her blood seemed to congeal in her heart. "And you wished to go to Vincennes,—to Saint-Mande, even?"

"I hardly know what I wished: you would have advised me perhaps."

"In what respect?"

"You have often done so."

"Most certainly I should not have done so in the present instance, for I do not forgive as you do. I am less loving, perhaps; when my heart has been once wounded, it remains so always."

"But M. Fouquet has not wounded you," said Marguerite Vanel, with the most perfect simplicity.

"You perfectly understand what I mean. M. Fouquet has not wounded me; I do not know of either obligation or injury received at his hands, but you have reason to complain of him. You are my friend, and I am afraid I should not advise you as you would like."

"Ah! you are prejudging the case."

"The sighs you spoke of just now are more than indications."

"You overwhelm me," said the young woman suddenly, as if collecting her whole strength, like a wrestler preparing for a last struggle; "you take only my evil dispositions and my weaknesses into calculation, and do not speak of my pure and generous feelings. If, at this moment, I feel instinctively attracted towards the superintendent, if I even make an advance to him, which, I confess, is very probable, my motive for it is, that M. Fouquet's fate deeply affects me, and because he is, in my opinion, one of the most unfortunate men living."

"Ah!" said the marquise, placing her hand upon her heart, "something new, then, has occurred?"

"Do you not know it?"

"I am utterly ignorant of everything about him," said Madame de Belliere, with the poignant anguish that suspends thought and speech, and even life itself.

"In the first place, then, the king's favour is entirely withdrawn from M. Fouquet, and conferred on M. Colbert."

"So it is stated."

"It is very clear, since the discovery of the plot of Belle-Isle."

"I was told that the discovery of the fortifications there had turned out to M. Fouquet's honour."

Marguerite began to laugh in so cruel a manner that Madame de Belliere could at that moment have delightedly plunged a dagger in her bosom. "Dearest," continued Marguerite, "there is no longer any question of M. Fouquet's honour; his safety is concerned. Before three days are passed the ruin of the superintendent will be complete."

"Stay," said the marquise, in her turn smiling, "that is going a little fast."

"I said three days, because I wish to deceive myself with a hope; but probably the catastrophe will be complete within twenty-four hours."

"Why so?"

"For the simplest of all reasons,—that M. Fouquet has no more money."

"In matters of finance, my dear Marguerite, some are without money to-day, who to-morrow can procure millions."

"That might be M. Fouquet's case when he had two wealthy and clever friends who amassed money for him, and wrung it from every possible or impossible source; but those friends are dead."

"Money does not die, Marguerite; it may be concealed, but it can be looked for, bought and found."

"You see things on the bright side, and so much the better for you. It is really very unfortunate that you are not the Egeria of M. Fouquet; you might now show him the source whence he could obtain the millions which the king asked him for yesterday."

"Millions!" said the marquise, in terror.

"Four—an even number."

"Infamous!" murmured Madame de Belliere, tortured by her friend's merciless delight.

"M. Fouquet, I should think, must certainly have four millions," she replied, courageously.

"If he has those which the king requires to-day," said Marguerite, "he will not, perhaps, possess those which the king will demand in a month or so."

"The king will exact money from him again, then?"

"No doubt; and that is my reason for saying that the ruin of poor M. Fouquet is inevitable. Pride will induce him to furnish the money, and when he has no more, he will fall."

"It is true," said the marquise, trembling; "the plan is a bold one; but tell me, does M. Colbert hate M. Fouquet so very much?"

"I think he does not like him. M. Colbert is powerful; he improves on close acquaintance; he has gigantic ideas, a strong will, and discretion; he will rise."

"He will be superintendent?"

"It is probable. Such is the reason, my dear marquise, why I felt myself impressed in favour of that poor man, who once loved, and even adored me; and why, when I see him so unfortunate, I forgive his infidelity, which I have reason to believe he also regrets; and why, moreover, I should not have been disinclined to afford him some consolation, or some good advice; he would have understood the step I had taken, and would have thought kindly of me for it. It is gratifying to be loved, you know. Men value love more highly when they are no longer blinded by its influence."

The marquise, bewildered and overcome by these cruel attacks, which had been calculated with the greatest nicety and precision, hardly knew what to answer in return; she even seemed to have lost all power of thought. Her perfidious friend's voice had assumed the most affectionate tone; she spoke as a woman, but concealed the instincts of a wolf.

"Well," said Madame de Belliere, who had a vague hope that Marguerite would cease to overwhelm a vanquished enemy, "why do you not go and see M. Fouquet?"

"Decidedly, marquise, you have made me reflect. No, it would be unbecoming for me to make the first advance. M. Fouquet no doubt loves me, but he is too proud. I cannot expose myself to an affront.... besides, I have my husband to consider. You tell me nothing? Very well, I shall consult M. Colbert on the subject." Marguerite rose smilingly, as though to take leave, but the marquise had not the strength to imitate her. Marguerite advanced a few paces, in order that she might continue to enjoy the humiliating grief in which her rival was plunged, and then said, suddenly,—"You do not accompany me to the door, then?" The marquise rose, pale and almost lifeless, without thinking of the envelope, which had occupied her attention so greatly at the commencement of the conversation, and which was revealed at the first step she took. She then opened the door of her oratory, and without even turning her head towards Marguerite Vanel, entered it, closing the door after her. Marguerite said, or rather muttered a few words, which Madame de Belliere did not even hear. As soon, however, as the marquise had disappeared, her envious enemy, not being able to resist the desire to satisfy herself that her suspicions were well founded, advanced stealthily like a panther, and seized the envelope. "Ah!" she said, gnashing her teeth, "it was indeed a letter from M. Fouquet she was reading when I arrived," and then darted out of the room. During this interval, the marquise, having arrived behind the rampart, as it were, of her door, felt that her strength was failing her; for a moment she remained rigid, pale and motionless as a statue, and then, like a statue shaken on its base by an earthquake, tottered and fell inanimate on the carpet. The noise of the fall resounded at the same moment as the rolling of Marguerite's carriage leaving the hotel.

XXVII. Madame de Belliere's Plate.

The blow had been the more painful on account of its being unexpected. It was some time before the marquise recovered herself; but once recovered, she began to reflect upon the events so heartlessly announced to her. She therefore returned, at the risk even of losing her life in the way, to that train of ideas which her relentless friend had forced her to pursue. Treason, then—deep menaces, concealed under the semblance of public interest—such were Colbert's maneuvers. A detestable delight at an approaching downfall, untiring efforts to attain this object, means of seduction no less wicked than the crime itself—such were the weapons Marguerite employed. The crooked atoms of Descartes triumphed; to the man without compassion was united a woman without heart. The marquise perceived, with sorrow rather than indignation, that the king was an accomplice in the plot which betrayed the duplicity of Louis XIII. in his advanced age, and the avarice of Mazarin at a period of life when he had not had the opportunity of gorging himself with French gold. The spirit of this courageous woman soon resumed its energy, no longer overwhelmed by indulgence in compassionate lamentations. The marquise was not one to weep when action was necessary, nor to waste time in bewailing a misfortune as long as means still existed of relieving it. For some minutes she buried her face in her cold fingers, and then, raising her head, rang for her attendants with a steady hand, and with a gesture betraying a fixed determination of purpose. Her resolution was taken.

"Is everything prepared for my departure?" she inquired of one of her female attendants who entered.

"Yes, madame; but it was not expected that your ladyship would leave for Belliere for the next few days."

"All my jewels and articles of value, then, are packed up?"

"Yes, madame; but hitherto we have been in the habit of leaving them in Paris. Your ladyship does not generally take your jewels with you into the country."

"But they are all in order, you say?"

"Yes, in your ladyship's own room."

"The gold plate?"

"In the chest."

"And the silver plate?"

"In the great oak closet."

The marquise remained silent for a few moments, and then said calmly, "Let my goldsmith be sent for."

Her attendants quitted the room to execute the order. The marquise, however, had entered her own room, and was inspecting her casket of jewels with the greatest attention. Never, until now, had she bestowed such close attention upon riches in which women take so much pride; never, until now, had she looked at her jewels, except for the purpose of making a selection according to their settings or their colours. On this occasion, however, she admired the size of the rubies and the brilliancy of the diamonds; she grieved over every blemish and every defect; she thought the gold light, and the stones wretched. The goldsmith, as he entered, found her thus occupied. "M. Faucheux," she said, "I believe you supplied me with my gold service?"

"I did, your ladyship."

"I do not now remember the amount of the account."

"Of the new service, madame, or of that which M. de Belliere presented to you on your marriage? for I have furnished both."

"First of all, the new one."

"The covers, the goblets, and the dishes, with their covers, the eau-epergne, the ice-pails, the dishes for the preserves, and the tea and coffee urns, cost your ladyship sixty thousand francs."

"No more?"

"Your ladyship thought the account very high."

"Yes, yes; I remember, in fact, that it was dear; but it was the workmanship, I suppose?"

"Yes, madame; the designs, the chasings—all new patterns."

"What proportion of the cost does the workmanship form? Do not hesitate to tell me."

"A third of its value, madame."

"There is the other service, the old one, that which belonged to my husband?"

"Yes, madame; there is less workmanship in that than in the other. Its intrinsic value does not exceed thirty thousand francs."

"Thirty thousand," murmured the marquise. "But, M. Fauchaux, there is also the service which belonged to my mother; all that massive plate which I did not wish to part with, on account of the associations connected with it."

"Ah! madame, that would indeed be an excellent resource for those who, unlike your ladyship, might not be in position to keep their plate. In chasing that they worked in solid metal. But that service is no longer in fashion. Its weight is its only advantage."

"That is all I care about. How much does it weigh?"

"Fifty thousand livres at the very least. I do not allude to the enormous vases for the buffet, which alone weigh five thousand livres, or ten thousand the pair."

"One hundred and thirty," murmured the marquise. "You are quite sure of your figures, M. Fauchaux?"

"The amount is entered in my books. Your ladyship is extremely methodical, I am aware."

"Let us now turn to another subject," said Madame de Belliere; and she opened one of her jewel-boxes.

"I recognize these emeralds," said M. Fauchaux; "for it was I who had the setting of them. They are the most beautiful in the whole court. No, I am mistaken; Madame de Chatillon has the most beautiful set; she had them from Messieurs de Guise; but your set, madame, comes next."

"What are they worth?"

"Mounted?"

"No; supposing I wished to sell them."

"I know very well who would buy them," exclaimed M. Fauchaux.

"That is the very thing I ask. They could be sold, then?"

"All your jewels could be sold, madame. It is well known that you possess the most beautiful jewels in Paris. You are not changeable in your tastes; when you make a purchase it is of the very best; and what you purchase you do not part with."

"What could these emeralds be sold for, then?"

"A hundred and thirty thousand francs."

The marquise wrote down upon her tablets the amount which the jeweler mentioned. "The ruby necklace?" she said.

"Are they balas-rubies, madame?"

"Here they are."

"They are beautiful—magnificent. I did not know your ladyship had these stones."

"What is their value?"

"Two hundred thousand francs. The center one is alone worth a hundred thousand."

"I thought so," said the marquise. "As for diamonds, I have them in numbers; rings, necklaces, sprigs, ear-rings, clasps. Tell me their value, M. Fauchaux."

The jeweler took his magnifying-glass and scales, weighed and inspected them, and silently made his calculations. "These stones," he said, "must have cost your ladyship an income of forty thousand francs."

"You value them at eight hundred thousand francs?"

"Nearly so."

"It is about what I imagined—but the settings are not included?"

"No, madame; but if I were called upon to sell or to buy, I should be satisfied with the gold of the settings alone as my profit upon the transaction. I should make a good twenty-five thousand francs."

"An agreeable sum."

"Very much so, madame."

"Will you then accept that profit, then, on condition of converting the jewels into money?"

"But you do not intend to sell you diamonds, I suppose, madame?" exclaimed the bewildered jeweler.

"Silence, M. Fauchaux, do not disturb yourself about that; give me an answer simply. You are an honourable man, with whom my family has dealt for thirty years; you knew my father and mother, whom your own father and mother served. I address you as a friend; will you accept the gold of the settings in return for a sum of ready money to be placed in my hands?"

"Eight hundred thousand francs! it is enormous."

"I know it."

"Impossible to find."

"Not so."

"But reflect, madame, upon the effect which will be produced by the sale of your jewels."

"No one need know it. You can get sets of false jewels made for me, similar to the real. Do not answer a word; I insist upon it. Sell them separately, sell the stones only."

"In that way it is easy. Monsieur is looking out for some sets of jewels as well as single stones for Madame's toilette. There will be a competition for them. I can easily dispose of six hundred thousand francs' worth to Monsieur. I am certain yours are the most beautiful."

"When can you do so?"

"In less than three days' time."

"Very well, the remainder you will dispose of among private individuals. For the present, make me out a contract of sale, payment to be made in four days."

"I entreat you to reflect, madame; for if you force the sale, you will lose a hundred thousand francs."

"If necessary, I will lose two hundred; I wish everything to be settled this evening. Do you accept?"

"I do, your ladyship. I will not conceal from you that I shall make fifty thousand francs by the transaction."

"So much the better for you. In what way shall I have the money?"

"Either in gold, or in bills of the bank of Lyons, payable at M. Colbert's."

"I agree," said the marquise, eagerly; "return home and bring the sum in question in notes, as soon as possible."

"Yes, madame, but for Heaven's sake—"

"Not a word, M. Fauchaux. By the by, I was forgetting the silver plate. What is the value of that which I have?"

"Fifty thousand francs, madame."

"That makes a million," said the marquise to herself. "M. Fauchaux, you will take away with you both the gold and silver plate. I can assign, as a pretext, that I wish it remodeled on patters more in accordance with my own taste. Melt it down, and return me its value in money, at once."

"It shall be done, your ladyship."

"You will be good enough to place the money in a chest, and direct one of your clerks to accompany the chest, and without my servants seeing him; and order him to wait for me in a carriage."

"In Madame de Fauchaux's carriage?" said the jeweler.

"If you will allow it, and I will call for it at your house."

"Certainly, your ladyship."

"I will direct some of my servants to convey the plate to your house." The marquise rung. "Let the small van be placed at M. Fauchaux's disposal," she said. The jeweler bowed and left the house, directing that the van should follow him closely, saying aloud, that the marquise was about to have her plate melted down in order to have other plate manufactured of a more modern style. Three hours afterwards she went to M. Fauchaux's house and received from him eight hundred francs in gold inclosed in a chest, which one of the clerks could hardly carry towards Madame Fauchaux's carriage—for Madame Fauchaux kept her carriage. As the daughter of a president of accounts, she had brought a marriage portion of thirty thousand crowns to her husband, who was syndic of the goldsmiths. These thirty thousand crowns had become very fruitful during twenty years. The jeweler, though a millionaire, was a modest man. He had purchased a substantial carriage, built in 1648, ten years after the king's birth. This carriage, or rather house upon wheels, excited the admiration of the whole quarter in which he resided—it was covered with allegorical paintings, and clouds scattered over with stars. The marquise entered this somewhat extraordinary vehicle, sitting opposite the clerk, who endeavored to put his knees out of the way, afraid even of touching the marquise's dress. It was the clerk, too, who told the coachman, who was very proud of having a marquise to drive, to take the road to Saint-Mande.

XXVIII. The Dowry.

Monsieur Fauchaux's horses were serviceable animals, with thickset knees and legs that had some difficulty in moving. Like the carriage, they belonged to the earlier part of the century. They were not as fleet as the English horses of M. Fouquet, and consequently it took two hours to get to Saint-Mande. Their progress, it might be said, was majestic. Majesty, however, precludes hurry. The marquise stopped the carriage at the door so well known to her, although she had seen it only once, under circumstances, it will now be remembered, no less painful than those which brought her now to it again. She drew a key from her pocket, and inserted it into the lock, pushed open the door, which noiselessly yielded to her touch, and directed the clerk to carry the chest upstairs to the first floor. The weight of the chest was so great that the clerk was obliged to get the coachman to assist him with it. They placed it in a small cabinet, ante-room, or boudoir rather, adjoining the saloon where we once saw M. Fouquet at the marquise's feet. Madame de Belliere gave the coachman a louis, smiled gracefully at the clerk, and dismissed them both. She closed the door after them, and waited in the room, alone and barricaded. There was no servant to be seen about the rooms, but everything was prepared as though some invisible genius had divined the wishes and desires of an expected guest. The fire was laid, candles in the candelabra, refreshments upon the table, books scattered about, fresh-cut flowers in the vases. One might almost have imagined it an enchanted house. The marquise lighted the candles, inhaled the perfume of the flowers, sat down, and was soon plunged in profound thought. Her deep musings, melancholy though they were, were not untinged with a certain vague joy. Spread out before her was a treasure, a million wrung from her fortune as a gleaner plucks the blue corn-flower from her crown of flowers. She conjured up the sweetest dreams. Her principal thought, and one that took precedence of all others, was to devise means of leaving this money for M. Fouquet without his possibly learning from whom the gift had come. This idea, naturally enough, was the first to present itself to her mind. But although, on reflection, it appeared difficult to carry out, she did not despair of success. She would then ring to summon M. Fouquet and make her escape, happier than if, instead of having given a million, she had herself found one. But, being there, and having seen the boudoir so coquettishly decorated that it might almost be said the least particle of dust had but the moment before been removed by the servants; having observed the drawing-room, so perfectly arranged that it might almost be said her presence there had driven away the fairies who were its occupants, she asked herself if the glance or gaze of those whom she had displaced—whether spirits, fairies, elves, or human creatures—had not already recognized her. To secure success, it was necessary that some steps should be seriously taken, and it was necessary also that the superintendent should comprehend the serious position in which he was placed, in order to yield compliance with the generous fancies of a woman; all the fascinations of an eloquent friendship would be required to persuade him, and, should this be insufficient, the maddening influence of a devoted passion, which, in its resolute determination to carry conviction, would not be turned aside. Was not the superintendent, indeed, known for his delicacy and dignity of feeling? Would he allow himself to accept from any woman that of which she had stripped herself? No! He would resist, and if any voice in the world could overcome his resistance, it would be the voice of the woman he loved. Another doubt, and that a cruel one, suggested itself to Madame de Belliere with a sharp, acute pain, like a dagger thrust. Did he really love her? Would that volatile mind, that inconstant heart, be likely to be fixed for a moment, even were it to gaze upon an angel? Was it not the same with Fouquet, notwithstanding his genius and his uprightness of conduct, as with those conquerors on the field of battle who shed tears when they have gained a victory? "I must learn if it be so, and must judge of that for myself," said the marquise. "Who can tell whether that heart, so coveted, is not common in its impulses, and full of alloy? Who can tell if that mind, when the touchstone is applied to it, will not be found of a mean and vulgar character? Come, come," she said, "this is doubting and hesitation too much—to the proof," she said, looking at the timepiece. "It is now seven o'clock," she said; "he must have arrived; it is the hour for signing his papers." With a feverish impatience she rose and walked towards the mirror, in which she smiled with a resolute smile of devotedness; she touched the spring and drew out the handle of the bell. Then, as if exhausted beforehand by the struggle she had just undergone, she threw herself on her knees, in utter abandonment, before a large couch, in which she buried her face in her trembling hands. Ten minutes afterwards she heard the spring of the door sound. The door moved upon invisible hinges, and Fouquet appeared. He looked pale, and seemed bowed down by the weight of some bitter reflection. He did not hurry, but simply came at the summons. The preoccupation of his mind must indeed have been very great, that a man, so devoted to pleasure, for whom indeed pleasure meant everything, should obey such a summons so listlessly. The previous night, in fact, fertile in melancholy ideas, had sharpened his features, generally so noble in their indifference of expression, and had traced dark lines of anxiety around his eyes. Handsome and noble he still was, and the melancholy expression of his mouth, a rare expression with men, gave a new character to his features, by which his youth seemed to be renewed. Dressed in black, the lace in front of his chest much disarranged by his feverishly restless hand, the looks of the superintendent, full of dreamy reflection, were fixed upon the threshold of the room which he had so frequently approached in search of expected happiness. This gloomy gentleness of manner, this smiling sadness of expression, which had replaced his former excessive joy, produced an indescribable effect upon Madame de Belliere, who was regarding him at a distance.

A woman’s eye can read the face of the man she loves, its every feeling of pride, its every expression of suffering; it might almost be said that Heaven has graciously granted to women, on account of their very weakness, more than it has accorded to other creatures. They can conceal their own feelings from a man, but from them no man can conceal his. The marquise divined in a single glance the whole weight of the unhappiness of the superintendent. She divined a night passed without sleep, a day passed in deceptions. From that moment she was firm in her own strength, and she felt that she loved Fouquet beyond everything else. She arose and approached him, saying, “You wrote to me this morning to say you were beginning to forget me, and that I, whom you had not seen lately, had no doubt ceased to think of you. I have come to undeceive you, monsieur, and the more completely so, because there is one thing I can read in your eyes.”

“What is that, madame?” said Fouquet, astonished.

“That you have never loved me so much as at this moment; in the same manner you can read, in my present step towards you, that I have not forgotten you.”

“Oh! madame,” said Fouquet, whose face was for a moment lighted up by a sudden gleam of joy, “you are indeed an angel, and no man can suspect you. All he can do is to humble himself before you and entreat forgiveness.”

“Your forgiveness is granted, then,” said the marquise. Fouquet was about to throw himself upon his knees. “No, no,” she said, “sit here by my side. Ah! that is an evil thought which has just crossed your mind.”

“How do you detect it, madame?”

“By the smile that has just marred the expression of your countenance. Be candid, and tell me what your thought was—no secrets between friends.”

“Tell me, then, madame, why you have been so harsh these three or four months past?”

“Harsh?”

“Yes; did you not forbid me to visit you?”

“Alas!” said Madame de Belliere, sighing, “because your visit to me was the cause of your being visited with a great misfortune; because my house is watched; because the same eyes that have seen you already might see you again; because I think it less dangerous for you that I should come here than that you should come to my house; and, lastly, because I know you to be already unhappy enough not to wish to increase your unhappiness further.”

Fouquet started, for these words recalled all the anxieties connected with his office of superintendent—he who, for the last few minutes, had indulged in all the wild aspirations of the lover. “I unhappy?” he said, endeavoring to smile: “indeed, marquise, you will almost make me believe I am so, judging from your own sadness. Are your beautiful eyes raised upon me merely in pity? I was looking for another expression from them.”

“It is not I who am sad, monsieur; look in the mirror, there—it is yourself.”

“It is true I am somewhat pale, marquise; but it is from overwork; the king yesterday required a supply of money from me.”

“Yes, four millions; I am aware of it.”

“You know it?” exclaimed Fouquet, in a tone of surprise; “how can you have learnt it? It was after the departure of the queen, and in the presence of one person only, that the king—”

“You perceive that I do know it; is that not sufficient? Well, go on, monsieur, the money the king has required you to supply—”

“You understand, marquise, that I have been obliged to procure it, then to get it counted, afterwards registered—altogether a long affair. Since Monsieur de Mazarin’s death, financial affairs occasion some little fatigue and embarrassment. My administration is somewhat overtaxed, and this is the reason why I have not slept during the past night.”

“So you have the amount?” inquired the marquise, with some anxiety.

“It would indeed be strange, marquise,” replied Fouquet, cheerfully, “if a superintendent of finances were not to have a paltry four millions in his coffers.”

“Yes, yes, I believe you either have, or will have them.”

“What do you mean by saying I shall have them?”

“It is not very long since you were required to furnish two millions.”

“On the contrary, it seems almost an age; but do not let us talk of money matters any longer.”

“On the contrary, we will continue to speak of them, for that is my only reason for coming to see you.”

“I am at a loss to compass your meaning,” said the superintendent, whose eyes began to express an anxious curiosity.

“Tell me, monsieur, is the office of superintendent a permanent position?”

“You surprise me, marchioness, for you speak as if you had some motive or interest in putting the question.”

“My reason is simple enough; I am desirous of placing some money in your hands, and naturally I wish to know if you are certain of your post.”

“Really, marquise, I am at a loss what to reply; I cannot conceive your meaning.”

“Seriously, then, dear M. Fouquet, I have certain funds which somewhat embarrass me. I am tired of investing my money in lands, and am anxious to intrust it to some friend who will turn it to account.”

“Surely it does not press,” said M. Fouquet.

“On the contrary, it is very pressing.”

“Very well, we will talk of that by and by.”

“By and by will not do, for my money is there,” returned the marquise, pointing out the coffer to the superintendent, and showing him, as she opened it, the bundles of notes and heaps of gold. Fouquet, who had risen from his seat at the same moment as Madame de Belliere, remained for a moment plunged in thought; then suddenly starting back, he turned pale, and sank down in his chair, concealing his face in his hands. “Madame, madame,” he murmured, “what opinion can you have of me, when you make me such an offer?”

“Of you!” returned the marquise. “Tell me, rather, what you yourself think of the step I have taken.”

“You bring me this money for myself, and you bring it because you know me to be embarrassed. Nay, do not deny it, for I am sure of it. Can I not read your heart?”

“If you know my heart, then, can you not see that it is my heart I offer you?”

“I have guessed rightly, then,” exclaimed Fouquet. “In truth, madame, I have never yet given you the right to insult me in this manner.”

“Insult you,” she said, turning pale, “what singular delicacy of feeling! You tell me you love me; in the name of that affection you wish me to sacrifice my reputation and my honour, yet, when I offer you money which is my own, you refuse me.”

“Madame, you are at liberty to preserve what you term your reputation and your honour. Permit me to preserve mine. Leave me to my ruin, leave me to sink beneath the weight of the hatreds which surround me, beneath the faults I have committed, beneath the load, even, of my remorse, but, for Heaven’s sake, madame, do not overwhelm me with this last infliction.”

“A short time since, M. Fouquet, you were wanting in judgment; now you are wanting in feeling.”

Fouquet pressed his clenched hand upon his breast, heaving with emotion, saying: “overwhelm me, madame, for I have nothing to reply.”

“I offered you my friendship, M. Fouquet.”

“Yes, madame, and you limited yourself to that.”

“And what I am now doing is the act of a friend.”

“No doubt it is.”

“And you reject this mark of my friendship?”

“I do reject it.”

“Monsieur Fouquet, look at me,” said the marquise, with glistening eyes, “I now offer you my love.”

“Oh, madame,” exclaimed Fouquet.

“I have loved you for a long while past; women, like men, have a false delicacy at times. For a long time past I have loved you, but would not confess it. Well, then, you have implored this love on your knees, and I have refused you; I was blind, as you were a little while since; but as it was my love that you sought, it is my love I now offer you.”

“Oh! madame, you overwhelm me beneath a load of happiness.”

“Will you be happy, then, if I am yours—entirely?”

“It will be the supremest happiness for me.”

“Take me, then. If, however, for your sake I sacrifice a prejudice, do you, for mine, sacrifice a scruple.”

“Do not tempt me.”

“Do not refuse me.”

“Think seriously of what you are proposing.”

“Fouquet, but one word. Let it be ‘No,’ and I open this door,” and she pointed to the door which led into the streets, “and you will never see me again. Let that word be ‘Yes,’ and I am yours entirely.”

“Elise! Elise! But this coffer?”

“Contains my dowry.”

“It is your ruin,” exclaimed Fouquet, turning over the gold and papers; “there must be a million here.”

“Yes, my jewels, for which I care no longer if you do not love me, and for which, equally, I care no longer if you love me as I love you.”

“This is too much,” exclaimed Fouquet. “I yield, I yield, even were it only to consecrate so much devotion. I accept the dowry.”

“And take the woman with it,” said the marquise, throwing herself into his arms.

XXIX. Le Terrain de Dieu.

During the progress of these events Buckingham and De Wardes traveled in excellent companionship, and made the journey from Paris to Calais in undisturbed harmony together. Buckingham had hurried his departure, so that the greater part of his adieux were very hastily made. His visit to Monsieur and Madame, to the young queen, and to the queen-dowager, had been paid collectively—a precaution on the part of the queen-mother which saved him the distress of any private conversation with Monsieur, and also the danger of seeing Madame again. The carriages containing the luggage had already been sent on beforehand, and in the evening he set off in his traveling carriage with his attendants.

De Wardes, irritated at finding himself dragged away in so abrupt a manner by this Englishman, had sought in his subtle mind for some means of escaping from his fetters; but no one having rendered him any assistance in this respect, he was absolutely obliged, therefore, to submit to the burden of his own evil thoughts and caustic spirit.

Such of his friends in whom he had been able to confide, had, in their character of wits, rallied him upon the duke’s superiority. Others, less brilliant, but more sensible, had reminded him of the king’s orders prohibiting dueling. Others, again, and they the larger number, who, in virtue of charity, or national vanity, might have rendered him assistance, did not care to run the risk of incurring disgrace, and would, at the best, have informed the ministers of a departure which might end in a massacre on a small scale. The result was, that, after having fully deliberated upon the matter, De Wardes packed up his luggage, took a couple of horses, and, followed only by one servant, made his way towards the barrier, where Buckingham’s carriage was to await him.

The duke received his adversary as he would have done an intimate acquaintance, made room beside him on the same seat with himself, offered him refreshments, and spread over his knees the sable cloak that had been thrown on the front seat. They then conversed of the court, without alluding to Madame; of Monsieur, without speaking of domestic affairs; of the king, without speaking of his brother’s wife; of the queen-mother, without alluding to her daughter-in-law; of the king of England, without alluding to his sister; of the state of the affections of either of the travelers, without pronouncing any name that might be dangerous. In this way the journey, which was performed by short stages, was most agreeable, and Buckingham, almost a Frenchman from wit and education, was delighted at having so admirably selected his traveling companion. Elegant repasts were served, of which they partook but lightly; trials of horses made in the beautiful meadows that skirted the road; coursing indulged in, for Buckingham had his greyhounds with him; and in such ways did they pass away the pleasant time. The duke somewhat resembled the beautiful river Seine, which folds France a thousand times in its loving embrace, before deciding upon joining its waters with the ocean. In quitting France, it was her recently adopted daughter he had brought to Paris whom he chiefly regretted; his every thought was a remembrance of her—his every memory a regret. Therefore, whenever, now and then, despite his command over himself, he was lost in thought, De Wardes left him entirely to his musings. This delicacy might have touched Buckingham, and changed his feelings towards De Wardes, if the latter, while preserving silence, had shown a glance less full of malice, and a smile less false. Instinctive dislikes, however, are relentless; nothing appeases them; a few ashes may, sometimes, apparently, extinguish them; but beneath those ashes the smothered embers rage more furiously. Having exhausted every means of amusement the route offered, they arrived, as we have said, at Calais towards the end of the sixth day. The duke's attendants, since the previous evening, had traveled in advance, and now chartered a boat, for the purpose of joining the yacht, which had been tacking about in sight, or bore broadside on, whenever it felt its white wings wearied, within cannon-shot of the jetty.

The boat was destined for the transport of the duke's equipages from the shore to the yacht. The horses had been embarked, having been hoisted from the boat upon the deck in baskets, expressly made for the purpose, and wadded in such a manner that their limbs, even in the most violent fits of terror or impatience, were always protected by the soft support which the sides afforded, and their coats not even turned. Eight of these baskets, placed side by side, filled the ship's hold. It is well known that, in short voyages horses refuse to eat, but remain trembling all the while, with the best of food before them, such as they would have greatly coveted on land. By degrees, the duke's entire equipage was transported on board the yacht; he was then informed that everything was in readiness, and that they only waited for him, whenever he would be disposed to embark with the French gentleman; for no one could possibly imagine that the French gentleman would have any other accounts to settle with his Grace other than those of friendship. Buckingham desired the captain to be told to hold himself in readiness, but that, as the sea was beautiful, and as the day promised a splendid sunset, he did not intend to go on board until nightfall, and would avail himself of the evening to enjoy a walk on the strand. He added also, that, finding himself in such excellent company, he had not the least desire to hasten his embarkation.

As he said this he pointed out to those who surrounded him the magnificent spectacle which the sky presented, of deepest azure in the horizon, the amphitheatre of fleecy clouds ascending from the sun's disc to the zenith, assuming the appearance of a range of snowy mountains, whose summits were heaped one upon another. The dome of clouds was tinged at its base with, as it were, the foam of rubies, fading away into opal and pearly tints, in proportion as the gaze was carried from base to summit. The sea was gilded with the same reflection, and upon the crest of every sparkling wave danced a point of light, like a diamond by lamplight. The mildness of the evening, the sea breezes, so dear to contemplative minds, setting in from the east and blowing in delicious gusts; then, in the distance, the black outline of the yacht with its rigging traced upon the empurpled background of the sky—while, dotting the horizon, might be seen, here and there, vessels with their trimmed sails, like the wings of a seagull about to plunge; such a spectacle indeed well merited admiration. A crowd of curious idlers followed the richly dressed attendants, amongst whom they mistook the steward and the secretary for the master and his friend. As for Buckingham, who was dressed very simply, in a gray satin vest, and doublet of violet-coloured velvet, wearing his hat thrust over his eyes, and without orders or embroidery, he was taken no more notice of than De Wardes, who was in black, like an attorney.

The duke's attendants had received directions to have a boat in readiness at the jetty head, and to watch the embarkation of their master, without approaching him until either he or his friend should summon them,—“whatever may happen,” he had added, laying a stress upon these words, so that they might not be misunderstood. Having walked a few paces upon the strand, Buckingham said to De Wardes, “I think it is now time to take leave of each other. The tide, you perceive, is rising; ten minutes hence it will have soaked the sands where we are now walking in such a manner that we shall not be able to keep our footing.”

“I await your orders, my lord, but—”

“But, you mean, we are still upon soil which is part of the king's territory.”

“Exactly.”

“Well, do you see yonder a kind of little island surrounded by a circle of water? The pool is increasing every minute, and the isle is gradually disappearing. This island, indeed, belongs to Heaven, for it is situated between two seas, and is not shown on the king's charts. Do you observe it?”

“Yes; but we can hardly reach it now, without getting our feet wet.”

“Yes; but observe that it forms an eminence tolerably high, and that the tide rises up on every side, leaving the top free. We shall be admirably placed upon that little theatre. What do you think of it?”

“I shall be perfectly happy wherever I may have the honour of crossing my sword with your lordship's.”

“Very well, then, I am distressed to be the cause of your wetting your feet, M. de Wardes, but it is most essential you should be able to say to the king: ‘Sire, I did not fight upon your majesty's territory.’ Perhaps the distinction is somewhat subtle, but, since Port-Royal, your nation delights in subtleties of expression. Do not let us complain of this, however, for it makes your wit very brilliant, and of a style peculiarly your own. If you do not object, we will hurry ourselves, for the sea, I perceive, is rising fast, and night is setting in.”

“My reason for not walking faster was, that I did not wish to precede your Grace. Are you still on dry land, my lord?”

“Yes, at present I am. Look yonder! My servants are afraid we shall be drowned, and have converted the boat into a cruiser. Do you remark how curiously it dances upon the crests of the waves? But, as it makes me feel sea-sick, would you permit me to turn my back towards them?”

“You will observe, my lord, that in turning your back to them, you will have the sun full in your face.”

“Oh, its rays are very feeble at this hour and it will soon disappear; do not be uneasy on that score.”

“As you please, my lord; it was out of consideration for your lordship that I made the remark.”

“I am aware of that, M. de Wardes, and I fully appreciate your kindness. Shall we take off our doublets?”

“As you please, my lord.”

“Do not hesitate to tell me, M. de Wardes, if you do not feel comfortable upon the wet sand, or if you think yourself a little too close to French territory. We could fight in England, or even upon my yacht.”

“We are exceedingly well placed here, my lord; only I have the honour to remark that, as the sea is rising fast, we have hardly time—”

Buckingham made a sign of assent, took off his doublet and threw it on the ground, a proceeding which De Wardes imitated. Both their bodies, which seemed like phantoms to those who were looking at them from the shore, were thrown strongly into relief by a dark red violet-coloured shadow with which the sky became overspread.

“Upon my word, your Grace,” said De Wardes, “we shall hardly have time to begin. Do you not perceive how our feet are sinking into the sand?”

“I have sunk up to the ankles,” said Buckingham, “without reckoning that the water is even now breaking in upon us.”

“It has already reached me. As soon as you please, therefore, your Grace,” said De Wardes, who drew his sword, a movement imitated by the duke.

“M. de Wardes,” said Buckingham, “one final word. I am about to fight you because I do not like you,—because you have wounded me in ridiculing a certain devotional regard I have entertained, and one which I acknowledge that, at this moment, I still retain, and for which I would very willingly die. You are a bad and heartless man, M. de Wardes, and I will do my very utmost to take your life; for I feel assured that, if you survive this engagement, you will, in the future, work great mischief towards my friends. That is all I have to remark, M. de Wardes,” concluded Buckingham as he saluted him.

“And I, my lord, have only this to reply to you: I have not disliked you hitherto, but, since you give me such a character, I hate you, and will do all I possibly can to kill you;” and De Wardes saluted Buckingham.

Their swords crossed at the same moment, like two flashes of lightning on a dark night. The swords seemed to seek each other, guessed their position, and met. Both were practiced swordsmen, and the earlier passes were without any result. The night was fast closing in, and it was so dark that they attacked and defended themselves almost instinctively. Suddenly De Wardes felt his word arrested,—he had just touched Buckingham's shoulder. The duke's sword sunk, as his arm was lowered.

“You are wounded, my lord,” said De Wardes, drawing back a step or two.

“Yes, monsieur, but only slightly.”

“Yet you quitted your guard.”

“Only from the first effect of the cold steel, but I have recovered. Let us go on, if you please.” And disengaging his sword with a sinister clashing of the blade, the duke wounded the marquis in the breast.

“A hit?” he said.

“No,” cried De Wardes, not moving from his place.

“I beg your pardon, but observing that your shirt was stained—” said Buckingham.

“Well,” said De Wardes furiously, “it is now your turn.”

And with a terrible lunge, he pierced Buckingham's arm, the sword passing between the two bones. Buckingham feeling his right arm paralyzed, stretched out his left, seized his sword, which was about falling from his nerveless grasp, and before De Wardes could resume his guard, he thrust him through the breast. De Wardes tottered, his knees gave way beneath him, and leaving his sword still fixed in the duke's arm, he fell into the water, which was soon crimsoned with a more genuine reflection than that which it had borrowed from the clouds. De Wardes was not dead; he felt the terrible danger that menaced him, for the sea rose fast. The duke, too, perceived the danger. With an effort and an exclamation of pain he tore out the blade which remained in his arm, and turning towards De Wardes said, “Are you dead, marquis?”

“No,” replied De Wardes, in a voice choked by the blood which rushed from his lungs to his throat, “but very near it.”

“Well, what is to be done; can you walk?” said Buckingham, supporting him on his knee.

“Impossible,” he replied. Then falling down again, said, “call to your people, or I shall be drowned.”

“Halloa! boat there! quick, quick!”

The boat flew over the waves, but the sea rose faster than the boat could approach. Buckingham saw that De Wardes was on the point of being again covered by a wave; he passed his left arm, safe and unwounded, round his body and raised him up. The wave ascended to his waist, but did not move him. The duke immediately began to carry his late antagonist towards the shore. He had hardly gone ten paces, when a second wave, rushing onwards higher, more furious and menacing than the former, struck him at the height of his chest, threw him over and buried him beneath the water. At the reflux, however, the duke and De Wardes were discovered lying on the strand. De Wardes had fainted. At this moment four of the duke's sailors, who comprehended the danger, threw themselves into the sea, and in a moment were close beside him. Their terror was extreme when they observed how their master became covered with blood, in proportion to the water, with which it was impregnated, flowed towards his knees and feet; they wished to carry him.

“No, no,” exclaimed the duke, “take the marquis on shore first.”

“Death to the Frenchman!” cried the English sullenly.

“Wretched knaves!” exclaimed the duke, drawing himself up with a haughty gesture, which sprinkled them with blood, “obey directly! M. de Wardes on shore! M. de Wardes's safety to be looked to first, or I will have you all hanged!”

The boat had by this time reached them; the secretary and steward leaped into the sea, and approached the marquis, who no longer showed any sign of life.

“I commit him to your care, as you value your lives,” said the duke. “Take M. de Wardes on shore.” They took him in their arms, and carried him to the dry sand, where the tide never rose so high. A few idlers and five or six fishermen had gathered on the shore, attracted by the strange spectacle of two men fighting with the water up to their knees. The fishermen, observing a group of men approaching carrying a wounded man, entered the sea until the water was up to their waists. The English transferred the wounded man to them, at the very moment the latter began to open his eyes again. The salt water and the fine sand had got into his wounds, and caused him the acutest pain. The duke's secretary drew out a purse filled with gold from his pocket, and handed it to the one among those present who appeared of most importance, saying: “From my master, his Grace the Duke of Buckingham, in order that every possible care may be taken of the Marquis de Wardes.”

Then, followed by those who had accompanied him, he returned to the boat, which Buckingham had been enabled to reach with the greatest difficulty, but only after he had seen De Wardes out of danger. By this time it was high tide; embroidered coats, and silk sashes were lost; many hats, too, had been carried away by the waves. The flow of the tide had borne the duke's and De Wardes's clothes to the shore, and De Wardes was wrapped in the duke's doublet, under the belief that it was his own, when the fishermen carried him in their arms towards the town.

XXX. Threefold Love.

As soon as Buckingham departed, Guiche imagined the coast would be perfectly clear for him without any interference. Monsieur, who no longer retained the slightest feeling of jealousy, and who, besides, permitted himself to be monopolized by the Chevalier de Lorraine, allowed as much liberty and freedom in his house as the most exacting could desire. The king, on his side, who had conceived a strong predilection for his sister-in-law's society, invented a variety of amusements, in quick succession to each other, in order to render her residence in Paris as cheerful as possible, so that in fact, not a day passed without a ball at the Palais Royal, or a reception in Monsieur's apartments. The king had directed that Fontainebleau should be prepared for the reception of the court, and every one was using his utmost interest to get invited. Madame led a life of incessant occupation; neither her voice nor her pen were idle for a moment. The conversations with De Guiche were gradually assuming a tone of interest which might unmistakably be recognized as the prelude of a deep-seated attachment. When eyes look languishingly while the subject under discussion happens to be colours of materials for dresses; when a whole hour is occupied in analyzing the merits and the perfume of a sachet or a flower;—there are words in this style of conversation which every one might listen to, but there are gestures and sighs that every one cannot perceive. After Madame had talked for some time with De Guiche, she conversed with the king, who paid her a visit regularly every day. They played, wrote verses, or selected mottoes or emblematical devices; this spring was not only the Maytide of nature, it was the youth of an entire people, of which those at court were the head. The king was handsome, young, and of unequalled gallantry. All women were passionately loved by him, even the queen, his wife. This mighty monarch was, however, more timid and more reserved than any other person in the kingdom, to such a degree, indeed, that he did not confess his sentiments even to himself. This timidity of bearing restrained him within the limits of ordinary politeness, and no woman could boast of having any preference shown her beyond that shown to others. It might be foretold that the day when his real character would be displayed would be the dawn of a new sovereignty; but as yet he had not declared himself. M. de Guiche took advantage of this, and constituted himself the sovereign prince of the whole laughter-loving court. It had been reported that he was on the best of terms with Mademoiselle de Montalais; that he had been assiduously attentive to Mademoiselle de Chatillon; but now he was not even barely civil to any of the court beauties. He had eyes and ears for one person alone. In this manner, and, as it were, without design, he devoted himself to Monsieur, who had a great regard for him, and kept him as much as possible in his own apartments. Unsociable from natural disposition, he had estranged himself too much previous to the arrival of Madame, but, after her arrival, he did not estrange himself sufficiently. This conduct, which every one had observed, had been particularly remarked by the evil genius of the house, the Chevalier de Lorraine, for whom Monsieur exhibited the warmest attachment because he was of a very cheerful disposition, even in his remarks most full of malice, and because he was never at a loss how to wile the time away. The Chevalier de Lorraine, therefore, having noticed that he was threatened with being supplanted by De Guiche, resorted to strong measures. He disappeared from the court, leaving Monsieur much embarrassed. The first day of his absence, Monsieur hardly inquired about him, for he had De Guiche with him, and, except that the time given to conversation with Madame, his days and nights were rigorously devoted to the prince. On the second day, however, Monsieur, finding no one near him, inquired where the chevalier was. He was told that no one knew.

De Guiche, after having spent the morning in selecting embroideries and fringes with Madame, went to console the prince. But after dinner, as there were some amethysts to be looked at, De Guiche returned to Madame's cabinet. Monsieur was left quite to himself during the time devoted to dressing and decorating himself; he felt that he was the most miserable of men, and again inquired whether there was any news of the chevalier, in reply to which he was told that no one could tell where the chevalier was to be found. Monsieur, hardly knowing in what direction to inflict his weariness, went to Madame's apartments dressed in his morning-gown. He found a large assemblage of people there, laughing and whispering in every part of the room; at one end, a group of women around one of the courtiers, talking together, amid smothered bursts of laughter; at the other end, Manicamp and Malicorne were being pillaged at cards by Montalais and Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, while two others were standing by, laughing. In another part were Madame, seated upon some cushions on the floor, and De Guiche, on his knees beside her, spreading out a handful of pearls and precious stones, while the princess, with her white and slender fingers pointed out such among them as pleased her the most. Again, in another corner of the room, a guitar player was playing some of the Spanish seguedillas, to which Madame had taken the greatest fancy ever since she had heard them sung by the young queen with a melancholy expression of voice. But the songs which the Spanish princess had sung with tears in her eyes, the young Englishwoman was humming with a smile that well displayed her beautiful teeth. The cabinet presented, in fact, the most perfect representation of unrestrained pleasure and amusement. As he entered, Monsieur was struck at beholding so many persons enjoying themselves without him. He was so jealous at the sight that he could not resist exclaiming, like a child, "What! you are amusing yourselves here, while I am sick and tired of being alone!"

The sound of his voice was like a clap of thunder coming to interrupt the warbling of birds under the leafy covert of the trees; a dead silence ensued. De Guiche was on his feet in a moment. Malicorne tried to hide himself behind Montalais. Manicamp stood bolt upright, and assumed a very ceremonious demeanor. The guitar player thrust his instrument under a table, covering it with a piece of carpet to conceal it from the prince's observation. Madame was the only one who did not move, and smiling at her husband, said, "Is not this the hour you usually devote to your toilette?"

"An hour which others select, it seems, for amusing themselves," replied the prince, grumblingly.

This untoward remark was the signal for a general rout; the women fled like a flock of terrified starlings; the guitar player vanished like a shadow; Malicorne, still protected by Montalais, who purposely widened out her dress, glided behind the hanging tapestry. As for Manicamp, he went to the assistance of De Guiche, who naturally remained near Madame, and both of them, with the princess herself, courageously sustained the attack. The count was too happy to bear malice against the husband; but Monsieur bore a grudge against his wife. Nothing was wanting but a quarrel; he sought it, and the hurried departure of the crowd, which had been so joyous before he arrived, and was so disturbed by his entrance, furnished him with a pretext.

"Why do they run away at the very sight of me?" he inquired, in a supercilious tone; to which remark Madame replied, that, "whenever the master of the house made his appearance, the family kept aloof out of respect." As she said this, she made so funny and so pretty a grimace, that De Guiche and Manicamp could not control themselves; they burst into a peal of laughter; Madame followed their example, and even Monsieur himself could not resist it, and he was obliged to sit down, as, for laughing, he could scarcely keep his equilibrium. However, he very soon left off, but his anger had increased. He was still more furious because he had permitted himself to laugh, than from having seen others laugh. He looked at Manicamp steadily, not venturing to show his anger towards De Guiche; but, at a sign which displayed no little amount of annoyance, Manicamp and De Guiche left the room, so that Madame, left alone, began sadly to pick up her pearls and amethysts, no longer smiling, and speaking still less.

"I am very happy," said the duke, "to find myself treated as a stranger here, Madame," and he left the room in a passion. On his way out, he met Montalais, who was in attendance in the ante-room. "It is very agreeable to pay you a visit here, but outside the door."

Montalais made a very low obeisance. "I do not quite understand what your royal highness does me the honour to say."

"I say that when you are all laughing together in Madame's apartment, he is an unwelcome visitor who does not remain outside."

"Your royal highness does not think, and does not speak so, of yourself?"

"On the contrary, it is on my own account that I do speak and think. I have no reason, certainly, to flatter myself about the reception I meet with here at any time. How is it that, on the very day there is music and a little society in Madame's apartments—in my own apartments, indeed, for they are mine—on the very day that I wish to amuse myself a little in my turn, every one runs away? Are they afraid to see me, that they all take wing as soon as I appear? Is there anything wrong, then, going on in my absence?"

"Yet nothing has been done to-day, my lord, which is not done every day."

"What! do they laugh like that every day?"

"Why, yes, my lord."

"The same group of people simpering and the same singing and strumming going on every day?"

"The guitar, my lord, was introduced to-day; but when we have no guitars, we have violins and flutes; ladies soon weary without music."

"The deuce!—and the men?"

"What men, my lord?"

"M. de Guiche, M. de Manicamp, and the rest of them?"

"They all belong to your highness's household."

"Yes, yes, you are right," said the prince, as he returned to his own apartments, full of thought. He threw himself into the largest of his arm-chairs, without looking at himself in the glass. "Where can the chevalier be?" said he. One of the prince's attendants happened to be near him, overheard his remark, and replied,—

"No one knows, your highness."

"Still the same answer. The first one who answers me again, 'I do not know,' I will discharge." Every one at this remark hurried out of his apartments, in the same manner as the others had fled from Madame's apartments. The prince then flew into the wildest rage. He kicked over a chiffonier, which tumbled on the carpet, broken into pieces. He next went into the galleries, and with the greatest coolness threw down, one after another, an enameled vase, a porphyry ewer, and a bronze candelabrum. The noise summoned every one to the various doors.

"What is your highness's pleasure?" said the captain of the guards, timidly.

"I am treating myself to some music," replied the prince, gnashing his teeth.

The captain of the guards desired his royal highness's physician to be sent for. But before he came, Malicorne arrived, saying to the prince, "My lord, the Chevalier de Lorraine is here."

The duke looked at Malicorne, and smiled graciously at him, just as the chevalier entered.

XXXI. M. de Lorraine's Jealousy.

The Duc d'Orleans uttered a cry of delight on perceiving the Chevalier de Lorraine. "This is fortunate, indeed," he said; "by what happy chance do I see you? Had you indeed disappeared, as every one assured me?"

"Yes, my lord."

"A caprice?"

"I to venture upon caprices with your highness! The respect—"

"Put respect out of the way, for you fail in it every day. I absolve you; but why did you leave me?"

"Because I felt that I was of no further use to you."

"Explain yourself."

"Your highness has people about you who are far more amusing than I can ever be. I felt I was not strong enough to enter into contest with them, and I therefore withdrew."

"This extreme diffidence shows a want of common sense. Who are those with whom you cannot contend? De Guiche?"

"I name no one."

"This is absurd. Does De Guiche annoy you?"

"I do not say he does; do not force me to speak, however; you know very well that De Guiche is one of our best friends."

"Who is it, then?"

"Excuse me, my lord, let us say no more about it." The chevalier knew perfectly well that curiosity is excited in the same way as thirst —by removing that which quenches it; or in other words, by denying an explanation.

"No, no," said the prince; "I wish to know why you went away."

"In that case, my lord, I will tell you; but do not get angry. I remarked that my presence was disagreeable."

"To whom?"

"To Madame."

"What do you mean?" said the duke in astonishment.

"It is simple enough; Madame is very probably jealous of the regard you are good enough to testify for me."

"Has she shown it to you?"

"Madame never addresses a syllable to me, particularly since a certain time."

"Since what time?"

"Since the time when, M. de Guiche having made himself more agreeable to her than I could, she receives him at every and any hour."

The duke coloured. "At any hour, chevalier; what do you mean by that?"

"You see, your highness, I have already displeased you; I was quite sure I should."

"I am not displeased; but what you say is rather startling. In what respect does Madame prefer De Guiche to you?"

"I shall say no more," said the chevalier, saluting the prince ceremoniously.

"On the contrary, I require you to speak. If you withdraw on that account, you must indeed be very jealous."

"One cannot help being jealous, my lord, when one loves. Is not your royal highness jealous of Madame? Would you not, if you saw some one always near Madame, and always treated with great favour, take umbrage at it? One's friends are as one's lovers. Your highness has sometimes conferred the distinguished honour upon me of calling me your friend."

"Yes, yes; but you used a phrase which has a very equivocal significance; you are unfortunate in your phrases."

“What phrase, my lord?”

“You said, ‘treated with great favour.’ What do you mean by favour?”

“Nothing can be more simple,” said the chevalier, with an expression of great frankness; “for instance, whenever a husband remarks that his wife summons such and such a man near her; whenever this man is always to be found by her side, or in attendance at the door of her carriage; whenever the bouquet of the one is always the same colour as the ribbons of the other; when music and supper parties are held in private apartments; whenever a dead silence takes place immediately the husband makes his appearance in his wife’s rooms; and when the husband suddenly finds that he has, as a companion, the most devoted and the kindest of men, who, a week before, was with him as little as possible; why, then—”

“Well, finish.”

“Why, then, I say, my lord, one possibly may get jealous. But all these details hardly apply; for our conversation had nothing to do with them.”

The duke was evidently very much agitated, and seemed to struggle with himself a good deal. “You have not told me,” he then remarked, “why you absented yourself. A little while ago you said it was from a fear of intruding; you added, even, that you had observed a disposition on Madame’s part to encourage De Guiche.”

“Pardon me, my lord, I did not say that.”

“You did, indeed.”

“Well, if I did say so, I observed nothing but what was very inoffensive.”

“At all events, you remarked something.”

“You embarrass me, my lord.”

“What does that matter? Answer me. If you speak the truth, why should you feel embarrassed?”

“I always speak the truth, my lord; but I also always hesitate when it is a question of repeating what others say.”

“Ah! repeat? It appears that it is talked about, then?”

“I acknowledge that others have spoken to me on the subject.”

“Who?” said the prince.

The chevalier assumed almost an angry air, as he replied, “My lord, you are subjecting me to cross-examination; you treat me as a criminal at the bar; the rumors which idly pass by a gentleman’s ears do not remain there. Your highness wishes me to magnify rumors until it attains the importance of an event.”

“However,” said the duke, in great displeasure, “the fact remains that you withdrew on account of this report.”

“To speak the truth, others have talked to me of the attentions of M. de Guiche to Madame, nothing more; perfectly harmless, I repeat, and more than that, allowable. But do not be unjust, my lord, and do not attach any undue importance to it. It does not concern you.”

“M. de Guiche’s attentions to Madame do not concern me?”

“No, my lord; and what I say to you I would say to De Guiche himself, so little do I think of the attentions he pays Madame. Nay, I would say it even to Madame herself. Only you understand what I am afraid of—I am afraid of being thought jealous of the favour shown, when I am only jealous as far as friendship is concerned. I know your disposition; I know that when you bestow your affections you become exclusively attached. You love Madame—and who, indeed, would not love her? Follow me attentively as I proceed:—Madame has noticed among your friends the handsomest and most fascinating of them all; she will begin to influence you on his behalf in such a way that you will neglect the others. Your indifference would kill me; it is already bad enough to have to support Madame’s indifference. I have, therefore, made up my mind to give way to the favourite whose happiness I envy, even while I acknowledge my sincere friendship and sincere admiration for him. Well, my lord, do you see anything to object to in this reasoning? Is it not that of a man of honour? Is my conduct that of a sincere friend? Answer me, at least, after having so closely questioned me.”

The duke had seated himself, with his head buried in his hands. After a silence long enough to enable the chevalier to judge the effect of this oratorical display, the duke arose, saying, “Come, be candid.”

“As I always am.”

“Very well. You know that we already observed something respecting that mad fellow, Buckingham.”

“Do not say anything against Madame, my lord, or I shall take my leave. It is impossible you can be suspicious of Madame?”

“No, no, chevalier; I do not suspect Madame; but in fact, I observe—I compare—”

“Buckingham was a madman, my lord.”

“A madman about whom, however, you opened my eyes thoroughly.”

“No, no,” said the chevalier, quickly; “it was not I who opened your eyes, it was De Guiche. Do not confound us, I beg.” And he began to laugh in so harsh a manner that it sounded like the hiss of a serpent.

“Yes, yes; I remember. You said a few words, but De Guiche showed the most jealousy.”

“I should think so,” continued the chevalier, in the same tone. “He was fighting for home and altar.”

“What did you say?” said the duke, haughtily, thoroughly roused by this insidious jest.

“Am I not right? for does not M. de Guiche hold the chief post of honour in your household?”

“Well,” replied the duke, somewhat calmed, “had this passion of Buckingham been remarked?”

“Certainly.”

“Very well. Do people say that M. de Guiche’s is remarked as much?”

“Pardon me, my lord; you are again mistaken; no one says that M. de Guiche entertains anything of the sort.”

“Very good.”

“You see, my lord, that it would have been better, a hundred times better, to have left me in my retirement, than to have allowed you to conjure up, by aid of any scruples I may have had, suspicions which Madame will regard as crimes, and she would be in the right, too.”

“What would you do?”

“Act reasonably.”

“In what way?”

“I should not pay the slightest attention to the society of these new Epicurean philosophers; and, in that way, the rumors will cease.”

“Well, I will see; I will think it over.”

“Oh, you have time enough; the danger is not great; and then, besides, it is not a question of danger or of passion. It all arose from a fear I had to see your friendship for me decrease. From the very moment you restore it, with so kind an assurance of its existence, I have no longer any other idea in my head.”

The duke shook his head as if he meant to say: “If you have no more ideas, I have, though.” It being now the dinner hour, the prince sent to inform Madame of it; but she returned a message to the effect that she could not be present, but would dine in her own apartment.

“That is not my fault,” said the duke. “This morning, having taken them by surprise in the midst of a musical party, I got jealous; and so they are in the sulks with me.”

“We will dine alone,” said the chevalier, with a sigh; “I regret De Guiche is not here.”

“Oh! De Guiche will not remain long in the sulks; he is a very good-natured fellow.”

“My lord,” said the chevalier, suddenly, “an excellent idea has struck me, in our conversation just now. I may have exasperated your highness, and caused you some dissatisfaction. It is but fitting that I should be the mediator. I will go and look for the count, and bring him back with me.”

“Ah! chevalier, you are really a very good-natured fellow.”

“You say that as if you were surprised.”

“Well, you are not so tender-hearted every day.”

“That may be; but confess that I know how to repair a wrong I may have done.”

“I confess that.”

“Will your highness do me the favour to wait here a few minutes?”

“Willingly; be off, and I will try on my Fontainebleau costume.”

The chevalier left the room, called his different attendant with the greatest care, as if he were giving them different orders. All went off in various directions; but he retained his valet de chambre.

“Ascertain, and immediately, too, of M. de Guiche is not in Madame’s apartments. How can one learn it?”

“Very easily, monsieur. I will ask Malicorne, who will find out from Mlle. de Montalais. I may as well tell you, however, that the inquiry will be useless; for all M. de Guiche’s attendants are gone, and he must have left with them.”

“Ascertain, nevertheless.”

Ten minutes had hardly passed, when the valet returned. He beckoned his master mysteriously towards the servants’ staircase, and showed him into a small room with a window looking out upon the garden. “What is the matter?” said the chevalier; “why so many precautions?”

“Look, monsieur,” said the valet, “look yonder, under the walnut-tree.”

“Ah?” said the chevalier. “I see Manicamp there. What is he waiting for?”

“You will see in a moment, monsieur, if you wait patiently. There, do you see now?”

“I see one, two, four musicians with their instruments, and behind them, urging them on, De Guiche himself. What is he doing there, though?”

“He is waiting until the little door of the staircase, belonging to the ladies of honour, is opened; by that staircase he will ascend to Madame’s apartments, where some new pieces of music are going to be performed during dinner.”

“This is admirable news you tell me.”

“Is it not, monsieur?”

“Was it M. de Malicorne who told you this?”

“Yes, monsieur.”

“He likes you, then?”

“No, monsieur, it is Monsieur that he likes.”

“Why?”

“Because he wishes to belong to his household.”

“And most certainly he shall. How much did he give you for that?”

“The secret which I now dispose of to you, monsieur.”

“And which I buy for a hundred pistoles. Take them.”

“Thank you, monsieur. Look, look, the little door opens; a woman admits the musicians.”

“It is Montalais.”

“Hush, my lord; do not call out her name; whoever says Montalais says Malicorne. If you quarrel with the one, you will be on bad terms with the other.”

“Very well; I have seen nothing.”

“And I,” said the valet, pocketing the purse, “have received nothing.”

The chevalier, being now certain that Guiche had entered, returned to the prince, whom he found splendidly dressed and radiant with joy, as with good looks. "I am told," he exclaimed, "that the king has taken the sun as his device; really, my lord, it is you whom this device would best suit."

"Where is De Guiche?"

"He cannot be found. He has fled—has evaporated entirely. Your scolding of this morning terrified him. He could not be found in his apartments."

"Bah! the hair-brained fellow is capable of setting off post-haste to his own estates. Poor man! we will recall him. Come, let us dine now."

"My lord, to-day is a very festival of ideas; I have another."

"What is it?"

"Madame is angry with you, and she has reason to be so. You owe her revenge; go and dine with her."

"Oh! that would be acting like a weak and whimsical husband."

"It is the duty of a good husband to do so. The princess is no doubt wearied enough; she will be weeping in her plate, and here eyes will get quite red. A husband who is the cause of his wife's eyes getting red is an odious creature. Come, my lord, come."

"I cannot; for I have directed dinner to be served here."

"Yet see, my lord, how dull we shall be; I shall be low-spirited because I know that Madame will be alone; you, hard and savage as you wish to appear, will be sighing all the while. Take me with you to Madame's dinner, and that will be a delightful surprise. I am sure we shall be very merry; you were in the wrong this morning."

"Well, perhaps I was."

"There is no perhaps at all, for it is a fact you were so."

"Chevalier, chevalier, your advice is not good."

"Nay, my advice is good; all the advantages are on your own side. Your violet-coloured suit, embroidered with gold, becomes you admirably. Madame will be as much vanquished by the man as by the action. Come, my lord."

"You decide me; let us go."

The duke left his room, accompanied by the chevalier and went towards Madame's apartments. The chevalier hastily whispered to the valet, "Be sure there are some people before that little door, so that no one can escape in that direction. Run, run!" And he followed the duke towards the ante-chambers of Madame's suite of apartments, and when the ushers were about to announce them, the chevalier said, laughing, "His highness wishes to surprise Madame."

XXXII. Monsieur is Jealous of Guiche.

Monsieur entered the room abruptly, as persons do who mean well and think they confer pleasure, or as those who hope to surprise some secret, the terrible reward of jealous people. Madame, almost out of her senses with joy at the first bars of music, was dancing in the most unrestrained manner, leaving the dinner, which had been already begun, unfinished. Her partner was M. de Guiche, who, with his arms raised, and his eyes half closed, was kneeling on one knee, like the Spanish dancers, with looks full of passion, and gestures of the most caressing character. The princess was dancing round him with a responsive smile, and the same air of alluring seductiveness. Montalais stood by admiringly; La Vallière, seated in a corner of the room, looked on thoughtfully. It is impossible to describe the effect which the presence of the prince produced upon this gleeful company, and it would be equally impossible to describe the effect which the sight of their happiness produced upon Philip. The Comte de Guiche had no power to move; Madame remained in the middle of one of the figures and of an attitude, unable to utter a word. The Chevalier de Lorraine, leaning his back against the doorway, smiled like a man in the very height of the frankest admiration. The pallor of the prince, and the convulsive twitching of his hands and limbs, were the first symptoms that struck those present. A dead silence succeeded the merry music of the dance. The Chevalier de Lorraine took advantage of this interval to salute Madame and De Guiche most respectfully, affecting to join them together in his reverences as though they were the master and mistress of the house. Monsieur then approached them, saying, in a hoarse tone of voice, "I am delighted; I came here expecting to find you ill and low-spirited, and I find you abandoning yourself to new amusements; really, it is most fortunate. My house is the pleasantest in the kingdom." Then turning towards De Guiche, "Comte," he said, "I did not know you were so good a dancer." And, again addressing his wife, he said, "Show a little more consideration for me, Madame; whenever you intend to amuse yourselves here, invite me. I am a prince, unfortunately, very much neglected."

Guiche had now recovered his self-possession, and with the spirited boldness which was natural to him, and sat so well upon him, he said, "Your highness knows very well that my very life is at your service, and whenever there is a question of its being needed, I am ready; but to-day, as it is only a question of dancing to music, I dance."

"And you are perfectly right," said the prince, coldly. "But, Madame," he continued, "you do not remark that your ladies deprive me of my friends; M. de Guiche does not belong to you, Madame, but to me. If you wish to dine without me you have your ladies. When I dine alone I have my gentlemen; do not strip me of everything."

Madame felt the reproach and the lesson, and the colour rushed to her face. "Monsieur," she replied, "I was not aware, when I came to the court of France, that princesses of my rank were to be regarded as the women in Turkey are. I was not aware that we were not allowed to be seen; but, since such is your desire, I will conform myself to it; pray do not hesitate, if you should wish it, to have my windows barred, even."

This repartee, which made Montalais and De Guiche smile, rekindled the prince's anger, no inconsiderable portion of which had already evaporated in words.

"Very well," he said, in a concentrated tone of voice, "this is the way in which I am respected in my own house."

"My lord, my lord," murmured the chevalier in the duke's ear, in such a manner that every one could observe he was endeavoring to calm him.

"Come," replied the prince, as his only answer to the remark, hurrying him away, and turning round with so hasty a movement that he almost ran against Madame. The chevalier followed him to his own apartment, where the prince had no sooner seated himself than he gave free vent to his fury. The chevalier raised his eyes towards the ceiling, joined his hands together, and said not a word.

"Give me your opinion," exclaimed the prince.

"Upon what?"

"Upon what is taking place here."

"Oh, my lord, it is a very serious matter."

"It is abominable! I cannot live in this manner."

"How miserable all this is," said the chevalier. "We hoped to enjoy tranquillity after that madman Buckingham had left."

"And this is worse."

"I do not say that, my lord."

"Yes, but I say it; for Buckingham would never have ventured upon a fourth part of what we have just now seen."

"What do you mean?"

"To conceal oneself for the purposes of dancing, and to feign indisposition in order to dine tete-a-tete."

"No, no, my lord."

"Yes, yes," exclaimed the prince, exciting himself like a self-willed child; "but I will not endure it any longer, I must learn what is really going on."

"Oh, my lord, an exposure—"

"By Heaven, monsieur, shall I put myself out of the way, when people show so little consideration for me? Wait for me here, chevalier, wait for me here." The prince disappeared in the neighboring apartment and inquired of the gentleman in attendance if the queen-mother had returned from chapel.

Anne of Austria felt that her happiness was now complete; peace restored to her family, a nation delighted with the presence of a young monarch who had shown an aptitude for affairs of great importance; the revenues of the state increased; external peace assured; everything seemed to promise a tranquil future. Her thoughts recurred, now and then, to the poor young nobleman whom she had received as a mother, and had driven away as a hard-hearted step-mother, and she sighed as she thought of him.

Suddenly the Duc d'Orleans entered her room. "Dear mother," he exclaimed hurriedly, closing the door, "things cannot go on as they are now."

Anne of Austria raised her beautiful eyes towards him, and with an unmoved suavity of manner, said, "What do you allude to?"

"I wish to speak of Madame."

"Your wife?"

"Yes, madame."

"I suppose that silly fellow Buckingham has been writing a farewell letter to her."

"Oh! yes, madame; of course, it is a question of Buckingham."

"Of whom else could it be, then? for that poor fellow was, wrongly enough, the object of your jealousy, and I thought—"

"My wife, madame, has already replaced the Duke of Buckingham."

"Philip, what are you saying? You are speaking very heedlessly."

"No, no. Madame has so managed matters, that I am still jealous."

"Of whom, in Heaven's name?"

"Is it possible you have not remarked it? Have you not noticed that M. de Guiche is always in her apartments—always with her?"

The queen clapped her hands together, and began to laugh. "Philip," she said, "your jealousy is not merely a defect, it is a disease."

"Whether a defect or a disease, madame, I am the sufferer from it."

"And do you imagine that a complaint which exists only in your own imagination can be cured? You wish it to be said you are right in being jealous, when there is no ground whatever for your jealousy."

"Of course, you will begin to say for this gentleman what you already said on the behalf of the other."

"Because, Philip," said the queen dryly, "what you did for the other, you are going to do for this one."

The prince bowed, slightly annoyed. "If I give you facts," he said, "will you believe me?"

"If it regarded anything else but jealousy, I would believe you without your bringing facts forward; but as jealousy is the case, I promise nothing."

"It is just the same as if your majesty were to desire me to hold my tongue, and sent me away unheard."

"Far from it; you are my son, I owe you a mother's indulgence."

"Oh, say what you think; you owe me as much indulgence as a madman deserves."

"Do not exaggerate, Philip, and take care how you represent your wife to me as a woman of depraved mind—"

"But facts, mother, facts!"

"Well, I am listening."

"This morning at ten o'clock they were playing music in Madame's apartments."

"No harm in that, surely."

"M. de Guiche was talking with her alone—Ah! I forgot to tell you, that, during the last ten days, he has never left her side."

"If they were doing any harm they would hide themselves."

"Very good," exclaimed the duke, "I expected you to say that. Pray remember with precision the words you have just uttered. This morning I took them by surprise, and showed my dissatisfaction in a very marked manner."

"Rely upon it, that is quite sufficient; it was, perhaps, even a little too much. These young women easily take offense. To reproach them for an error they have not committed is, sometimes, almost equivalent to telling them they might be guilty of even worse."

"Very good, very good; but wait a minute. Do not forget what you have just this moment said, that this morning's lesson ought to have been sufficient, and that if they had been doing what was wrong, they would have hidden themselves."

"Yes, I said so."

"Well, just now, repenting of my hastiness of the morning, and imagining that Guiche was sulking in his own apartments, I went to pay Madame a visit. Can you guess what, or whom, I found there? Another set of musicians; more dancing, and Guiche himself—he was concealed there."

Anne of Austria frowned. "It was imprudent," she said. "What did Madame say?"

"Nothing."

"And Guiche?"

"As much—oh, no! he muttered some impertinent remark or another."

"Well, what is your opinion, Philip?"

"That I have been made a fool of; that Buckingham was only a pretext, and that Guiche is the one who is really to blame in the matter."

Anne shrugged her shoulders. "Well," she said, "what else?"

"I wish De Guiche to be dismissed from my household, as Buckingham was, and I shall ask the king, unless—"

"Unless what?"

"Unless you, my dear mother, who are so clever and so kind, will execute the commission yourself."

"I will not do it, Philip."

"What, madame?"

"Listen, Philip; I am not disposed to pay people ill compliments every day; I have some influence over young people, but I cannot take advantage of it without running the chances of losing it altogether. Besides, there is nothing to prove that M. de Guiche is guilty."

"He has displeased me."

"That is your own affair."

"Very well, I know what I shall do," said the prince, impetuously.

Anne looked at him with some uneasiness. "What do you intend to do?" she said.

"I will have him drowned in my fish-pond the very next time I find him in my apartments again." Having launched this terrible threat, the prince expected his mother would be frightened out of her senses; but the queen was unmoved.

"Do so," she said.

Philip was as weak as a woman, and began to cry out, "Every one betrays me,—no one cares for me; my mother, even, joins my enemies."

"Your mother, Philip, sees further in the matter than you do, and does not care about advising you, since you will not listen to her."

"I will go to the king."

"I was about to propose that to you. I am now expecting his majesty; it is the hour he usually pays me a visit; explain the matter to him yourself."

She had hardly finished when Philip heard the door of the ante-room open with some noise. He began to feel nervous. At the sound of the king's footsteps, which could be heard upon the carpet, the duke hurriedly made his escape. Anne of Austria could not resist laughing, and was laughing still when the king entered. He came very affectionately to inquire after the even now uncertain health of the queen-mother, and to announce to her that the preparations for the journey to Fontainebleau were complete. Seeing her laugh, his uneasiness on her account diminished, and he addressed her in a vivacious tone himself. Anne of Austria took him by the hand, and, in a voice full of playfulness, said, "Do you know, sire that I am proud of being a Spanish woman?"

"Why, madame?"

"Because Spanish women are worth more than English women at least."

"Explain yourself."

"Since your marriage you have not, I believe, had a single reproach to make against the queen."

"Certainly not."

"And you, too, have been married some time. Your brother, on the contrary, has been married but a fortnight."

"Well?"

"He is now finding fault with Madame a second time."

"What, Buckingham still?"

"No, another."

"Who?"

"Guiche."

"Really? Madame is a coquette, then?"

"I fear so."

"My poor brother," said the king, laughing.

"You don't object to coquettes, it seems?"

"In Madame, certainly I do; but Madame is not a coquette at heart."

"That may be, but your brother is excessively angry about it."

"What does he want?"

"He wants to drown Guiche."

"That is a violent measure to resort to."

"Do not laugh; he is extremely irritated. Think of what can be done."

"To save Guiche—certainly."

"Of, if your brother heard you, he would conspire against you as your uncle did against your father."

"No; Philip has too much affection for me for that, and I, on my side, have too great a regard for him; we shall live together on very good terms. But what is the substance of his request?"

"That you will prevent Madame from being a coquette and Guiche from being amiable."

"Is that all? My brother has an exalted idea of sovereign power. To reform a man, not to speak about reforming a woman!"

"How will you set about it?"

"With a word to Guiche, who is a clever fellow, I will undertake to convince him."

"But Madame?"

"That is more difficult; a word will not be enough. I will compose a homily and read it to her."

"There is no time to be lost."

"Oh, I will use the utmost diligence. There is a repetition of the ballet this afternoon."

"You will read her a lecture while you are dancing?"

"Yes, madame."

"You promise to convert her?"

"I will root out the heresy altogether, either by convincing her, or by extreme measures."

"That is all right, then. Do not mix me up in the affair; Madame would never forgive me all her life, and as a mother-in-law, I ought to desire to live on good terms with my new-found daughter."

"The king, madame, will take all upon himself. But let me reflect."

"What about?"

"It would be better, perhaps, if I were to go and see Madame in her own apartment."

"Would that not seem a somewhat serious step to take?"

"Yes; but seriousness is not unbecoming in preachers, and the music of the ballet would drown half my arguments. Besides, the object is to prevent any violent measures on my brother's part, so that a little precipitation may be advisable. Is Madame in her own apartment?"

"I believe so."

"What is my statement of grievances to consist of?"

"In a few words, of the following: music uninterruptedly; Guiche's assiduity; suspicions of treasonable plots and practices."

"And the proofs?"

"There are none."

"Very well; I will go at once to see Madame." The king turned to look in the mirrors at his costume, which was very rich, and his face, which was radiant as the morning. "I suppose my brother is kept a little at a distance," said the king.

"Fire and water cannot be more opposite."

"That will do. Permit me, madame, to kiss your hands, the most beautiful hands in France."

"May you be successful, sire, as the family peacemaker."

"I do not employ an ambassador," said Louis, "which is as much as to say that I shall succeed." He laughed as he left the room, and carelessly adjusted his ruffles as he went along.

XXXIII. The Mediator.

When the king made his appearance in Madame's apartments, the courtiers, whom the news of a conjugal misunderstanding had dispersed through the various apartments, began to entertain the most serious apprehensions. A storm was brewing in that direction, the elements of which the Chevalier de Lorraine, in the midst of the different groups, was analyzing with delight, contributing to the weaker, and acting, according to his own wicked designs, in such a manner with regard to the stronger, as to produce the most disastrous consequences possible. As Anne of Austria had herself said, the presence of the king gave a solemn and serious character to the event. Indeed, in the year 1662, the dissatisfaction of Monsieur with Madame, and the king's intervention in the private affairs of Monsieur, was a matter of no inconsiderable moment. 3

The boldest, even, who had been the associates of the Comte de Guiche, had, from the first moment, held aloof from him, with a sort of nervous apprehension; and the comte himself, infected by the general panic, retired to his own room. The king entered Madame's private apartments, acknowledging and returning the salutations, as he was always in the habit of doing. The ladies of honour were ranged in a line on his passage along the gallery. Although his majesty was very much preoccupied, he gave the glance of a master at the two rows of young and beautiful girls, who modestly cast down their eyes, blushing as they felt the king's gaze fall upon them. One only of the number, whose long hair fell in silken masses upon the most beautiful skin imaginable, was pale, and could hardly sustain herself, notwithstanding the knocks which her companion gave her with her elbow. It was La Vallière whom Montalais supported in that manner by whispering some of that courage to her with which she herself was so abundantly provided. The king could not resist turning round to look at them again. Their faces, which had already been raised, were again lowered, but the only fair head among them remained motionless, as if all the strength and intelligence she had left had abandoned her. When he entered Madame's room, Louis found his sister-in-law reclining upon the cushions of her cabinet. She rose and made a profound reverence, murmuring some words of thanks for the honour she was receiving. She then resumed her seat, overcome by a sudden weakness, which was no doubt assumed, for a delightful colour animated her cheeks, and her eyes, still red from the tears she had recently shed, never had more fire in them. When the king was seated, as soon as he had remarked, with that accuracy of observation which characterized him, the disorder of the apartment, and the no less great disorder of Madame's countenance, he assumed a playful manner, saying, "My dear sister, at what hour to-day would you wish the repetition of the ballet to take place?"

Madame, shaking her charming head, slowly and languishingly said: “Ah! sire, will you graciously excuse my appearance at the repetition? I was about to send to inform you that I could not attend to-day.”

“Indeed,” said the king, in apparent surprise; “are you not well?”

“No, sire.”

“I will summon your medical attendants, then.”

“No, for they can do nothing for my indisposition.”

“You alarm me.”

“Sire, I wish to ask your majesty’s permission to return to England.”

The king started. “Return to England,” he said; “do you really say what you mean?”

“I say it reluctantly, sire,” replied the grand-daughter of Henry IV., firmly, her beautiful black eyes flashing. “I regret to have to confide such matters to your majesty, but I feel myself too unhappy at your majesty’s court; and I wish to return to my own family.”

“Madame, madame,” exclaimed the king, as he approached her.

“Listen to me, sire,” continued the young woman, acquiring by degrees that ascendancy over her interrogator which her beauty and her nervous nature conferred; “young as I am, I have already suffered humiliation, and have endured disdain here. Oh! do not contradict me, sire,” she said, with a smile. The king coloured.

“Then,” she continued, “I had reasoned myself into the belief that Heaven called me into existence with that object—I, the daughter of a powerful monarch; that since my father had been deprived of life, Heaven could well smite my pride. I have suffered greatly; I have been the cause, too, of my mother suffering much; but I vowed that if Providence ever placed me in a position of independence, even were it that of a workman of the lower classes, who gains her bread by her labor, I would never suffer humiliation again. That day has now arrived; I have been restored to the fortune due to my rank and to my birth; I have even ascended again the steps of a throne, and I thought that, in allying myself with a French prince, I should find in him a relation, a friend, an equal; but I perceive I have found only a master, and I rebel. My mother shall know nothing of it; you whom I respect, and whom I—love—”

The king started; never had any voice so gratified his ear.

“You, sire, who know all, since you have come here; you will, perhaps, understand me. If you had not come, I should have gone to you. I wish for permission to go away. I leave it to your delicacy of feeling to exculpate and to protect me.”

“My dear sister,” murmured the king, overpowered by this bold attack, “have you reflected upon the enormous difficulty of the project you have conceived?”

“Sire, I do not reflect, I feel. Attacked, I instinctively repel the attack, nothing more.”

“Come, tell me, what have they done to you?” said the king.

The princess, it will have been seen, by this peculiarly feminine maneuver, had escaped every reproach, and advanced on her side a far more serious one; from the accused she became the accuser. It is an infallible sign of guilt; but notwithstanding that, all women, even the least clever of the sex, invariably know how to derive some such means of turning the tables. The king had forgotten that he was paying her a visit in order to say to her, “What have you done to my brother?” and he was reduced to weakly asking her, “What have they done to you?”

“What have they done to me?” replied Madame. “One must be a woman to understand it, sire—they have made me shed tears;” and, with one of her fingers, whose slenderness and perfect whiteness were unequaled, she pointed to her brilliant eyes swimming with unshed drops, and again began to weep.

“I implore you, my dear sister!” said the king, advancing to take her warm and throbbing hand, which she abandoned to him.

“In the first place, sire, I was deprived of the presence of my brother’s friend. The Duke of Buckingham was an agreeable, cheerful visitor; my own countryman, who knew my habits; I will say almost a companion, so accustomed had we been to pass our days together, with our other friends, upon the beautiful piece of water at St. James’s.”

“But Villiers was in love with you.”

“A pretext! What does it matter,” she said, seriously, “whether the duke was in love with me or not? Is a man in love so very dangerous for me? Ah! sire, it is not sufficient for a man to love a woman.” And she smiled so tenderly, and with so much archness, that the king felt his heart swell and throb in his breast.

“At all events, if my brother were jealous?” interrupted the king.

“Very well, I admit that is a reason; and the duke was sent away accordingly.”

“No, not sent away.”

“Driven away, dismissed, expelled, then, if you prefer it, sire. One of the first gentlemen of Europe obliged to leave the court of the King of France, of Louis XIV., like a beggar, on account of a glance or a bouquet. It was little worthy of a most gallant court; but forgive me, sire; I forgot, that, in speaking thus, I am attacking your sovereign power.”

“I assure you, my dear sister, it was not I who dismissed the Duke of Buckingham; I was charmed with him.”

“It was not you?” said Madame; “ah! so much the better;” and she emphasized the “so much the better,” as if she had instead said, “so much the worse.”

A few minutes’ silence ensued. She then resumed: “The Duke of Buckingham having left—I now know why and by whose means—I thought I should have recovered my tranquillity; but not at all, for all at once Monsieur found another pretext; all at once—”

“All at once,” said the king, playfully, “some one else presents himself. It is but natural; you are beautiful, and will always meet with men who will madly love you.”

“In that case,” exclaimed the princess, “I will create a solitude around me, which indeed seems to be what is wished, and what is being prepared for me. But no, I prefer to return to London. There I am known and appreciated. I shall have friends, without fearing they may be regarded as my lovers. Shame! it is a disgraceful suspicion, and unworthy a gentleman. Monsieur has lost everything in my estimation, since he has shown me he can be a tyrant to a woman.”

“Nay, nay, my brother’s only fault is that of loving you.”

“Love me! Monsieur love me! Ah! sire,” and she burst out laughing. “Monsieur will never love any woman,” she said; “Monsieur loves himself too much; no, unhappily for me, Monsieur’s jealousy is of the worst kind—he is jealous without love.”

“Confess, however,” said the king, who began to be excited by this varied and animated conversation; “confess that Guiche loves you.”

“Ah! sire, I know nothing about that.”

“You must have perceived it. A man who loves readily betrays himself.”

“M. de Guiche has not betrayed himself.”

“My dear sister, you are defending M. de Guiche.”

“I, indeed! Ah, sire, I only needed a suspicion from yourself to crown my wretchedness.”

“No, madame, no,” returned the king, hurriedly; “do not distress yourself. Nay, you are weeping. I implore you to calm yourself.”

She wept, however, and large tears fell upon her hands; the king took one of her hands in his, and kissed the tears away. She looked at him so sadly and with so much tenderness that he felt his heart giving way under her gaze.

“You have no kind of feeling, then, for Guiche?” he said, more disturbed than became his character of mediator.

“None—absolutely none.”

“Then I can reassure my brother in that respect?”

“Nothing will satisfy him, sire. Do not believe he is jealous. Monsieur has been badly advised by some one, and he is of nervous disposition.”

“He may well be so when you are concerned,” said the king.

Madame cast down her eyes, and was silent; the king did so likewise, still holding her hand all the while. Their momentary silence seemed to last an age. Madame gently withdrew her hand, and from that moment, she felt her triumph was certain, and that the field of battle was her own.

“Monsieur complains,” said the king, “that you prefer the society of private individuals to his own conversation and society.”

“But Monsieur passes his life in looking at his face in the glass, and in plotting all sorts of spiteful things against women with the Chevalier de Lorraine.”

“Oh, you are going somewhat too far.”

“I only tell you what is true. Do you observe for yourself, sire, and you will see that I am right.”

“I will observe; but, in the meantime, what satisfaction can I give my brother?”

“My departure.”

“You repeat that word,” exclaimed the king, imprudently, as if, during the last ten minutes, such a change had been produced that Madame would have had all her ideas on the subject thoroughly changed.

“Sire, I cannot be happy here any longer,” she said. “M. de Guiche annoys Monsieur. Will he be sent away, too?”

“If it be necessary, why not?” replied the king, smiling.

“Well; and after M. de Guiche—whom, by the by, I shall regret—I warn you, sire.”

“Ah, you will regret him?”

“Certainly; he is amiable, he has a great friendship for me, and he amuses me.”

“If Monsieur were only to hear you,” said the king, slightly annoyed, “do you know I would not undertake to make it up again between you; nay, I would not even attempt it.”

“Sire, can you, even now, prevent Monsieur from being jealous of the first person who may approach? I know very well that M. de Guiche is not the first.”

“Again I warn you that as a good brother I shall take a dislike to De Guiche.”

“Ah, sire, do not, I entreat you, adopt either the sympathies or the dislikes of Monsieur. Remain king; better for yourself and for every one else.”

“You jest charmingly, madame; and I can well understand how the people you attack must adore you.”

“And is that the reason why you, sire, whom I had regarded as my defender, are about to join these who persecute me?” said Madame.

“I your persecutor! Heaven forbid!”

“Then,” she continued, languishingly, “grant me a favour.”

“Whatever you wish.”

“Let me return to England.”

“Never, never!” exclaimed Louis XIV.

“I am a prisoner, then?”

“In France—if France is a prison—yes.”

“What must I do, then?”

“I will tell you. Instead of devoting yourself to friendships which are somewhat unstable, instead of alarming us by your retirement, remain always in our society, do not leave us, let us live as a united family. M. de Guiche is certainly very amiable; but if, at least, we do not possess his wit—”

“Ah, sire, you know very well you are pretending to be modest.”

“No, I swear to you. One may be a king, and yet feel that he possesses fewer chances of pleasing than many other gentlemen.”

“I am sure, sire, that you do not believe a single word you are saying.”

The king looked at Madame tenderly, and said, “Will you promise me one thing?”

“What is it?”

“That you will no longer waste upon strangers, in your own apartments, the time which you owe us. Shall we make an offensive and defensive alliance against the common enemy?”

“An alliance with you, sire?”

"Why not? Are you not a sovereign power?"

"But are you, sire, a reliable ally?"

"You shall see, madame."

"And when shall this alliance commence?"

"This very day."

"I will draw up the treaty, and you shall sign it."

"Blindly."

"Then, sire, I promise you wonders; you are the star of the court, and when you make your appearance, everything will be resplendent."

"Oh, madame, madame," said Louis XIV., "you know well that there is no brilliancy that does not proceed from yourself, and that if I assume the sun as my device, it is only an emblem."

"Sire, you flatter your ally, and you wish to deceive her," said Madame, threatening the king with her finger menacingly raised.

"What! you believe I am deceiving you, when I assure you of my affection?"

"Yes."

"What makes you so suspicious?"

"One thing."

"What is it? I shall indeed be unhappy if I do not overcome it."

"That one thing in question, sire, is not in your power, not even in the power of Heaven."

"Tell me what it is."

"The past."

"I do not understand, madame," said the king, precisely because he had understood her but too well.

The princess took his hand in hers. "Sire," she said, "I have had the misfortune to displease you for so long a period, that I have almost the right to ask myself to-day why you were able to accept me as a sister-in-law."

"Displease me! You have displeased me?"

"Nay, do not deny it, for I remember it well."

"Our alliance shall date from to-day," exclaimed the king, with a warmth that was not assumed. "You will not think any more of the past, will you? I myself am resolved that I will not. I shall always remember the present; I have it before my eyes; look." And he led the princess before a mirror, in which she saw herself reflected, blushing and beautiful enough to overcome a saint.

"It is all the same," she murmured; "it will not be a very worthy alliance."

"Must I swear?" inquired the king, intoxicated by the voluptuous turn the whole conversation had taken.

"Oh, I will not refuse to witness a resounding oath," said Madame; "it has always the semblance of security."

The king knelt upon a footstool and took Madame's hand. She, with a smile that no painter could ever succeed in depicting, and which a poet might only imagine, gave him both her hands, in which he hid his burning face. Neither of them could utter a syllable. The king felt Madame withdraw her hands, caressing his face while she did so. He rose immediately and left the apartment. The courtiers remarked his heightened colour, and concluded that the scene had been a stormy one. The Chevalier de Lorraine, however, hastened to say, "Nay, be comforted, gentlemen, his majesty is always pale when he is angry."

XXXIV. The Advisers.

The king left Madame in a state of agitation it would have been difficult even for himself to have explained. It is impossible, in fact, to depict the secret play of those strange sympathies which, suddenly and apparently without any cause, are excited, after many years passed in the greatest calmness and indifference, by two hearts destined to love each other. Why had Louis formerly disdained, almost hated, Madame? Why did he now find the same woman so beautiful, so captivating? And why, not only were his thoughts occupied about her, but still more, why were they so continuously occupied about her? Why, in fact, had Madame, whose eyes and mind were sought for in another direction, shown during the last week towards the king a semblance of favour which encouraged the belief of still greater regard. It must not be supposed that Louis proposed to himself any plan of seduction; the tie which united Madame to his brother was, or at least, seemed to him, an insuperable barrier; he was even too far removed from that barrier to perceive its existence. But on the downward path of those passions in which the heart rejoices, towards which youth impels us, no one can decide where to stop, not even the man who has in advance calculated all the chances of his own success or another's submission. As far as Madame was concerned, her regard for the king may easily be explained: she was young, a coquette, and ardently fond of admiration. Hers was one of those buoyant, impetuous natures, which upon a theatre would leap over the greatest obstacles to obtain an acknowledgement of applause from the spectators. It was not surprising, then, that, after having been adored by Buckingham, by De Guiche, who was superior to Buckingham, even if it were only from that negative merit, so much appreciated by women, that is to say, novelty—it was not surprising, we say, that the princess should raise her ambition to being admired by the king, who not only was the first person in the kingdom, but was one of the handsomest and cleverest men in Europe. As for the sudden passion with which Louis was inspired for his sister-in-law, physiology would perhaps supply an explanation by some hackneyed commonplace reasons, and nature by means of her mysterious affinity of characters. Madame had the most beautiful black eyes in the world; Louis, eyes as beautiful, but blue. Madame was laughter-loving and unreserved in her manners; Louis, melancholy and diffident. Summoned to meet each other for the first time upon the grounds of interest and common curiosity, these two opposite natures were mutually influenced by the mingling of their reciprocal contradictions of character. Louis, when he returned to his own rooms, acknowledged to himself that Madame was the most attractive woman of his court. Madame, left alone, delightedly thought that she had made a great impression on the king. This feeling with her must remain passive, whilst the king could not but act with all the natural vehemence of the heated fancies of a young man, and of a young man who has but to express a wish to see his wish fulfilled. The first thing the king did was to announce to Monsieur that everything was quietly arranged; that Madame had the greatest respect, the sincerest affection for him; but that she was of a proud, impetuous character, and that her susceptibilities were so acute as to require very careful management. Monsieur replied in the reticent tone of voice he generally adopted with his brother, that he could not very well understand the susceptibilities of a woman whose conduct might, in his opinion, expose her to censorious remarks, and that if any one had a right to feel wounded, it was he, Monsieur himself. To this the king replied in a quick tone of voice, which showed the interest he took in his sister-in-law, "Thank Heaven, Madame is above censure."

"The censure of others, certainly, I admit," said Monsieur; "but not above mine, I presume."

"Well," said the king, "all I have to say, Philip, is that Madame's conduct does not deserve your censure. She certainly is heedless and singular, but professes the best feelings. The English character is not always well understood in France, and the liberty of English manners sometimes surprises those who do not know the extent to which this liberty is enriched by innocence."

"Ah!" said Monsieur, more and more piqued, "from the very moment that your majesty absolves my wife, whom I accuse, my wife is not guilty, and I have nothing more to say."

"Philip," replied the king hastily, for he felt the voice of conscience murmuring softly in his heart, that Monsieur was not altogether wrong, "what I have done, and what I have said, has been only for your happiness. I was told that you complained of a want of confidence and attention on Madame's part, and I did not wish your uneasiness to be prolonged. It is part of my duty to watch over your household, as over that of the humblest of my subjects. I have satisfied myself, therefore, with the sincerest pleasure, that your apprehensions have no foundation."

"And," continued Monsieur, in an interrogative tone of voice, and fixing his eyes upon his brother, "what your majesty has discovered for Madame—and I bow myself to your superior judgment—have you verified for those who have been the cause of the scandal of which I complain?"

"You are right, Philip," said the king; "I will reserve that point for future consideration."

These words comprised an order as well as a consolation; the prince felt it to be so, and withdrew.

As for Louis, he went to seek his mother, for he felt that he had need of a more complete absolution than that he had just received from his brother. Anne of Austria did not entertain for M. de Guiche the same reasons for indulgence she had had for Buckingham. She perceived, at the very first words he pronounced, that Louis was not disposed to be severe.

To appear in a contradictory humor was one of the stratagems of the good queen, in order to succeed in ascertaining the truth. But Louis was no longer in his apprenticeship; already for more than a year past he had been king, and during that year he had learned how to dissemble. Listening to Anne of Austria, in order to permit her to disclose her own thoughts, testifying his approval only by look and gesture, he became convinced, from certain piercing glances, and from certain skillful insinuations, that the queen, so clear-sighted in matters of gallantry, had, if not guessed, at least suspected, his weakness for Madame. Of all his auxiliaries, Anne of Austria would be the most important to secure; of all his enemies, Anne of Austria would prove most dangerous. Louis, therefore, changed his maneuvers. He complained of Madame, absolved Monsieur, listened to what his mother had to say of De Guiche, as he had previously listened to what she had to say of Buckingham, and then, when he saw that she thought she had gained a complete victory over him, he left her.

The whole of the court, that is to say, all the favourites and more intimate associates, and they were numerous, since there were already five masters, were assembled in the evening for the repetition of the ballet. This interval had been occupied by poor De Guiche in receiving visits; among the number was one which he hoped and feared nearly to an equal extent. It was that of the Chevalier de Lorraine. About three o'clock in the afternoon the chevalier entered De Guiche's rooms. His looks were of the most reassuring character. "Monsieur," said he to De Guiche, "was in an excellent humor, and no none could say that the slightest cloud had passed across the conjugal sky. Besides, Monsieur was not one to bear ill-feeling."

For a long time past, during his residence at the court, the Chevalier de Lorraine had decided, that of Louis XIII.'s two sons, Monsieur was the one who had inherited the father's character—an uncertain, irresolute character; impulsively good, indifferently disposed at bottom; but certainly a cipher for his friends. He especially cheered De Guiche, by pointing out to him that Madame would, before long, succeed in governing her husband, and that, consequently, that man would govern Monsieur who should succeed in influencing Madame.

To this, De Guiche full of mistrust and presence of mind, replied, "Yes, chevalier; but I believe Madame to be a very dangerous person."

"In what respect?"

"She has perceived that Monsieur is not very passionately inclined towards women."

"Quite true," said the Chevalier de Lorraine, laughing.

"In that case, Madame will choose the first one who approaches, in order to make him the object of her preference, and to bring back her husband by jealousy."

"Deep! deep!" exclaimed the chevalier.

"But true," replied De Guiche.

Neither the one nor the other expressed his real thought. De Guiche, at the very moment he thus attacked Madame's character, mentally asked her forgiveness from the bottom of his heart. The chevalier, while admiring De Guiche's penetration, was leading him, blindfolded, to the brink of the precipice. De Guiche then questioned him more directly upon the effect produced by the scene of the morning, and upon the still more serious effect produced by the scene at dinner.

"But I have already told you they are all laughing at it," replied the Chevalier de Lorraine, "and Monsieur himself at the head of them."

"Yet," hazarded De Guiche, "I have heard that the king paid Madame a visit."

"Yes, precisely so. Madame was the only one who did not laugh, and the king went to her in order to make her laugh, too."

"So that—"

"So that nothing is altered in the arrangements of the day," said the chevalier.

"And is there a repetition of the ballet this evening?"

"Certainly."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite," returned the chevalier.

At this moment of the conversation between the two young men, Raoul entered, looking full of anxiety. As soon as the chevalier, who had a secret dislike for him, as for every other noble character, perceived him enter, he rose from his seat.

"What do you advise me to do, then?" inquired De Guiche of the chevalier.

"I advise you to go to sleep in perfect tranquillity, my dear count."

"And my advice, De Guiche," said Raoul, "is the very opposite."

“What is that?”

“To mount your horse and set off at once for one of your estates; on your arrival, follow the chevalier’s advice, if you like; and, what is more, you can sleep there as long and as tranquilly as you please.”

“What! set off!” exclaimed the chevalier, feigning surprise; “why should De Guiche set off?”

“Because, and you cannot be ignorant of it—you particularly so— because every one is talking about the scene which has passed between Monsieur and De Guiche.”

De Guiche turned pale.

“Not at all,” replied the chevalier, “not at all; and you have been wrongly informed, M. de Bragelonne.”

“I have been perfectly well informed, on the contrary, monsieur,” replied Raoul, “and the advice I give De Guiche is that of a friend.”

During this discussion, De Guiche, somewhat shaken, looked alternately first at one and then at the other of his advisers. He inwardly felt that a game, important in all its consequences for the rest of his life, was being played at that moment.

“Is it not fact,” said the chevalier, putting the question to the count himself, “is it not fact, De Guiche, that the scene was not so tempestuous as the Vicomte de Bragelonne seems to think, and who, moreover, was not himself there?”

“Whether tempestuous or not,” persisted Raoul, “it is not precisely of the scene itself that I am speaking, but of the consequences that may ensue. I know that Monsieur has threatened, I know that Madame has been in tears.”

“Madame in tears!” exclaimed De Guiche, imprudently clasping his hands.

“Ah!” said the chevalier, laughing, “this is indeed a circumstance I was not acquainted with. You are decidedly better informed than I am, Monsieur de Bragelonne.”

“And it is because I am better informed than yourself, chevalier, that I insist upon De Guiche leaving.”

“No, no; I regret to differ from you, vicomte; but his departure is unnecessary. Why, indeed, should he leave? tell us why.”

“The king!”

“The king!” exclaimed De Guiche.

“Yes; I tell you the king has taken up the affair.”

“Bah!” said the chevalier, “the king likes De Guiche, and particularly his father; reflect, that, if the count were to leave, it would be an admission that he had done something which merited rebuke.”

“Why so?”

“No doubt of it; when one runs away, it is either from guilt or fear.”

“Sometimes, because a man is offended; often because he is wrongfully accused,” said Bragelonne. “We will assign as a reason for his departure, that he feels hurt and injured—nothing will be easier; we will say that we both did our utmost to keep him, and you, at least, will not be speaking otherwise than the truth. Come, De Guiche, you are innocent, and, being so, the scene of to-day must have wounded you. So set off.”

“No, De Guiche, remain where you are,” said the chevalier; “precisely as M. de Bragelonne has put it, because you are innocent. Once more, forgive me, vicomte; but my opinion is the very opposite to your own.”

“And you are at perfect liberty to maintain it, monsieur; but be assured that the exile which De Guiche will voluntarily impose upon himself will be of short duration. He can terminate it whenever he pleases, and returning from his voluntary exile, he will meet with smiles from all lips; while, on the contrary, the anger of the king may now draw down a storm upon his head, the end of which no one can foresee.”

The chevalier smiled, and muttered to himself, “That is the very thing I wish.” And at the same time he shrugged his shoulders, a movement which did not escape the count, who dreaded, if he quitted the court, to seem to yield to a feeling of fear.

“No, no; I have decided, Bragelonne; I stay.”

“I prophesy, then,” said Raoul, sadly, “that misfortune will befall you, De Guiche.”

“I, too, am a prophet, but not a prophet of evil; on the contrary, count, I say to you, ‘remain.’”

“Are you sure,” inquired De Guiche, “that the repetition of the ballet still takes place?”

“Quite sure.”

“Well, you see, Raoul,” continued De Guiche, endeavoring to smile, “you see, the court is not so very sorrowful, or so readily disposed for internal dissensions, when dancing is carried on with such assiduity. Come, acknowledge that,” said the count to Raoul, who shook his head, saying, “I have nothing to add.”

“But,” inquired the chevalier, curious to learn whence Raoul had obtained his information, the exactitude of which he was inwardly forced to admit, “since you say you are well informed, vicomte, how can you be better informed than myself, who am one of the prince’s most intimate companions?”

“To such a declaration I submit. You certainly ought to be perfectly well informed, I admit; and, as a man of honour is incapable of saying anything but what he knows to be true, or of speaking otherwise than what he thinks, I will say no more, but confess myself defeated, and leave you in possession of the field of battle.”

Whereupon Raoul, who now seemed only to care to be left quiet, threw himself upon a couch, whilst the count summoned his servants to aid him in dressing. The chevalier, finding that time was passing away, wished to leave; but he feared, too, that Raoul, left alone with De Guiche, might yet influence him to change his mind. He therefore made use of his last resource.

“Madame,” he said, “will be brilliant; she appears to-day in her costume of Pomona.”

“Yes, that is so,” exclaimed the count.

“And she has just given directions in consequence,” continued the chevalier. “You know, Monsieur de Bragelonne, that the king is to appear as Spring.”

“It will be admirable,” said De Guiche; “and that is a better reason for me to remain than any you have yet given, because I am to appear as Autumn, and shall have to dance with Madame. I cannot absent myself without the king’s orders, since my departure would interrupt the ballet.”

“I,” said the chevalier, “am to be only a simple egyptian; true, it is, I am a bad dancer, and my legs are not well made. Gentlemen, adieu. Do not forget the basket of fruit, which you are to offer to Pomona, count.”

“Rest assured,” said De Guiche, delightedly, “I shall forget nothing.”

“I am now quite certain that he will remain,” murmured the Chevalier de Lorraine to himself.

Raoul, when the chevalier had left, did not even attempt to dissuade his friend, for he felt that it would be trouble thrown away; he merely observed to the comte, in his melancholy and melodious voice, “You are embarking in a most dangerous enterprise. I know you well; you go to extremes in everything, and the lady you love does so, too. Admitting for an instant that she should at last love you—”

“Oh, never!” exclaimed De Guiche.

“Why do you say never?”

“Because it would be a great misfortune for both of us.”

“In that case, instead of regarding you simply imprudent, I cannot but consider you absolutely mad.”

“Why?”

“Are you perfectly sure—mind, answer me frankly—that you do not wish her whom you love to make any sacrifice for you?”

“Yes, yes; quite sure.”

“Love her, then, at a distance.”

“What! at a distance?”

“Certainly; what matters being present or absent, since you expect nothing from her? Love her portrait, a memento.”

“Raoul!”

“Love is a shadow, an illusion, a chimera; be devoted to the affection itself, in giving a name to your ideality.”

“Ah!”

“You turn away; your servants approach. I will say no more. In good or bad fortune, De Guiche, depend on me.”

“Indeed I shall do so.”

“Very well; that is all I had to say to you. Spare no pains in your person, De Guiche, and look your very best. Adieu.”

“You will not be present, then, at the ballet, vicomte?”

“No; I shall have a visit to pay in town. Farewell, De Guiche.”

The reception was to take place in the king’s apartments. In the first place, there were the queens, then Madame, and a few ladies of the court, who had been carefully selected. A great number of courtiers, also selected, occupied the time, before the dancing commenced, in conversing, as people knew how to converse in those times. None of the ladies who had received invitations appeared in the costumes of the fete, as the Chevalier de Lorraine had predicted, but many conversations took place about the rich and ingenious toilettes designed by different painters for the ballet of “The Demi-Gods;” for thus were termed the kings and queens of which Fontainebleau was about to become the Pantheon. Monsieur arrived, holding in his hand a drawing representing his character; he looked somewhat anxious; he bowed courteously to the young queen and his mother, but saluted Madame almost cavalierly. His notice of her and his coldness of manner were observed by all. M. de Guiche indemnified the princess by a look of passionate devotion, and it must be admitted that Madame, as she raised her eyes, returned it to him with interest. It is unquestionable that De Guiche had never looked so handsome, for Madame’s glance had its customary effect of lighting up the features of the son of the Marshal de Gramont. The king’s sister-in-law felt a storm mustering above her head; she felt, too, that during the whole of the day, so fruitful in future events, she had acted unjustly, if not treasonably, towards one who loved her with such a depth of devotion. In her eyes the moment seemed to have arrived for an acknowledgement to the poor victim of the injustice of the morning. Her heart spoke, and murmured the name of De Guiche; the count was sincerely pitied and accordingly gained the victory over all others. Neither Monsieur, nor the king, nor the Duke of Buckingham, was any longer thought of; De Guiche at that moment reigned without a rival. But although Monsieur also looked very handsome, still he could not be compared to the count. It is well known—indeed all women say so—that a wide difference invariably exists between the good looks of a lover and those of a husband. Besides, in the present case, after Monsieur had left, and after the courteous and affectionate recognition of the young queen and of the queen-mother, and the careless and indifferent notice of Madame, which all the courtiers had remarked; all these motives gave the lover the advantage over the husband. Monsieur was too great a personage to notice these details. Nothing is so certain as a well settled idea of superiority to prove the inferiority of the man who has that opinion of himself. The king arrived. Every one looked for what might possibly happen in the glance, which began to bestir the world, like the brow of Jupiter Tonans. Louis had none of his brother’s gloominess, but was perfectly radiant. Having examined the greater part of the drawings which were displayed for his inspection on every side, he gave his opinion or made his remarks upon them, and in this manner rendered some happy and others wretched by a single word. Suddenly his glance, which was smilingly directed towards Madame, detected the slight correspondence established between the princess and the count. He bit his lips, but when he opened them again to utter a few commonplace remarks, he said, advancing towards the queens:—

“I have just been informed that everything is now prepared at Fontainebleau, in accordance with my directions.” A murmur of satisfaction arose from the different groups, and the king perceived on every face the greatest anxiety to receive an invitation for the fetes. “I shall leave to-morrow,” he added. Whereupon the profoundest silence immediately ensued. “And I invite,” said the king, finishing, “all those who are now present to get ready to accompany me.”

Smiling faces were now everywhere visible, with the exception of Monsieur, who seemed to retain his ill-humor. The different noblemen and ladies of the court thereupon defiled before the king, one after the other, in order to thank his majesty for the great honour which had been conferred upon them by the invitation. When it came to De Guiche’s turn, the king said, “Ah! M. de Guiche, I did not see you.”

The comte bowed, and Madame turned pale. De Guiche was about to open his lips to express his thanks, when the king said, “Comte, this is the season for farming purposes in the country; I am sure your tenants in Normandy will be glad to see you.”

The king, after this pitiless attack, turned his back on the poor comte, whose turn it was now to become pale; he advanced a few steps towards the king, forgetting that the king is never spoken to except in reply to questions addressed.

“I have perhaps misunderstood your majesty,” he stammered out.

The king turned his head slightly, and with a cold and stern glance, which plunged like a sword relentlessly into the hearts of those under disgrace, repeated, "I said retire to your estates," allowing every syllable to fall slowly one by one.

A cold perspiration bedewed the comte's face, his hands convulsively opened, and his hat, which he held between his trembling fingers, fell to the ground. Louis sought his mother's glance, as though to show her that he was master; he sought his brother's triumphant look, as if to ask him if he were satisfied with the vengeance taken; and lastly, his eyes fell upon Madame; but the princess was laughing and smiling with Madame de Noailles. She heard nothing, or rather had pretended not to hear at all. The Chevalier de Lorraine looked on also, with one of those looks of fixed hostility that seemed to give to a man's glance the power of a lever when it raises an obstacle, wrests it away, and casts it to a distance. M. de Guiche was left alone in the king's cabinet, the whole of the company having departed. Shadows seemed to dance before his eyes. He suddenly broke through the settled despair that overwhelmed him, and flew to hide himself in his own room, where Raoul awaited him, immovable in his own sad presentiments.

"Well?" he murmured, seeing his friend enter, bareheaded, with a wild gaze and tottering gait.

"Yes, yes, it is true," said De Guiche, unable to utter more, and falling exhausted upon the couch.

"And she?" inquired Raoul.

"She," exclaimed his unhappy friend, as he raised his hand clenched in anger, towards Heaven. "She!—"

"What did she say and do?"

"She said that her dress suited her admirably, and then she laughed."

A fit of hysteric laughter seemed to shatter his nerves, for he fell backwards, completely overcome.

XXXV. Fontainebleau.

For four days, every kind of enchantment brought together in the magnificent gardens of Fontainebleau had converted this spot into a place of the most perfect enjoyment. M. Colbert seemed gifted with ubiquity. In the morning there were the accounts of the previous night's expenses to settle; during the day, programmes, essays, enrolments, payments. M. Colbert had amassed four millions of francs, and dispersed them with sleepless economy. He was horrified at the expenses which mythology involved; not a wood nymph, nor a dryad, that cost less than a hundred francs a day! The dress alone amounted to three hundred francs. The expense of powder and sulphur for fireworks amounted, every night, to a hundred thousand francs. In addition to these, the illuminations on the borders of the sheet of water cost thirty thousand francs every evening. The fetes had been magnificent; and Colbert could not restrain his delight. From time to time, he noticed Madame and the king setting forth on hunting expeditions, or preparing for the reception of different fantastic personages, solemn ceremonials, which had been extemporized a fortnight before, and in which Madame's sparkling wit and the king's magnificence were equally well displayed.

For Madame, the heroine of the fete, replied to the addresses of the deputations from unknown races—Garamanth's, Scythians, Hyperboreans, Caucasians, and Patagonians, who seemed to issue from the ground for the purpose of approaching her with their congratulations; and upon every representative of these races the king bestowed a diamond, or some other article of value. Then the deputies, in verses more or less amusing, compared the king to the sun, Madame to Phoebe, the sun's sister, and the queen and Monsieur were no more spoken of than if the king had married Henrietta of England, and not Maria Theresa of Austria. The happy pair, hand in hand, imperceptibly pressing each other's fingers, drank in deep draughts the sweet beverage of adulation, by which the attractions of youth, beauty, power and love are enhanced. Every one at Fontainebleau was amazed at the extent of the influence which Madame had so rapidly acquired over the king, and whispered among themselves that Madame was, in point of fact, the true queen; and in effect, the king himself proclaimed its truth by his every thought, word, and look. He formed his wishes, he drew his inspirations from Madame's eyes, and his delight was unbounded when Madame deigned to smile upon him. And was Madame, on her side, intoxicated with the power she wielded, as she beheld every one at her feet? This was a question she herself could hardly answer; but what she did know was, that she could frame no wish, and that she felt herself to be perfectly happy. The result of all these changes, the source of which emanated from the royal will, was that Monsieur, instead of being the second person in the kingdom, had, in reality, become the third. And it was now far worse than in the time when De Guiche's guitars were heard in Madame's apartments; for, then, at least, Monsieur had the satisfaction of frightening those who annoyed him. Since the departure, however, of the enemy, who had been driven away by means of his alliance with the king, Monsieur had to submit to a burden, heavier, but in a very different sense, to his former one. Every evening Madame returned home quite exhausted. Horse-riding, bathing in the Seine, spectacles, dinners under the leafy covert of the trees, balls on the banks of the grand canal, concerts, etc., etc.; all this would have been sufficient to have killed, not a slight and delicate woman, but the strongest porter in the chateau. It is perfectly true that, with regard to dancing, concerts, and promenades, and such matters, a woman is far stronger than the most robust of porters. But, however great a woman's strength may be, there is a limit to it, and she cannot hold out long under such a system. As for Monsieur, he had not even the satisfaction of witnessing Madame's abdication of her royalty in the evening, for she lived in the royal pavilion with the young queen and the queen-mother. As a matter of course, the Chevalier de Lorraine did not quit Monsieur, and did not fail to distil drops of gall into every wound the latter received. The result was, that Monsieur—who had at first been in the highest spirits, and completely restored since Guiche's departure—subsided into his melancholy state three days after the court was installed at Fontainebleau.

It happened, however, that, one day, about two o'clock in the afternoon, Monsieur, who had risen late, and had bestowed upon his toilet more than his usual attention,—it happened, we repeat, that Monsieur, who had not heard of any plans having been arranged for the day, formed the project of collecting his own court, and of carrying Madame off with him to Moret, where he possessed a charming country house. He accordingly went to the queen's pavilion, and was astonished, on entering, to find none of the royal servants in attendance. Quite alone, therefore, he entered the rooms, a door on the left opening to Madame's apartment, the one on the right to the young queen's. In his wife's apartment, Monsieur was informed, by a sempstress who was working there, that every one had left at eleven o'clock, for the purpose of bathing in the Seine, that a grand fete was to be made of the expedition, that all the carriages had been placed at the park gates, and that they had all set out more than an hour ago.

"Very good," said Monsieur, "the idea is a good one; the heat is very oppressive, and I have no objection to bathe, too."

He summoned his servants, but no one came. He summoned those in attendance on Madame, but everybody had gone out. He went to the stables, where he was informed by a groom that there were no carriages of any description. He desired that a couple of horses should be saddled, one for himself and the other for his valet. The groom told him that all the horses had been sent away. Monsieur, pale with anger, again descended towards the queen's apartments, and penetrated as far as Anne of Austria's oratory, where he perceived, through the half-opened tapestry-hangings, his young and beautiful sister on her knees before the queen-mother, who appeared weeping bitterly. He had not been either seen or heard. He cautiously approached the opening, and listened, the sight of so much grief having aroused his curiosity. Not only was the young queen weeping, but she was complaining also. "Yes," she said, "the king neglects me, the king devotes himself to pleasures and amusements only, in which I have no share."

"Patience, patience, my daughter," said Anne of Austria, in Spanish; and then, also in Spanish, added some words of advice, which Monsieur did not understand. The queen replied by accusations, mingled with sighs and sobs, among which Monsieur often distinguished the word banos, which Maria Theresa accentuated with spiteful anger.

"The baths," said Monsieur to himself, "it seems it is the baths that have put her out." And he endeavored to put together the disconnected phrases which he had been able to understand. It was easy to guess that the queen was complaining bitterly, and that, if Anne of Austria did not console her, she at least endeavored to do so. Monsieur was afraid to be detected listening at the door and he therefore made up his mind to cough; the two queens turned round at the sound and Monsieur entered. At sight of the prince, the young queen rose precipitately, and dried her tears. Monsieur, however, knew the people he had to deal with too well, and was naturally too polite to remain silent, and he accordingly saluted them. The queen-mother smiled pleasantly at him, saying, "What do you want, Philip?"

"I?—nothing," stammered Monsieur. "I was looking for—"

"Whom?"

"I was looking for Madame."

"Madame is at the baths."

"And the king?" said Monsieur, in a tone which made the queen tremble.

"The king also, the whole court as well," replied Anne of Austria.

"Except you, madame," said Monsieur.

"Oh! I," said the young queen, "I seem to terrify all those who amuse themselves."

"And so do I,—judging from appearances," rejoined Monsieur.

Anne of Austria made a sigh to her daughter-in-law, who withdrew, weeping.

Monsieur's brows contracted, as he remarked aloud, "What a cheerless house. What do you think of it, mother?"

"Why, no; everybody here is pleasure-hunting."

"Yes, indeed, that is the very thing that makes those dull who do not care for pleasure."

"In what a tone you say that, Philip."

"Upon my word, madame, I speak as I think."

"Explain yourself; what is the matter?"

"Ask my sister-in-law, rather, who, just now, was detailing all her grievances to you."

"Her grievances, what—"

"Yes, I was listening; accidentally, I confess, but still I listened—so that I heard only too well my sister complain of those famous baths of Madame—"

"Ah! folly!"

"No, no, no; people are not always foolish when they weep. The queen said banos, which means baths."

"I repeat, Philip," said Anne of Austria, "that your sister is childishly jealous."

"In that case, madame," replied the prince, "I, too, must with great humility accuse myself of possessing the same defect."

"You also, Philip?"

"Certainly."

"Are you really jealous of these baths?"

"And why not, madame, when the king goes to the baths with my wife, and does not take the queen? Why not, when Madame goes to the baths with the king, and does not do me the honour to even invite me? And you enjoin my sister-in-law to be satisfied, and require me to be satisfied, too."

"You are raving, my dear Philip," said Anne of Austria; "you have driven the Duke of Buckingham away; you have been the cause of M. de Guiche's exile; do you now wish to send the king away from Fontainebleau?"

"I do not pretend to anything of the kind, madame," said Monsieur, bitterly; "but, at least, I can withdraw, and I shall do so."

"Jealous of the king—jealous of your brother?"

"Yes, madame, I am jealous of the king—of my own brother, and remarkably jealous, too."

"Really, Monsieur," exclaimed Anne of Austria, affecting to be indignant, "I begin to believe you are mad, and a sworn enemy to my repose. I therefore abandon the place to you, for I have no means of defending myself against such monomanias."

She arose and left Monsieur a prey to the most extravagant transport of passion. He remained for a moment completely bewildered; then, recovering himself, again went to the stables, found the groom, once more asked him for a carriage or a horse, and upon his reply that there was neither the one or the other, Monsieur snatched a long whip from the hand of a stable-boy, and began to pursue the poor devil of a groom all round the servants' courtyard, whipping him the while, in spite of his cries and excuses; then, quite out of breath, covered with perspiration, and trembling in every limb, he returned to his own apartments, broke in pieces some beautiful specimens of porcelain, and then got into bed, booted and spurred as he was, crying out for some one to come to him. 4

XXXVI. The Bath.

At Vulaines, beneath the impenetrable shade of flowering osiers and willows, which, as they bent down their green heads, dipped the extremities of their branches in the blue waters, a long and flat-bottomed boat, with ladders covered with long blue curtains, served as a refuge for the bathing Dianas, who, as they left the water, were watched by twenty plumed Acteons, who, eagerly, and full of admiration, galloped up and down the flowery banks of the river. But Diana herself, even the chaste Diana, clothed in her long chlamys, was less beautiful—less impenetrable, than Madame, as young and beautiful as that goddess herself. For, notwithstanding the fine tunic of the huntress, her round and delicate knee can be seen; and notwithstanding the sonorous quiver, her brown shoulders can be detected; whereas, in Madame's case, a long white veil enveloped her, wrapping her round and round a hundred times, as she resigned herself into the hands of her female attendants, and thus was rendered inaccessible to the most indiscreet, as well as to the most penetrating gaze. When she ascended the ladder, the poets were present—and all were poets when Madame was the subject of discussion—the twenty poets who were galloping about, stopped, and with one voice, exclaimed that pearls, and not drops of water, were falling from her person, to be lost again in the happy river. The king, the center of these effusions, and of this respectful homage, imposed silence upon those expatiators, for whom it seemed impossible to exhaust their raptures, and he rode away, for fear of offending, even through the silken curtains, the modesty of the woman and the dignity of the princess. A great blank thereupon ensued in the scene, and perfect silence in the boat. From the movements on board—from the flutterings and agitations of the curtains—the goings to and fro of the female attendants engaged in their duties, could be guessed.

The king smilingly listened to the conversation of the courtiers around him, but it could easily be perceived that he gave but little, if any, attention to their remarks. In fact, hardly had the sound of the rings drawn along the curtain-rods announced that Madame was dressed, and that the goddess was about to make her reappearance, than the king, returning to his former post immediately, and running quite close to the river-bank, gave the signal for all those to approach whose duty or pleasure summoned them to Madame's side. The pages hurried forward, conducting the led horses; the carriages, which had remained sheltered under the trees, advanced towards the tent, followed by a crowd of servants, bearers, and female attendants, who, while their masters had been bathing, had mutually exchanged their own observations, critical remarks, and the discussion of matters personal—the fugitive journal of that period, of which no one now remembers anything, not even by the waves, the witnesses of what went on that day—theirselfes now sublimed into immensity, as the actors have vanished into eternity.

A crowd of people swarming upon the banks of the river, without reckoning the groups of peasants drawn together by their anxiety to see the king and the princess, was, for many minutes, the most disorderly, but the most agreeable, mob imaginable. The king dismounted from his horse, a movement which was imitated by all the courtiers, and offered his hat to Madame, whose rich riding-habit displayed her fine figure, which was set off to great advantage by that garment, made of fine woolen cloth embroidered with silver. Her hair, still damp and blacker than jet, hung in heavy masses upon her white and delicate neck. Joy and health sparkled in her beautiful eyes; composed, yet full of energy, she inhaled the air in deep draughts, under a lace parasol, which was borne by one of her pages. Nothing could be more charming, more graceful, more poetical, than these two figures buried under the rose-coloured shade of the parasol, the king, whose white teeth were displayed in continual smiles, and Madame, whose black eyes sparkled like carbuncles in the glittering reflection of the changing hues of the silk. When Madame approached her horse, a magnificent animal of Andalusian breed, of spotless white, somewhat heavy, perhaps, but with a spirited and splendid head, in which the mixture, happily combined, of Arabian and Spanish blood could be readily traced, and whose long tail swept the ground; and as the princess affected difficulty in mounting, the king took her in his arms in such a manner that Madame's arm was clasped like a circlet of alabaster around the king's neck. Louis, as he withdrew, involuntarily touched with his lips the arm, which was not withheld, and the princess having thanked her royal equerry, every one sprang to his saddle at the same moment. The king and Madame drew aside to allow the carriages, the outriders, and runners, to pass by. A fair proportion of the cavaliers, released from the restraint etiquette had imposed upon them, gave the rein to their horses, and darted after the carriages which bore the maids of honour, as blooming as so many virgin huntresses around Diana, and the human whirlwind, laughing, chattering, and noisy, passed onward.

The king and Madame, however, kept their horses in hand at a foot-pace. Behind his majesty and his sister-in-law, certain of the courtiers —those, at least, who were seriously disposed or were anxious to be within reach, or under the eyes, of the king—followed at a respectful distance, restraining their impatient horses, regulating their pace by that of the king and Madame, and abandoned themselves to all the delight and gratification which is to be found in the conversation of clever people, who can, with perfect courtesy, make a thousand atrocious, but laughable remarks about their neighbors. In their stifled laughter, and in the little reticences of their sardonic humor, Monsieur, the poor absentee, was not spared. But they pitied, and bewailed greatly, the fate of De Guiche, and it must be confessed that their compassion, as far as he was concerned, was not misplaced. The king and Madame having breathed the horses, and repeated a hundred times over such remarks as the courtiers, who supplied them with talk, suggested to them, set off at a hand gallop, and the leafy coverts of the forest resounded to the footfalls of the mounted party. To the conversations beneath the shade of the trees,—to remarks made in the shape of confidential communications, and observations, mysteriously exchanged, succeeded the noisiest bursts of laughter;—from the very outriders to royalty itself, merriment seemed to spread. Every one began to laugh and to cry out. The magpies and the jays fluttered away uttering their guttural cries, beneath the waving avenues of oaks; the cuckoo staid his monotonous cry in the recesses of the forest; the chaffinch and tomtit flew away in clouds; while the terrified deer bounded riverwards from the midst of the thickets. This crowd, spreading joy, confusion, and light wherever it passed, was heralded, it may be said, to the chateau by its own clamor. As the king and Madame entered the village, they were received by the acclamations of the crowd. Madame hastened to look for Monsieur, for she instinctively understood that he had been far too long kept from sharing in this joy. The king went to rejoin the queens; he knew he owed them—one especially—a compensation for his long absence. But Madame was not admitted to Monsieur's apartments, and she was informed that Monsieur was asleep. The king, instead of being met by Maria Theresa smiling, as was usual with her, found Anne of Austria in the gallery watching for his return, who advanced to meet him, and taking him by the hand, led him to her own apartment. No one ever knew what was the nature of the conversation which took place between them, or rather what it was that the queen-mother said to Louis XIV.; but the general tenor of the interview might certainly be guessed from the annoyed expression of the king's face as he left her.

But we, whose mission it is to interpret all things, as it is also to communicate our interpretations to our readers,—we should fail in our duty, if we were to leave them in ignorance of the result of this interview. It will be found sufficiently detailed, at least we hope so, in the following chapter.

XXXVII. The Butterfly-Chase.

The king, on retiring to his apartments to give some directions and to arrange his ideas, found on his toilette-glass a small note, the handwriting of which seemed disguised. He opened it and read—"Come quickly, I have a thousand things to say to you." The king and Madame had not been separated a sufficiently long time for these thousand things to be the result of the three thousand which they had been saying to each other during the route which separated Vulaines from Fontainebleau. The confused and hurried character of the note gave the king a great deal to reflect upon. He occupied himself but slightly with his toilette, and set off to pay his visit to Madame. The princess, who did not wish to have the appearance of expecting him, had gone into the gardens with the ladies of her suite. When the king was informed that Madame had left her apartments and had gone for a walk in the gardens, he collected all the gentlemen he could find, and invited them to follow him. He found Madame engaged in chasing butterflies, on a large lawn bordered with heliotrope and flowering broom. She was looking on as the most adventurous and youngest of her ladies ran to and fro, and with her back turned to a high hedge, very impatiently awaited the arrival of the king, with whom she had appointed the rendezvous. The sound of many feet upon the gravel walk made her turn round. Louis XIV. was hatless, he had struck down with his cane a peacock butterfly, which Monsieur de Saint-Aignan had picked up from the ground quite stunned.

"You see, Madame," said the king, as he approached her, "that I, too, am hunting on your behalf!" and then, turning towards those who had accompanied him, said, "Gentlemen, see if each of you cannot obtain as much for these ladies," a remark which was a signal for all to retire. And thereupon a curious spectacle might have been observed; old and corpulent courtiers were seen running after butterflies, losing their hats as they ran, and with their raised canes cutting down the myrtles and the furze, as they would have done the Spaniards.

The king offered Madame his arm, and they both selected, as the center of observation, a bench with a roof of boards and moss, a kind of hut roughly designed by the modest genius of one of the gardeners who had inaugurated the picturesque and fanciful amid the formal style of the gardening of that period. This sheltered retreat, covered with nasturtiums and climbing roses, screened the bench, so that the spectators, insulated in the middle of the lawn, saw and were seen on every side, but could not be heard, without perceiving those who might approach for the purpose of listening. Seated thus, the king made a sign of encouragement to those who were running about; and then, as if he were engaged with Madame in a dissertation upon the butterfly, which he had thrust through with a gold pin and fastened on his hat, said to her, "How admirably we are placed here for conversations."

"Yes, sire, for I wished to be heard by you alone, and yet to be seen by every one."

"And I also," said Louis.

"My note surprised you?"

"Terrified me rather. But what I have to tell you is more important."

"It cannot be, sire. Do you know that Monsieur refuses to see me?"

"Why so?"

"Can you not guess why?"

"Ah, Madame! in that case we have both the same thing to say to each other."

"What has happened to you, then?"

"You wish me to begin?"

"Yes, for I have told you all."

"Well, then, as soon as I returned, I found my mother waiting for me, and she led me away to her own apartments."

"The queen-mother?" said Madame, with some anxiety, "the matter is serious then."

"Indeed it is, for she told me... but, in the first place, allow me to preface what I have to say with one remark. Has Monsieur ever spoken to you about me?"

"Often."

"Has he ever spoken to you about his jealousy?"

"More frequently still."

"Of his jealousy of me?"

"No, but of the Duke of Buckingham and De Guiche."

"Well, Madame, Monsieur's present idea is a jealousy of myself."

"Really," replied the princess, smiling archly.

"And it really seems to me," continued the king, "that we have never given any ground—"

"Never! at least I have not. But who told you that Monsieur was jealous?"

"My mother represented to me that Monsieur entered her apartments like a madman, that he uttered a thousand complaints against you, and—forgive me for saying it—against your coquetry. It appears that Monsieur indulges in injustice, too."

"You are very kind, sire."

"My mother reassured him; but he pretended that people reassure him too often, and that he had had quite enough of it."

"Would it not be better for him not to make himself uneasy in any way?"

"The very thing I said."

"Confess, sire, that the world is very wicked. Is it possible that a brother and sister cannot converse together, or take pleasure in each other's company, without giving rise to remarks and suspicions? For indeed, sire, we are doing no harm, and have no intention of doing any." And she looked at the king with that proud yet provoking glance that kindles desire in the coldest and wisest of men.

"No!" sighed the king, "that is true."

"You know very well, sire, that if it were to continue, I should be obliged to make a disturbance. Do you decide upon our conduct, and say whether it has, or has not, been perfectly correct."

"Oh, certainly—perfectly correct."

"Often alone together,—for we delight in the same things,—we might possibly be led away into error, but have we been? I regard you as a brother, and nothing more."

The king frowned. She continued:

"Your hand, which often meets my own, does not excite in me that agitation and emotion which is the case with those who love each other, for instance—"

"Enough," said the king, "enough, I entreat you. You have no pity—you are killing me."

"What is the matter?"

"In fact, then, you distinctly say you experience nothing when near me."

"Oh, sire! I don't say that—my affection—"

"Enough, Henrietta, I again entreat you. If you believe me to be marble, as you are, undeceive yourself."

"I do not understand you, sire."

"Very well," said the king, casting down his eyes. "And so our meetings, the pressure of each other's hand, the looks we have exchanged—Yes, yes; you are right, and I understand your meaning," and he buried his face in his hands.

"Take care, sire," said Madame, hurriedly, "Monsieur de Saint-Aignan is looking at you."

"Of course," said Louis, angrily; "never even the shadow of liberty! never any sincerity in my intercourse with any one! I imagine I have found a friend, who is nothing but a spy; a dearer friend, who is only a—sister!"

Madame was silent, and cast down her eyes.

"My husband is jealous," she murmured, in a tone of which nothing could equal its sweetness and charm.

"You are right," exclaimed the king, suddenly.

"You see," she said, looking at him in a manner that set his heart on fire, "you are free, you are not suspected, the peace of your house is not disturbed."

"Alas," said the king, "as yet you know nothing, for the queen is jealous."

"Maria Theresa!"

"Stark mad with jealousy! Monsieur's jealousy arises from hers; she was weeping and complaining to my mother, and was reproaching us for those bathing parties, which have made me so happy."

"And me too," answered Madame, by a look.

"When, suddenly," continued the king, "Monsieur, who was listening, heard the word 'banos,' which the queen pronounced with some degree of bitterness, that awakened his attention; he entered the room, looking quite wild, broke into the conversation, and began to quarrel with my mother so bitterly that she was obliged to leave him; so that, while you have a jealous husband to deal with, I shall have perpetually present before me a specter of jealousy with swollen eyes, a cadaverous face, and sinister looks."

"Poor king," murmured Madame, as she lightly touched the king's hand. He retained her hand in his, and in order to press it without exciting suspicion in the spectators, who were not so much taken up with the butterflies that they could not occupy themselves about other matters, and who perceived clearly enough that there was some mystery in the king's and Madame's conversation, Louis placed the dying butterfly before his sister-in-law, and bent over it as if to count the thousand eyes of its wings, or the particles of golden dust which covered it. Neither of them spoke; however, their hair mingled, their breaths united, and their hands feverishly throbbed in each other's grasp. Five minutes passed in this manner.

XXXVIII. What Was Caught after the Butterflies.

The two young people remained for a moment with their heads bent down, bowed, as it were, beneath the double thought of the love which was springing up in their hearts, and which gives birth to so many happy fancies in the imaginations of twenty years of age. Henrietta gave a side glance, from time to time, at the king. Hers was one of those finely-organized natures capable of looking inwardly at itself, as well as at others at the same moment. She perceived Love lying at the bottom of Louis's heart, as a skillful diver sees a pearl at the bottom of the sea. She knew Louis was hesitating, if not in doubt, and that his indolent or timid heart required aid and encouragement. "And so?" she said, interrogatively, breaking the silence.

"What do you mean?" inquired Louis, after a moment's pause.

"I mean, that I shall be obliged to return to the resolution I had formed."

"To what resolution?"

"To that which I have already submitted to your majesty."

"When?"

"On the very day we had a certain explanation about Monsieur's jealousies."

"What did you say to me then?" inquired Louis, with some anxiety.

"Do you not remember, sire?"

"Alas! if it be another cause of unhappiness, I shall recollect it soon enough."

"A cause of unhappiness for myself alone, sire," replied Madame Henrietta; "but as it is necessary, I must submit to it."

"At least, tell me what it is," said the king.

"Absence."

"Still that unkind resolve?"

"Believe me, sire, I have not found it without a violent struggle with myself; it is absolutely necessary I should return to England."

"Never, never will I permit you to leave France," exclaimed the king.

"And yet, sire," said Madame, affecting a gentle yet sorrowful determination, "nothing is more urgently necessary; nay, more than that, I am persuaded it is your mother's desire I should do so."

"Desire!" exclaimed the king; "that is a very strange expression to use to me."

"Still," replied Madame Henrietta, smilingly, "are you not happy in submitting to the wishes of so good a mother?"

"Enough, I implore you; you rend my very soul."

"I?"

"Yes; for you speak of your departure with tranquillity."

"I was not born for happiness, sire," replied the princess, dejectedly; "and I acquired, in very early life, the habit of seeing my dearest wishes disappointed."

"Do you speak truly?" said the king. "Would your departure gainsay any one of your cherished thoughts?"

"If I were to say 'yes,' would you begin to take your misfortune patiently?"

"How cruel you are!"

"Take care, sire; some one is coming."

The king looked all round him, and said, "No, there is no one," and then continued: "Come, Henrietta, instead of trying to contend against Monsieur's jealousy by a departure which would kill me—" Henrietta slightly shrugged her shoulders like a woman unconvinced. "Yes," repeated Louis, "which would kill me, I say. Instead of fixing your mind on this departure, does not your imagination—or rather does not your heart—suggest some expedient?"

"What is it you wish my heart to suggest?"

"Tell me, how can one prove to another that it is wrong to be jealous?"

"In the first place, sire, by giving no motive for jealousy; in other words, in loving no one but the person in question."

"Oh! I expected more than that."

"What did you expect?"

"That you would simply tell me that jealous people are pacified by concealing the affection which is entertained for the object of jealousy."

"Dissimulation is difficult, sire."

"Yet it is only be means of conquering difficulties that any happiness is attained. As far as I am concerned, I swear I will give the lie to those who are jealous of me by pretending to treat you like any other woman."

"A bad, as well as unsafe, means," said the young princess, shaking her pretty head.

"You seem to think everything bad, dear Henrietta," said Louis, discontentedly. "You negative everything I propose. Suggest, at least, something else in its stead. Come, try and think. I trust implicitly to a woman's invention. Do you invent in your turn?"

"Well, sire, I have hit upon something. Will you listen to it?"

"Can you ask me? You speak of a matter of life or death to me, and then ask if I will listen."

"Well, I judge of it by my own case. If my husband intended to put me on the wrong scent with regard to another woman, one thing would reassure me more than anything else."

"What would that be?"

"In the first place to see that he never took any notice of the woman in question."

"Exactly. That is precisely what I said just now."

"Very well; but in order to be perfectly reassured on the subject, I should like to see him occupy himself with some one else."

"Ah! I understand you," replied Louis, smiling. "But confess, dear Henrietta, if the means is at least ingenious, it is hardly charitable."

"Why so?"

"In curing the dread of a wound in a jealous person's mind, you inflict one upon the heart. His fear ceases, it is true; but the evil still exists; and that seems to me to be far worse."

"Agreed; but he does not detect, he does not suspect the real enemy; he does no prejudice to love itself; he concentrates all his strength on the side where his strength will do no injury to anything or any one. In a word, sire, my plan, which I confess I am surprised to find you dispute, is mischievous to jealous people, it is true; but to lovers it is full of advantage. Besides, let me ask, sire, who, except yourself, has ever thought of pitying jealous people? Are they not a melancholy crew of grumblers always equally unhappy, whether with or without a cause? You may remove that cause, but you never can remove their sufferings. It is a disease which lies in the imagination, and, like all imaginary disorders, it is incurable. By the by, I remember an aphorism upon this subject, of poor Dr. Dawley, a clever and amusing man, who, had it not been for my brother, who could not do without him, I should have with me now. He used to say, 'Whenever you are likely to suffer from two affections, choose that which will give you the least trouble, and I will allow you to retain it; for it is positive,' he said, 'that that very ailment is of the greatest service to me, in order to enable me to get rid of the other.'"

"Well and judiciously remarked, Henrietta," replied the king, smiling.

"Oh! we have some clever people in London, sire."

"And those clever people produce adorable pupils. I will grant this Daley, Darley, Dawley, or whatever you call him, a pension for his aphorism; but I entreat you, Henrietta, to begin by choosing the least of your evils. You do not answer—you smile. I guess that the least of your bugbears is your stay in France. I will allow you to retain this information; and, in order to begin with the cure of the other, I will this very day begin to look out for a subject which shall divert the attention of the jealous members of either sex who persecute us both."

"Hush! this time some one is really coming," said Madame; and she stooped to gather a flower from the thick grass at her feet. Some one, in fact, was approaching; for, suddenly, a bevy of young girls ran down from the top of the hillock, following the cavaliers—the cause of this interruption being a magnificent hawk-moth, with wings like rose-leaves. The prey in question had fallen into the net of Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, who displayed it with some pride to her less successful rivals. The queen of the chase had seated herself some twenty paces from the bank on which Louis and Madame Henrietta were reclining; and leaned her back against a magnificent oak-tree entwined with ivy, and stuck the butterfly on the long cane she carried in her hand. Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente was very beautiful, and the gentlemen, accordingly, deserted her companions, and under the pretext of complimenting her upon her success, pressed in a circle around her. The king and princess looked gloomily at this scene, as spectators of maturer age look on at the games of little children. "They seem to be amusing themselves there," said the king.

"Greatly, sire; I have always found that people are amused wherever youth and beauty are to be found."

"What do you think of Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, Henrietta?" inquired the king.

"I think she has rather too much flax-yellow and lily-whiteness in her complexion," replied Madame, fixing in a moment upon the only fault it was possible to find in the almost perfect beauty of the future Madame de Montespan."

"Rather too fair, yes; but beautiful, I think, in spite of that."

"Is that your opinion, sire?"

"Yes, really."

"Very well; and it is mine, too."

"And she seems to be much sought after."

"On, that is a matter of course. Lovers flutter from one to another. If we had hunted for lovers instead of butterflies, you can see, from those who surround her, what successful sport we should have had."

"Tell me, Henrietta, what would be said if the king were to make himself one of those lovers, and let his glance fall in that direction? Would some one else be jealous, in such a case?"

"Oh! sire, Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente is a very efficacious remedy," said Madame, with a sigh. "She would cure a jealous man, certainly; but she might possibly make a woman jealous, too."

"Henrietta," exclaimed Louis, "you fill my heart with joy. Yes, yes; Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente is far too beautiful to serve as a cloak."

“A king’s cloak,” said Madame Henrietta, smiling, “ought to be beautiful.”

“Do you advise me to do it, then?” inquired Louis.

“! what should I say, sire, except that to give such an advice would be to supply arms against myself? It would be folly or pride to advise you to take, for the heroine of an assumed affection, a woman more beautiful than the one for whom you pretend to feel real regard.”

The king tried to take Madame’s hand in his own; his eyes sought hers; and then he murmured a few words so full of tenderness, but pronounced in so low a tone, that the historian, who ought to hear everything, could not hear them. Then, speaking aloud, he said, “Do you yourself choose for me the one who is to cure our jealous friend. To her, then, all my devotion, all my attention, all the time that I can spare from my occupations, shall be devoted. For her shall be the flower that I may pluck for you, the fond thoughts with which you have inspired me. Towards her I will direct the glance I dare not bestow upon you, and which ought to be able to rouse you from your indifference. But, be careful in your selection, lest, in offering her the rose which I may have plucked, I find myself conquered by you; and my looks, my hand, my lips, turn immediately towards you, even were the whole world to guess my secret.”

While these words escaped from the king’s lips, in a stream of wild affection, Madame blushed, breathless, happy, proud, almost intoxicated with delight. She could find nothing to say in reply; her pride and her thirst for homage were satisfied. “I shall fail,” she said, raising her beautiful black eyes, “but not as you beg me, for all this incense which you wish to burn on the altar of another divinity. Ah! sire, I too shall be jealous of it, and want restored to me; and would not that a particle of it should be lost in the way. Therefore, sire, with your royal permission, I will choose one who shall appear to me the least likely to distract your attention, and who will leave my image intact and unshadowed in your heart.”

“Happily for me,” said the king, “your heart is not hard and unfeeling. If it were so, I should be alarmed at the threat you hold out. Precautions were taken on this point, and around you, as around myself, it would be difficult to meet with a disagreeable-looking face.”

Whilst the king was speaking, Madame had risen from her seat, looked around the greensward, and after a careful and silent examination, she called the king to her side, and said, “See yonder, sire, upon the declivity of that little hill, near that group of Guelder roses, that beautiful girl walking alone, her head down, her arms hanging by her side, with her eyes fixed upon the flowers, which she crushes beneath her feet, like one who is lost in thought.”

“Mademoiselle de Vallière, do you mean?” remarked the king.

“Yes.”

“Oh!”

“Will she not suit you, sire?”

“Why, look how thin the poor child is. She has hardly any flesh upon her bones.”

“Nay: am I stout then?”

“She is so melancholy.”

“The greater contrast to myself, who am accused of being too lively.”

“She is lame.”

“Do you really think so?”

“No doubt of it. Look; she has allowed every one to pass by her, through fear of her defect being remarked.”

“Well, she will not run so fast as Daphne, and will not be as able to escape Apollo.”

“Henrietta,” said the king, out of temper; “of all your maids of honour, you have really selected for me the one most full of defects.”

“Still she is one of my maids of honour.”

“Of course; but what do you mean?”

“I mean that, in order to visit this new divinity, you will not be able to do so without paying a visit to my apartments, and that, as propriety will forbid your conversing with her in private, you will be compelled to see her in my circle, to speak, as it were, at me, while speaking to her. I mean, in fact, that those who may be jealous, will be wrong if they suppose you come to my apartments for my sake, since you will go there for Mademoiselle de la Vallière.”

“Who happens to be lame.”

“Hardly that.”

“Who never opens her lips.”

“But who, when she does open them, displays a beautiful set of teeth.”

“Who may serve as a model for an osteologist.”

“Your favour will change her appearance.”

“Henrietta!”

“At all events you allowed me to choose.”

“Alas! yes.”

“Well, my choice is made: I impose her upon you, and you must submit.”

“Oh! I would accept one of the furies, if you were to insist upon it.”

“La Vallière is as gentle as a lamb: do not fear she will ever contradict you when you tell her you love her,” said Madame, laughing.

“You are not afraid, are you, that I shall say too much to her?”

“It would be for my sake.”

“The treaty is agreed to, then?”

“Not only so, but signed. You will continue to show me the friendship of a brother, the attention of a brother, the gallantry of a monarch, will you not?”

“I will preserve for you intact a heart that has already become accustomed to beat only at your command.”

“Very well, do you not see that we have guaranteed the future by this means?”

“I hope so.”

“Will your mother cease to regard me as an enemy?”

“Yes.”

“Will Maria Theresa leave off speaking in Spanish before Monsieur, who has a horror of conversation held in foreign languages, because he always thinks he is being ill spoken of? and lastly,” continued the princess, “will people persist in attributing a wrongful affection to the king when the truth is, we can offer nothing to each other, except absolute sympathy, free from mental reservation?”

“Yes, yes,” said the king, hesitatingly. “But other things may still be said of us.”

“What can be said, sire? shall we never be left in tranquillity?”

“People will say I am deficient in taste; but what is my self-respect in comparison with your tranquillity?”

“In comparison with my honour, sire, and that of our family, you mean. Besides, I beg you to attend, do not be so hastily prejudiced against La Vallière. She is slightly lame, it is true, but she is not deficient in good sense. Moreover, all that the king touches is converted into gold.”

“Well, Madame, rest assured of one thing, namely, that I am still grateful to you: you might even yet make me pay dearer for your stay in France.”

“Sire, some one approaches.”

“Well!”

“One last word.”

“Say it.”

“You are prudent and judicious, sire; but in the present instance you will be obliged to summon to your aid all your prudence, and all your judgment.”

“Oh!” exclaimed Louis, laughing, “from this very day I shall begin to act my part, and you shall see whether I am not quite fit to represent the character of a tender swain. After luncheon, there will be a promenade in the forest, and then there is supper and the ballet at ten o’clock.”

“I know it.”

“The ardor of my passion shall blaze more brilliantly than the fireworks, shall shine more steadily than our friend Colbert’s lamps; it shall shine so dazzlingly that the queens and Monsieur will be almost blinded by it.”

“Take care, sire, take care.”

“In Heaven’s name, what have I done, then?”

“I shall begin to recall the compliments I paid you just now. You prudent! you wise! did I say? Why, you begin by the most reckless inconsistencies! Can a passion be kindled in this manner, like a torch, in a moment? Can a monarch, such as you are, without any preparation, fall at the feet of a girl like La Vallière?”

“Ah! Henrietta, now I understand you. We have not yet begun the campaign, and you are plundering me already.”

“No, I am only recalling you to common-sense ideas. Let your passion be kindled gradually, instead of allowing it to burst forth so suddenly. Jove’s thunders and lightnings are heard and seen before the palace is set on fire. Everything has its commencements. If you are so easily excited, no one will believe you are really captivated, and every one will think you out of your senses—if even, indeed, the truth itself not be guessed. The public is not so fatuous as they seem.”

The king was obliged to admit that Madame was an angel for sense, and the very reverse for cleverness. He bowed, and said: “Agreed, Madame, I will think over my plan of attack: great military men—my cousin De Conde for instance—grow pale in meditation upon their strategical plans, before they move one of the pawns, which people call armies; I therefore wish to draw up a complete plan of campaign; for you know that the tender passion is subdivided in a variety of ways. Well, then, I shall stop at the village of Little Attentions, at the hamlet of Love-Letters, before I follow the road of Visible Affection; the way is clear enough, you know, and poor Madame de Scudery would never forgive me for passing though a halting-place without stopping.”

“Oh! now we have returned to our proper senses, shall we say adieu, sire?”

“Alas! it must be so, for see, we are interrupted.”

“Yes, indeed,” said Henrietta, “they are bringing Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente and her sphinx butterfly in grand procession this way.”

“It is perfectly well understood, that this evening, during the promenade, I am to make my escape into the forest, and find La Vallière without you.”

“I will take care to send her away.”

“Very well! I will speak to her when she is with her companions, and I will then discharge my first arrow at her.”

“Be skillful,” said Madame, laughing, “and do not miss the heart.”

Then the princess took leave of the king, and went forward to meet the merry troop, which was advancing with much ceremony, and a great many pretended flourishes of trumpets, imitated with their mouths.

XXXIX. The Ballet of the Seasons.

At the conclusion of the banquet, which was served at five o’clock, the king entered his cabinet, where his tailors were awaiting him for the purpose of trying on the celebrated costume representing Spring, which was the result of so much imagination, and had cost so many efforts of thought to the designers and ornament-workers of the court. As for the ballet itself, every person knew the part he had to take in it, and how to perform it. The king had resolved to make it surprise. Hardly, therefore, had he finished his conference, and entered his own apartment, than he desired his two masters of the ceremonies, Villeroy and Saint-Aignan, to be sent for. Both replied that they only awaited his orders, and that everything was ready to begin, but that it was necessary to be sure of fine weather and a favourable night before these orders could be carried out. The king opened his window; the pale-gold hues of the evening were visible on the horizon through the vistas of the wood, and the moon, white as snow, was already mounting the heavens. Not a ripple could be noticed on the surface of the green waters; the swans themselves, even, reposing with folded wings like ships at anchor, seemed inspirations of the warmth of the air, the freshness of the water, and the silence of the beautiful evening. The king, having observed all these things, and contemplated the magnificent picture before him, gave the order which De Villeroy and De Saint-Aignan awaited; but with a view of insuring the execution of this order in a royal manner, one last question was necessary, and Louis XIV. put it to the two gentlemen in the following manner:—"Have you any money?"

"Sire," replied Saint-Aignan, "we have arranged everything with M. Colbert."

"Ah! very well!"

"Yes, sire, and M. Colbert said he would wait upon your majesty, as soon as your majesty should manifest an intention of carrying out the fetes, of which he has furnished the programme."

"Let him come in, then," said the king; and as if Colbert had been listening at the door for the purpose of keeping himself au courant with the conversation, he entered as soon as the king had pronounced his name to the two courtiers.

"Ah! M. Colbert," said the king. "Gentlemen, to your posts," whereupon Saint-Aignan and Villeroy took their leave. The king seated himself in an easy-chair near the window, saying: "The ballet will take place this evening, M. Colbert."

"In that case, sire, I will pay all accounts to-morrow."

"Why so?"

"I promised the tradespeople to pay their bills the day following that on which the ballet should take place."

"Very well, M. Colbert, pay them, since you have promised to do so."

"Certainly, sire; but I must have money to do that."

"What! have not the four millions, which M. Fouquet promised, been sent? I forgot to ask you about it."

"Sire, they were sent at the hour promised."

"Well?"

"Well, sire, the coloured lamps, the fireworks, the musicians, and the cooks, have swallowed up four millions in eight days."

"Entirely?"

"To the last penny. Every time your majesty directed the banks of the grand canal to be illuminated, as much oil was consumed as there was water in the basins."

"Well, well, M. Colbert; the fact is, then, you have no more money?"

"I have no more, sire, but M. Fouquet has," Colbert replied, his face darkening with a sinister expression of pleasure.

"What do you mean?" inquired Louis.

"We have already made M. Fouquet advance six millions. He has given them with too much grace not to have others still to give, if they are required, which is the case at the present moment. It is necessary, therefore, that he should comply."

The king frowned. "M. Colbert," said he, accentuating the financier's name, "that is not the way I understood the matter; I do not wish to make use, against any of my servants, of a means of pressure which may oppress him and fetter his services. In eight days M. Fouquet has furnished six millions; that is a good round sum."

Colbert turned pale. "And yet," he said, "your majesty did not use this language some time ago, when the news about Belle-Isle arrived, for instance."

"You are right, M. Colbert."

"Nothing, however, has changed since then; on the contrary, indeed."

"In my thoughts, monsieur, everything has changed."

"Does your majesty then no longer believe the disloyal attempt?"

"My affairs concern myself alone, monsieur; and I have already told you I transact them without interference."

"Then, I perceive," said Colbert, trembling with anger and fear, "that I have had the misfortune to fall into disgrace with your majesty."

"Not at all; you are, on the contrary, most agreeable to me."

"Yet, sire," said the minister, with a certain affected bluntness, so successful when it was a question of flattering Louis's self-esteem, "what use is there in being agreeable to your majesty, if one can no longer be of any use?"

"I reserve your services for a better occasion; and believe me, they will only be the better appreciated."

"Your majesty's plan, then, in this affair, is—"

"You want money, M. Colbert?"

"Seven hundred thousand francs, sire."

"You will take them from my private treasure." Colbert bowed. "And," added Louis, "as it seems a difficult matter for you, notwithstanding your economy, to defray, with so limited a sum, the expenses which I intend to incur, I will at once sign an order for three millions."

The king took a pen and signed an order immediately, then handed it to Colbert. "Be satisfied, M. Colbert, the plan I have adopted is one worthy of a king," said Louis XIV., who pronounced these words with all the majesty he knew how to assume in such circumstances; and dismissed Colbert for the purpose of giving an audience to his tailors.

The order issued by the king was known throughout the whole of Fontainebleau; it was already known, too, that the king was trying on his costume, and that the ballet would be danced in the evening. The news circulated with the rapidity of lightning; during its progress it kindled every variety of coquetry, desire, and wild ambition. At the same moment, as if by enchantment, every one who knew how to hold a needle, every one who could distinguish a coat from a pair of trousers, was summoned to the assistance of those who had received invitations. The king had completed his toilette by nine o'clock; he appeared in an open carriage decorated with branches of trees and flowers. The queens had taken their seats upon a magnificent dias or platform, erected upon the borders of the lake, in a theater of wonderful elegance of construction. In the space of five hours the carpenters had put together all the different parts connected with the building; the upholsterers had laid down the carpets, erected the seats; and, as if at the wave of an enchanter's wand, a thousand arms, aiding, instead of interfering with each other, had constructed the building, amidst the sound of music; whilst, at the same time, other workmen illuminated the theater and the shores of the lake with an incalculable number of lamps. As the heavens, set with stars, were perfectly unclouded, as not even a breath of air could be heard in the woods, and as if Nature itself had yielded complacently to the king's fancies, the back of the theater had been left open; so that, behind the foreground of the scenes, could be seen as a background the beautiful sky, glittering with stars; the sheet of water, illuminated by the lights which were reflected in it; and the bluish outline of the grand masses of woods, with their rounded tops. When the king made his appearance, the theater was full, and presented to the view one vast group, dazzling with gold and precious stones; in which, however, at the first glance, no single face could be distinguished. By degrees, as the sight became accustomed to so much brilliancy, the rarest beauties appeared to the view, as in the evening sky the stars appear one by one to him who closes his eyes and then opens them again.

The theater represented a grove of trees; a few fauns lifting up their cloven feet were jumping about; a dryad made her appearance on the scene, and was immediately pursued by them; others gathered round her for her defense, and they quarrelled as they danced. Suddenly, for the purpose of restoring peace and order, Spring, accompanied by his whole court, made his appearance. The Elements, subaltern powers of mythology, together with their attributes, hastened to follow their gracious sovereign. The Seasons, allies of Spring, followed him closely, to form a quadrille, which, after many words of more or less flattering import, was the commencement of the dance. The music, hautboys, flutes, and viols, was delightfully descriptive of rural delights. The king had already made his appearance, amid thunders of applause. He was dressed in a tunic of flowers, which set off his graceful and well-formed figure to advantage. His legs, the best-shaped at court, were displayed to great advantage in flesh-coloured silken hose, of silk so fine and so transparent that it seemed almost like flesh itself. The most beautiful pale-lilac satin shoes, with bows of flowers and leaves, imprisoned his small feet. The bust of the figure was in harmonious keeping with the base; Louis's waving hair floated on his shoulders, the freshness of his complexion was enhanced by the brilliancy of his beautiful blue eyes, which softly kindled all hearts; a mouth with tempting lips, which deigned to open in smiles. Such was the prince of that period: justly that evening styled "The King of all the Loves."

There was something in his carriage which resembled the buoyant movements of an immortal, and he did not dance so much as seem to soar along. His entrance produced, therefore, the most brilliant effect. Suddenly the Comte de Saint-Aignan was observed endeavoring to approach either the king or Madame.

The princess—who was robed in a long dress, diaphanous and light as the finest network tissue from the hands of skillful Mechlin workers, one knee occasionally revealed beneath the folds of the tunic, and her little feet encased in silken slippers decked with pearls—advanced radiant with beauty, accompanied by her cortege of Bacchantes, and had already reached the spot assigned to her in the dance. The applause continued so long that the comte had ample leisure to join the king.

"What is the matter, Saint-Aignan?" said Spring.

"Nothing whatever," replied the courtier, as pale as death; "but your majesty has not thought of Fruits."

"Yes; it is suppressed."

"Far from it, sire; your majesty having given no directions about it, the musicians have retained it."

"How excessively annoying," said the king. "This figure cannot be performed, since M. de Guiche is absent. It must be suppressed."

"Ah, sire, a quarter of an hour's music without any dancing will produce an effect so chilling as to ruin the success of the ballet."

"But, come, since—"

"Oh, sire, that is not the greatest misfortune; for, after all, the orchestra could still just as well cut it out, if it were necessary; but—"

"But what?"

"Why, M. de Guiche is here."

"Here?" replied the king, frowning, "here? Are you sure?"

"Yes, sire; and ready dressed for the ballet."

The king felt himself colour deeply, and said, "You are probably mistaken."

"So little is that the case, sire, that if your majesty will look to the right, you will see that the comte is in waiting."

Louis turned hastily towards the side, and in fact, on his right, brilliant in his character of Autumn, De Guiche awaited until the king should look at him, in order that he might address him. To give an idea of the stupefaction of the king, and that of Monsieur, who was moving about restlessly in his box,—to describe also the agitated movement of the heads in the theater, and the strange emotion of Madame, at the sight of her partner,—is a task we must leave to abler hands. The king stood almost gaping with astonishment as he looked at the comte, who, bowing lowly, approached Louis with the profoundest respect.

"Sire," he said, "your majesty's most devoted servant approaches to perform a service on this occasion with similar zeal that he has already shown on the field of battle. Your majesty, in omitting the dance of the Fruits, would be losing the most beautiful scene in the ballet. I did not wish to be the substance of so dark a shadow to your majesty's elegance, skill, and graceful invention; and I have left my tenants in order to place my services at your majesty's commands."

Every word fell distinctly, in perfect harmony and eloquence, upon Louis XIV.'s ears. Their flattery pleased, as much as De Guiche's courage had astonished him, and he simply replied: "I did not tell you to return, come."

"Certainly not, sire; but your majesty did not tell me to remain."

The king perceived that time was passing away, that if this strange scene were prolonged it would complicate everything, and that a single cloud upon the picture would eventually spoil the whole. Besides, the king's heart was filled with two or three new ideas; he had just derived fresh inspiration from the eloquent glances of Madame. Her look had said to him: "Since they are jealous of you, divide their suspicions, for the man who distrusts two rivals does not object to either in particular." So that Madame, by this clever diversion, decided him. The king smiled upon De Guiche, who did not comprehend a word of Madame's dumb language, but he remarked that she pretended not to look at him, and he attributed the pardon which had been conferred upon him to the princess's kindness of heart. The king seemed only pleased with every one present. Monsieur was the only one who did not understand anything about the matter. The ballet began; the effect was more than beautiful. When the music, by its bursts of melody, carried away these illustrious dancers, when the simple, untutored pantomime of that period, only the more natural on account of the very indifferent acting of the august actors, had reached its culminating point of triumph, the theater shook with tumultuous applause.

De Guiche shone like a sun, but like a courtly sun, that is resigned to fill a subordinate part. Disdainful of a success of which Madame showed no acknowledgement, he thought of nothing but boldly regaining the marked preference of the princess. She, however, did not bestow a single glance upon him. By degrees all his happiness, all his brilliancy, subsided into regret and uneasiness; so that his limbs lost their power, his arms hung heavily by his sides, and his head drooped as though he was stupefied. The king, who had from this moment become in reality the principal dancer in the quadrille, cast a look upon his vanquished rival. De Guiche soon ceased to sustain even the character of the courtier; without applause, he danced indifferently, and very soon could not dance at all, by which accident the triumph of the king and of Madame was assured.

XL: The Nymphs of the Park of Fontainebleau.

The king remained for a moment to enjoy a triumph as complete as it could possibly be. He then turned towards Madame, for the purpose of admiring her also a little in her turn. Young persons love with more vivacity, perhaps with greater ardor and deeper passion, than others more advanced in years; but all the other feelings are at the same time developed in proportion to their youth and vigor: so that vanity being with them almost always the equivalent of love, the latter feeling, according to the laws of equipoise, never attains that degree of perfection which it acquires in men and women from thirty to five and thirty years of age. Louis thought of Madame, but only after he had studiously thought of himself; and Madame carefully thought of herself, without bestowing a single thought upon the king. The victim, however, of all these royal affections and affectations, was poor De Guiche. Every one could observe his agitation and prostration—a prostration which was, indeed, the more remarkable since people were not accustomed to see him with his arms hanging listlessly by his side, his head bewildered, and his eyes with all their bright intelligence bedimmed. It rarely happened that any uneasiness was excited on his account, whenever a question of elegance or taste was under discussion; and De Guiche's defeat was accordingly attributed by the greater number present to his courtier-like tact and ability. But there were others—keen-sighted observers are always to be met with at court—who remarked his paleness and his altered looks; which he could neither feign nor conceal, and their conclusion was that De Guiche was not acting the part of a flatterer. All these sufferings, successes, and remarks were blended, confounded, and lost in the uproar of applause. When, however, the queens expressed their satisfaction and the spectators their enthusiasm, when the king had retired to his dressing-room to change his costume, and whilst Monsieur, dressed as a woman, as he delighted to be, was in his turn dancing about, De Guiche, who had now recovered himself, approached Madame, who, seated at the back of the theater, was waiting for the second part, and had quitted the others for the purpose of creating a sort of solitude for herself in the midst of the crowd, to meditate, as it were, beforehand, upon chorographic effects; and it will be perfectly understood that, absorbed in deep meditation, she did not see, or rather pretended not to notice, anything that was passing around her. De Guiche, observing that she was alone, near a thicket constructed of painted cloth, approached her. Two of her maids of honour, dressed as hamadryads, seeing De Guiche advance, drew back out of respect., whereupon De Guiche proceeded towards the middle of the circle and saluted her royal highness; but, whether she did or did not observe his salutations, the princess did not even turn her head. A cold shiver passed through poor De Guiche; he was unprepared for such utter indifference, for he had neither seen nor been told of anything that had taken place, and consequently could guess nothing. Remarking, therefore, that his obeisance obtained him no acknowledgement, he advanced one step further, and in a voice which he tried, though vainly, to render calm, said: "I have the honour to present my most humble respects to your royal highness."

Upon this Madame deigned to turn her eyes languishingly towards the comte, observing. "Ah! M. de Guiche, is that you? good day!"

The comte's patience almost forsook him, as he continued,—“Your royal highness danced just now most charmingly."

"Do you think so?" she replied with indifference.

"Yes; the character which your royal highness assumed is in perfect harmony with your own."

Madame again turned round, and, looking De Guiche full in the face with a bright and steady gaze, said,—“Why so?"

"Oh! there can be no doubt of it."

"Explain yourself?"

"You represented a divinity, beautiful, disdainful, inconstant."

"You mean Pomona, comte?"

"I allude to the goddess."

Madame remained silent for a moment, with her lips compressed, and then observed,—“But, comte, you, too, are an excellent dancer."

"Nay, Madame, I am only one of those who are never noticed, or who are soon forgotten if they ever happen to be noticed."

With this remark, accompanied by one of those deep sighs which affect the remotest fibers of one's being, his heart burdened with sorrow and throbbing fast, his head on fire, and his gaze wandering, he bowed breathlessly, and withdrew behind the thicket. The only reply Madame condescended to make was by slightly raising her shoulders, and, as her ladies of honour had discreetly retired while the conversation lasted, she recalled them by a look. The ladies were Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente and Mademoiselle de Montalais.

"Did you hear what the Comte de Guiche said?" the princess inquired.

"No."

"It really is very singular," she continued, in a compassionate tone, "how exile has affected poor M. de Guiche's wit." And then, in a louder voice, fearful lest her unhappy victim might lose a syllable, she said,—“In the first place he danced badly, and afterwards his remarks were very silly."

She then rose, humming the air to which she was presently going to dance. De Guiche had overheard everything. The arrow pierced his heart and wounded him mortally. Then, at the risk of interrupting the progress of the fete by his annoyance, he fled from the scene, tearing his beautiful costume of Autumn in pieces, and scattering, as he went along, the branches of vines, mulberry and almond trees, with all the other artificial attributes of his assumed divinity. A quarter of an hour afterwards he returned to the theater; but it will be readily believed that it was only a powerful effort of reason over his great excitement that enabled him to go back; or perhaps, for love is thus strangely constituted, he found it impossible even to remain much longer separated from the presence of one who had broken his heart. Madame was finishing her figure. She saw, but did not look at De Guiche, who, irritated and revengeful, turned his back upon her as she passed him, escorted by her nymphs, and followed by a hundred flatterers. During this time, at the other end of the theater, near the lake, a young woman was seated, with her eyes fixed upon one of the windows of the theater, from which were issuing streams of light—the window in question being that of the royal box. As De Guiche quitted the theater for the purpose of getting into the fresh air he so much needed, he passed close to this figure and saluted her. When she perceived the young man, she rose, like a woman surprised in the midst of ideas she was desirous of concealing from herself. De Guiche stopped as he recognized her, and said hurriedly,—“Good evening, Mademoiselle de la Vallière; I am indeed fortunate in meeting you."

"I, also, M. de Guiche, am glad of this accidental meeting," said the young girl, as she was about to withdraw.

"Pray do not leave me," said De Guiche, stretching out his hand towards her, "for you would be contradicting the kind words you have just pronounced. Remain, I implore you: the evening is most lovely. You wish to escape from the merry tumult, and prefer your own society. Well, I can understand it; all women who are possessed of any feeling do, and one never finds them dull or lonely when removed from the giddy vortex of these exciting amusements. Oh! Heaven!" he exclaimed, suddenly.

"What is the matter, monsieur le comte?" inquired La Vallière, with some anxiety. "You seem agitated."

"I! oh, no!"

"Will you allow me, M. de Guiche, to return you the thanks I had proposed to offer you on the very first opportunity? It is to your recommendation, I am aware, that I owe my admission among the number of Madame's maids of honour."

"Indeed! Ah! I remember now, and I congratulate myself. Do you love any one?"

"I!" exclaimed La Vallière.

"Forgive me, I hardly know what I am saying; a thousand times forgive me; Madame was right, quite right, this brutal exile has completely turned my brain."

"And yet it seemed to me that the king received you with kindness."

"Do you think so? Received me with kindness—perhaps so—yes—"

"There cannot be a doubt he received you kindly, for, in fact, you returned without his permission."

"Quite true, and I believe you are right. But have you not seen M. de Bragelonne here?"

La Vallière started at the name. "Why do you ask?" she inquired.

"Have I offended you again?" said De Guiche. "In that case I am indeed unhappy, and greatly to be pitied."

"Yes, very unhappy, and very much to be pitied, Monsieur de Guiche, for you seem to be suffering terribly."

"Oh! mademoiselle, why have I not a devoted sister, or a true friend, such as yourself?"

"You have friends, Monsieur de Guiche, and the Vicomte de Bragelonne, of whom you spoke just now, is, I believe, one of the most devoted."

"Yes, yes, you are right, he is one of my best friends. Farewell, Mademoiselle de la Vallière, farewell." And he fled, like one possessed, along the banks of the lake. His dark shadow glided, lengthening as it disappeared, among the illumined yews and glittering undulations of the water. La Vallière looked after him, saying,—“Yes, yes, he, too, is suffering, and I begin to understand why."

She had hardly finished when her companions, Mademoiselle de Montalais and Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, ran forward. They were released from their attendance, and had changed their costumes of nymphs; delighted with the beautiful night, and the success of the evening, they returned to look after their companion.

"What, already here!" they said to her. "We thought we should be first at the rendezvous."

"I have been here this quarter of an hour," replied La Vallière.

"Did not the dancing amuse you?"

"No."

"But surely the enchanting spectacle?"

"No more than the dancing. As far as beauty is concerned, I much prefer that which these dark woods present, in whose depths can be seen, now in one direction and again in another, a light passing by, as though it were an eye, in colour like a midnight rainbow, sometimes open, at others closed."

"La Vallière is quite a poetess," said Tonnay-Charente.

"In other words," said Montalais, "she is insupportable. Whenever there is a question of laughing a little or of amusing ourselves, La Vallière begins to cry; whenever we girls have reason to cry, because, perhaps, we have mislaid our dresses, or because our vanity as been wounded, or our costume fails to produce an effect, La Vallière laughs."

"As far as I am concerned, that is not my character," said Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente. "I am a woman; and there are few like me; whoever loves me, flatters me; whoever flatters me, pleases me; and whoever pleases—"

"Well!" said Montalais, "you do not finish."

"It is too difficult," replied Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, laughing loudly. "Do you, who are so clever, finish for me."

"And you, Louise?" said Montalais, "does any one please you?"

"That is a matter that concerns no one but myself," replied the young girl, rising from the mossy bank on which she had been reclining during the whole time the ballet lasted. "Now, mesdemoiselles, we have agreed to amuse ourselves to-night without any one to overlook us, and without any escort. We are three in number, we like one another, and the night is lovely. Look yonder, do you not see the moon slowly rising, silvering the topmost branches of the chestnuts and the oaks. Oh, beautiful walk! sweet liberty! exquisite soft turf of the woods, the happiness which your friendship confers upon me! let us walk arm in arm towards those large trees. Out yonder all are at this moment seated at table and fully occupied, or preparing to adorn themselves for a set and formal promenade; horses are being saddled, or harnessed to the carriages—the queen's mules or Madame's four white ponies. As for ourselves, we shall soon reach some retired spot where no eyes can see us and no step follow ours. Do you not remember, Montalais, the woods of Cheverny and of Chambord, the innumerable rustling poplars of Blois, where we exchanged our mutual hopes?"

"And confidences too?"

"Yes."

"Well," said Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, "I also think a good deal; but I take care—"

"To say nothing," said Montalais, "so that when Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente thinks, Athenais is the only one who knows it."

"Hush!" said Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, "I hear steps approaching from this side."

"Quick, quick, then, among the high reed-grass," said Montalais; "stoop, Athenais, you are so tall."

Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente stooped as she was told, and, almost at the same moment, they saw two gentlemen approaching, their heads bent down, walking arm in arm, on the fine gravel walk running parallel with the bank. The young girls had, indeed, made themselves small—indeed invisible.

"It is Monsieur de Guiche," whispered Montalais in Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente's ear.

"It is Monsieur de Bragelonne," whispered the latter to La Vallière.

The two young men approached still closer, conversing in animated tones. "She was here just now," said the count. "If I had only seen her, I should have declared it to be a vision, but I spoke to her."

"You are positive, then?"

"Yes; but perhaps I frightened her."

"In what way?"

"Oh! I was still half crazy at you know what; so that she could hardly have understood what I was saying, and must have grown alarmed."

"Oh!" said Bragelonne, "do not make yourself uneasy: she is all kindness, and will excuse you; she is clear-sighted, and will understand."

"Yes, but if she should have understood, and understood too well, she may talk."

"You do not know Louise, count," said Raoul. "Louise possesses every virtue, and has not a single fault." And the two young men passed on, and, as they proceeded, their voices were soon lost in the distance.

"How is it, La Vallière," said Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, "that the Vicomte de Bragelonne spoke of you as Louise?"

"We were brought up together," replied Louise, blushing; "M. de Bragelonne has honoured me by asking my hand in marriage, but—"

"Well?"

"It seems the king will not consent to it."

"Eh! Why the king? and what has the king to do with it?" exclaimed Aure, sharply. "Good gracious! has the king any right to interfere in matters of that kind? Politics are politics, as M. de Mazarin used to say; but love is love. If, therefore, you love M. de Bragelonne, marry him. I give my consent."

Athenais began to laugh.

"Oh! I am speaking seriously," replied Montalais, "and my opinion in this case is quite as good as the king's, I suppose; is it not, Louise?"

"Come," said La Vallière, "these gentlemen have passed; let us take advantage of our being alone to cross the open ground and so take refuge in the woods."

"So much the better," said Athenais, "because I see the torches setting out from the chateau and the theater, and they seem as if they were preceding some person of distinction."

"Let us run, then," said all three. And, gracefully lifting up the long skirts of their silk dresses, they lightly ran across the open space between the lake and the thickest covert of the park. Montalais agile as a deer, Athenais eager as a young wolf, bounded through the dry grass, and, now and then, some bold Acteon might, by the aid of the faint light, have perceived their straight and well-formed limbs somewhat displayed beneath the heavy folds of their satin petticoats. La Vallière, more refined and more bashful, allowed her dress to flow around her; retarded also by the lameness of her foot, it was not long before she called out to her companions to halt, and, left behind, she obliged them both to wait for her. At this moment, a man, concealed in a dry ditch planted with young willow saplings, scrambled quickly up its shelving side, and ran off in the direction of the chateau. The three young girls, on their side, reached the outskirts of the park, every path of which they well knew. The ditches were bordered by high hedges full of flowers, which on that side protected the foot-passengers from being intruded upon by the horses and carriages. In fact, the sound of Madame's and the queen's carriages could be heard in the distance upon the hard dry ground of the roads, followed by the mounted cavaliers. Distant music reached them in response, and when the soft notes died away, the nightingale, with throat of pride, poured forth his melodious chants, and his most complicated, learned, and sweetest compositions to those who had met beneath the thick covert of the woods. Near the songster, in the dark background of the large trees, could be seen the glistening eyes of an owl, attracted by the harmony. In this way the fete of the whole court was a fete also for the mysterious inhabitants of the forest; for certainly the deer in the brake, the pheasant on the branch, the fox in its hole, were all listening. One could realize the life led by this nocturnal and invisible population from the restless movements that suddenly took place among the leaves. Our sylvan nymphs uttered a slight cry, but, reassured immediately afterwards, they laughed, and resumed their walk. In this manner they reached the royal oak, the venerable relic of a tree which in its prime has listened to the sighs of Henry II. for the beautiful Diana of Poitiers, and later still to those of Henry IV. for the lovely Gabrielle d'Estrees. Beneath this oak the gardeners had piled up the moss and turf in such a manner that never had a seat more luxuriously rested the wearied limbs of man or monarch. The trunk, somewhat rough to recline against, was sufficiently large to accommodate the three young girls, whose voices were lost among the branches, which stretched upwards to the sky.

XLI. What Was Said under the Royal Oak.

The softness of the air, the stillness of the foliage, tacitly imposed upon these young girls an engagement to change immediately their giddy conversation for one of a more serious character. She, indeed, whose disposition was the most lively,—Montalais, for instance,—was the first to yield to the influence; and she began by heaving a deep sigh, and saying:—"What happiness to be here alone, and at liberty, with every right to be frank, especially towards one another."

"Yes," said Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente; "for the court, however brilliant it may be, has always some falsehood concealed beneath the folds of its velvet robes, or the glitter of its diamonds."

"I," replied La Vallière, "I never tell a falsehood; when I cannot speak the truth, I remain silent."

"You will not long remain in favour," said Montalais; "it is not here as it was at Blois, where we told the dowager Madame all our little annoyances, and all our longings. There were certain days when Madame remembered that she herself had been young, and, on those days, whoever talked with her found in her a sincere friend. She related to us her flirtations with Monsieur, and we told her of the flirtations she had had with others, or, at least, the rumors of them that had spread abroad. Poor woman, so simple-minded! she laughed at them, as we did. Where is she now?"

"Ah, Montalais,—laughter-loving Montalais!" cried La Vallière; "you see you are sighing again: the woods inspire you, and you are almost reasonable this evening."

"You ought not, either of you," said Athenais, "to regret the court at Blois so much, unless you do not feel happy with us. A court is a place where men and women resort to talk of matters which mothers, guardians, and especially confessors, severely denounce."

"Oh, Athenais!" said Louise, blushing.

"Athenais is frank to-night," said Montalais; "let us avail ourselves of it."

"Yes, let us take advantage of it, for this evening I could divulge the softest secrets of my heart."

"Ah, if M. Montespan were here!" said Montalais.

"Do you think that I care for M. de Montespan?" murmured the beautiful young girl.

"He is handsome, I believe?"

"Yes. And that is no small advantage in my eyes."

"There now, you see—"

"I will go further, and say, that of all the men whom one sees here, he is the handsomest, and the most—"

"What was that?" said La Vallière, starting suddenly from the mossy bank.

"A deer hurrying by, perhaps."

"I am only afraid of men," said Athenais.

"When they do not resemble M. de Montespan."

"A truce to raillery. M. de Montespan is attentive to me, but that does not commit me in any way. Is not M. de Guiche here, he who is so devoted to Madame?"

"Poor fellow!" said La Vallière.

"Why to be pitied? Madame is sufficiently beautiful, and of high enough rank, I suppose."

La Vallière shook her head sorrowfully, saying, "When one loves, it is neither beauty nor rank;—when one loves it should be the heart, or the eyes only, of him, or of her whom one loves."

Montalais began to laugh loudly. "Heart, eyes," she said; "oh, sugar-plums!"

"I speak for myself," replied La Vallière.

"Noble sentiments," said Athenais, with an air of protection, but with indifference.

"Are they not your own?" asked Louise.

"Perfectly so; but to continue: how can one pity a man who bestows his attentions upon such a woman as Madame? If any disproportion exists, it is on the count's side."

"Oh! no, no," returned La Vallière; "it is on Madame's side."

"Explain yourself."

"I will. Madame has not even a wish to know what love is. She diverts herself with the feeling, as children do with fireworks, form which a spark might set a palace on fire. It makes a display, and that is all she cares about. Besides, pleasure forms the tissue of which she wishes her life to be woven. M. de Guiche loves this illustrious personage, but she will never love him."

Athenais laughed disdainfully. "Do people really ever love?" she said. "Where are the noble sentiments you just now uttered? Does not a woman's virtue consist in the uncompromising refusal of every intrigue that might compromise her? A properly regulated woman, endowed with a natural heart, ought to look at men, make herself loved—adored, even, by them, and say at the very utmost but once in her life, 'I begin to think that I ought not to have been what I am,—I should have detested this one less than others.'"

"Therefore," exclaimed La Vallière, "that is what M. de Montespan has to expect."

"Certainly; he, as well as every one else. What! have I not said that I admit he possesses a certain superiority, and would not that be enough? My dear child, a woman is a queen during the entire period nature permits her to enjoy sovereign power—from fifteen to thirty-five years of age. After that, we are free to have a heart, when we only have that left—"

"Oh, oh!" murmured La Vallière.

"Excellent," cried Montalais; "a very masterly woman; Athenais, you will make your way in the world."

"Do you not approve of what I say?"

"Completely," replied her laughing companion.

"You are not serious, Montalais?" said Louise.

"Yes, yes; I approve everything Athenais has just said; only—"

"Only what?"

"Well, I cannot carry it out. I have the firmest principles; I form resolutions beside which the laws of the Stadtholder and of the King of Spain are child's play; but when the moment arrives to put them into execution, nothing comes of them."

"Your courage fails?" said Athenais, scornfully.

"Miserably so."

"Great weakness of nature," returned Athenais. "But at least you make a choice."

"Why, no. It pleases fate to disappoint me in everything; I dream of emperors, and I find only—"

"Aure, Aure!" exclaimed La Vallière, "for pity's sake, do not, for the pleasure of saying something witty, sacrifice those who love you with such devoted affection."

"Oh, I do not trouble myself much about that; those who love me are sufficiently happy that I do not dismiss them altogether. So much the worse for myself if I have a weakness for any one, but so much the worse for others if I revenge myself upon them for it."

"You are right," said Athenais, "and, perhaps, you too will reach the goal. In other words, young ladies, that is termed being a coquette. Men, who are very silly in most things, are particularly so in confounding, under the term of coquetry, a woman's pride, and love of changing her sentiments as she does her dress. I, for instance, am proud; that is to say, impregnable. I treat my admirers harshly, but without any pretention to retain them. Men call me a coquette, because they are vain enough to think I care for them. Other women—Montalais, for instance—have allowed themselves to be influenced by flattery; they would be lost were it not for that most fortunate principle of instinct which urges them to change suddenly, and punish the man whose devotion they so recently accepted."

"A very learned dissertation," said Montalais, in the tone of thorough enjoyment.

"It is odious!" murmured Louise.

"Thanks to that sort of coquetry, for, indeed, that is genuine coquetry," continued Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente; "the lover who, a little while since, was puffed up with pride, in a minute afterwards is suffering at every pore of his vanity and self-esteem. He was, perhaps, already beginning to assume the airs of a conqueror, but now he retreats defeated; he was about to assume an air of protection towards us, but he is obliged to prostrate himself once more. The result of all this is, that, instead of having a husband who is jealous and troublesome, free from restraint in his conduct towards us, we have a lover always trembling in our presence, always fascinated by our attractions, always submissive; and for this simple reason, that he finds the same woman never twice of the same mind. Be convinced, therefore, of the advantages of coquetry. Possessing that, one reigns a queen among women in cases where Providence has withheld that precious faculty of holding one’s heart and mind in check.”

“How clever you are,” said Montalais, “and how well you understand the duty women owe themselves!”

“I am only settling a case of individual happiness,” said Athenais modestly; “and defending myself, like all weak, loving dispositions, against the oppressions of the stronger.”

“La Vallière does not say a word.”

“Does she not approve of what we are saying?”

“Nay; only I do not understand it,” said Louise. “You talk like people not called upon to live in this world of ours.”

“And very pretty your world is,” said Montalais.

“A world,” returned Athenais, “in which men worship a woman until she has fallen,—and insult her when she has fallen.”

“Who spoke to you of falling?” said Louise.

“Yours is a new theory, then; will you tell us how you intend to resist yielding to temptation, if you allow yourself to be hurried away by feelings of affection?”

“Oh!” exclaimed the young girl, raising towards the dark heavens her beautiful large eyes filled with tears, “if you did but know what a heart is, I would explain, and convince you; a loving heart is stronger than all your coquetry, more powerful than all your pride. A woman is never truly loved, I believe; a man never loves with idolatry, unless he feels sure he is loved in return. Let old men, whom we read of in comedies, fancy themselves adored by coquettes. A young man is conscious of, and knows them; if he has a fancy, or a strong desire, and an absorbing passion, for a coquette, he cannot mistake her; a coquette may drive him out of his senses, but will never make him fall in love. Love, such as I conceive it to be, is an incessant, complete, and perfect sacrifice; but it is not the sacrifice of one only of the two persons thus united. It is the perfect abnegation of two who are desirous of blending their beings into one. If ever I love, I shall implore my lover to leave me free and pure; I will tell him, and he will understand, that my heart was torn by my refusal, and he, in his love for me, aware of the magnitude of my sacrifice,—he, in his turn, I say, will store his devotion for me,—will respect me, and will not seek my ruin, to insult me when I shall have fallen, as you said just now, whilst uttering your blasphemies against love, such as I understand it. That is my idea of love. And now you will tell me, perhaps, that my love will despise me; I defy him to do so, unless he be the vilest of men, and my heart assures me that it is not such a man I would choose. A look from me will repay him for the sacrifices he makes, or will inspire him with the virtues which he would never think he possessed.”

“But, Louise,” exclaimed Montalais, “you tell us this, and do not carry it into practice.”

“What do you mean?”

“You are adored by Raoul de Bragelonne, who worships you on both knees. The poor fellow is made the victim of your virtue, just as he would be— nay, more than he would be, even—of my coquetry, or Athenais’s pride.”

“All this is simply a different shade of coquetry,” said Athenais; “and Louise, I perceive, is a coquette without knowing it.”

“Oh!” said La Vallière.

“Yes, you may call it instinct, if you please, keenest sensibility, exquisite refinement of feeling, perpetual play of restrained outbreaks of affection, which end in smoke. It is very artful too, and very effective. I should even, now that I reflect upon it, have preferred this system of tactics to my own pride, for waging war on members of the other sex, because it offers the advantage sometimes of thoroughly convincing them; but, at the present moment, without utterly condemning myself, I declare it to be superior to the non-complex coquetry of Montalais.” And the two young girls began to laugh.

La Vallière alone preserved silence, and quietly shook her head. Then, a moment after, she added, “If you were to tell me, in the presence of a man, but a fourth part of what you have just said, or even if I were assured that you think it, I should die of shame and grief where I am now.”

“Very well; die, poor tender little darling,” replied Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente; “for if there are no men here, there are at least two women, your own friends, who declare you to be attained and convicted of being a coquette from instinct; in other words, the most dangerous kind of coquette the world possesses.”

“Oh! mesdemoiselles,” replied La Vallière, blushing, and almost ready to weep. Her two companions again burst out laughing.

“Very well! I will ask Bragelonne to tell me.”

“Bragelonne?” said Athenais.

“Yes! Bragelonne, who is as courageous as Caesar, and as clever and witty as M. Fouquet. Poor fellow! for twelve years he has known you, loved you, and yet—one can hardly believe it—he has never even kissed the tips of your fingers.”

“Tell us the reason of this cruelty, you who are all heart,” said Athenais to La Vallière.

“Let me explain it by a single word—virtue. You will perhaps deny the existence of virtue?”

“Come, Louise, tell us the truth,” said Aure, taking her by the hand.

“What do you wish me to tell you?” cried La Vallière.

“Whatever you like; but it will be useless for you to say anything, for I persist in my opinion of you. A coquette from instinct; in other words, as I have already said, and I say it again, the most dangerous of all coquettes.”

“Oh! no, no; for pity’s sake do not believe that!”

“What! twelve years of extreme severity.”

“How can that be, since twelve years ago I was only five years old? The frivolity of the child cannot surely be placed to the young girl’s account.”

“Well! you are now seventeen; three years instead of twelve. During those three years you have remained constantly and unchangeably cruel. Against you are arrayed the silent shades of Blois, the meetings when you diligently conned the stars together, the evening wanderings beneath the plantain-trees, his impassioned twenty years speaking to your fourteen summers, the fire of his glances addressed to yourself.”

“Yes, yes; but so it is!”

“Impossible!”

“But why impossible?”

“Tell us something credible and we will believe you.”

“Yet, if you were to suppose one thing.”

“What is that?”

“Suppose that I thought I was in love, and that I am not.”

“What! not in love!”

“Well, then! if I have acted in a different manner to what others do when they are in love, it is because I do not love; and because my hour has not yet come.”

“Louise, Louise,” said Montalais, “take care or I will remind you of the remark you made just now. Raoul is not here; do not overwhelm him while he is absent; be charitable, and if, on closer inspection, you think you do not love him, tell him so, poor fellow!” and she began to laugh.

“Louise pitied M. de Guiche just now,” said Athenais; “would it be possible to detect an explanation of her indifference for the one in this compassion for the other?”

“Say what you please,” said La Vallière, sadly; “upbraid me as you like, since you do not understand me.”

“Oh! oh!” replied Montalais, “temper, sorrow, tears; we are jesting, Louise, and are not, I assure you, quite the monsters you suppose. Look at the proud Athenais, as she is called; she does not love M. de Montespan, it is true, but she would be in despair if M. de Montespan did not continue to love her. Look at me; I laugh at M. Malicorne, but the poor fellow whom I laugh at knows precisely when he will be permitted to press his lips upon my hand. And yet the eldest of us is not twenty yet. What a future before us!”

“Silly, silly girls!” murmured Louise.

“You are quite right,” said Montalais; “and you alone have spoken words of wisdom.”

“Certainly.”

“I do not dispute it,” replied Athenais. “And so it is clear you do not love poor M. de Bragelonne?”

“Perhaps she does,” said Montalais; “she is not yet quite certain of it. But, in any case, listen, Athenais; if M. de Bragelonne is ever free, I will give you a little friendly advice.”

“What is that?”

“To look at him well before you decide in favour of M. de Montespan.”

“Oh! in that way of considering the subject, M. de Bragelonne is not the only one whom one could look at with pleasure; M. de Guiche, for instance, has his value also.”

“He did not distinguish himself this evening,” said Montalais; “and I know from very good authority that Madame thought him insupportable.”

“M. de Saint-Aignan produced a most brilliant effect, and I am sure that more than one person who saw him dance this evening will not soon forget him. Do you not think so, La Vallière?”

“Why do you ask me? I did not see him, nor do I know him.”

“What! you did not see M. de Saint-Aignan? Don’t you know him?”

“No.”

“Come, come, do not affect a virtue more extravagantly excessive than our vanity!—you have eyes, I suppose?”

“Excellent.”

“Then you must have seen all those who danced this evening.”

“Yes, nearly all.”

“That is a very impertinent ‘nearly all’ for somebody.”

“You must take it for what it is worth.”

“Very well; now, among all those gentlemen whom you saw, which do you prefer?”

“Yes,” said Montalais, “is it M. de Saint-Aignan, or M. de Guiche, or M.—”

“I prefer no one; I thought them all about the same.”

“Do you mean, then, that among that brilliant assembly, the first court in the world, no one pleased you?”

“I do not say that.”

“Tell us, then, who your ideal is?”

“It is not an ideal being.”

“He exists, then?”

“In very truth,” exclaimed La Vallière, aroused and excited; “I cannot understand you at all. What! you who have a heart as I have, eyes as I have, and yet you speak of M. de Guiche, of M. de Saint-Aignan, when the king was there.” These words, uttered in a precipitate manner, and in an agitated, fervid tone of voice, made her two companions, between whom she was seated, exclaim in a manner that terrified her, “The king!”

La Vallière buried her face in her hands. “Yes,” she murmured; “the king! the king! Have you ever seen any one to be compared to the king?”

“You were right just now in saying you had excellent eyes, Louise, for you see a great distance; too far, indeed. Alas! the king is not one upon whom our poor eyes have a right to hinge themselves.”

“That is too true,” cried La Vallière; “it is not the privilege of all eyes to gaze upon the sun; but I will look upon him, even were I to be blinded in doing so.” At this moment, and as though caused by the words which had just escaped La Vallière’s lips, a rustling of leaves, and of what sounded like some silken material, was heard behind the adjoining bushes. The young girls hastily rose, almost terrified out of their senses. They distinctly saw the leaves move, without being able to see what it was that stirred them.

"It is a wolf or a wild boar," cried Montalais; "fly! fly!" The three girls, in the extremity of terror, fled by the first path that presented itself, and did not stop until they had reached the verge of the wood. There, breathless, leaning against each other, feeling their hearts throb wildly, they endeavored to collect their senses, but could only succeed in doing so after the lapse of some minutes. Perceiving at last the lights from the windows of the chateau, they decided to walk towards them. La Vallière was exhausted with fatigue, and Aure and Athenais were obliged to support her.

"We have escaped well," said Montalais.

"I am greatly afraid," said La Vallière, "that it was something worse than a wolf. For my part, and I speak as I think, I should have preferred to have run the risk of being devoured alive by some wild animal than to have been listened to and overheard. Fool, fool that I am! How could I have thought, how could I have said what I did?" And saying this her head bowed like the water tossed plume of a bulrush; she felt her limbs fail, and her strength abandoning her, and, gliding almost inanimate from the arms of her companions, sank down upon the turf.

XLII. The King's Uneasiness.

Let us leave poor La Vallière, who had fainted in the arms of her two companions, and return to the precincts of the royal oak. The young girls had hardly run twenty paces, when the sound which had so much alarmed them was renewed among the branches. A man's figure might indistinctly be perceived, and putting the branches of the bushes aside, he appeared upon the verge of the wood, and perceiving that the place was empty, burst out into a peal of laughter. It is almost superfluous to add that the form in question was that of a young and handsome cavalier, who immediately made a sign to another, who thereupon made his appearance.

"What, sire," said the second figure, advancing timidly, "has your majesty put our young sentimentalists to flight?"

"It seems so," said the king, "and you can show yourself without fear."

"Take care, sire, you will be recognized."

"But I tell you they are flown."

"This is a most fortunate meeting, sire; and, if I dared offer an opinion to your majesty, we ought to follow them."

"They are far enough away by this time."

"They would quickly allow themselves to be overtaken, especially if they knew who were following them."

"What do you mean by that, coxcomb that you are?"

"Why, one of them seems to have taken a fancy to me, and another compared you to the sun."

"The greater reason why we should not show ourselves, Saint-Aignan. The sun never shows itself in the night-time."

"Upon my word, sire, your majesty seems to have very little curiosity. In your place, I should like to know who are the two nymphs, the two dryads, the two hamadryads, who have so good an opinion of us."

"I shall know them again very well, I assure you, without running after them."

"By what means?"

"By their voices, of course. They belong to the court, and the one who spoke of me had a remarkably sweet voice."

"Ah! your majesty permits yourself to be influenced by flattery."

"No one will ever say it is a means you make use of."

"Forgive my stupidity, sire."

"Come; let us go and look where I told you."

"Is the passion, then, which your majesty confided to me, already forgotten?"

"Oh! no, indeed. How is it possible to forget such beautiful eyes as Mademoiselle de la Vallière has?"

"Yet the other one has a beautiful voice."

"Which one?"

"The lady who has fallen in love with the sun."

"M. de Saint-Aignan!"

"Forgive me, sire."

"Well, I am not sorry you should believe me to be an admirer of sweet voices as well as of beautiful eyes. I know you to be a terrible talker, and to-morrow I shall have to pay for the confidence I have shown you."

"What do you mean, sire?"

"That to-morrow every one will know that I have designs upon this little La Vallière; but be careful, Saint-Aignan, I have confided my secret to no one but you, and if any one should speak to me about it, I shall know who has betrayed my secret."

"You are angry, sire."

"No; but you understand I do not wish to compromise the poor girl."

"Do not be afraid, sire."

"You promise me, then?"

"I give you my word of honour."

"Excellent," thought the king, laughing to himself; "now every one will know to-morrow that I have been running about after La Vallière to-night."

Then, endeavoring to see where he was, he said: "Why we have lost ourselves."

"Not quite so bad as that, sire."

"Where does that gate lead to?"

"To Rond-Point, sire."

"Where were we going when we heard the sound of women's voices?"

"Yes, sire, and the termination of a conversation in which I had the honour of hearing my own name pronounced by the side of your majesty's."

"You return to that subject too frequently, Saint-Aignan."

"Your majesty will forgive me, but I am delighted to know that a woman exists whose thoughts are occupied about me, without my knowledge, and without my having done anything to deserve it. Your majesty cannot comprehend this satisfaction, for your rank and merit attract attention, and compel regard."

"No, no, Saint-Aignan, believe me or not, as you like," said the king, leaning familiarly upon Saint-Aignan's arm and taking the path he thought would lead them to the chateau; "but this candid confession, this perfectly disinterested preference of one who will, perhaps, never attract my attention—in one word, the mystery of this adventure excites me, and the truth is, that if I were not so taken with La Vallière—"

"Do not let that interfere with your majesty's intentions: you have time enough before you."

"What do you mean?"

"La Vallière is said to be very strict in her ideas."

"You excite my curiosity and I am anxious to see her again. Come, let us walk on."

The king spoke untruly, for nothing, on the contrary, could make him less anxious, but he had a part to play, and so he walked on hurriedly. Saint-Aignan followed him at a short distance. Suddenly the king stopped; the courtier followed his example.

"Saint-Aignan," he said, "do you not hear some one moaning?"

"Yes, sire, and weeping, too, it seems."

"It is in this direction," said the king. "It sounds like the tears and sobs of a woman."

"Run," said the king; and, following a by-path, they ran across the grass. As they approached, the cries were more distinctly heard.

"Help, help," exclaimed two voices. The king and his companion redoubled their speed, and, as they approached nearer, the sighs they had heard were changed into loud sobs. The cry of "Help! help!" was again repeated; at the sound of which, the king and Saint-Aignan increased the rapidity of their pace. Suddenly at the other side of a ditch, under the branches of a willow, they perceived a woman on her knees, holding another in her arms who seemed to have fainted. A few paces from them, a third, standing in the middle of the path, was calling for assistance. Perceiving the two gentlemen, whose rank she could not tell, her cries for assistance were redoubled. The king, who was in advance of his companion, leaped across the ditch, and reached the group at the very moment when, from the end of the path which led to the chateau, a dozen persons were approaching, who had been drawn to the spot by the same cries that had attracted the attention of the king and M. de Saint-Aignan.

"What is the matter, young ladies?" said Louis.

"The king!" exclaimed Mademoiselle de Montalais, in her astonishment, letting La Vallière's head fall upon the ground.

"Yes, it is the king; but that is no reason why you should abandon your companion. Who is she?"

"It is Mademoiselle de la Vallière, sire."

"Mademoiselle de la Vallière!"

"Yes, sire, she has just fainted."

"Poor child!" said the king. "Quick, quick, fetch a surgeon." But however great the anxiety with which the king had pronounced these words may have seemed to others, he had not so carefully schooled himself but that they appeared, as well as the gesture which accompanied them, somewhat cold to Saint-Aignan, to whom the king had confided the sudden love with which she had inspired him.

"Saint-Aignan," continued the king, "watch over Mademoiselle de la Vallière, I beg. Send for a surgeon. I will hasten forward and inform Madame of the accident which has befallen one of her maids of honour." And, in fact, while M. de Saint-Aignan was busily engaged in making preparations for carrying Mademoiselle de la Vallière to the chateau, the king hurried forward, happy to have an opportunity of approaching Madame, and of speaking to her under a colourable pretext. Fortunately, a carriage was passing; the coachman was told to stop, and the persons who were inside, having been informed of the accident, eagerly gave up their seats to Mademoiselle de la Vallière. The current of fresh air produced by the rapid motion of the carriage soon recalled her to her senses. Having reached the chateau, she was able, though very weak, to alight from the carriage, and, with the assistance of Athenais and of Montalais, to reach the inner apartments. They made her sit down in one of the rooms of the ground floor. After a while, as the accident had not produced much effect upon those who had been walking, the promenade was resumed. During this time, the king had found Madame beneath a tree with overhanging branches, and had seated himself by her side.

"Take care, sire," said Henrietta to him, in a low tone, "you do not show yourself as indifferent as you ought to be."

"Alas!" replied the king, in the same tone, "I much fear we have entered into an agreement above our strength to keep." He then added aloud, "You have heard of the accident, I suppose?"

"What accident?"

"Oh! in seeing you I forgot I hurried here expressly to tell you of it. I am, however, painfully affected by it; one of your maids of honour, Mademoiselle de la Vallière, has just fainted."

"Indeed! poor girl," said the princess, quietly, "what was the cause of it?"

She then added in an undertone, "You forget, sire, that you wish others to believe in your passion for this girl, and yet you remain here while she is almost dying, perhaps, elsewhere."

"Ah! Madame," said the king, sighing, "how much more perfect you are in your part than I am, and how actively you think of everything."

He then rose, saying loud enough for every one to hear him, "Permit me to leave you, Madame; my uneasiness is very great, and I wish to be quite certain, myself, that proper attention has been given to Mademoiselle de la Vallière." And the king left again to return to La Vallière, while those who had been present commented upon the king's remark:—"My uneasiness is very great."

XLIII. The King's Secret.

On his way Louis met the Comte de Saint-Aignan. "Well, Saint-Aignan," he inquired, with affected interest, "how is the invalid."

"Really, sire," stammered Saint-Aignan, "to my shame, I confess I do not know."

"What! you do not know?" said the king, pretending to take in a serious manner this want of attention for the object of his predilection.

"Will your majesty pardon me; but I have just met one of our three loquacious wood-nymphs, and I confess that my attention has been taken away from other matters."

"Ah!" said the king, eagerly, "you have found, then—"

"The one who deigned to speak of me in such advantageous terms; and, having found mine, I was searching for yours, sire, when I had the happiness to meet your majesty."

"Very well; but Mademoiselle de la Vallière before everything else," said the king, faithful to the character he had assumed.

"Oh! our charming invalid!" said Saint-Aignan; "how fortunately her fainting fit came on, since your majesty had already occupied yourself about her."

"What is the name of your fair lady, Saint-Aignan? Is it a secret?"

"It ought to be a secret, and a very great one, even; but your majesty is well aware that no secret can possibly exist for you."

"Well, what is her name?"

"Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente."

"Is she pretty?"

"Exceedingly, sire; and I recognized the voice which pronounced my name in such tender accents. I accosted her, questioned her as well as I was able to do, in the midst of the crowd; and she told me, without suspecting anything, that a little while ago she was under the great oak, with her two friends, when the sound of a wolf or a robber had terrified them, and made them run away."

"But," inquired the king, anxiously, "what are the names of these two friends?"

"Sire," said Saint-Aignan, "will your majesty send me forthwith to the Bastille?"

"What for?"

"Because I am an egotist and a fool. My surprise was so great at such a conquest, and at so fortunate a discovery, that I went no further in my inquiries. Besides, I did not think that your majesty would attach any very great importance to what you heard, knowing how much your attention was taken up by Mademoiselle de la Vallière; and then, Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente left me precipitately, to return to Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

"Let us hope, then, that I shall be as fortunate as yourself. Come, Saint-Aignan."

"Your majesty is ambitions, I perceive, and does not wish to allow any conquest to escape you. Well, I assure you that I will conscientiously set about my inquiries; and, moreover, from one or the other of those Three Graces we shall learn the names of the rest, and by the names their secrets."

"I, too," said the king, "only require to hear her voice to know it again. Come, let us say no more about it, but show me where poor La Vallière is."

"Well," thought Saint-Aignan, "the king's regard is beginning to display itself, and for that girl too. It is extraordinary; I should never have believed it." And with this thought passing through his mind, he showed the king the room to which La Vallière had been carried; the king entered, followed by Saint-Aignan. In a low chamber, near a large window looking out upon the gardens, La Vallière, reclining in a large armchair, was inhaling deep draughts of the perfumed evening breeze. From the loosened body of her dress, the lace fell in tumbled folds, mingling with the tresses of her beautiful fair hair, which lay scattered upon her shoulders. Her languishing eyes were filled with tears; she seemed as lifeless as those beautiful visions of our dreams, that pass before the mental eye of the sleeper, half-opening their wings without moving them, unclosing their lips without a sound escaping them. The pearl-like pallor of La Vallière possessed a charm it would be impossible to describe. Mental and bodily suffering had produced upon her features a soft and noble expression of grief; from the perfect passiveness of her arms and bust, she more resembled one whose soul had passed away, than a living being; she seemed not to hear either of the whisperings which arose from the court. She seemed to be communing within herself; and her beautiful, delicate hands trembled from time to time as though at the contact of some invisible touch. She was so completely absorbed in her reverie, that the king entered without her perceiving him. At a distance he gazed upon her lovely face, upon which the moon shed its pure silvery light.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed, with a terror he could not control, "she is dead."

"No, sire," said Montalais, in a low voice; "on the contrary, she is better. Are you not better, Louise?"

But Louise did not answer. "Louise," continued Montalais, "the king has deigned to express his uneasiness on your account."

"The king!" exclaimed Louise, starting up abruptly, as if a stream of fire had started through her frame to her heart; "the king uneasy about me?"

"Yes," said Montalais.

"The king is here, then?" said La Vallière, not venturing to look round her.

"That voice! that voice!" whispered Louis, eagerly, to Saint-Aignan.

"Yes, it is so," replied Saint-Aignan; "your majesty is right; it is she who declared her love for the sun."

"Hush!" said the king. And then approaching La Vallière, he said, "You are not well, Mademoiselle de la Vallière? Just now, indeed, in the park, I saw that you had fainted. How were you attacked?"

"Sire," stammered out the poor child, pale and trembling, "I really do not know."

"You have been walking too far," said the king; "and fatigue, perhaps—"

"No, sire," said Montalais, eagerly, answering for her friend, "it could not be from fatigue, for we passed most of the evening seated beneath the royal oak."

"Under the royal oak?" returned the king, starting. "I was not deceived; it is as I thought." And he directed a look of intelligence at the comte.

"Yes," said Saint-Aignan, "under the royal oak, with Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente."

"How do you know that?" inquired Montalais.

"In a very simple way. Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente told me so."

"In that case, she probably told you the cause of Mademoiselle de la Vallière's fainting?"

"Why, yes; she told me something about a wolf or a robber. I forget precisely which." La Vallière listened, her eyes fixed, her bosom heaving, as if, gifted with an acuteness of perception, she foresaw a portion of the truth. Louis imagined this attitude and agitation to be the consequence of a terror only partially reassured. "Nay, fear nothing," he said, with a rising emotion which he could not conceal; "the wolf which terrified you so much was simply a wolf with two legs."

"It was a man, then!" said Louise; "it was a man who was listening?"

"Suppose it was so, mademoiselle, what great harm was there in his having listened? Is it likely that, even in your own opinion, you would have said anything which could not have been listened to?"

La Vallière wrung her hands, and hid her face in them, as if to hide her blushes. "In Heaven's name," she said, "who was concealed there? Who was listening?"

The king advanced towards her, to take hold of one of her hands. "It was I," he said, bowing with marked respect. "Is it likely I could have frightened you?" La Vallière uttered a loud cry; for the second time her strength forsook her; and moaning in utter despair, she again fell lifeless in her chair. The king had just time to hold out his arm; so that she was partially supported by him. Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente and Montalais, who stood a few paces from the king and La Vallière, motionless and almost petrified at the recollection of their conversation with La Vallière, did not even think of offering their assistance, feeling restrained by the presence of the king, who, with one knee on the ground, held La Vallière round the waist with his arm.

"You heard, sire!" murmured Athenais. But the king did not reply; he remained with his eyes fixed upon La Vallière's half-closed eyes, and held her quiescent hand in his own.

"Of course," replied Saint-Aignan, who, on his side, hoping that Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, too, would faint, advancing towards her, holding his arms extended,—"of course; we did not even lose a single word." But the haughty Athenais was not a woman to faint easily; she darted a terrible look at Saint-Aignan, and fled. Montalais, with more courage, advanced hurriedly towards Louise, and received her from the king's hands, who was already fast losing his presence of mind, as he felt his face covered by the perfumed tresses of the seemingly dying girl. "Excellent," whispered Saint-Aignan. "This is indeed an adventure; and it will be my own fault if I am not the first to relate it."

The king approached him, and, with a trembling voice and a passionate gesture, said, "Not a syllable, comte."

The poor king forgot that, only an hour before, he had given him a similar recommendation, but with the very opposite intention; namely, that the comte should be indiscreet. It followed, as a matter of course, that he latter recommendation was quite as unnecessary as the former. Half an hour afterwards, everybody in Fontainebleau knew that Mademoiselle de la Vallière had had a conversation under the royal oak with Montalais and Tonnay-Charente, and that in this conversation she had confessed her affection for the king. It was known, also, that the king, after having manifested the uneasiness with which Mademoiselle de la Vallière's health had inspired him, had turned pale, and trembled very much as he received the beautiful girl fainting into his arms; so that it was quite agreed among the courtiers, that the greatest event of the period had just been revealed; that his majesty loved Mademoiselle de la Vallière, and that, consequently, Monsieur could now sleep in perfect tranquillity. It was this, even, that the queen-mother, as surprised as the others by the sudden change, hastened to tell the young queen and Philip d'Orleans. Only she set to work in a different manner, by attacking them in the following way:—To her daughter-in-law she said, "See, now, Therese, how very wrong you were to accuse the king; now it is said he is devoted to some other person; why should there be any greater truth in the report of to-day than in that of yesterday, or in that of yesterday than in that of to-day?" To Monsieur, in relating to him the adventure of the royal oak, she said, "Are you not very absurd in your jealousies, my dear Philip? It is asserted that the king is madly in love with that little La Vallière. Say nothing of it to your wife; for the queen will know all about it very soon." This latter confidential communication had an immediate result. Monsieur, who had regained his composure, went triumphantly to look after his wife, and it was not yet midnight and the fete was to continue until two in the morning, he offered her his hand for a promenade. At the end of a few paces, however, the first thing he did was to disobey his mother's injunctions.

"Do not tell any one, the queen least of all," he said mysteriously, "what people say about the king."

"What do they say about him?" inquired Madame.

"That my brother has suddenly fallen in love."

"With whom?"

"With Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

As it was dark, Madame could smile at her ease.

"Ah!" she said, "and how long is it since this has been the case?"

"For some days, it seems. But that was nothing but nonsense; it is only this evening that he has revealed his passion."

"The king shows his good taste," said Madame, "in my opinion she is a very charming girl."

"I verily believe you are jesting."

"! in what way?"

"In any case this passion will make some one very happy, even if it be only La Vallière herself."

"Really," continued the princess, "you speak as if you had read into the inmost recesses of La Vallière's heart. Who has told you that she agrees to return the king's affection?"

"And who has told you that she will not return it?"

"She loves the Vicomte de Bragelonne."

"You think so?"

"She is even affianced to him."

"She was so."

"What do you mean?"

"When they went to ask the king's permission to arrange the marriage, he refused his permission."

"Refused?"

"Yes, although the request was preferred by the Comte de la Fere himself, for whom the king has the greatest regard, on account of the part he took in your royal brother's restoration, and in other events, also, which happened a long time ago."

"Well! the poor lovers must wait until the king is pleased to change his opinion; they are young, and there is time enough."

"But, dear me," said Philip, laughing, "I perceive you do not know the best part of the affair."

"No!"

"That by which the king was most deeply touched."

"The king, do you say, has been deeply touched?"

"To the very quick of his heart."

"But how?—in what manner?—tell me directly."

"By an adventure, the romance of which cannot be equalled."

"You know how I love to hear of such adventures, and yet you keep me waiting," said the princess, impatiently.

"Well, then—" and Monsieur paused.

"I am listening."

"Under the royal oak—you know where the royal oak is?"

"What can that matter? Under the royal oak, you were saying?"

"Well! Mademoiselle de la Vallière, fancying herself to be alone with her two friends, revealed to them her affection for the king."

"Ah!" said Madame, beginning to be uneasy, "her affection for the king?"

"Yes."

"When was this?"

"About an hour ago."

Madame started, and then said, "And no one knew of this affection?"

"No one."

"Not even his majesty?"

"Not even his majesty. The artful little puss kept her secret strictly to herself, when suddenly it proved stronger than herself, and so escaped her."

"And from whom did you get this absurd tale?"

"Why, as everybody else did, from La Vallière herself, who confessed her love to Montalais and Tonnay-Charente, who were her companions."

Madame stopped suddenly, and by a hasty movement let go her husband's hand.

"Did you say it was an hour ago she made this confession?" Madame inquired.

"About that time."

"Is the king aware of it?"

"Why, that is the very thing which constitutes the perfect romance of the affair, for the king was behind the royal oak with Saint-Aignan, and heard the whole of the interesting conversation without losing a single word of it."

Madame felt struck to the heart, saying incautiously, "But I have seen the king since, and he never told me a word about it."

"Of course," said Monsieur; "he took care not to speak of it to you himself, since he recommended every one not to say a word about it."

"What do you mean?" said Madame, growing angry.

"I mean that they wished to keep you in ignorance of the affair altogether."

"But why should they wish to conceal it from me?"

"From the fear that your friendship for the young queen might induce you to say something about it to her, nothing more."

Madame hung down her head; her feelings were grievously wounded. She could not enjoy a moment's repose until she had met the king. As a king is, most naturally, the very last person in his kingdom who knows what is said about him, in the same way that a lover is the only one who is kept in ignorance of what is said about his mistress, therefore, when the king perceived Madame, who was looking for him, he approached her in some perturbation, but still gracious and attentive in his manner. Madame waited for him to speak about La Vallière first; but as he did not speak of her, she said, "And the poor girl?"

"What poor girl?" said the king.

"La Vallière. Did you not tell me, sire, that she had fainted?"

"She is still very ill," said the king, affecting the greatest indifference.

"But surely that will prejudicially affect the rumor you were going to spread, sire?"

"What rumor?"

"That your attention was taken up by her."

"Oh!" said the king, carelessly, "I trust it will be reported all the same."

Madame still waited; she wished to know if the king would speak to her of the adventure of the royal oak. But the king did not say a word about it. Madame, on her side, did not open her lips about it; so that the king took leave of her without having reposed the slightest confidence in her. Hardly had she watched the king move away, than she set out in search of Saint-Aignan. Saint-Aignan was never very difficult to find; he was like the smaller vessels that always follow in the wake of, and as tenders to, the larger ships. Saint-Aignan was the very man whom Madame needed in her then state of mind. And as for him, he only looked for worthier ears than others he had found to have an opportunity of recounting the event in all its details. And so he did not spare Madame a single word of the whole affair. When he had finished, Madame said to him, "Confess, now, that is his all a charming invention."

"Invention, no; a true story, yes."

"Confess, whether invention or true story, that it was told to you as you have told it to me, but that you were not there."

"Upon my honour, Madame, I was there."

"And you think that these confessions may have made an impression on the king?"

"Certainly, as those of Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente did upon me," replied Saint-Aignan; "do not forget, Madame, that Mademoiselle de la Vallière compared the king to the sun; that was flattering enough."

"The king does not permit himself to be influenced by such flatteries."

"Madame, the king is just as much Adonis as Apollo; and I saw plain enough just now when La Vallière fell into his arms."

"La Vallière fell into the king's arms!"

"Oh! it was the most graceful picture possible; just imagine, La Vallière had fallen back fainting, and—"

"Well! what did you see?—tell me—speak!"

"I saw what ten other people saw at the same time as myself; I saw that when La Vallière fell into his arms, the king almost fainted himself."

Madame smothered a subdued cry, the only indication of her smothered anger.

"Thank you," she said, laughing in a convulsive manner, "you relate stories delightfully, M. de Saint-Aignan." And she hurried away, alone, and almost suffocated by painful emotion, towards the chateau.

XLIV. Courses de Nuit.

Monsieur quitted the princess in the best possible humor, and feeling greatly fatigued, retired to his apartments, leaving every one to finish the night as he chose. When in his room, Monsieur began to dress for the night with careful attention, which displayed itself from time to time in paroxysms of satisfaction. While his attendants were engaged in curling his hair, he sang the principal airs of the ballet which the violins had played, and to which the king had danced. He then summoned his tailors, inspected his costumes for the next day, and, in token of his extreme satisfaction, distributed various presents among them. As, however, the Chevalier de Lorraine, who had seen the prince return to the chateau, entered the room, Monsieur overwhelmed him with kindness. The former, after having saluted the prince, remained silent for a moment, like a sharpshooter who deliberates before deciding in what direction he will renew his fire; then, seeming to make up his mind, he said, "Have you remarked a very singular coincidence, my lord?"

"No; what is it?"

"The bad reception which his majesty, in appearance, gave the Comte de Guiche."

"In appearance?"

"Yes, certainly; since, in reality, he has restored him to favour."

"I did not notice it," said the prince.

"What, did you not remark, that, instead of ordering him to go away again into exile, as was natural, he encouraged him in his opposition by permitting him to resume his place in the ballet?"

"And you think the king was wrong, chevalier?" said the prince.

"Are you not of my opinion, prince?"

"Not altogether so, my dear chevalier; and I think the king was quite right not to have made a disturbance against a poor fellow whose want of judgment is more to be complained of than his intention."

"Really," said the chevalier, "as far as I am concerned, I confess that this magnanimity astonishes me to the highest degree."

"Why so?" inquired Philip.

"Because I should have thought the king had been more jealous," replied the chevalier, spitefully. During the last few minutes Monsieur had felt there was something of an irritating nature concealed under his favourite's remarks; this last word, however, ignited the powder.

"Jealous!" exclaimed the prince. "Jealous! what do you mean? Jealous of what, if you please—or jealous of whom?"

The chevalier perceived that he had allowed an excessively mischievous remark to escape him, as he was in the habit of doing. He endeavored, therefore, apparently to recall it while it was still possible to do so. "Jealous of his authority," he said, with an assumed frankness; "of what else would you have the king jealous?"

"Ah!" said the prince, "that's very proper."

"Did your royal highness," continued the chevalier, "solicit dear De Guiche's pardon?"

"No, indeed," said Monsieur. "De Guiche is an excellent fellow, and full of courage; but as I do not approve of his conduct with Madame, I wish him neither harm nor good."

The chevalier had assumed a bitterness with regard to De Guiche, as he had attempted to do with regard to the king; but he thought he perceived that the time for indulgence, and even for the utmost indifference, had arrived, and that, in order to throw some light on the question, it might be necessary for him to put the lamp, as the saying is, beneath the husband's very nose.

"Very well, very well," said the chevalier to himself, "I must wait for De Wardes; he will do more in one day than I in a month; for I verily believe he is even more envious than I. Then, again, it is not De Wardes I require so much as that some event or another should happen; and in the whole of this affair I see none. That De Guiche returned after he had been sent away is certainly serious enough, but all its seriousness disappears when I learn that De Guiche has returned at the very moment Madame troubles herself no longer about him. Madame, in fact, is occupied with the king, that is clear; but she will not be so much longer if, as it is asserted, the king has ceased to trouble his head about her. The moral of the whole matter is, to remain perfectly neutral, and await the arrival of some new caprice and let that decide the whole affair." And the chevalier thereupon settled himself resignedly in the armchair in which Monsieur permitted him to seat himself in his presence, and, having no more spiteful or malicious remarks to make, the consequence was that De Lorraine's wit seemed to have deserted him. Most fortunately Monsieur was in high good-humor, and he had enough for two, until the time arrived for dismissing his servants and gentlemen of the chamber, and he passed into his sleeping-apartment. As he withdrew, he desired the chevalier to present his compliments to Madame, and say that, as the night was cool, Monsieur, who was afraid of the toothache, would not venture out again into the park during the remainder of the evening. The chevalier entered the princess's apartments at the very moment she came in herself. He acquitted himself faithfully of the commission intrusted to him, and, in the first place, remarked all the indifference and annoyance with which Madame received her husband's communication—a circumstance which appeared to him fraught with something fresh. If Madame had been about to leave her apartments with that strangeness of manner, he would have followed her; but she was returning to them; there was nothing to be done, therefore he turned upon his heel like an unemployed heron, appearing to question earth, air, and water about it; shook his head, and walked away mechanically in the direction of the gardens. He had hardly gone a hundred paces when he met two young men, walking arm in arm, with their heads bent down, and idly kicking the small stones out of their path as they walked on, plunged in thought. It was De Guiche and De Bragelonne, the sight of whom, as it always did, produced upon the chevalier, instinctively, a feeling of repugnance. He did not, however, the less, on that account, salute them with a very low bow, which they returned with interest. Then, observing that the park was nearly deserted, that the illuminations began to burn out, and that the morning breeze was setting in, he turned to the left, and entered the chateau again, by one of the smaller courtyards. The others turned aside to the right, and continued on their way towards the large park. As the chevalier was ascending the side staircase, which led to the private entrance, he saw a woman, followed by another, make her appearance under the arcade which led from the small to the large courtyard. The two women walked so fast that the rustling of their dresses could be distinguished through the silence of the night. The style of their mantles, their graceful figures, a mysterious yet haughty carriage which distinguished them both, especially the one who walked first, struck the chevalier.

"I certainly know those two," he said to himself, pausing upon the top step of the small staircase. Then, as with the instinct of a bloodhound he was about to follow them, one of the servants who had been running after him arrested his attention.

"Monsieur," he said, "the courier has arrived."

"Very well," said the chevalier, "there is time enough; to-morrow will do."

"There are some urgent letters which you would be glad to see, perhaps."

"Where from?" inquired the chevalier.

"One from England, and the other from Calais; the latter arrived by express, and seems of great importance."

"From Calais! Who the deuce can have to write to me from Calais?"

"I think I recognize the handwriting of Monsieur le Comte de Wardes."

"Oh!" cried the chevalier, forgetting his intention of acting the spy, "in that case I will come up at once." This he did, while the two unknown beings disappeared at the end of the court opposite to the one by which they had just entered. We shall now follow them, and leave the chevalier undisturbed to his correspondence. When they had arrived at the grove of trees, the foremost of the two halted, somewhat out of breath, and, cautiously raising her hood, said, "Are we still far from the tree?"

"Yes, Madame, more than five hundred paces; but pray rest awhile, you will not be able to walk much longer at this rate."

"You are right," said the princes, for it was she; and she leaned against a tree. "And now," she resumed, after having recovered her breath, "tell me the whole truth, and conceal nothing from me."

"Oh, Madame," cried the young girl, "you are already angry with me."

"No, my dear Athenais, reassure yourself, I am in no way angry with you. After all, these things do not concern me personally. You are anxious about what you may have said under the oak; you are afraid of having offended the king, and I wish to tranquillize you by ascertaining myself if it were possible you could have been overheard."

"Oh, yes, Madame, the king was close to us."

"Still, you were not speaking so loud that some of your remarks may not have been lost."

"We thought we were quite alone, Madame."

"There were three of you, you say?"

"Yes; La Vallière, Montalais, and myself."

"And you, individually, spoke in a light manner of the king?"

"I am afraid so. Should such be the case, will your highness have the kindness to make my peace with his majesty?"

"If there should be any occasion for it, I promise you I will do so. However, as I have already told you, it will be better not to anticipate evil. The night is now very dark, and the darkness is still greater under the trees. It is not likely you were recognized by the king. To inform him of it, by being the first to speak, is to denounce yourself."

"Oh, Madame, Madame! if Mademoiselle de la Vallière were recognized, I must have been recognized also. Besides, M. de Saint-Aignan left no doubt on the subject."

"Did you, then, say anything very disrespectful of the king?"

"Not at all; it was one of the others who made some very flattering speeches about the king; and my remarks must have been much in contrast with hers."

"Montalais is such a giddy girl," said Madame.

"It was not Montalais. Montalais said nothing; it was La Vallière."

Madame started as if she had not known it perfectly well already. "No, no," she said, "the king cannot have heard. Besides, we will now try the experiment for which we came out. Show me the oak. Do you know where it is?" she continued.

"Alas! Madame, yes."

"And you can find it again?"

"With my eyes shut."

"Very well; sit down on the bank where you were, where La Vallière was, and speak in the same tone and to the same effect as you did before; I will conceal myself in the thicket, and if I can hear you, I will tell you so."

"Yes, Madame."

"If, therefore, you really spoke loud enough for the king to have heard you, in that case—"

Athenais seemed to await the conclusion of the sentence with some anxiety.

"In that case," said Madame, in a suffocated voice, arising doubtless from her hurried progress, "in that case, I forbid you—" And Madame again increased her pace. Suddenly, however, she stopped.

"An idea occurs to me," she said.

"A good idea, no doubt, Madame," replied Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente.

"Montalais must be as much embarrassed as La Vallière and yourself."

"Less so, for she is less compromised, having said less."

"That does not matter; she will help you, I dare say, by deviating a little from the exact truth."

"Especially if she knows that your highness is kind enough to interest yourself about me."

"Very well, I think I have discovered what it is best for you all to pretend."

"How delightful."

"You had better say that all three of you were perfectly well aware that the king was behind the tree, or behind the thicket, whichever it might have been; and that you knew M. de Saint-Aignan was there too."

"Yes, Madame."

"For you cannot disguise it from yourself, Athenais, Saint-Aignan takes advantage of some very flattering remarks you made about him."

"Well, Madame, you see very clearly that one can be overheard," cried Athenais, "since M. de Saint-Aignan overheard us."

Madame bit her lips, for she had thoughtlessly committed herself. "Oh, you know Saint-Aignan's character very well," she said, "the favour the king shows him almost turns his brain, and he talks at random; not only so, he very often invents. That is not the question; the fact remains, did or did not the king overhear?"

"Oh, yes, Madame, he certainly did," said Athenais, in despair.

"In that case, do what I said: maintain boldly that all three of you knew—mind, all three of you, for if there is a doubt about any one of you, there will be a doubt about all,—persist, I say, that you knew that the king and M. de Saint-Aignan were there, and that you wished to amuse yourself at the expense of those who were listening."

"Oh, Madame, at the king's expense; we shall never dare say that!"

"It is a simple jest; an innocent deception readily permitted in young girls whom men wish to take by surprise. In this manner everything explains itself. What Montalais said of Malicorne, a mere jest; what you said of M. de Saint-Aignan, a mere jest too; and what La Vallière might have said of—"

"And which she would have given anything to recall."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Perfectly."

"Very well, an additional reason. Say the whole affair was a mere joke. M. de Malicorne will have no occasion to get out of temper; M. de Saint-Aignan will be completely put out of countenance; he will be laughed at instead of you; and lastly, the king will be punished for a curiosity unworthy of his rank. Let people laugh a little at the king in this affair, and I do not think he will complain of it."

"Oh, Madame, you are indeed an angel of goodness and sense!"

"It is to my own advantage."

"In what way?"

"How can you ask me why it is to my advantage to spare my maids of honour the remarks, annoyances, perhaps even calumnies, that might follow? Alas! you well know that the court has no indulgence for this sort of peccadillo. But we have now been walking for some time, shall we be long before we reach it?"

"About fifty or sixty paces further; turn to the left, Madame, if you please."

"And you are sure of Montalais?" said Madame.

"Oh, certainly."

"Will she do what you ask her?"

"Everything. She will be delighted."

"And La Vallière—" ventured the princess.

"Ah, there will be some difficulty with her, Madame; she would scorn to tell a falsehood."

"Yet, when it is in her interest to do so—"

"I am afraid that that would not make the slightest difference in her ideas."

"Yes, yes," said Madame. "I have been already told that; she is one of those overnice and affectedly particular people who place heaven in the foreground in order to conceal themselves behind it. But if she refuses to tell a falsehood,—as she will expose herself to the jests of the whole court, as she will have annoyed the king by a confession as ridiculous as it was immodest,—Mademoiselle la Baume le Blanc de la Vallière will think it but proper I should send her back again to her pigeons in the country, in order that, in Touraine yonder, or in Le Blaisois,—I know not where it may be,—she may at her ease study sentiment and pastoral life combined."

These words were uttered with a vehemence and harshness that terrified Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente; and the consequence was, that, as far as she was concerned, she promised to tell as many falsehoods as might be necessary. It was in this frame of mind that Madame and her companion reached the precincts of the royal oak.

"Here we are," said Tonnay-Charente.

"We shall soon learn if one can overhear," replied Madame.

"Hush!" whispered the young girl, holding Madame back with a hurried gesture, entirely forgetful of her companion's rank. Madame stopped.

"You see that you can hear," said Athenais.

"How?"

"Listen."

Madame held her breath; and, in fact, the following words pronounced by a gentle and melancholy voice, floated towards them:

"I tell you, vicomte, I tell you I love her madly; I tell you I love her to distraction."

Madame started at the voice; and, beneath her hood, a bright joyous smile illumined her features. It was she who now held back her companion, and with a light step leading her some twenty paces away, that is to say, out of the reach of the voice, she said, "Remain here, my dear Athenais, and let no one surprise us. I think it must be you they are conversing about."

"Me, Madame?"

"Yes, yes,—or rather your adventure. I will go and listen; if we were both there, we should be discovered. Or, stay!—go and fetch Montalais, and then return and wait for me with her at the entrance of the forest." And then, as Athenais hesitated, she again said "Go!" in a voice which did not admit of reply. Athenais thereupon arranged her dress so as to prevent its rustling being heard; and, by a path beyond the group of trees, she regained the flower-garden. As for Madame, she concealed herself in the thicket, leaning her back against a gigantic chestnut-tree, one of the branches of which had been cut in such a manner as to form a seat, and waited there, full of anxiety and apprehension. “Now,” she said, “since one can hear from this place, let us listen to what M. de Bragelonne and that other madly-in-love fool, the Comte de Guiche, have to say about me.”

XLV. In Which Madame Acquires a Proof that Listeners Hear What Is Said.

There was a moment’s silence, as if the mysterious sounds of night were hushed to listen, at the same time as Madame, to the youthful passionate disclosures of De Guiche. Raoul was about to speak. He leaned indolently against the trunk of the large oak, and replied in his sweet and musical voice, “Alas, my dear De Guiche, it is a great misfortune.”

“Yes,” cried the latter, “great indeed.”

“You do not understand me, De Guiche. I say that it is a great misfortune for you, not merely loving, but not knowing how to conceal your love.”

“What do you mean?” said De Guiche.

“Yes, you do not perceive one thing; namely, that it is no longer to the only friend you have,—in other words,—to a man who would rather die than betray you; you do not perceive, I say, that it is no longer to your only friend that you confide your passion, but to the first person that approaches you.”

“Are you mad, Bragelonne,” exclaimed De Guiche, “to say such a thing to me?”

“The fact stands thus, however.”

“Impossible! How, in what manner can I have ever been indiscreet to such an extent?”

“I mean, that your eyes, your looks, your sighs, proclaim, in spite of yourself, that exaggerated feeling which leads and hurries a man beyond his own control. In such a case he ceases to be master of himself; he is a prey to a mad passion, that makes him confide his grief to the trees, or to the air, from the very moment he has no longer any living being in reach of his voice. Besides, remember this: it very rarely happens that there is not always some one present to hear, especially the very things which ought not to be heard.” De Guiche uttered a deep sigh. “Nay,” continued Bragelonne, “you distress me; since your return here, you have a thousand times, and in a thousand different ways, confessed your love for her; and yet, had you not said one word, your return alone would have been a terrible indiscretion. I persist, then, in drawing this conclusion; that if you do not place a better watch over yourself than you have hitherto done, one day or other something will happen that will cause an explosion. Who will save you then? Answer me. Who will save her? for, innocent as she will be of your affection, your affection will be an accusation against her in the hands of her enemies.”

“Alas!” murmured De Guiche; and a deep sigh accompanied the exclamation.

“That is not answering me, De Guiche.”

“Yes, yes.”

“Well, what reply have you to make?”

“This, that when the day arrives I shall be no more a living being than I feel myself now.”

“I do not understand you.”

“So many vicissitudes have worn me out. At present, I am no more a thinking, acting being; at present, the most worthless of men is better than I am; my remaining strength is exhausted, my latest-formed resolutions have vanished, and I abandon myself to my fate. When a man is out campaigning, as we have been together, and he sets off alone and unaccompanied for a skirmish, it sometimes happens that he may meet with a party of five or six foragers, and although alone, he defends himself; afterwards, five or six others arrive unexpectedly, his anger is aroused and he persists; but if six, eight, or ten others should still be met with, he either sets spurs to his horse, if he should still happen to retain one, or lets himself be slain to save an ignominious flight. Such, indeed, is my own case: first, I had to struggle against myself; afterwards, against Buckingham; now, since the king is in the field, I will not contend against the king, nor even, I wish you to understand, will the king retire; nor even against the nature of that woman. Still I do not deceive myself; having devoted myself to the service of such a love, I will lose my life in it.”

“It is not the lady you ought to reproach,” replied Raoul; “it is yourself.”

“Why so?”

“You know the princess’s character,—somewhat giddy, easily captivated by novelty, susceptible to flattery, whether it come from a blind person or a child, and yet you allow your passion for her to eat your very life away. Look at her,—love her, if you will,—for no one whose heart is not engaged elsewhere can see her without loving her. Yet, while you love her, respect, in the first place, her husband’s rank, then herself, and lastly, your own safety.”

“Thanks, Raoul.”

“What for?”

“Because, seeing how much I suffer through this woman, you endeavor to console me, because you tell me all the good of her you think, and perhaps even that which you do not think.”

“Oh,” said Raoul, “there you are wrong, comte; what I think I do not always say, but in that case I say nothing; but when I speak, I know not how to feign or to deceive; and whoever listens to me may believe me.”

During this conversation, Madame, her head stretched forward with eager ear and dilated glance, endeavoring to penetrate the obscurity, thirstily drank in the faintest sound of their voices.

“Oh, I know her better than you do, then!” exclaimed Guiche. “She is not merely giddy, but frivolous; she is not only attracted by novelty, she is utterly oblivious, and is without faith; she is not simply susceptible to flattery, she is a practiced and cruel coquette. A thorough coquette! yes, yes, I am sure of it. Believe me, Bragelonne, I am suffering all the torments of hell; brave, passionately fond of danger, I meet a danger greater than my strength and my courage. But, believe me, Raoul, I reserve for myself a victory which shall cost her floods of tears.”

“A victory,” he asked, “and of what kind?”

“Of what kind, you ask?”

“Yes.”

“One day I will accost her, and will address her thus: ‘I was young— madly in love, I possessed, however, sufficient respect to throw myself at your feet, and to prostrate myself in the dust, if your looks had not raised me to your hand. I fancied I understood your looks, I rose, and then, without having done anything more towards you than love you yet more devotedly, if that were possible—you, a woman without heart, faith, or love, in very wantonness, dashed me down again from sheer caprice. You are unworthy, princess of the royal blood though you may be, of the love of a man of honour; I offer my life as a sacrifice for having loved you too tenderly, and I die despairing you.’”

“Oh!” cried Raoul, terrified at the accents of profound truth which De Guiche’s words betrayed, “I was right in saying you were mad, Guiche.”

“Yes, yes,” exclaimed De Guiche, following out his own idea; “since there are no wars here now, I will flee yonder to the north, seek service in the Empire, where some Hungarian, or Croat, or Turk, will perhaps kindly put me out of my misery.” De Guiche did not finish, or rather as he finished, a sound made him start, and at the same moment caused Raoul to leap to his feet. As for De Guiche, buried in his own thoughts, he remained seated, with his head tightly pressed between his hands. The branches of the tree were pushed aside, and a woman, pale and much agitated, appeared before the two young men. With one hand she held back the branches, which would have struck her face, and, with the other, she raised the hood of the mantle which covered her shoulders. By her clear and lustrous glance, by her lofty carriage, by her haughty attitude, and, more than all that, by the throbbing of his own heart, De Guiche recognized Madame, and, uttering a loud cry, he removed his hands from his temple, and covered his eyes with them. Raoul, trembling and out of countenance, merely muttered a few words of respect.

“Monsieur de Bragelonne,” said the princess, “have the goodness, I beg, to see if my attendants are not somewhere yonder, either in the walks or in the groves; and you, M. de Guiche, remain here: I am tired, and you will perhaps give me your arm.”

Had a thunderbolt fallen at the feet of the unhappy young man, he would have been less terrified than by her cold and severe tone. However, as he himself had just said, he was brave; and as in the depths of his own heart he had just decisively made up his mind, De Guiche arose, and, observing Bragelonne’s hesitation, he turned towards him a glance full of resignation and grateful acknowledgement. Instead of immediately answering Madame, he even advanced a step towards the vicomte, and holding out the arm which the princess had just desired him to give her, he pressed his friend’s hand in his own, with a sigh, in which he seemed to give to friendship all the life that was left in the depths of his heart. Madame, who in her pride had never known what it was to wait, now waited until this mute colloquy was at an end. Her royal hand remained suspended in the air, and, when Raoul had left, it sank without anger, but not without emotion, in that of De Guiche. They were alone in the depths of the dark and silent forest, and nothing could be heard but Raoul’s hastily retreating footsteps along the obscure paths. Over their heads was extended the thick and fragrant vault of branches, through the occasional openings of which the stars could be seen glittering in their beauty. Madame softly drew De Guiche about a hundred paces away from that indiscreet tree which had heard, and had allowed so many things to be heard, during the evening, and, leading him to a neighboring glade, so that they could see a certain distance around them, she said in a trembling voice, “I have brought you here, because yonder where you were, everything can be overheard.”

“Everything can be overheard, did you say, Madame?” replied the young man, mechanically.

“Yes.”

“Which means—” murmured De Guiche.

“Which means that I have heard every syllable you have said.”

“Oh, Heaven! this only was wanting to destroy me,” stammered De Guiche; and he bent down his head, like an exhausted swimmer beneath the wave which engulfs him.

“And so,” she said, “you judge me as you have said?” De Guiche grew pale, turned his head aside, and was silent. He felt almost on the point of fainting.

“I do not complain,” continued the princess, in a tone of voice full of gentleness; “I prefer a frankness that wounds me, to flattery, which would deceive me. And so, according to your opinion, M. de Guiche, I am a coquette, an a worthless creature.”

“Worthless,” cried the young man; “you worthless! Oh, no; most certainly I did not say, I could not have said, that that which was the most precious object in life for me could be worthless. No, no; I did not say that.”

“A woman who sees a man perish, consumed by the fire she has kindled, and who does not allay that fire, is, in my opinion, a worthless woman.”

“What can it matter to you what I said?” returned the comte. “What am I compared to you, and why should you even trouble yourself to know whether I exist or not?”

“Monsieur de Guiche, both you and I are human beings, and, knowing you as I do, I do not wish you to risk your life; with you I will change my conduct and character. I will be, not frank, for I am always so, but truthful. I implore you, therefore, to love me no more, and to forget utterly that I have ever addressed a word or a glance towards you.”

De Guiche turned around, bending a look full of passionate devotion upon her. “You,” he said; “you excuse yourself, you implore me?”

“Certainly; since I have done evil, I ought to repair the evil I have done. And so, comte, this is what we will agree to. You will forgive my frivolity and my coquetry. Nay, do not interrupt me. I will forgive you for having said I was frivolous and a coquette, or something worse, perhaps; and you will renounce your idea of dying, and will preserve for your family, for the king, and for our sex, a cavalier whom every one esteems, and whom many hold dear.” Madame pronounced this last word in such an accent of frankness, and even of tenderness, that poor De Guiche’s heart felt almost bursting.

“Oh! Madame, Madame!” he stammered out.

“Nay, listen further,” she continued. “When you shall have renounced all thought of me forever, from necessity in the first place, and, next, because you will yield to my entreaty, then you will judge me more favourably, and I am convinced you will replace this love—forgive the frivolity of the expression—by a sincere friendship, which you will be ready to offer me, and which, I promise you, shall be cordially accepted.”

De Guiche, his forehead bedewed with perspiration, a feeling of death in his heart, and a trembling agitation through his whole frame, bit his lip, stamped his foot on the ground, and, in a word, devoured the bitterness of his grief. “Madame,” he said, “what you offer is impossible, and I cannot accept such conditions.”

“What!” said Madame, “do you refuse my friendship, then?”

“No, no! I do not need your friendship, Madame. I prefer to die from love, than to live for friendship.”

“Comte!”

“Oh! Madame,” cried De Guiche, “the present is a moment for me, in which no other consideration and no other respect exist, than the consideration and respect of a man of honour towards the woman he worships. Drive me away, curse me, denounce me, you will be perfectly right. I have uttered complaints against you, but their bitterness has been owing to my passion for you; I have said I wish to die, and die I will. If I lived, you would forget me; but dead, you would never forget me, I am sure.”

Henrietta, who was standing buried in thought, and nearly as agitated as De Guiche himself, turned aside her head as but a minute before he had turned aside his. Then, after a moment’s pause, she said, “And you love me, then, very much?”

“Madly; madly enough to die from it, whether you drive me from you, or whether you listen to me still.”

"It is a hopeless case," she said, in a playful manner; "a case which must be treated with soothing application. Give me your hand. It is as cold as ice." De Guiche knelt down, and pressed to his lips, not one, but both of Madame's hands.

"Love me, then," said the princess, "since it cannot be otherwise." And almost imperceptibly she pressed his fingers, raising him thus, partly in the manner of a queen, and partly as a fond and affectionate woman would have done. De Guiche trembled from head to foot, and Madame, who felt how passion coursed through every fiber of his being, knew that he indeed loved truly. "Give me your arm, comte," she said, "and let us return."

"Ah! Madame," said the comte, trembling and bewildered; "you have discovered a third way of killing me."

"But, happily, it is the slowest way, is it not?" she replied, as she led him towards the grove of trees they had so lately quitted.

XLVI. Aramis's Correspondence.

When De Guiche's affairs, which had been suddenly set to right without his having been able to guess the cause of their improvement, assumed the unexpected aspect we have seen, Raoul, in obedience to the request of the princess, had withdrawn in order not to interrupt an explanation, the results of which he was far from guessing; and he soon after joined the ladies of honour who were walking about in the flower-gardens. During this time, the Chevalier de Lorraine, who had returned to his own room, read De Wardes's latter with surprise, for it informed him by the hand of his valet, of the sword-thrust received at Calais, and of all the details of the adventure, and invited him to inform De Guiche and Monsieur, whatever there might be in the affair likely to be most disagreeable to both of them. De Wardes particularly endeavored to prove to the chevalier the violence of Madame's affection for Buckingham, and he finished his letter by declaring that he thought this feeling was returned. The chevalier shrugged his shoulders at the last paragraph, and, in fact, De Wardes was out of date, as we have seen. De Wardes was still only at Buckingham's affair. The chevalier threw the letter over his shoulder upon an adjoining table, and said in a disdainful tone, "It is really incredible; and yet poor De Wardes is not deficient in ability; but the truth is, it is not very apparent, so easy is it to grow rusty in the country. The deuce take the simpleton, who ought to have written to me about matters of importance, and yet he writes such silly stuff as that. If it had not been for that miserable letter, which has no meaning at all in it, I should have detected in the grove yonder a charming little intrigue, which would have compromised a woman, would have perhaps have been as good as a sword-thrust for a man, and have diverted Monsieur for many days to come."

He looked at his watch. "It is now too late," he said. "One o'clock in the morning; every one must have returned to the king's apartments, where the night is to be finished; well, the scent is lost, and unless some extraordinary chance—" And thus saying, as if to appeal to his good star, the chevalier, greatly out of temper, approached the window, which looked out upon a somewhat solitary part of the garden. Immediately, and as if some evil genius was at his orders, he perceived returning towards the chateau, accompanied by a man, a silk mantle of a dark colour, and recognized the figure which had struck his attention half an hour previously.

"Admirable!" he thought, striking his hands together, "this is my providential mysterious affair." And he started out precipitately, along the staircase, hoping to reach the courtyard in time to recognize the woman in the mantle, and her companion. But as he arrived at the door of the little court, he nearly knocked against Madame, whose radiant face seemed full of charming revelations beneath the mantle which protected without concealing her. Unfortunately, Madame was alone. The chevalier knew that since he had seen her, not five minutes before, with a gentleman, the gentleman in question could not be far off. Consequently, he hardly took time to salute the princess as he drew up to allow her to pass; then when she had advanced a few steps, with the rapidity of a woman who fears recognition, and when the chevalier perceived that she was too much occupied with her own thoughts to trouble herself about him, he darted into the garden, looked hastily round on every side, and embraced within his glance as much of the horizon as he possibly could. He was just in time; the gentleman who had accompanied Madame was still in sight; only he was hurrying towards one of the wings of the chateau, behind which he was on the point of disappearing. There was not an instant to lose; the chevalier darted in pursuit of him, prepared to slacken his pace as he approached the unknown; but in spite of the diligence he used, the unknown had disappeared behind the flight of steps before he approached.

It was evident, however, that as the man pursued was walking quietly, in a pensive manner, with his head bent down, either beneath the weight of grief or happiness, when once the angle was passed, unless, indeed, he were to enter by some door or another, the chevalier could not fail to overtake him. And this, certainly, would have happened, if, at the very moment he turned the angle, the chevalier had not run against two persons, who were themselves wheeling in the opposite direction. The chevalier was ready to seek a quarrel with these two troublesome intruders, when, looking up, he recognized the superintendent. Fouquet was accompanied by a person whom the chevalier now saw for the first time. This stranger was the bishop of Vannes. Checked by the important character of the individual, and obliged out of politeness to make his own excuses when he expected to receive them, the chevalier stepped back a few paces; and as Monsieur Fouquet possessed, if not the friendship, at least the respect of every one; as the king himself, although he was rather his enemy than his friend, treated M. Fouquet as a man of great consideration, the chevalier did what the king himself would have done, namely, he bowed to M. Fouquet, who returned his salutation with kindly politeness, perceiving that the gentleman had run against him by mistake and without any intention of being rude. Then, almost immediately afterwards, having recognized the Chevalier de Lorraine, he made a few civil remarks, to which the chevalier was obliged to reply. Brief as the conversation was, De Lorraine saw, with the most unfeigned displeasure, the figure of his unknown becoming dimmer in the distance, and fast disappearing in the darkness. The chevalier resigned himself, and, once resigned, gave his entire attention to Fouquet:—"You arrive late, monsieur," he said. "Your absence has occasioned great surprise, and I heard Monsieur express himself as much astonished that, having been invited by the king, you had not come."

"It was impossible for me to do so; but I came as soon as I was free."

"Is Paris quiet?"

"Perfectly so. Paris has received the last tax very well."

"Ah! I understand you wished to assure yourself of this good feeling before you came to participate in our fetes."

"I have arrived, however, somewhat late to enjoy them. I will ask you, therefore, to inform me if the king is in the chateau or not, if I am likely to be able to see him this evening, or if I shall have to wait until to-morrow."

"We have lost sight of his majesty during the last half-hour nearly," said the chevalier.

"Perhaps he is in Madame's apartments?" inquired Fouquet.

"Not in Madame's apartments, I should think, for I just now met Madame as she was entering by the small staircase; and unless the gentleman whom you a moment ago encountered was the king himself—" and the chevalier paused, hoping that, in this manner, he might learn who it was he had been hurrying after. But Fouquet, whether he had or had not recognized De Guiche, simply replied,

"No, monsieur, it was not the king."

The chevalier, disappointed in his expectation, saluted them; but as he did so, casting a parting glance around him, and perceiving M. Colbert in the center of a group, he said to the superintendent: "Stay, monsieur; there is some one under the trees yonder, who will be able to inform you better than myself."

"Who?" asked Fouquet, whose near-sightedness prevented him from seeing through the darkness.

"M. Colbert," returned the chevalier.

"Indeed! That person, then, who is speaking yonder to those men with torches in their hands, is M. Colbert?"

"M. Colbert himself. He is giving orders personally to the workmen who are arranging the lamps for the illuminations."

"Thank you," said Fouquet, with an inclination of the head, which indicated that he had obtained all the information he wished. The chevalier, on his side, having, on the contrary, learned nothing at all, withdrew with a profound salutation.

He had scarcely left when Fouquet, knitting his brows, fell into a deep reverie. Aramis looked at him for a moment with a mingled feeling of compassion and silence.

"What!" he said to him, "the fellow's name alone seemed to affect you. Is it possible that, full of triumph and delight as you were just now, the sight merely of that man is capable of dispiriting you? Tell me, have you faith in your good star?"

"No," replied Fouquet, dejectedly.

"Why not?"

"Because I am too full of happiness at this present moment," he replied, in a trembling voice. "You, my dear D'Herblay, who are so learned, will remember the history of a certain tyrant of Samos. What can I throw into the sea to avert approaching evil? Yes! I repeat it once more, I am too full of happiness! so happy that I wish for nothing beyond what I have... I have risen so high... You know my motto: Quo non ascendam? I have risen so high that nothing is left me but to descend from my elevation. I cannot believe in the progress of a success already more than human."

Aramis smiled as he fixed his kind and penetrating glance upon him. "If I were aware of the cause of your happiness," he said, "I should probably fear for your grace; but you regard me in the light of a true friend; I mean, you turn to me in misfortune, nothing more. Even that is an immense and precious boon, I know; but the truth is, I have a just right to beg you to confide in me, from time to time, any fortunate circumstances that befall you, in which I should rejoice, you know, more than if they had befallen myself."

"My dear prelate," said Fouquet, laughing, "my secrets are of too profane a character to confide them to a bishop, however great a worldling he may be."

"Bah! in confession."

"Oh! I should blush too much if you were my confessor." And Fouquet began to sigh. Aramis again looked at him without further betrayal of his thoughts than a placid smile.

"Well," he said, "discretion is a great virtue."

"Silence," said Fouquet; "yonder venomous reptile has recognized us, and is crawling this way."

"Colbert?"

"Yes; leave me, D'Herblay; I do not wish that fellow to see you with me, or he will take an aversion to you."

Aramis pressed his hand, saying, "What need have I of his friendship, while you are here?"

"Yes, but I may not always be here," replied Fouquet, dejectedly.

"On that day, then, if that day should ever dawn," said Aramis, tranquilly, "we will think over a means of dispensing with the friendship, or of braving the dislike of M. Colbert. But tell me, my dear Fouquet, instead of conversing with this reptile, as you did him the honour of styling him, a conversation the need for which I do not perceive, why do you not pay a visit, if not to the king, at least to Madame?"

"To Madame," said the superintendent, his mind occupied by his souvenirs. "Yes, certainly, to Madame."

"You remember," continued Aramis, "that we have been told that Madame stands high in favour during the last two or three days. It enters into your policy, and forms part of our plans, that you should assiduously devote yourself to his majesty's friends. It is a means of counteracting the growing influence of M. Colbert. Present yourself, therefore, as soon as possible to Madame, and, for our sakes, treat this ally with consideration."

"But," said Fouquet, "are you quite sure that it is upon her that the king has his eyes fixed at the present moment?"

"If the needle has turned, it must be since the morning. You know I have my police."

"Very well! I will go there at once, and, at all events, I shall have a means of introduction in the shape of a magnificent pair of antique cameos set with diamonds."

"I have seen them, and nothing could be more costly and regal."

At this moment they were interrupted by a servant followed by a courier. "For you, my lord," said the courier aloud, presenting a letter to Fouquet.

"For your grace," said the lackey in a low tone, handing Aramis a letter. And as the lackey carried a torch in his hand, he placed himself between the superintendent and the bishop of Vannes, so that both of them could read at the same time. As Fouquet looked at the fine and delicate writing on the envelope, he started with delight. Those who love, or who are beloved, will understand his anxiety in the first place, and his happiness in the next. He hastily tore open the letter, which, however, contained only these words: "It is but an hour since I quitted you, it is an age since I told you how much I love you." And that was all. Madame de Belliere had, in fact, left Fouquet about an hour previously, after having passed two days with him; and apprehensive lest his remembrance of her might be effaced for too long a period from the heart she regretted, she dispatched a courier to him as the bearer of this important communication. Fouquet kissed the letter, and rewarded the bearer with a handful of gold. As for Aramis, he, on his side, was engaged in reading, but with more coolness and reflection, the following letter:

"The king has this evening been struck with a strange fancy; a woman loves him. He learned it accidentally, as he was listening to the conversation of this young girl with her companions; and his majesty has entirely abandoned himself to his new caprice. The girl's name is Mademoiselle de la Vallière, and she is sufficiently pretty to warrant this caprice becoming a strong attachment. Beware of Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

There was not a word about Madame. Aramis slowly folded the letter and put it in his pocket. Fouquet was still delightedly inhaling the perfume of his epistle.

"My lord," said Aramis, touching Fouquet's arm.

"Yes, what is it?" he asked.

“An idea has just occurred to me. Are you acquainted with a young girl of the name of La Vallière?”

“Not at all.”

“Reflect a little.”

“Ah! yes, I believe so; one of Madame’s maids of honour.”

“That must be the one.”

“Well, what then?”

“Well, my lord, it is to that young girl that you must pay your visit this evening.”

“Bah! why so?”

“Nay, more than that, it is to her you must present your cameos.”

“Nonsense.”

“You know, my lord, that my advice is not to be regarded lightly.”

“But this is unforeseen—”

“That is my affair. Pay your court in due form, and without loss of time, to Mademoiselle de la Vallière. I will be your guarantee with Madame de Belliere that your devotion is altogether politic.”

“What do you mean, my dear D’Herblay, and whose name have you just pronounced?”

“A name which ought to convince you that, as I am so well informed about yourself, I may possibly be just as well informed about others. Pay your court, therefore, to La Vallière.”

“I will pay my court to whomsoever you like,” replied Fouquet, his heart filled with happiness.

“Come, come, descend again to the earth, traveler in the seventh heaven,” said Aramis; “M. Colbert is approaching. He has been recruiting while we were reading; see, how he is surrounded, praised, congratulated; he is decidedly becoming powerful.” In fact, Colbert was advancing, escorted by all the courtiers who remained in the gardens, every one of whom complimented him upon the arrangements of the fete: all of which so puffed him up that he could hardly contain himself.

“If La Fontaine were here,” said Fouquet, smiling, “what an admirable opportunity for him to recite his fable of ‘The Frog that wanted to make itself as big as the Ox.’”

Colbert arrived in the center of the circle blazing with light; Fouquet awaited his approach, unmoved and with a slightly mocking smile. Colbert smiled too; he had been observing his enemy during the last quarter of an hour, and had been approaching him gradually. Colbert’s smile was a presage of hostility.

“Oh, oh!” said Aramis, in a low tone of voice to the superintendent; “the scoundrel is going to ask you again for more millions to pay for his fireworks and his coloured lamps.” Colbert was the first to salute them, and with an air which he endeavored to render respectful. Fouquet hardly moved his head.

“Well, my lord, what do your eyes say? Have we shown our good taste?”

“Perfect taste,” replied Fouquet, without permitting the slightest tone of raillery to be remarked in his words.

“Oh!” said Colbert, maliciously, “you are treating us with indulgence. We are poor, we servants of the king, and Fontainebleau is no way to be compared as a residence with Vaux.”

“Quite true,” replied Fouquet coolly.

“But what can we do, my lord?” continued Colbert, “we have done our best on slender resources.”

Fouquet made a gesture of assent.

“But,” pursued Colbert, “it would be only a proper display of your magnificence, my lord, if you were to offer to his majesty a fete in your wonderful gardens—in those gardens which have cost you sixty millions of francs.”

“Seventy-two,” said Fouquet.

“An additional reason,” returned Colbert; “it would, indeed, be truly magnificent.”

“But do you suppose, monsieur, that his majesty would deign to accept my invitation?”

“I have no doubt whatever of it,” cried Colbert, hastily; “I will guarantee that he does.”

“You are exceedingly kind,” said Fouquet. “I may depend on it, then?”

“Yes, my lord; yes, certainly.”

“Then I will consider the matter,” yawned Fouquet.

“Accept, accept,” whispered Aramis, eagerly.

“You will consider?” repeated Colbert.

“Yes,” replied Fouquet; “in order to know what day I shall submit my invitation to the king.”

“This very evening, my lord, this very evening.”

“Agreed,” said the superintendent. “Gentlemen, I should wish to issue my invitations; but you know that wherever the king goes, the king is in his own palace; it is by his majesty, therefore, that you must be invited.” A murmur of delight immediately arose. Fouquet bowed and left.

“Proud and dauntless man,” thought Colbert, “you accept, and yet you know it will cost you ten millions.”

“You have ruined me,” whispered Fouquet, in a low tone, to Aramis.

“I have saved you,” replied the latter, whilst Fouquet ascended the flight of steps and inquired whether the king was still visible.

XLVII. The Orderly Clerk.

The king, anxious to be again quite alone, in order to reflect well upon what was passing in his heart, had withdrawn to his own apartments, where M. de Saint-Aignan had, after his conversation with Madame, gone to meet him. This conversation has already been related. The favourite, vain of his twofold importance, and feeling that he had become, during the last two hours, the confidant of the king, began to treat the affairs of the court in a somewhat indifferent manner: and, from the position in which he had placed himself, or rather, where chance had placed him, he saw nothing but love and garlands of flowers around him. The king’s love for Madame, that of Madame for the king, that of Guiche for Madame, that of La Vallière for the king, that of Malicorne for Montalais, that of Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente for himself, was not all this, truly, more than enough to turn the head of any courtier? Besides, Saint-Aignan was the model of courtiers, past, present, and to come; and, moreover, showed himself such an excellent narrator, and so discerningly appreciative that the king listened to him with an appearance of great interest, particularly when he described the excited manner with which Madame had sought for him to converse about the affair of Mademoiselle de la Vallière. While the king no longer experienced for Madame any remains of the passion he had once felt for her, there was, in this same eagerness of Madame to procure information about him, great gratification for his vanity, from which he could not free himself. He experienced this pleasure then, but nothing more, and his heart was not, for a single moment, alarmed at what Madame might, or might not, think of his adventure. When, however, Saint-Aignan had finished, the king, while preparing to retire to rest, asked, “Now, Saint-Aignan, you know what Mademoiselle de la Vallière is, do you not?”

“Not only what she is, but what she will be.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean that she is everything that woman can wish to be—that is to say, beloved by your majesty; I mean, that she will be everything your majesty may wish her to be.”

“That is not what I am asking. I do not wish to know what she is to-day, or what she will be to-morrow; as you have remarked, that is my affair. But tell me what others say of her.”

“They say she is well conducted.”

“Oh!” said the king, smiling, “that is mere report.”

“But rare enough, at court, sire, to believe when it is spread.”

“Perhaps you are right. Is she well born?”

“Excellently; the daughter of the Marquis de la Vallière, and step-daughter of that good M. de Saint-Remy.”

“Ah, yes! my aunt’s major-domo; I remember; and I remember now that I saw her as I passed through Blois. She was presented to the queens. I have even to reproach myself that I did not on that occasion pay her the attention she deserved.”

“Oh, sire! I trust that your majesty will now repair time lost.”

“And the report—you tell me—is, that Mademoiselle de la Vallière never had a lover.”

“In any case, I do not think your majesty would be much alarmed at the rivalry.”

“Yet, stay,” said the king, in a very serious tone of voice.

“Your majesty?”

“I remember.”

“Ah!”

“If she has no lover, she has, at least, a betrothed.”

“A betrothed!”

“What! Count, do you not know that?”

“No.”

“You, the man who knows all the news?”

“Your majesty will excuse me. You know this betrothed, then?”

“Assuredly! his father came to ask me to sign the marriage contract: it is—” The king was about to pronounce the Vicomte de Bragelonne’s name, when he stopped, and knitted his brows.

“It is—” repeated Saint-Aignan, inquiringly.

“I don’t remember now,” replied Louis XIV., endeavoring to conceal an annoyance he had some trouble to disguise.

“Can I put your majesty in the way?” inquired the Comte de Saint-Aignan.

“No; for I no longer remember to whom I intended to refer; indeed, I only remember very indistinctly, that one of the maids of honour was to marry—the name, however, has escaped me.”

“Was it Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente he was going to marry?” inquired Saint-Aignan.

“Very likely,” said the king.

“In that case, the intended was M. de Montespan; but Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente did not speak of it, it seemed to me, in such a manner as would frighten suitors away.”

“At all events,” said the king, “I know nothing, or almost nothing, about Mademoiselle de la Vallière. Saint-Aignan, I rely upon you to procure me every information about her.”

“Yes, sire, and when shall I have the honour of seeing your majesty again, to give you the latest news?”

“Whenever you have procured it.”

“I shall obtain it speedily, then, if the information can be as quickly obtained as my wish to see your majesty again.”

“Well said, count! By the by, has Madame displayed any ill-feeling against this poor girl?”

“None, sire.”

“Madame did not get angry, then?”

“I do not know; I only know that she laughed continually.”

“That’s well; but I think I hear voices in the ante-rooms—no doubt a courier has just arrived. Inquire, Saint-Aignan.” The count ran to the door and exchanged a few words with the usher; he returned to the king, saying, “Sire, it is M. Fouquet who has this moment arrived, by your majesty’s orders, he says. He presented himself, but, because of the lateness of the hour, he does not press for an audience this evening, and is satisfied to have his presence here formally announced.”

"M. Fouquet! I wrote to him at three o'clock, inviting him to be at Fontainebleau the following day, and he arrives at Fontainebleau at two o'clock in the morning! This is, indeed, zeal!" exclaimed the king, delighted to see himself so promptly obeyed. "On the contrary, M. Fouquet shall have his audience. I summoned him, and will receive him. Let him be introduced. As for you, count, pursue your inquiries, and be here to-morrow."

The king placed his finger on his lips; and Saint-Aignan, his heart brimful of happiness, hastily withdrew, telling the usher to introduce M. Fouquet, who, thereupon, entered the king's apartment. Louis rose to receive him.

"Good evening, M. Fouquet," he said, smiling graciously; "I congratulate you on your punctuality; and yet my message must have reached you late?"

"At nine in the evening, sire."

"You have been working very hard lately, M. Fouquet, for I have been informed that you have not left your rooms at Saint-Mande during the last three or four days."

"It is perfectly true, your majesty, that I have kept myself shut up for the past three days," replied Fouquet.

"Do you know, M. Fouquet, that I had a great many things to say to you?" continued the king, with a most gracious air.

"Your majesty overwhelms me, and since you are so graciously disposed towards me, will you permit me to remind you of the promise made to grant an audience?"

"Ah, yes! some church dignitary, who thinks he has to thank me for something, is it not?"

"Precisely so, sire. The hour is, perhaps, badly chosen; but the time of the companion whom I have brought with me is valuable, and as Fontainebleau is on the way to his diocese—"

"Who is it, then?"

"The bishop of Vannes, whose appointment your majesty, at my recommendation, deigned, three months since, to sign."

"That is very possible," said the king, who had signed without reading; "and he is here?"

"Yes, sire; Vannes is an important diocese; the flock belonging to this pastor needed his religious consolation; they are savages, whom it is necessary to polish, at the same time that he instructs them, and M. d'Herblay is unequalled in such kind of missions."

"M. d'Herblay!" said the king, musingly, as if his name, heard long since, was not, however, unknown to him.

"Oh!" said Fouquet, promptly, "your majesty is not acquainted with the obscure name of one of your most faithful and valuable servants?"

"No, I confess I am not. And so he wishes to set off again?"

"He has this very day received letters which will, perhaps, compel him to leave, so that, before setting off for that unknown region called Bretagne, he is desirous of paying his respects to your majesty."

"Is he waiting?"

"He is here, sire."

"Let him enter."

Fouquet made a sign to the usher in attendance, who was waiting behind the tapestry. The door opened, and Aramis entered. The king allowed him to finish the compliments which he addressed to him, and fixed a long look upon a countenance which no one could forget, after having once beheld it.

"Vannes!" he said: "you are bishop of Vannes, I believe?"

"Yes, sire."

"Vannes is in Bretagne, I think?" Aramis bowed.

"Near the coast?" Aramis again bowed.

"A few leagues from Bell-Isle, is it not?"

"Yes, sire," replied Aramis; "six leagues, I believe."

"Six leagues; a mere step, then," said Louis XIV.

"Not for us poor Bretons, sire," replied Aramis: "six leagues, on the contrary, is a great distance, if it be six leagues on land; and an immense distance, if it be leagues on the sea. Besides, I have the honour to mention to your majesty that there are six leagues of sea from the river to Belle-Isle."

"It is said that M. Fouquet has a very beautiful house there?" inquired the king.

"Yes, it is said so," replied Aramis, looking quietly at Fouquet.

"What do you mean by 'it is said so?'" exclaimed the king.

"He has, sire."

"Really, M. Fouquet, I must confess that one circumstance surprises me."

"What may that be, sire?"

"That you should have at the head of the diocese a man like M. d'Herblay, and yet should not have shown him Belle-Isle."

"Oh, sire," replied the bishop, without giving Fouquet time to answer, "we poor Breton prelates seldom leave our residences."

"M. de Vannes," said the king, "I will punish M. Fouquet for his indifference."

"In what way, sire?"

"I will change your bishopric."

Fouquet bit his lips, but Aramis only smiled.

"What income does Vannes bring you in?" continued the king.

"Sixty thousand livres, sire," said Aramis.

"So trifling an amount as that; but you possess other property, Monsieur de Vannes?"

"I have nothing else, sire; only M. Fouquet pays me one thousand two hundred livres a year for his pew in the church."

"Well, M. d'Herblay, I promise you something better than that."

"Sire—"

"I will not forget you."

Aramis bowed, and the king also bowed to him in a respectful manner, as he was accustomed to do towards women and members of the Church. Aramis gathered that his audience was at an end; he took his leave of the king in the simple, unpretending language of a country pastor, and disappeared.

"He is, indeed, a remarkable face," said the king, following him with his eyes as long as he could see him, and even to a certain degree when he was no longer to be seen.

"Sire," replied Fouquet, "if that bishop had been educated early in life, no prelate in the kingdom would deserve the highest distinctions better than he."

"His learning is not extensive, then?"

"He changed the sword for the crucifix, and that rather late in life. But it matters little, if your majesty will permit me to speak of M. de Vannes again on another occasion—"

"I beg you to do so. But before speaking of him, let us speak of yourself, M. Fouquet."

"Of me, sire?"

"Yes, I have to pay you a thousand compliments."

"I cannot express to your majesty the delight with which you overwhelm me."

"I understand you, M. Fouquet. I confess, however, to have had certain prejudices against you."

"In that case, I was indeed unhappy, sire."

"But they exist no longer. Did you not perceive—"

"I did, indeed, sire; but I awaited with resignation the day when the truth would prevail; and it seems that that day has now arrived."

"Ah! you knew, then, you were in disgrace with me?"

"Alas! sire, I perceived it."

"And do you know the reason?"

"Perfectly well; your majesty thought that I had been wastefully lavish in expenditure."

"Not so; far from that."

"Or, rather an indifferent administrator. In a word, you thought that, as the people had no money, there would be none for your majesty either."

"Yes, I thought so; but I was deceived."

Fouquet bowed.

"And no disturbances, no complaints?"

"And money enough," said Fouquet.

"The fact is that you have been profuse with it during the last month."

"I have more, not only for all your majesty's requirements, but for all your caprices."

"I thank you, Monsieur Fouquet," replied the king, seriously. "I will not put you to the proof. For the next two months I do not intend to ask you for anything."

"I will avail myself of the interval to amass five or six millions, which will be serviceable as money in hand in case of war."

"Five or six millions!"

"For the expenses of your majesty's household only, be it understood."

"You think war probable, M. Fouquet?"

"I think that if Heaven has bestowed on the eagle a beak and claws, it is to enable him to show his royal character."

The king blushed with pleasure.

"We have spent a great deal of money these few days past, Monsieur Fouquet; will you not scold me for it?"

"Sire, your majesty has still twenty years of youth to enjoy, and a thousand million francs to lavish in those twenty years."

"That is a great deal of money, M. Fouquet," said the king.

"I will economize, sire. Besides, your majesty as two valuable servants in M. Colbert and myself. The one will encourage you to be prodigal with your treasures—and this shall be myself, if my services should continue to be agreeable to your majesty; and the other will economize money for you, and this will be M. Colbert's province."

"M. Colbert?" returned the king, astonished.

"Certainly, sire; M. Colbert is an excellent accountant."

At this commendation, bestowed by the traduced on the traducer, the king felt himself penetrated with confidence and admiration. There was not, moreover, either in Fouquet's voice or look, anything which injuriously affected a single syllable of the remark he had made; he did not pass one eulogium, as it were, in order to acquire the right of making two reproaches. The king comprehended him, and yielding to so much generosity and address, he said, "You praise M. Colbert, then?"

"Yes, sire, I praise him; for, besides being a man of merit, I believe him to be devoted to your majesty's interests."

"Is that because he has often interfered with your own views?" said the king, smiling.

"Exactly, sire."

"Explain yourself."

"It is simple enough. I am the man who is needed to make the money come in; he is the man who is needed to prevent it leaving."

"Nay, nay, monsieur le surintendant, you will presently say something which will correct this good opinion."

"Do you mean as far as administrative abilities are concerned, sire?"

"Yes."

"Not in the slightest."

"Really?"

"Upon my honour, sire, I do not know throughout France a better clerk than M. Colbert."

This word "clerk" did not possess, in 1661, the somewhat subservient signification attached to it in the present day; but, as spoken by Fouquet, whom the king had addressed as the superintendent, it seemed to acquire an insignificant and petty character, that at this juncture served admirably to restore Fouquet to his place, and Colbert to his own.

"And yet," said Louis XIV., "it was Colbert, however, that, notwithstanding his economy, had the arrangement of my fêtes here at Fontainebleau; and I assure you, Monsieur Fouquet, that in no way has he checked the expenditure of money." Fouquet bowed, but did not reply.

"Is it not your opinion too?" said the king.

"I think, sire," he replied, "that M. Colbert has done what he had to do in an exceedingly orderly manner, and that he deserves, in this respect, all the praise your majesty may bestow upon him."

The word "orderly" was a proper accompaniment for the word "clerk." The king possessed that extreme sensitiveness of organization, that delicacy of perception, which pierced through and detected the regular order of feelings and sensations, before the actual sensations themselves, and he therefore comprehended that the clerk had, in Fouquet's opinion, been too full of method and order in his arrangements; in other words, that the magnificent fêtes of Fontainebleau might have been rendered more magnificent still. The king consequently felt that there was something in the amusements he had provided with which some person or another might be able to find fault; he experienced a little of the annoyance felt by a person coming from the provinces to Paris, dressed out in the very best clothes which his wardrobe can furnish, only to find that the fashionably dressed man there looks at him either too much or not enough. This part of the conversation, which Fouquet had carried on with so much moderation, yet with extreme tact, inspired the king with the highest esteem for the character of the man and the capacity of the minister. Fouquet took his leave at a quarter to three in the morning, and the king went to bed a little uneasy and confused at the indirect lesson he had received; and a good hour was employed by him in going over again in memory the embroideries, the tapestries, the bills of fare of the various banquets, the architecture of the triumphal arches, the arrangements for the illuminations and fireworks, all the offspring of the "Clerk Colbert's" invention. The result was, the king passed in review before him everything that had taken place during the last eight days, and decided that faults could be found in his fêtes. But Fouquet, by his politeness, his thoughtful consideration, and his generosity, had injured Colbert more deeply than the latter, by his artifice, his ill-will, and his persevering hatred, had ever yet succeeded in hurting Fouquet.

XLVIII. Fontainebleau at Two o'Clock in the Morning.

As we have seen, Saint-Aignan had quitted the king's apartment at the very moment the superintendent entered it. Saint-Aignan was charged with a mission that required dispatch, and he was going to do his utmost to turn his time to the best advantage. He whom we have introduced as the king's friend was indeed an uncommon personage; he was one of those valuable courtiers whose vigilance and acuteness of perception threw all other favourites into the shade, and counterbalanced, by his close attention, the servility of Dangeau, who was not the favourite, but the toady of the king. M. de Saint-Aignan began to think what was to be done in the present position of affairs. He reflected that his first information ought to come from De Guiche. He therefore set out in search of him, but De Guiche, whom we saw disappear behind one of the wings, and who seemed to have returned to his own apartments, had not entered the chateau. Saint-Aignan therefore went in quest of him, and after having turned, and twisted, and searched in every direction, he perceived something like a human form leaning against a tree. This figure was as motionless as a statue, and seemed deeply engaged in looking at a window, although its curtains were closely drawn. As this window happened to be Madame's, Saint-Aignan concluded that the form in question must be that of De Guiche. He advanced cautiously, and found he was not mistaken. De Guiche had, after his conversation with Madame, carried away such a weight of happiness, that all of his strength of mind was hardly sufficient to enable him to support it. On his side, Saint-Aignan knew that De Guiche had had something to do with La Vallière's introduction to Madame's household, for a courtier knows everything and forgets nothing; but he had never learned under what title or conditions De Guiche had conferred his protection upon La Vallière. But, as in asking a great many questions it is singular if a man does not learn something, Saint-Aignan reckoned upon learning much or little, as the case might be, if he questioned De Guiche with that extreme tact, and, at the same time, with that persistence in attaining an object, of which he was capable. Saint-Aignan's plan was as follows: If the information obtained was satisfactory, he would inform the king, with alacrity, that he had lighted upon a pearl, and claim the privilege of setting the pearl in question in the royal crown. If the information were unsatisfactory,—which, after all, might be possible,—he would examine how far the king cared about La Vallière, and make use of his information in such a manner as to get rid of the girl altogether, and thereby obtain all the merit of her banishment with all the ladies of the court who might have the least pretensions to the king's heart, beginning with Madame and finishing with the queen. In case the king should show himself obstinate in his fancy, then he would not produce the damaging information he had obtained, but would let La Vallière know that this damaging information was carefully preserved in a secret drawer of her confidant's memory. In this manner, he would be able to air his generosity before the poor girl's eyes, and so keep her in constant suspense between gratitude and apprehension, to such an extent as to make her a friend at court, interested, as an accomplice, in trying to make his fortune, while she was making her own. As far as concerned the day when the bombshell of the past should burst, if ever there were any occasion, Saint-Aignan promised himself that he would by that time have taken all possible precautions, and would pretend an entire ignorance of the matter to the king; while, with regard to La Vallière, he would still have an opportunity of being considered the personification of generosity. It was with such ideas as these, which the fire of covetousness had caused to dawn in half an hour, that Saint-Aignan, the son of earth, as La Fontaine would have said, determined to get De Guiche into conversation: in other words, to trouble him in his happiness—a happiness of which Saint-Aignan was quite ignorant. It was long past one o'clock in the morning when Saint-Aignan perceived De Guiche, standing, motionless, leaning against the trunk of a tree, with his eyes fastened upon the lighted window,—the sleepest hour of night-time, which painters crown with myrtles and budding poppies, the hour when eyes are heavy, hearts throb, and heads feel dull and languid—an hour which casts upon the day which has passed away a look of regret, while addressing a loving greeting to the dawning light. For De Guiche it was the dawn of unutterable happiness; he would have bestowed a treasure upon a beggar, had one stood before him, to secure him uninterrupted indulgence in his dreams. It was precisely at this hour that Saint-Aignan, badly advised,—selfishness always counsels badly,—came and struck him on the shoulder, at the very moment he was murmuring a word, or rather a name.

"Ah!" he cried loudly, "I was looking for you."

"For me?" said De Guiche, starting.

"Yes; and I find you seemingly moon-struck. Is it likely, my dear comte, you have been attacked by a poetical malady, and are making verses?"

The young man forced a smile upon his lips, while a thousand conflicting sensations were muttering defiance of Saint-Aignan in the deep recesses of his heart. "Perhaps," he said. "But by what happy chance—"

"Ah! your remark shows that you did not hear what I said."

"How so?"

"Why, I began by telling you I was looking for you."

"You were looking for me?"

"Yes: and I find you now in the very act."

"Of doing what, I should like to know?"

"Of singing the praises of Phyllis."

"Well, I do not deny it," said De Guiche, laughing. "Yes, my dear comte, I was celebrating Phyllis's praises."

"And you have acquired the right to do so."

"I?"

"You; no doubt of it. You; the intrepid protector of every beautiful and clever woman."

"In the name of goodness, what story have you got hold of now?"

"Acknowledged truths, I am well aware. But stay a moment; I am in love."

"You?"

"Yes."

"So much the better, my dear comte; tell me all about it." And De Guiche, afraid that Saint-Aignan might perhaps presently observe the window, where the light was still burning, took the comte's arm and endeavored to lead him away.

"Oh!" said the latter, resisting, "do not take me towards those dark woods, it is too damp there. Let us stay in the moonlight." And while he yielded to the pressure of De Guiche's arm, he remained in the flower-garden adjoining the chateau.

"Well," said De Guiche, resigning himself, "lead me where you like, and ask me what you please."

"It is impossible to be more agreeable than you are." And then, after a moment's silence, Saint-Aignan continued, "I wish you to tell me something about a certain person in who you have interested yourself."

"And with whom you are in love?"

"I will neither admit nor deny it. You understand that a man does not very readily place his heart where there is no hope of return, and that it is most essential he should take measures of security in advance."

"You are right," said De Guiche with a sigh; "a man's heart is a very precious gift."

"Mine particularly is very tender, and in that light I present it to you."

"Oh! you are well known, comte. Well?"

"It is simply a question of Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente."

"Why, my dear Saint-Aignan, you are losing your senses, I should think."

"Why so?"

"I have never shown or taken any interest in Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente."

"Bah!"

"Never."

"Did you not obtain admission for Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente into Madame's household?"

"Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente—and you ought to know it better than any one else, my dear comte—is of a sufficiently good family to make her presence here desirable, and her admittance very easy."

"You are jesting."

"No; and upon my honour I do not know what you mean."

"And you had nothing, then, to do with her admission?"

"No."

"You do not know her?"

"I saw her for the first time the day she was presented to Madame. Therefore, as I have never taken any interest in her, as I do not know her, I am not able to give you the information you require." And De Guiche made a movement as though he were about to leave his questioner.

"Nay, nay, one moment, my dear comte," said Saint-Aignan; "you shall not escape me in this manner."

"Why, really, it seems to me that it is now time to return to our apartments."

"And yet you were not going in when I—did not meet, but found you."

"Therefore, my dear comte," said De Guiche, "as long as you have anything to say to me, I place myself entirely at your service."

"And you are quite right in doing so. What matters half an hour more or less? Will you swear that you have no injurious communications to make to me about her, and that any injurious communications you might possibly have to make are not the cause of your silence?"

"Oh! I believe the poor child to be as pure as crystal."

"You overwhelm me with joy. And yet I do not wish to have towards you the appearance of a man so badly informed as I seem. It is quite certain that you supplied the princess's household with the ladies of honour. Nay, a song has even been written about it."

"Oh! songs are written about everything."

"Do you know it?"

"No: sing it to me and I shall make its acquaintance."

"I cannot tell you how it begins; I only remember how it ends."

"Very well, at all events, that is something."

"When Maids of Honour happen to run short, Lo!—Guiche will furnish the entire Court."

"The idea is weak, and the rhyme poor," said De Guiche.

"What can you expect, my dear fellow? it is not Racine's or Moliere's, but La Feuillade's; and a great lord cannot rhyme like a beggarly poet."

"It is very unfortunate, though, that you only remember the termination."

"Stay, stay, I have just recollected the beginning of the second couplet."

"Why, there's the birdcage, with a pretty pair, The charming Montalais, and..."

"And La Vallière," exclaimed Guiche, impatiently, and completely ignorant besides of Saint-Aignan's object.

"Yes, yes, you have it. You have hit upon the word, 'La Vallière.'"

"A grand discovery indeed."

"Montalais and La Vallière, these, then, are the two young girls in whom you interest yourself," said Saint-Aignan, laughing.

"And so Mademoiselle de Tonny-Charente's name is not to be met with in the song?"

"No, indeed."

"And are you satisfied, then?"

"Perfectly; but I find Montalais there," said Saint-Aignan, still laughing.

"Oh! you will find her everywhere. She is a singularly active young lady."

"You know her?"

"Indirectly. She was the protegee of a man named Malicorne, who is a protegee of Manicamp's; Manicamp asked me to get the situation of maid of honour for Montalais in Madame's household, and a situation for Malicorne as an officer in Monsieur's household. Well, I asked for the appointments, for you know very well that I have a weakness for that droll fellow Manicamp."

"And you obtained what you sought?"

"For Montalais, yes; for Malicorne, yes and no; for as yet he is only on trial. Do you wish to know anything else?"

"The last word of the couplet still remains, La Vallière," said Saint-Aignan, resuming the smile that so tormented Guiche.

"Well," said the latter, "it is true that I obtained admission for her in Madame's household."

"Ah!" said Saint-Aignan.

"But," continued Guiche, assuming a great coldness of manner, "you will oblige me, comte, not to jest about that name. Mademoiselle la Baume le Blanc de la Vallière is a young lady perfectly well-conducted."

"Perfectly well-conducted do you say?"

"Yes."

"Then you have not heard the last rumor?" exclaimed Saint-Aignan.

"No, and you will do me a service, my dear comte, in keeping this report to yourself and to those who circulate it."

"Ah! bah! you take the matter up very seriously."

"Yes; Mademoiselle de Vallière is beloved by one of my best friends."

Saint-Aignan started. "Aha!" he said.

"Yes, comte," continued Guiche; "and consequently, you, the most distinguished man in France for polished courtesy of manner, will understand that I cannot allow my friend to be placed in a ridiculous position."

Saint-Aignan began to bite his nails, partially from vexation, and partially from disappointed curiosity. Guiche made him a very profound bow.

"You send me away," said Saint-Aignan, who was dying to know the name of the friend.

"I do not send you away, my dear fellow. I am going to finish my lines to Phyllis."

"And those lines—"

"Are a quatrain. You understand, I trust, that a quatrain is a serious affair?"

"Of course."

"And as, of these four lines, of which it is composed, I have yet three and a half to make, I need my undivided attention."

"I quite understand. Adieu! comte. By the by—"

"What?"

"Are you quick at making verses?"

"Wonderfully so."

"Will you have quite finished the three lines and a half to-morrow morning?"

"I hope so."

"Adieu, then, until to-morrow."

"Adieu, adieu!"

Saint-Aignan was obliged to accept the notice to quit; he accordingly did so, and disappeared behind the hedge. Their conversation had led Guiche and Saint-Aignan a good distance from the chateau. Every mathematician, every poet, and every dreamer has his own subjects of interest. Saint-Aignan, on leaving Guiche, found himself at the extremity of the grove,—at the very spot where the outbuildings of the servants begin, and where, behind the thickets of acacias and chestnut-trees interlacing their branches, which were hidden by masses of clematis and young vines, the wall which separated the woods from the courtyard was erected. Saint-Aignan, alone, took the path which led towards these buildings; De Guiche going off in the opposite direction. The one proceeded to the flower-garden, while the other bent his steps towards the walls. Saint-Aignan walked on between rows of mountain-ash, lilac, and hawthorn, which formed an almost impenetrable roof above his head; his feet were buried in the soft gravel and thick moss. He was deliberating a means of taking his revenge, which seemed difficult for him to carry out, and was vexed with himself for not having learned more about La Vallière, notwithstanding the ingenious measures he had resorted to in order to acquire more information about her, when suddenly the murmur of a human voice attracted his attention. He heard whispers, the complaining tones of a woman's voice mingled with entreaties, smothered laughter, sighs, and half-stilted exclamations of surprise; but above them all, the woman's voice prevailed. Saint-Aignan stopped to look about him; he perceived from the greatest surprise that the voices proceeded, not from the ground, but from the branches of the trees. As he glided along under the covered walk, he raised his head, and observed at the top of the wall a woman perched upon a ladder, in eager conversation with a man seated on a branch of a chestnut-tree, whose head alone could be seen, the rest of his body being concealed in the thick covert of the chestnut.

5

XLIX. The Labyrinth.

Saint-Aignan, who had only been seeking for information, had met with an adventure. This was indeed a piece of good luck. Curious to learn why, and particularly what about, this man and woman were conversing at such an hour, and in such a singular position, Saint-Aignan made himself as small as he possibly could, and approached almost under the rounds of the ladder. And taking measures to make himself as comfortable as possible, he leaned his back against a tree and listened, and heard the following conversation. The woman was the first to speak.

"Really, Monsieur Manicamp," she said, in a voice which, notwithstanding the reproaches she addressed to him, preserved a marked tone of coquetry, "really your indiscretion is of a very dangerous character. We cannot talk long in this manner without being observed."

"That is very probable," said the man, in the calmest and coolest of tones.

"In that case, then, what would people say? Oh! if any one were to see me, I declare I should die of very shame."

"Oh! that would be very silly; I do not believe you would."

"It might have been different if there had been anything between us; but to injure myself gratuitously is really very foolish of me; so, adieu, Monsieur Manicamp."

"So far so good; I know the man, and now let me see who the woman is," said Saint-Aignan, watching the rounds of the ladder, on which were standing two pretty little feet covered with blue satin shoes.

"Nay, nay, for pity's sake, my dear Montalais," cried Manicamp, "deuce take it, do not go away; I have a great many things to say to you, of the greatest importance, still."

"Montalais," said Saint-Aignan to himself, "one of the three. Each of the three gossips had her adventure, only I imagined the hero of this one's adventure was Malicorne and not Manicamp."

At her companion's appeal, Montalais stopped in the middle of her descent, and Saint-Aignan could observe the unfortunate Manicamp climb from one branch of the chestnut-tree to another, either to improve his situation or to overcome the fatigue consequent upon his inconvenient position.

"Now, listen to me," said he; "you quite understand, I hope, that my intentions are perfectly innocent?"

"Of course. But why did you write me a letter stimulating my gratitude towards you? Why did you ask me for an interview at such an hour and in such a place as this?"

"I stimulated your gratitude in reminding you that it was I who had been the means of your becoming attached to Madame's household; because most anxiously desirous of obtaining the interview you have been kind enough to grant me, I employed the means which appeared to me most certain to insure it. And my reason for soliciting it, at such an hour and in such a locality, was, that the hour seemed to me to be the most prudent, and the locality the least open to observation. Moreover, I had occasion to speak to you upon certain subjects which require both prudence and solitude."

"Monsieur Manicamp!"

"But everything I wish to say is perfectly honourable, I assure you."

"I think, Monsieur Manicamp, it will be more becoming in me to take my leave."

"No, no!—listen to me, or I will jump from my perch here to yours; and be careful how you set me at defiance, for a branch of this chestnut-tree causes me a good deal of annoyance, and may provoke me to extreme measures. Do not follow the example of this branch, then, but listen to me."

"I am listening, and I agree to do so; but be as brief as possible, for if you have a branch of the chestnut-tree which annoys you, I wish you to understand that one of the rounds of the ladder is hurting the soles of my feet, and my shoes are being cut through."

"Do me the kindness to give me your hand."

"Why?"

"Will you have the goodness to do so?"

"There is my hand, then; but what are you going to do?"

"To draw you towards me."

"What for? You surely do not wish me to join you in the tree?"

"No; but I wish you to sit down upon the wall; there, that will do; there is quite room enough, and I would give a great deal to be allowed to sit down beside you."

"No, no; you are very well where you are; we should be seen."

"Do you really think so?" said Manicamp, in an insinuating voice.

"I am sure of it."

"Very well, I remain in my tree, then, although I cannot be worse placed."

"Monsieur Manicamp, we are wandering away from the subject."

"You are right, we are so."

"You wrote me a letter?"

"I did."

"Why did you write?"

"Fancy, at two o'clock to-day, De Guiche left."

"What then?"

"Seeing him set off, I followed him, as I usually do."

"Of course, I see that, since you are here now."

"Don't be in a hurry. You are aware, I suppose, that De Guiche is up to his very neck in disgrace?"

"Alas! yes."

"It was the very height of imprudence on his part, then, to come to Fontainebleau to seek those who had at Paris sent him away into exile, and particularly those from whom he had been separated."

"Monsieur Manicamp, you reason like Pythagoras."

"Moreover, De Guiche is as obstinate as a man in love can be, and he refused to listen to any of my remonstrances. I begged, I implored him, but he would not listen to anything. Oh, the deuce!"

"What's the matter?"

"I beg your pardon, Mademoiselle Montalais, but this confounded branch, about which I have already had the honour of speaking to you, has just torn a certain portion of my dress."

"It is quite dark," replied Montalais, laughing; "so, pray continue, M. Manicamp."

"De Guiche set off on horseback as hard as he could, I following him, at a slower pace. You quite understand that to throw one's self into the water, for instance, with a friend, at the same headlong rate as he himself would do it, would be the act either of a fool or a madman. I therefore allowed De Guiche to get in advance, and I proceeded on my way with a commendable slowness of pace, feeling quite sure that my unfortunate friend would not be received, or, if he had been, that he would ride off again at the very first cross, disagreeable answer; and that I should see him returning much faster than he went, without having, myself, gone much farther than Ris or Melun—and that even was a good distance you will admit, for it is eleven leagues to get there and as many to return."

Montalais shrugged her shoulders.

"Laugh as much as you like; but if, instead of being comfortably seated on the top of the wall as you are, you were sitting on this branch as if you were on horseback, you would, like Augustus, aspire to descend."

"Be patient, my dear M. Manicamp; a few minutes will soon pass away; you were saying, I think, that you had gone beyond Ris and Melun."

"Yes, I went through Ris and Melun, and I continued to go on, more and more surprised that I did not see him returning; and here I am at Fontainebleau; I look for and inquire after De Guiche everywhere, but no one has seen him, no one in the town has spoken to him; he arrived riding at full gallop, he entered the chateau; and there he has disappeared. I have been here at Fontainebleau since eight o'clock this evening inquiring for De Guiche in every direction, but no De Guiche can be found. I am dying with uneasiness. You understand that I have not been running my head into the lion's den, in entering the chateau, as my imprudent friend has done; I came at once to the servants' offices, and I succeeded in getting a letter conveyed to you; and now, for Heaven's sake, my dear young lady, relieve me from my anxiety."

"There will be no difficulty in that, my dear M. Manicamp; your friend De Guiche has been admirably received."

"Bah!"

"The king made quite a fuss over him."

"The king, who exiled him!"

"Madame smiled upon him, and Monsieur appears to like him better than ever."

"Ah! ah!" said Manicamp, "that explains to me, then, why and how he has remained. And did he not say anything about me?"

"Not a word."

"That is very unkind. What is he doing now?"

"In all probability he is asleep, or, if not asleep, dreaming."

"And what have they been doing all the evening?"

"Dancing."

"The famous ballet? How did De Guiche look?"

"Superb!"

"Dear fellow! And now, pray forgive me, Mademoiselle Montalais; but all I now have to do is pass from where I now am to your apartment."

"What do you mean?"

"I cannot suppose that the door of the chateau will be opened for me at this hour; and as for spending the night upon this branch, I possibly might not object to do so, but I declare it is impossible for any other animal than a boa-constrictor to do it."

"But, M. Manicamp, I cannot introduce a man over the wall in that manner."

"Two, if you please," said a second voice, but in so timid a tone that it seemed as if its owner felt the utter impropriety of such a request.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Montalais, "who is that speaking to me?"

"Malicorne, Mademoiselle Montalais."

And as Malicorne spoke, he raised himself from the ground to the lowest branches, and thence to the height of the wall.

"Monsieur Malicorne! why, you are both mad!"

"How do you do, Mademoiselle Montalais?" inquired Malicorne.

"I needed but this!" said Montalais, in despair.

"Oh! Mademoiselle Montalais," murmured Malicorne; "do not be so severe, I beseech you."

"In fact," said Manicamp, "we are your friends, and you cannot possibly wish your friends to lose their lives; and to leave us to pass the night on these branches is in fact condemning us to death."

"Oh!" said Montalais, "Monsieur Malicorne is so robust that a night passed in the open air with the beautiful stars above him will not do him any harm, and it will be a just punishment for the trick he has played me."

"Be it so, then; let Malicorne arrange matters with you in the best way he can; I pass over," said Manicamp. And bending down the famous branch against which he had directed such bitter complaints, he succeeded, by the assistance of his hands and feet, in seating himself side by side with Montalais, who tried to push him back, while he endeavored to maintain his position, and, moreover, he succeeded. Having taken possession of the ladder, he stepped on it, and then gallantly offered his hand to his fair antagonist. While this was going on, Malicorne had installed himself in the chestnut-tree, in the very place Manicamp had just left, determining within himself to succeed him in the one he now occupied. Manicamp and Montalais descended a few rounds of the ladder, Manicamp insisting, and Montalais laughing and objecting.

Suddenly Malicorne's voice was heard in tones of entreaty:

"I entreat you, Mademoiselle Montalais, not to leave me here. My position is very insecure, and some accident will be certain to befall me, if I attempt unaided to reach the other side of the wall; it does not matter if Manicamp tears his clothes, for he can make use of M. de Guiche's wardrobe; but I shall not be able to use even those belonging to M. Manicamp, for they will be torn."

"My opinion," said Manicamp, without taking any notice of Malicorne's lamentations, "is that the best thing to be done is to go and look for De Guiche without delay, for, by and by, perhaps, I may not be able to get to his apartments."

"That is my own opinion, too," replied Montalais; "so, go at once, Monsieur Manicamp."

"A thousand thanks. Adieu Mademoiselle Montalais," said Manicamp, jumping to the ground; "your condescension cannot be repaid."

"Farewell, M. Manicamp; I am now going to get rid of M. Malicorne."

Malicorne sighed. Manicamp went away a few paces, but returning to the foot of the ladder, he said, "By the by, how do I get to M. de Guiche's apartments?"

"Nothing easier. You go along by the hedge until you reach a place where the paths cross."

"Yes."

"You will see four paths."

"Exactly."

"One of which you will take."

"Which of them?"

"That to the right."

"That to the right?"

"No, to the left."

"The deuce!"

"No, no, wait a minute—"

"You do not seem to be quite sure. Think again, I beg."

"You take the middle path."

"But there are four."

"So there are. All I know is, that one of the four paths leads straight to Madame's apartments; and that one I am well acquainted with."

"But M. de Guiche is not in Madame's apartments, I suppose?"

"No, indeed."

"Well, then the path which leads to Madame's apartments is of no use to me, and I would willingly exchange it for the one that leads to where M. de Guiche is lodging."

"Of course, and I know that as well; but as for indicating it from where we are, it is quite impossible."

"Well, let us suppose that I have succeeded in finding that fortunate path."

"In that case, you are almost there, for you have nothing else to do but cross the labyrinth."

"Nothing more than that? The deuce! so there is a labyrinth as well."

"Yes, and complicated enough too; even in daylight one may sometimes be deceived,—there are turnings and windings without end: in the first place, you must turn three times to the right, then twice to the left, then turn once—stay, is it once or twice, though? at all events, when you get clear of the labyrinth, you will see an avenue of sycamores, and this avenue leads straight to the pavilion in which M. de Guiche is lodging."

"Nothing could be more clearly indicated," said Manicamp; "and I have not the slightest doubt in the world that if I were to follow your directions, I should lose my way immediately. I have, therefore, a slight service to ask of you."

"What may that be?"

"That you will offer me your arm and guide me yourself, like another— like another—I used to know mythology, but other important matters have made me forget it; pray come with me, then?"

"And am I to be abandoned, then?" cried Malicorne.
"It is quite impossible, monsieur," said Montalais to Manicamp; "if I were to be seen with you at such an hour, what would be said of me?"
"Your own conscience would acquit you," said Manicamp, sententially.
"Impossible, monsieur, impossible."

"In that case, let me assist Malicorne to get down; he is a very intelligent fellow, and possesses a very keen scent; he will guide me, and if we lose ourselves, both of us will be lost, and the one will save the other. If we are together, and should be met by any one, we shall look as if we had some matter of business in hand; whilst alone I should have the appearance either of a lover or a robber. Come, Malicorne, here is the ladder."
Malicorne had already stretched out one of his legs towards the top of the wall, when Manicamp said, in a whisper, "Hush!"
"What's the matter?" inquired Montalais.
"I hear footsteps."
"Good heavens!"

In fact the fancied footsteps soon became a reality; the foliage was pushed aside, and Saint-Aignan appeared, with a smile on his lips, and his hand stretched out towards them, taking every one by surprise; that is to say, Malicorne upon the tree with his head stretched out, Montalais upon the round of the ladder and clinging to it tightly, and Manicamp on the ground with his foot advanced ready to set off. "Good-evening, Manicamp," said the comte, "I am glad to see you, my dear fellow; we missed you this evening, and a good many inquiries have been made about you. Mademoiselle de Montalais, your most obedient servant."
Montalais blushed. "Good heavens!" she exclaimed, hiding her face in both her hands.
"Pray reassure yourself; I know how perfectly innocent you are, and I shall give a good account of you. Manicamp, do you follow me: the hedge, the cross-paths, and labyrinth, I am well acquainted with them all; I will be your Ariadne. There now, your mythological name is found at last."
"Perfectly true, comte."

"And take M. Malicorne away with you at the same time," said Montalais.
"No, indeed," said Malicorne; "M. Manicamp has conversed with you as long as he liked, and now it is my turn, if you please; I have a multitude of things to tell you about our future prospects."
"You hear," said the comte, laughing; "stay with him, Mademoiselle Montalais. This is, indeed, a night for secrets." And, taking Manicamp's arm, the comte led him rapidly away in the direction of the road Montalais knew so well, and indicated so badly. Montalais followed them with her eyes as long as she could perceive them.
L: How Malicorne Had Been Turned Out of the Hotel of the Beau Paon.

While Montalais was engaged in looking after the comte and Manicamp, Malicorne had taken advantage of the young girl's attention being drawn away to render his position somewhat more tolerable, and when she turned round, she immediately noticed the change which had taken place; for he had seated himself, like a monkey, upon the wall, the foliage of the wild vine and honeysuckle curled around his head like a faun, while the twisted ivy branches represented tolerably enough his cloven feet. Montalais required nothing to make her resemblance to a dryad as complete as possible. "Well," she said, ascending another round of the ladder, "are you resolved to render me unhappy? have you not persecuted me enough, tyrant that you are?"

"I a tyrant?" said Malicorne.
"Yes, you are always compromising me, Monsieur Malicorne; you are a perfect monster of wickedness."
"I?"

"What have you to do with Fontainebleau? Is not Orleans your place of residence?"
"Do you ask me what I have to do here? I wanted to see you."

"Ah, great need of that."
"Not as far as concerns yourself, perhaps, but as far as I am concerned, Mademoiselle Montalais, you know very well that I have left my home, and that, for the future, I have no other place of residence than that which you may happen to have. As you, therefore, are staying at Fontainebleau at the present moment, I have come to Fontainebleau."
Montalais shrugged her shoulders. "You wished to see me, did you not?" she said.

"Of course."
"Very well, you have seen me,—you are satisfied; so now go away."
"Oh, no," said Malicorne; "I came to talk with you as well as to see you."
"Very well, we will talk by and by, and in another place than this."
"By and by! Heaven only knows if I shall meet you by and by in another place. We shall never find a more favourable one than this."
"But I cannot this evening, nor at the present moment."
"Why not?"

"Because a thousand things have happened to-night."
"Well, then, my affair will make a thousand and one."
"No, no; Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente is waiting for me in our room to communicate something of the very greatest importance."
"How long has she been waiting?"
"For an hour at least."

"In that case," said Malicorne, tranquilly, "she can wait a few minutes longer."
"Monsieur Malicorne," said Montalais, "you are forgetting yourself."
"You should rather say that it is you who are forgetting me, and that I am getting impatient at the part you make me play here indeed! For the last week I have been prowling about among the company, and you have not once deigned to notice my presence."
"Have you been prowling about here for a week, M. Malicorne?"

"Like a wolf; sometimes I have been burnt by the fireworks, which have singed two of my wigs; at others, I have been completely drenched in the osiers by the evening damps, or the spray from the fountains,—half-famished, fatigued to death, with the view of a wall always before me, and the prospect of having to scale it perhaps. Upon my word, this is not the sort of life for any one to lead who is neither a squirrel, a salamander, nor an otter; and since you drive your inhumanity so far as to wish to make me renounce my condition as a man, I declare it openly. A man I am, indeed, and a man I will remain, unless by superior orders."

"Well, then, tell me, what do you wish,—what do you require,—what do you insist upon?" said Montalais, in a submissive tone.
"Do you mean to tell me that you did not know I was at Fontainebleau?"

"I?"
"Nay, be frank."
"I suspected so."
"Well, then, could you not have contrived during the last week to have seen me once a day, at least?"
"I have always been prevented, M. Malicorne."
"Fiddlesticks!"

"Ask my companion, if you do not believe me."
"I shall ask no one to explain matters, I know better than any one."
"Compose yourself, M. Malicorne: things will change."
"They must indeed."

"You know that, whether I see you or not, I am thinking of you," said Montalais, in a coaxing tone of voice.
"Oh, you are thinking of me, are you? well, and is there anything new?"
"What about?"
"About my post in Monsieur's household."

"Ah, my dear Malicorne, no one has ventured lately to approach his royal highness."
"Well, but now?"

"Now it is quite a different thing; since yesterday he has left off being jealous."
"Bah! how has his jealousy subsided?"
"It has been diverted into another channel."
"Tell me all about it."

"A report was spread that the king had fallen in love with some one else, and Monsieur was tranquillized immediately."
"And who spread the report?"
Montalais lowered her voice. "Between ourselves," she said, "I think that Madame and the king have come to a secret understanding about it."
"Ah!" said Malicorne; "that was the only way to manage it. But what about poor M. de Guiche?"

"Oh, as for him, he is completely turned off."
"Have they been writing to each other?"
"No, certainly not; I have not seen a pen in either of their hands for the last week."
"On what terms are you with Madame?"
"The very best."
"And with the king?"
"The king always smiles at me whenever I pass him."
"Good. Now tell me whom have the two lovers selected to serve as their screen?"
"La Vallière."

"Oh, oh, poor girl! We must prevent that!"
"Why?"
"Because, if M. Raoul Bragelonne were to suspect it, he would either kill her or kill himself."
"Raoul, poor fellow! do you think so?"
"Women pretend to have a knowledge of the state of people's affections," said Malicorne, "and they do not even know how to read the thoughts of their own minds and hearts. Well, I can tell you that M. de Bragelonne loves La Vallière to such a degree that, if she deceived him, he would, I repeat, either kill himself or kill her."

"But the king is there to defend her," said Montalais.
"The king!" exclaimed Malicorne; "Raoul would kill the king as he would a common thief."
"Good heavens!" said Montalais; "you are mad, M. Malicorne."
"Not in the least. Everything I have told you is, on the contrary, perfectly serious; and, for my own part, I know one thing."

"What is that?"

"That I shall quietly tell Raoul of the trick."

"Hush!" said Montalais, mounting another round of the ladder, so as to approach Malicorne more closely, "do not open your lips to poor Raoul."

"Why not?"

"Because, as yet you know nothing at all."

"What is the matter, then?"

"Why, this evening—but no one is listening, I hope?"

"No."

"This evening, then, beneath the royal oak, La Vallière said aloud, and innocently enough, 'I cannot conceive that when one has once seen the king, one can ever love another man.'"

Malicorne almost jumped off the wall. "Unhappy girl! did she really say that?"

"Word for word."

"And she thinks so?"

"La Vallière always thinks what she says."

"That positively cries aloud for vengeance. Why, women are the veriest serpents," said Malicorne.

"Compose yourself, my dear Malicorne, compose yourself."

"No, no; let us take the evil in time, on the contrary. There is time enough yet to tell Raoul of it."

"Blunderer, on the contrary, it is too late," replied Montalais.

"How so?"

"La Vallière's remark, which was intended for the king, reached its destination."

"The king knows it, then? The king was told of it, I suppose?"

"The king heard it."

"Ahime! as the cardinal used to say."

"The king was hidden in the thicket close to the royal oak."

"It follows, then," said Malicorne, "that for the future, the plan which the king and Madame have arranged, will go as easily as if it were on wheels, and will pass over poor Bragelonne's body."

"Precisely so."

"Well," said Malicorne, after a moment's reflection, "do not let us interpose our poor selves between a large oak-tree and a great king, for we should certainly be ground to pieces."

"The very thing I was going to say to you."

"Let us think of ourselves, then."

"My own idea."

"Open your beautiful eyes, then."

"And you your large ears."

"Approach your little mouth for a kiss."

"Here," said Montalais, who paid the debt immediately in ringing coin.

"Now let us consider. First, we have M. de Guiche, who is in love with Madame; then La Vallière, who is in love with the king; next, the king, who is in love both with Madame and La Vallière; lastly Monsieur, who loves no one but himself. Among all these loves, a noodle would make his fortune: a greater reason, therefore, for sensible people like ourselves to do so."

"There you are with your dreams again."

"Nay, rather with realities. Let me still lead you, darling. I do not think you have been very badly off hitherto?"

"No."

"Well, the future is guaranteed by the past. Only, since all here think of themselves before anything else, let us do so too."

"Perfectly right."

"But of ourselves only."

"Be it so."

"An offensive and defensive alliance."

"I am ready to swear it."

"Put out your hand, then, and say, 'All for Malicorne.'"

"All for Malicorne."

"And I, 'All for Montalais,'" replied Malicorne, stretching out his hand in his turn.

"And now, what is to be done?"

"Keep your eyes and ears constantly open; collect every means of attack which may be serviceable against others; never let anything lie about which can be used against ourselves."

"Agreed."

"Decided."

"Sworn to. And now the agreement entered into, good-bye."

"What do you mean by 'good-bye?'"

"Of course you can now return to your inn."

"To my inn?"

"Yes; are you not lodging at the sign of the Beau Paon?"

"Montalais, Montalais, you now betray that you were aware of my being at Fontainebleau."

"Well; and what does that prove, except that I occupy myself about you more than you deserve?"

"Hum!"

"Go back, then, to the Beau Paon."

"That is now quite out of the question."

"Have you not a room there?"

"I had, but have it no longer."

"Who has taken it from you, then?"

"I will tell you. Some little time ago I was returning there, after I had been running about after you; and having reached my hotel quite out of breath, I perceived a litter, upon which four peasants were carrying a sick monk."

"A monk?"

"Yes, an old gray-bearded Franciscan. As I was looking at the monk, they entered the hotel; and as they were carrying him up the staircase, I followed, and as I reached the top of the staircase I observed that they took him into my room."

"Into your room?"

"Yes, into my own apartment. Supposing it to be a mistake, I summoned the landlord, who said that the room which had been let to me for the past eight days was let to the Franciscan for the ninth."

"Oh, oh!"

"That was exactly what I said; nay, I did even more, for I was inclined to get out of temper. I went up-stairs again. I spoke to the Franciscan himself, and wished to prove to him the impropriety of the step; when this monk, dying though he seemed to be, raised himself upon his arm, fixed a pair of blazing eyes upon me, and, in a voice which was admirably suited for commanding a charge of cavalry, said, 'Turn this fellow out of doors;' which was done, immediately by the landlord and the four porters, who made me descend the staircase somewhat faster than was agreeable. This is how it happens, dearest, that I have no lodging."

"Who can this Franciscan be?" said Montalais. "Is he a general?"

"That is exactly the very title that one of the bearers of the litter gave him as he spoke to him in a low tone."

"So that—" said Montalais.

"So that I have no room, no hotel, no lodging; and I am as determined as my friend Manicamp was just now, not to pass the night in the open air."

"What is to be done, then?" said Montalais.

"Nothing easier," said a third voice; whereupon Montalais and Malicorne uttered a simultaneous cry, and Saint-Aignan appeared. "Dear Monsieur Malicorne," said Saint-Aignan, "a very lucky accident has brought me back to extricate you from your embarrassment. Come, I can offer you a room in my own apartments, which, I can assure you, no Franciscan will deprive you of. As for you, my dear lady, rest easy. I already knew Mademoiselle de la Vallière's secret, and that of Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente; your own you have just been kind enough to confide to me; for which I thank you. I can keep three quite as well as one." Malicorne and Montalais looked at each other, like children detected in a theft; but as Malicorne saw a great advantage in the proposition which had been made to him, he gave Montalais a sign of assent, which she returned. Malicorne then descended the ladder, round by round, reflecting at every step on the means of obtaining piecemeal from M. de Saint-Aignan all he might possibly know about the famous secret. Montalais had already darted away like a deer, and neither cross-road nor labyrinth was able to lead her wrong. As for Saint-Aignan, he carried off Malicorne with him to his apartments, showing him a thousand attentions, enchanted to have so close at hand the very two men who, even supposing De Guiche were to remain silent, could give him the best information about the maids of honour.

LI. What Actually Occurred at the Inn Called the Beau Paon.

In the first place, let us supply our readers with a few details about the inn called Beau Paon. It owed its name to its sign, which represented a peacock spreading its tail. But, in imitation of certain painters who bestowed the face of a handsome young man on the serpent which tempted Eve, the limner of the sign had conferred upon the peacock the features of a woman. This famous inn, an architectural epigram against that half of the human race which renders existence delightful, was situated at Fontainebleau, in the first turning on the left-hand side, which divides the road from Paris, the large artery that constitutes in itself alone the entire town of Fontainebleau. The side street in question was then known as the Rue de Lyon, doubtless because, geographically, it led in the direction of the second capital of the kingdom. The street itself was composed of two houses occupied by persons of the class of tradespeople, the houses being separated by two large gardens bordered with hedges running round them. Apparently, however, there were three houses in the street. Let us explain, notwithstanding appearances, how there were in fact only two. The inn of the Beau Paon had its principal front towards the main street; but upon the Rue de Lyon there were two ranges of buildings divided by courtyards, which comprised sets of apartments for the reception of all classes of travelers, whether on foot or on horseback, or even with their own carriages; and in which could be supplied, not only board and lodging, but also accommodation for exercise, or opportunities of solitude for even the wealthiest courtiers, whenever, after having received some check at the court, they wished to shut themselves up to their own society, either to devour an affront, or to brood on revenge. From the windows of this part of the building travelers could perceive, in the first place, the street with the grass growing between the stones, which were being gradually loosened by it; next the beautiful hedges of elder and thorn, which embraced, as though within two green and flowery arms, the house of which we have spoken; and then, in the spaces between those houses, forming the groundwork of the picture, and appearing an almost impassable barrier, a line of thick trees, the advanced sentinels of the vast forest which extends in front of Fontainebleau. It was therefore easy, provided one secured an apartment at the angle of the building, to obtain, by the main street from Paris, a view of, as well as to hear, the passers-by and the fêtes; and, by the Rue de Lyon, to look upon and to enjoy the calm of the country. And this without reckoning that, in cases of urgent necessity, at the very moment people might be knocking at the principal door in the Rue de Paris, one could make one's escape by the little door in the Rue de Lyon, and, creeping along the gardens of the private houses, attain the outskirts of the forest. Malicorne, who, it will be remembered, was the first to speak about this inn, by way of deploring his being turned out of it, being then absorbed in his own affairs, had not told Montalais all that could be said about this curious inn; and we will try to repair the omission. With the exception of the few words he had said about the Franciscan friar, Malicorne had not given any particulars about the travelers who were staying in the inn. The manner in which they had arrived, the manner in which they had lived, the difficulty which existed for every one but certain privileged travelers, of entering the hotel without a password, or living there without certain preparatory precautions, must have struck Malicorne; and, we will venture to say, really did so. But Malicorne, as we have already said, had personal matters of his own to occupy his attention which prevented him from paying much attention to others. In fact, all the apartments of the hotel were engaged and retained by certain strangers, who never stirred out, who were incommunicative in their address, with countenances full of thoughtful preoccupation, and not one of whom was known to Malicorne. Every one of these travelers had reached the hotel after his own arrival there; each man had entered after having given a kind of password, which had at first attracted Malicorne's attention; but having inquired, in an indiscreet manner, about it, he had been informed that the host had given as a reason for this extreme vigilance, that, as the town was so full of wealthy noblemen, it must also be as full of clever and zealous pickpockets. The reputation of an honest inn like that of the Beau Paon was concerned in not allowing its visitors to be robbed. It occasionally happened that Malicorne asked himself, as he thought matters carefully over in his mind, and reflected upon his own position in the inn, how it was that they had allowed him to become an inmate of the hotel, when he had observed, since his residence there, admission refused to so many. He asked himself, too, how it was that Manicamp, who, in his opinion, must be a man to be looked upon with veneration by everybody, having wished to bait his horse at the Beau Paon, on arriving there, both horse and rider had been incontinently turned away with a nescio vos of the most positive character. All this for Malicorne, whose mind being fully occupied by his own love affair and personal ambition, was a problem he had not applied himself to solve. Had he wished to do so, we should hardly venture, notwithstanding the intelligence we have accorded as his due, to say he would have succeeded. A few words will prove to the reader that no one but Oedipus in person could have solved the enigma in question. During the week, seven travelers had taken up their abode in the inn, all of them having arrived there the day after the fortunate day on which Malicorne had fixed his choice on the Beau Paon. These seven persons, accompanied by a suitable retinue, were the following:—

First of all, a brigadier in the German army, his secretary, physician, three servants, and seven horses. The brigadier's name was the Comte de Wostpur.—A Spanish cardinal, with two nephews, two secretaries, an officer of his household, and twelve horses. The cardinal's name was My lord Herrebia.—A rich merchant of Bremen, with his man-servant and two horses. This merchant's name was Meinheer Bonstett.—A Venetian senator with his wife and daughter, both extremely beautiful. The senator's name was Signor Marini.—A Scottish laird, with seven highlanders of his clan, all on foot. The laird's name was MacCumnor.—An Austrian from Vienna without title or coat of arms, who had arrived in a carriage; a good deal of the priest, and something of the soldier. He was called the Councillor.—And, finally, a Flemish lady, with a man-servant, a lady's maid, and a female companion, a large retinue of servants, great display, and immense horses. She was called the Flemish lady. All these travelers had arrived on the same day, and yet their arrival had occasioned no confusion in the inn, no stoppage in the street; their apartments had been fixed upon beforehand, by their couriers or secretaries, who had arrived the previous evening or that very morning. Malicorne, who had arrived the previous day, riding an ill-conditioned horse, with a slender valise, had announced himself at the hotel of the Beau Paon as the friend of a nobleman desirous of witnessing the fetes, and who would himself arrive almost immediately. The landlord, on hearing these words, had smiled as if he were perfectly well acquainted either with Malicorne or his friend the nobleman, and had said to him, "Since you are the first arrival, monsieur, choose what apartment you please." And this was said with that obsequiousness of manners, so full of meaning with landlords, which means, "Make yourself perfectly easy, monsieur: we know with whom we have to do, and you will be treated accordingly." These words, and their accompanying gesture, Malicorne had thought very friendly, but rather obscure. However, as he did not wish to be very extravagant in his expenses, and as he thought that if he were to ask for a small apartment he would doubtless have been refused, on account of his want of consequence, he hastened to close at once with the innkeeper's remark, and deceive him with a cunning equal to his own. So, smiling as a man would do for whom whatever might be done was but simply his due, he said, "My dear host, I shall take the best and the gayest room in the house."

"With a stable?"

"Yes, with a stable."

"And when will you take it?"

"Immediately if it be possible."

"Quite so."

"But," said Malicorne, "I shall leave the large room unoccupied for the present."

"Very good!" said the landlord, with an air of intelligence.

"Certain reasons, which you will understand by and by, oblige me to take, at my own cost, this small room only."

"Yes, yes," said the host.

"When my friend arrives, he will occupy the large apartment: and as a matter of course, as this larger apartment will be his own affair, he will settle for it himself."

"Certainly," said the landlord, "certainly; let it be understood in that manner."

"It is agreed, then, that such shall be the terms?"

"Word for word."

"It is extraordinary," said Malicorne to himself. "You quite understand, then?"

"Yes."

"There is nothing more to be said. Since you understand,—for you do clearly understand, do you not?"

"Perfectly."

"Very well; and now show me to my room."

The landlord, cap in hand, preceded Malicorne, who installed himself in his room, and became more and more surprised to observe that the landlord, at every ascent or descent, looked and winked at him in a manner which indicated the best possible intelligence between them.

"There is some mistake here," said Malicorne to himself, "but until it is cleared up, I shall take advantage of it, which is the best thing I can possibly do." And he darted out of his room, like a hunting-dog following a scent, in search of all the news and curiosities of the court, getting himself burnt in one place and drowned in another, as he had told Mademoiselle de Montalais. The day after he had been installed in his room, he had noticed the seven travelers arrive successively, who speedily filled the whole hotel. When he saw this perfect multitude of people, of carriages, and retinue, Malicorne rubbed his hands delightedly, thinking that, one day later, he should not have found a bed to lie upon after his return from his exploring expeditions. When all the travelers were lodged, the landlord entered Malicorne's room, and with his accustomed courteousness, said to him, "You are aware, my dear monsieur, that the large room in the third detached building is still reserved for you?"

"Of course I am aware of it."

"I am really making you a present of it."

"Thank you."

"So that when your friend comes—"

"Well!"

"He will be satisfied with me, I hope: or, if he be not, he will be very difficult to please."

"Excuse me, but will you allow me to say a few words about my friend?"

"Of course, for you have a perfect right to do so."

"He intended to come, as you know."

"And he does so still."

"He may possibly have changed his opinion."

"No."

"You are quite sure, then?"

"Quite sure."

"But in case you should have some doubt."

"Well!"

"I can only say that I do not positively assure you that he will come."

"Yet he told you—"

"He certainly did tell me; but you know that man proposes and God disposes,—verba volant, scripta manent."

"Which is as much to say—"

"That what is spoken flies away, and what is written remains; and, as he did not write to me, but contented himself by saying to me, 'I will authorize you, yet without specifically instructing you,' you must feel that it places me in a very embarrassing position."

"What do you authorize me to do, then?"

"Why, to let your rooms if you find a good tenant for them."

"I?"

"Yes, you."

"Never will I do such a thing, monsieur. If he has not written to you, he has written to me."

"Ah! what does he say? Let us see if his letter agrees with his words."

"These are almost his very words. 'To the landlord of the Beau Paon Hotel,—You will have been informed of the meeting arranged to take place in your inn between some people of importance; I shall be one of those who will meet with the others at Fontainebleau. Keep for me, then, a small room for a friend who will arrive either before or after me—' and you are the friend, I suppose," said the landlord, interrupting his reading of the letter. Malicorne bowed modestly. The landlord continued:

"And a large apartment for myself. The large apartment is my own affair, but I wish the price of the smaller room to be moderate, as it is destined for a fellow who is deucedly poor.' It is still you he is speaking of, is he not?" said the host.

"Oh, certainly," said Malicorne.

"Then we are agreed; your friend will settle for his apartment, and you for your own."

"May I be broken alive on the wheel," said Malicorne to himself, "if I understand anything at all about it," and then he said aloud, "Well, then, are you satisfied with the name?"

"With what name?"

"With the name at the end of the letter. Does it give you the guarantee you require?"

"I was going to ask you the name."

"What! was the letter not signed?"

"No," said the landlord, opening his eyes very wide, full of mystery and curiosity.

"In that case," said Malicorne, imitating his gesture and his mysterious look, "if he has not given you his name, you understand, he must have his reasons for it."

"Oh, of course."

"And, therefore, I, his friend, his confidant, must not betray him."

"You are perfectly right, monsieur," said the landlord, "and I do not insist upon it."

"I appreciate your delicacy. As for myself, as my friend told you, my room is a separate affair, so let us come to terms about it. Short accounts make long friends. How much is it?"

"There is no hurry."

"Never mind, let us reckon it all up all the same. Room, my own board, a place in the stable for my horse, and his feed. How much per day?"

"Four livres, monsieur."

"Which will make twelve livres for the three days I have been here?"

"Yes, monsieur."

"Here are your twelve livres, then."

"But why settle now?"

"Because," said Malicorne, lowering his voice, and resorting to his former air of mystery, because he saw that the mysterious had succeeded, "because if I had to set off suddenly, to decamp at any moment, my account would be settled."

"You are right, monsieur."

"I may consider myself at home, then?"

"Perfectly."

"So far so well. Adieu!" And the landlord withdrew. Malicorne, left alone, reasoned with himself in the following manner: "No one but De Guiche or Manicamp could have written to this fellow; De Guiche, because he wishes to secure a lodging for himself beyond the precincts of the court, in the event of his success or failure, as the case might be; Manicamp, because De Guiche must have intrusted him with his commission. And De Guiche or Manicamp will have argued in this manner. The large apartment would serve for the reception, in a befitting manner, of a lady thickly veiled, reserving to the lady in question a double means of exit, either in a street somewhat deserted, or closely adjoining the forest. The smaller room might either shelter Manicamp for a time, who is De Guiche's confidant, and would be the vigilant keeper of the door, or De Guiche himself, acting, for greater safety, the part of a master and confidant at the same time. Yet," he continued, "how about this meeting which is to take place, and which has actually taken place, in this hotel? No doubt they are persons who are going to be presented to the king. And the 'poor devil,' for whom the smaller room is destined, is a trick, in order to better conceal De Guiche or Manicamp. If this be the case, as very likely it is, there is only half the mischief done, for there is simply the length of a purse string between Manicamp and Malicorne." After he had thus reasoned the matter out, Malicorne slept soundly, leaving the seven travelers to occupy, and in every sense of the word to walk up and down, their several lodgings in the hotel. Whenever there was nothing at court to put him out, when he had wearied himself with his excursions and investigations, tired of writing letters which he could never find an opportunity of delivering to the people they were intended for, he returned home to his comfortable little room, and leaning upon the balcony, which was filled with nasturtiums and white pinks, for whom Fontainebleau seemed to possess no attractions with all its illuminations, amusements, and fêtes.

Things went on in this manner until the seventh day, a day of which we have given such full details, with its night also, in the preceding chapters. On that night Malicorne was enjoying the fresh air, seated at his window, toward one o'clock in the morning, when Manicamp appeared on horseback, with a thoughtful and listless air.

"Good!" said Malicorne to himself, recognizing him at the first glance; "there's my friend, who is come to take possession of his apartment, that is to say, of my room." And he called to Manicamp, who looked up and immediately recognized Malicorne.

"Ah! by Jove!" said the former, his countenance clearing up, "glad to see you, Malicorne. I have been wandering about Fontainebleau, looking for three things I cannot find: De Guiche, a room, and a stable."

"Of M. de Guiche I cannot give you either good or bad news, for I have not seen him; but as far as concerns your room and a stable, that's another matter, for they have been retained here for you."

"Retained—and by whom?"

"By yourself, I presume."

"By me?"

"Do you mean to say you did not take lodgings here?"

"By no means," said Manicamp.

At this moment the landlord appeared on the threshold of the door.

"I want a room," said Manicamp.

"Did you engage one, monsieur?"

"No."

"Then I have no rooms to let."

"In that case, I have engaged a room," said Manicamp.

"A room simply, or lodgings?"

"Anything you please."

"By letter?" inquired the landlord.

Malicorne nodded affirmatively to Manicamp.

"Of course by letter," said Manicamp. "Did you not receive a letter from me?"

"What was the date of the letter?" inquired the host, in whom Manicamp's hesitation had aroused some suspicion.

Manicamp rubbed his ear, and looked up at Malicorne's window; but Malicorne had left his window and was coming down the stairs to his friend's assistance. At the very same moment, a traveler, wrapped in a large Spanish cloak, appeared at the porch, near enough to hear the conversation.

"I ask you what was the date of the letter you wrote to me to retain apartments here?" repeated the landlord, pressing the question.

"Last Wednesday was the date," said the mysterious stranger, in a soft and polished tone of voice, touching the landlord on the shoulder.

Manicamp drew back, and it was now Malicorne's turn, who appeared on the threshold, to scratch his ear. The landlord saluted the new arrival as a man who recognizes his true guest.

"Monsieur," he said to him, with civility, "your apartment is ready for you, and the stables too, only—" He looked round him and inquired, "Your horses?"

"My horses may or may not arrive. That, however, matters but little to you, provided you are paid for what has been engaged." The landlord bowed lower still.

"You have," continued the unknown traveler, "kept for me in addition, the small room I asked for?"

"Oh!" said Malicorne, endeavoring to hide himself.

"Your friend has occupied it during the last week," said the landlord, pointing to Malicorne, who was trying to make himself as small as possible. The traveler, drawing his cloak round him so as to cover the lower part of his face, cast a rapid glance at Malicorne, and said, "This gentleman is no friend of mine."

The landlord started violently.

"I am not acquainted with this gentleman," continued the traveler.

"What!" exclaimed the host, turning to Malicorne, "are you not this gentleman's friend, then?"

"What does it matter whether I am or not, provided you are paid?" said Malicorne, parodying the stranger's remark in a very majestic manner.

"It matters so far as this," said the landlord, who began to perceive that one person had been taken for another, "that I beg you, monsieur, to leave the rooms, which had been engaged beforehand, and by some one else instead of you."

"Still," said Malicorne, "this gentleman cannot require at the same time a room on the first floor and an apartment on the second. If this gentleman will take the room, I will take the apartment: if he prefers the apartment, I will be satisfied with the room."

"I am exceedingly distressed, monsieur," said the traveler in his soft voice, "but I need both the room and the apartment."

"At least, tell me for whom?" inquired Malicorne.

"The apartment I require for myself."

"Very well; but the room?"

"Look," said the traveler, pointing towards a sort of procession which was approaching.

Malicorne looked in the direction indicated, and observed borne upon a litter, the arrival of the Franciscan, whose installation in his apartment he had, with a few details of his own, related to Montalais, and whom he had so uselessly endeavored to convert to humbler views. The result of the arrival of the stranger, and of the sick Franciscan, was Malicorne's expulsion, without any consideration for his feelings, from the inn, by the landlord and the peasants who had carried the Franciscan. The details have already been given of what followed this expulsion; of Manicamp's conversation with Montalais; how Manicamp, with greater cleverness than Malicorne had shown, had succeeded in obtaining news of De Guiche, of the subsequent conversation of Montalais with Malicorne, and, finally, of the billets with which the Comte de Saint-Aignan had furnished Manicamp and Malicorne. It remains for us to inform our readers who was the traveler in the cloak—the principal tenant of the double apartment, of which Malicorne had only occupied a portion—and the Franciscan, quite as mysterious a personage, whose arrival, together with that of the stranger, unfortunately upset the two friends' plans.

LII. A Jesuit of the Eleventh Year.

In the first place, in order not to weary the reader's patience, we will hasten to answer the first question. The traveler with the cloak held over his face was Aramis, who, after he had left Fouquet, and taken from a portmanteau, which his servant had opened, a cavalier's complete costume, quitted the chateau, and went to the hotel of the Beau Paon, where, by letters, seven or eight days previously, he had, as the landlord had stated, directed a room and an apartment to be retained for him. Immediately after Malicorne and Manicamp had been turned out, Aramis approached the Franciscan, and asked him whether he would prefer the apartment or the room. The Franciscan inquired where they were both situated. He was told that the room was on the first, and the apartment on the second floor.

"The room, then," he said.

Aramis did not contradict him, but, with great submissiveness, said to the landlord: "The room." And bowing with respect he withdrew into the apartment, and the Franciscan was accordingly carried at once into the room. Now, is it not extraordinary that this respect should be shown by a prelate of the Church for a simple monk, for one, too, belonging to a mendicant order; to whom was given up, without a request for it even, a room which so many travelers were desirous of obtaining? How, too, can one explain the unexpected arrival of Aramis at the hotel—he who had entered the chateau with M. Fouquet, and could have remained at the chateau with M. Fouquet if he had liked? The Franciscan supported his removal up the staircase without uttering a complaint, although it was evident he suffered very much, and that every time the litter knocked against the wall or the railing of the staircase, he experienced a terrible shock throughout his frame. And finally, when he had arrived in the room, he said to those who carried him: "Help me to place myself in that armchair." The bearers of the litter placed it on the ground, and lifting the sick man up as gently as possible, carried him to the chair he had indicated, which was situated at the head of the bed. "Now," he added, with a marked benignity of gesture and tone, "desire the landlord to come."

They obeyed, and five minutes afterwards the landlord appeared at the door.

"Be kind enough," said the Franciscan to him, "to send these excellent fellows away; they are vassals of the Vicomte de Melun. They found me when I had fainted on the road overcome by the heat, and without thinking of whether they would be paid for their trouble, they wished to carry me to their own home. But I know at what cost to themselves is the hospitality which the poor extend to a sick monk, and I preferred this hotel, where, moreover, I was expected."

The landlord looked at the Franciscan in amazement, but the latter, with his thumb, made the sign of the cross in a peculiar manner upon his breast. The host replied by making a similar sign on his left shoulder. "Yes, indeed," he said, "we did expect you, but we hoped that you would arrive in a better state of health." And as the peasants were looking at the innkeeper, usually so supercilious, and saw how respectful he had become in the presence of a poor monk, the Franciscan drew from a deep pocket three or four pieces of gold which he held out.

"My friends," said he, "here is something to repay you for the care you have taken of me. So make yourselves perfectly easy, and do not be afraid of leaving me here. The order to which I belong, and for which I am traveling, does not require me to beg; only, as the attention you have shown me deserves to be rewarded, take these two louis and depart in peace."

The peasants did not dare to take them; the landlord took the two louis out of the monk's hand and placed them in that of one of the peasants, all four of whom withdrew, opening their eyes wider than ever. The door was then closed; and, while the innkeeper stood respectfully near it, the Franciscan collected himself for a moment. He then passed across his sallow face a hand which seemed dried up by fever, and rubbed his nervous and agitated fingers across his beard. His large eyes, hollowed by sickness and inquietude, seemed to peruse in the vague distance a mournful and fixed idea.

"What physicians have you at Fontainebleau?" he inquired, after a long pause.

"We have three, holy father."

"What are their names?"

"Luinquet first."

"The next one?"

"A brother of the Carmelite order, named Brother Hubert."

"The next?"

"A secular member, named Grisart."

"Ah! Grisart?" murmured the monk, "send for M. Grisart immediately."

The landlord moved in prompt obedience to the direction.

"Tell me what priests are there here?"

"What priests?"

"Yes; belonging to what orders?"

"There are Jesuits, Augustines, and Cordeliers; but the Jesuits are the closest at hand. Shall I send for a confessor belonging to the order of Jesuits?"

"Yes, immediately."

It will be imagined that, at the sign of the cross which they had exchanged, the landlord and the invalid monk had recognized each other as two affiliated members of the well-known Society of Jesus. Left to himself, the Franciscan drew from his pocket a bundle of papers, some of which he read over with the most careful attention. The violence of his disorder, however, overcame his courage; his eyes rolled in their sockets, a cold sweat poured down his face, and he nearly fainted, and lay with his head thrown backwards and his arms hanging down on both sides of his chair. For more than five minutes he remained without any movement, when the landlord returned, bringing with him the physician, whom he hardly allowed time to dress himself. The noise they made in entering the room, the current of air, which the opening of the door occasioned, restored the Franciscan to his senses. He hurriedly seized hold of the papers which were lying about, and with his long and bony hand concealed them under the cushions of the chair. The landlord went out of the room, leaving patient and physician together.

"Come here, Monsieur Grisart," said the Franciscan to the doctor; "approach closer, for there is no time to lose. Try, by touch and sound, and consider and pronounce your sentence."

"The landlord," replied the doctor, "told me I had the honour of attending an affiliated brother."

"Yes," replied the Franciscan, "it is so. Tell me the truth, then; I feel very ill, and I think I am about to die."

The physician took the monk's hand, and felt his pulse. "Oh, oh," he said, "a dangerous fever."

"What do you call a dangerous fever?" inquired the Franciscan, with an imperious look.

"To an affiliated member of the first or second year," replied the physician, looking inquiringly at the monk, "I should say—a fever that may be cured."

"But to me?" said the Franciscan. The physician hesitated.

"Look at my grey hair, and my forehead, full of anxious thought," he continued: "look at the lines in my face, by which I reckon up the trials I have undergone; I am a Jesuit of the eleventh year, Monsieur Grisart." The physician started, for, in fact, a Jesuit of the eleventh year was one of those men who had been initiated in all the secrets of the order, one of those for whom science has no more secrets, the society no further barriers to present—temporal obedience, no more trammels.

"In that case," said Grisart, saluting him with respect, "I am in the presence of a master?"

"Yes; act, therefore, accordingly."

"And you wish to know?"

"My real state."

"Well," said the physician, "it is a brain fever, which has reached its highest degree of intensity."

"There is no hope, then?" inquired the Franciscan, in a quick tone of voice.

"I do not say that," replied the doctor; "yet, considering the disordered state of the brain, the hurried respiration, the rapidity of the pulse, and the burning nature of the fever which is devouring you—"

"And which has thrice prostrated me since this morning," said the monk.

"All things considered, I shall call it a terrible attack. But why did you not stop on your road?"

"I was expected here, and I was obliged to come."

"Even at the risk of your life?"

"Yes, at the risk of dying on the way."

"Very well. Considering all the symptoms of your case, I must tell you that your condition is almost desperate."

The Franciscan smiled in a strange manner.

"What you have just told me is, perhaps, sufficient for what is due to an affiliated member, even of the eleventh year; but for what is due to me, Monsieur Grisart, it is too little, and I have a right to demand more. Come, then, let us be more candid still, and as frank as if you were making your own confession to Heaven. Besides, I have already sent for a confessor."

"Oh! I have hopes, however," murmured the doctor.

"Answer me," said the sick man, displaying with a dignified gesture a golden ring, the stone of which had until that moment been turned inside, and which bore engraved thereon the distinguishing mark of the Society of Jesus.

Grisart uttered loud exclamation. "The general!" he cried.

"Silence," said the Franciscan., "you can now understand that the whole truth is all important."

"My lord, my lord," murmured Grisart, "send for the confessor, for in two hours, at the next seizure, you will be attacked by delirium, and will pass away in its course."

"Very well," said the patient, for a moment contracting his eyebrows, "I have still two hours to live then?"

"Yes; particularly if you take the potion I will send you presently."

"And that will give me two hours of life?"

"Two hours."

"I would take it, were it poison, for those two hours are necessary not only for myself, but for the glory of the order."

"What a loss, what a catastrophe for us all!" murmured the physician.

"It is the loss of one man—nothing more," replied the Franciscan, "for Heaven will enable the poor monk, who is about to leave you, to find a worthy successor. Adieu, Monsieur Grisart; already even, through the goodness of Heaven, I have met with you. A physician who had not been one of our holy order, would have left me in ignorance of my condition; and, confident that existence would be prolonged a few days further, I should not have taken the necessary precautions. You are a learned man, Monsieur Grisart, and that confers an honour upon us all; it would have been repugnant to my feelings to have found one of our order of little standing in his profession. Adieu, Monsieur Grisart; send me the cordial immediately."

"Give me your blessing, at least, my lord."

"In my mind, I do; go, go; in my mind, I do so, I tell you—animo, Maitre Grisart, viribus impossibile." And he again fell back on the armchair, in an almost senseless state. M. Grisart hesitated, whether he should give him immediate assistance, or should run to prepare the cordial he had promised. He decided in favour of the cordial, for he darted out of the room and disappeared down the staircase. 6

LIII. The State Secret.

A few moments after the doctor's departure, the confessor arrived. He had hardly crossed the threshold of the door when the Franciscan fixed a penetrating look upon him, and, shaking his head, murmured—"A weak mind, I see; may Heaven forgive me if I die without the help of this living piece of human infirmity." The confessor, on his side, regarded the dying man with astonishment, almost with terror. He had never beheld eyes so burningly bright at the very moment they were about to close, nor looks so terrible at the moment they were about to be quenched in death. The Franciscan made a rapid and imperious movement of his hand. "Sit down, there, my father," he said, "and listen to me." The Jesuit confessor, a good priest, a recently initiated member of the order, who had merely seen the beginning of its mysteries, yielded to the superiority assumed by the penitent.

"There are several persons staying in this hotel," continued the Franciscan.

"But," inquired the Jesuit, "I thought I had been summoned to listen to a confession. Is your remark, then, a confession?"

"Why do you ask?"

"In order to know whether I am to keep your words secret."

"My remarks are part of my confession; I confide them to you in your character of a confessor."

"Very well," said the priest, seating himself on the chair which the Franciscan had, with great difficulty, just left, to lie down on the bed.

The Franciscan continued,—"I repeat, there are several persons staying in this inn."

"So I have heard."

"They ought to be eight in number."

The Jesuit made a sign that he understood him. "The first to whom I wish to speak," said the dying man, "is a German from Vienna, whose name is Baron de Wostpur. Be kind enough to go to him, and tell him the person he expected has arrived." The confessor, astounded, looked at his penitent; the confession seemed a singular one.

"Obey," said the Franciscan, in a tone of command impossible to resist. The good Jesuit, completely subdued, rose and left the room. As soon as he had gone, the Franciscan again took up the papers which a crisis of the fever had already, once before, obliged him to put aside.

"The Baron de Wostpur? Good!" he said; "ambitious, a fool, and straitened in means."

He folded up the papers, which he thrust under his pillow. Rapid footsteps were heard at the end of the corridor. The confessor returned, followed by the Baron de Wostpur, who walked along with his head raised, as if he were discussing with himself the possibility of touching the ceiling with the feather in his hat. Therefore, at the appearance of the Franciscan, at his melancholy look, and seeing the plainness of the room, he stopped, and inquired,—"Who has summoned me?"

"I," said the Franciscan, who turned towards the confessor, saying, "My good father, leave us for a moment together; when this gentleman leaves, you will return here." The Jesuit left the room, and, doubtless, availed himself of this momentary exile from the presence of the dying man to ask the host for some explanation about this strange penitent, who treated his confessor no better than he would a man servant. The baron approached the bed, and wished to speak, but the hand of the Franciscan imposed silence upon him.

"Every moment is precious," said the latter, hurriedly. "You have come here for the competition, have you not?"

"Yes, my father."

"You hope to be elected general of the order?"

"I hope so."

"You know on what conditions only you can possibly attain this high position, which makes one man the master of monarchs, the equal of popes?"

"Who are you," inquired the baron, "to subject me to these interrogations?"

"I am he whom you expected."

"The elector-general?"

"I am the elected."

"You are—"

The Franciscan did not give him time to reply; he extended his shrunken hand, on which glittered the ring of the general of the order. The baron drew back in surprise; and then, immediately afterwards, bowing with the profoundest respect, he exclaimed,—"Is it possible that you are here, my lord; you, in this wretched room; you, upon this miserable bed; you, in search of and selecting the future general, that is, your own successor?"

"Do not distress yourself about that, monsieur, but fulfil immediately the principal condition, of furnishing the order with a secret of importance, of such importance that one of the greatest courts of Europe will, by your instrumentality, forever be subjected to the order. Well! do you possess the secret which you promised, in your request, addressed to the grand council?"

"My lord—"

"Let us proceed, however, in due order," said the monk. "You are the Baron de Wostpur?"

"Yes, my lord."

"And this letter is from you?"

"Yes, my lord."

The general of the Jesuits drew a paper from his bundle, and presented it to the baron, who glanced at it, and made a sign in the affirmative, saying, "Yes, my lord, this letter is mine."

"Can you show me the reply which the secretary of the grand council returned to you?"

"Here it is," said the baron, holding towards the Franciscan a letter bearing simply the address, "To his excellency the Baron de Wostpur," and containing only this phrase, "From the 15th to the 22nd May, Fontainebleau, the hotel of the Beau Paon.—A. M. D. G." 7

"Right," said the Franciscan, "and now speak."

"I have a body of troops, composed of 50,000 men; all the officers are gained over. I am encamped on the Danube. In four days I can overthrow the emperor, who is, as you are aware, opposed to the progress of our order, and can replace him by whichever of the princes of his family the order may determine upon." The Franciscan listened, unmoved.

"Is that all?" he said.

"A revolution throughout Europe is included in my plan," said the baron.

"Very well, Monsieur de Wostpur, you will receive a reply; return to your room, and leave Fontainebleau within a quarter of an hour." The baron withdrew backwards, as obsequiously as if he were taking leave of the emperor he was ready to betray.

"There is no secret there," murmured the Franciscan, "it is a plot. Besides," he added, after a moment's reflection, "the future of Europe is no longer in the hands of the House of Austria."

And with a pencil he held in his hand, he struck the Baron de Wostpur's name from the list.

"Now for the cardinal," he said; "we ought to get something more serious from the side of Spain."

Raising his head, he perceived the confessor, who was awaiting his orders as respectfully as a school-boy.

"Ah, ah!" he said, noticing his submissive air, "you have been talking with the landlord."

"Yes, my lord; and to the physician."

"To Grisart?"

"Yes."

"He is here, then?"

"He is waiting with the potion he promised."

"Very well; if I require him, I will call; you now understand the great importance of my confession, do you not?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Then go and fetch me the Spanish Cardinal Herrebia. Make haste. Only, as you now understand the matter in hand, you will remain near me, for I begin to feel faint."

"Shall I summon the physician?"

"Not yet, not yet... the Spanish cardinal, no one else. Fly."

Five minutes afterwards, the cardinal, pale and disturbed, entered the little room.

"I am informed, my lord,—” stammered the cardinal.

"To the point," said the Franciscan, in a faint voice, showing the cardinal a letter which he had written to the grand council. "Is that your handwriting?"

"Yes, but—"

"And your summons?"

The cardinal hesitated to answer. His purple revolted against the mean garb of the poor Franciscan, who stretched out his hand and displayed the ring, which produced its effect, greater in proportion to the greatness of the person over whom the Franciscan exercised his influence.

"Quick, the secret, the secret!" said the dying man, leaning upon his confessor.

"Coram isto?" inquired the Spanish cardinal. 8

"Speak in Spanish," said the Franciscan, showing the liveliest attention.

"You are aware, my lord," said the cardinal, continuing the conversation in Castilian, "that the condition of the marriage of the Infanta with the king of France was the absolute renunciation of the rights of the said Infanta, as well as of King Louis XIV., to all claim to the crown of Spain." The Franciscan made a sign in the affirmative.

"The consequence is," continued the cardinal, "that the peace and alliance between the two kingdoms depend upon the observance of that clause of the contract." A similar sign from the Franciscan.

"Not only France and Spain," continued the cardinal, "but the whole of Europe even, would be violently rent asunder by the faithlessness of either party." Another movement of the dying man's head.

"It further results," continued the speaker, "that the man who might be able to foresee events, and to render certain that which is no more than a vague idea floating in the mind of man, that is to say, the idea of a future good or evil, would preserve the world from a great catastrophe; and the event, which has no fixed certainty even in the brain of him who originated it, could be turned to the advantage of our order."

"Pronto, pronto!" murmured the Franciscan, in Spanish, who suddenly became paler, and leaned upon the priest. The cardinal approached the ear of the dying man, and said, "Well, my lord, I know that the king of France has determined that, at the very first pretext, a death for instance, either that of the king of Spain, or that of a brother of the Infanta, France will, arms in hand, claim the inheritance, and I have in my possession, already prepared, the plan of policy agreed upon by Louis XIV. for this occasion."

"And this plan?" said the Franciscan.

"Here it is," returned the cardinal.

"In whose handwriting is it?"

"My own."

"Have you anything further to say to me?"

"I think I have said a good deal, my lord," replied the cardinal.

"Yes, you have rendered the order a great service. But how did you procure the details, by the aid of which you have constructed your plan?"

"I have the under-servants of the king of France in my pay, and I obtain from them all the waste papers, which have been saved from being burnt."

"Very ingenious," murmured the Franciscan, endeavoring to smile; "you will leave this hotel, cardinal, in a quarter of an hour, and a reply shall be sent you." The cardinal withdrew.

"Call Grisart, and desire the Venetian Marini to come," said the sick man.

While the confessor obeyed, the Franciscan, instead of striking out the cardinal's name, as he had done the baron's, made a cross at the side of it. Then, exhausted by the effort, he fell back on his bed, murmuring the name of Dr. Grisart. When he returned to his senses, he had drunk about half of the potion, of which the remainder was left in the glass, and he found himself supported by the physician, while the Venetian and the confessor were standing close to the door. The Venetian submitted to the same formalities as his two predecessors, hesitated as they had done at the sight of the two strangers, but his confidence restored by the order of the general, he revealed that the pope, terrified at the power of the order, was weaving a plot for the general expulsion of the Jesuits, and was tampering with the different courts of Europe in order to obtain their assistance. He described the pontiff's auxiliaries, his means of action, and indicated the particular locality in the Archipelago where, by a sudden surprise, two cardinals, adepts of the eleventh year, and, consequently, high in authority, were to be transported, together with thirty-two of the principal affiliated members of Rome. The Franciscan thanked the Signor Marini. It was by no means a slight service he had rendered the society by denouncing this pontifical project. The Venetian thereupon received directions to set off in a quarter of an hour, and left as radiant as if he already possessed the ring, the sign of the supreme authority of the society. As, however, he was departing, the Franciscan murmured to himself: "All these men are either spies, or a sort of police, not one of them a general; they have all discovered a plot, but not one of them a secret. It is not by means of ruin, or war, or force, that the Society of Jesus is to be governed, but by that mysterious influence moral superiority alone confers. No, the man is not yet found, and to complete the misfortune, Heaven strikes me down, and I am dying. Oh! must the society indeed fall with me for want of a column to support it? Must death, which is waiting for me, swallow up with me the future of the order; that future which ten years more of my own life would have rendered eternal? for that future, with the reign of the new king, is opening radiant and full of splendor." These words, which had been half-reflected, half-pronounced aloud, were listened to by the Jesuit confessor with a terror similar to that with which one listens to the wanderings of a person attacked by fever, whilst Grisart, with a mind of higher order, devoured them as the revelations of an unknown world, in which his looks were plunged without ability to comprehend. Suddenly the Franciscan recovered himself.

"Let us finish this," he said; "death is approaching. Oh! just now I was dying resignedly, for I hoped... while now I sink in despair, unless those who remain... Grisart, Grisart, give me to live a single hour longer."

Grisart approached the dying monk, and made him swallow a few drops, not of the potion which was still left in the glass, but of the contents of a small bottle he had upon his person.

"Call the Scotchman!" exclaimed the Franciscan; "call the Bremen merchant. Call, call quickly. I am dying. I am suffocated."

The confessor darted forward to seek assistance, as if there had been any human strength which could hold back the hand of death, which was weighing down the sick man; but, at the threshold of the door, he found Aramis, who, with his finger on his lips, like the statue of Harpocrates, the god of silence, by a look motioned him back to the end of the apartment. The physician and the confessor, after having consulted each other by looks, made a movement as if to push Aramis aside, who, however, with two signs of the cross, each made in a different manner, transfixed them both in their places.

"A chieff!" they both murmured.

Aramis slowly advanced into the room where the dying man was struggling against the first attack of the agony which had seized him. As for the Franciscan, whether owing to the effect of the elixir, or whether the appearance of Aramis had restored his strength, he made a movement, and his eyes glaring, his mouth half open, and his hair damp with sweat, sat up upon the bed. Aramis felt that the air of the room was stifling; the windows were closed; the fire was burning upon the hearth; a pair of candles of yellow wax were guttering down in the copper candlesticks, and still further increased, by their thick smoke, the temperature of the room. Aramis opened the window, and fixing upon the dying man a look full of intelligence and respect, said to him: "My lord, pray forgive my coming in this manner, before you summoned me, but your state alarms me, and I thought you might possibly die before you had seen me, for I am but the sixth upon your list."

The dying man started and looked at the list.

"You are, therefore, he who was formerly called Aramis, and since, the Chevalier d'Herblay? You are the bishop of Vannes?"

"Yes, my lord."

"I know you, I have seen you."

"At the last jubilee, we were with the Holy Father together."

"Yes, yes, I remember; and you place yourself on the list of candidates?"

"My lord, I have heard it said that the order required to become possessed of a great state secret, and knowing that from modesty you had in anticipation resigned your functions in favour of the person who should be the depositary of such a secret, I wrote to say that I was ready to compete, possessing alone a secret I believe to be important."

"Speak," said the Franciscan; "I am ready to listen to you, and to judge the importance of the secret."

"A secret of the value of that which I have the honour to confide to you cannot be communicated by word of mouth. Any idea which, when once expressed, has thereby lost its safeguard, and has become vulgarized by any manifestation or communication of it whatever, no longer is the property of him who gave it birth. My words may be overheard by some listener, or perhaps by an enemy; one ought not, therefore, to speak at random, for, in such a case, the secret would cease to be one."

"How do you propose, then, to convey your secret?" inquired the dying monk.

With one hand Aramis signed to the physician and the confessor to withdraw, and with the other he handed to the Franciscan a paper enclosed in a double envelope.

"Is not writing more dangerous still than language?"

"No, my lord," said Aramis, "for you will find within this envelope characters which you and I alone can understand." The Franciscan looked at Aramis with an astonishment which momentarily increased.

"It is a cipher," continued the latter, "which you used in 1655, and which your secretary, Juan Jujan, who is dead, could alone decipher, if he were restored to life."

"You knew this cipher, then?"

"It was I who taught it him," said Aramis, bowing with a gracefulness full of respect, and advancing towards the door as if to leave the room: but a gesture of the Franciscan accompanied by a cry for him to remain, restrained him.

"Ecce homo!" he exclaimed; then reading the paper a second time, he called out, "Approach, approach quickly!"

Aramis returned to the side of the Franciscan, with the same calm countenance and the same respectful manner, unchanged. The Franciscan, extending his arm, burnt by the flame of the candle the paper which Aramis had handed him. Then, taking hold of Aramis's hand, he drew him towards him, and inquired: "In what manner and by whose means could you possibly become acquainted with such a secret?"

"Through Madame de Chevreuse, the intimate friend and confidante of the queen."

"And Madame de Chevreuse—"

"Is dead."

"Did any others know it?"

"A man and a woman only, and they of the lower classes."

"Who are they?"

"Persons who had brought him up."

"What has become of them?"

"Dead also. This secret burns like vitriol."

"But you survive?"

"No one is aware that I know it."

"And for what length of time have you possessed this secret?"

"For the last fifteen years."

"And you have kept it?"

"I wished to live."

"And you give it to the order without ambition, without acknowledgement?"

"I give it to the order with ambition and with a hope of return," said Aramis; "for if you live, my lord, you will make of me, now you know me, what I can and ought to be."

"And as I am dying," exclaimed the Franciscan, "I constitute you my successor... Thus." And drawing off the ring, he passed it on Aramis's finger. Then, turning towards the two spectators of this scene, he said: "Be ye witnesses of this, and testify, if need be, that, sick in body, but sound in mind, I have freely and voluntarily bestowed this ring, the token of supreme authority, upon My lord d'Herblay, bishop of Vannes, whom I nominate my successor, and before whom I, an humble sinner, about to appear before Heaven, prostrate myself, as an example for all to follow." And the Franciscan bowed lowly and submissively, whilst the physician and the Jesuit fell on their knees. Aramis, even while he became paler than the dying man himself, bent his looks successively upon all the actors of this scene. Profoundly gratified ambition flowed with life-blood towards his heart.

"We must lose no time," said the Franciscan; "what I had still to do on earth was urgent. I shall never succeed in carrying it out."

"I will do it," said Aramis.

"It is well," said the Franciscan, and then turning towards the Jesuit and the doctor, he added, "Leave us alone," a direction they instantly obeyed.

"With this sign," he said, "you are the man needed to shake the world from one end to the other; with this sign you will overthrow; with this sign you will edify; in hoc signo vinces!" 9

"Close the door," continued the Franciscan after a pause. Aramis shut and bolted the door, and returned to the side of the Franciscan.

"The pope is conspiring against the order," said the monk; "the pope must die."

"He shall die," said Aramis, quietly.

"Seven hundred thousand livres are owing to a Bremen merchant of the name of Bonstett, who came here to get the guarantee of my signature."

"He shall be paid," said Aramis.

"Six knights of Malta, whose names are written here, have discovered, by the indiscretion of one of the affiliated of the eleventh year, the three mysteries; it must be ascertained what else these men have done with the secret, to get it back again and bury it."

"It shall be done."

"Three dangerous affiliated members must be sent away into Tibet, there to perish; they stand condemned. Here are their names."

"I will see that the sentence be carried out."

"Lastly, there is a lady at Anvers, grand-niece of Ravaillac; she holds certain papers in her hands that compromise the order. There has been payable to the family during the last fifty-one years a pension of fifty thousand livres. The pension is a heavy one, and the order is not wealthy. Redeem the papers, for a sum of money paid down, or, in case of refusal, stop the pension—but run no risk."

"I will quickly decide what is best to be done," said Aramis.

"A vessel chartered from Lima entered the port of Lisbon last week; ostensibly it is laden with chocolate, in reality with gold. Every ingot is concealed by a coating of chocolate. The vessel belongs to the order; it is worth seventeen millions of livres; you will see that it is claimed; here are the bills of landing."

"To what port shall I direct it to be taken?"

"To Bayonne."

"Before three weeks are over it shall be there, wind and weather permitting. Is that all?" The Franciscan made a sign in the affirmative, for he could no longer speak; the blood rushed to his throat and his head, and gushed from his mouth, his nostrils, and his eyes. The dying man had barely time to press Aramis's hand, when he fell in convulsions from his bed upon the floor. Aramis placed his hand upon the Franciscan's heart, but it had ceased to beat. As he stooped down, Aramis observed that a fragment of the paper he had given the Franciscan had escaped being burnt. He picked it up, and burnt it to the last atom. Then, summoning the confessor and the physician, he said to the former: "Your penitent is in heaven; he needs nothing more than prayers and the burial bestowed upon the pious dead. Go and prepare what is necessary for a simple interment, such as a poor monk only would require. Go."

The Jesuit left the room. Then, turning towards the physician, and observing his pale and anxious face, he said, in a low tone of voice: "Monsieur Grisart, empty and clean this glass; there is too much left in it of what the grand council desired you to put in."

Grisart, amazed, overcome, completely astounded, almost fell backwards in his extreme terror. Aramis shrugged his shoulders in sign of pity, took the glass, and poured out the contents among the ashes of the hearth. He then left the room, carrying the papers of the dead man with him.

LIV. A Mission.

The next day, or rather the same day (for the events we have just described were concluded only at three o'clock in the morning), before breakfast was served, and as the king was preparing to go to mass with the two queens; as Monsieur, with the Chevalier de Lorraine, and a few other intimate companions, was mounting his horse to set off for the river, to take one of those celebrated baths with which the ladies of the court were so infatuated, as, in fact, no one remained in the chateau, with the exception of Madame who, under the pretext of indisposition, would not leave her room; Montalais was seen, or rather not was not seen, to glide stealthily out of the room appropriated to the maids of honour, leading La Vallière after her, who tried to conceal herself as much as possible, and both of them, hurrying secretly through the gardens, succeeded, looking round them at every step they took, in reaching the thicket. The weather was cloudy, a warm breeze bowed the flowers and the shrubs, the burning dust, swept along in clouds by the wind, was whirled in eddies towards the trees. Montalais, who, during their progress, had discharged the functions of a clever scout, advanced a few steps further, and turning round again, to be quite sure that no one was either listening or approaching, said to her companion, "Thank goodness, we are quite alone! Since yesterday every one spies on us here, and a circle seems to be drawn round us, as if we were plague-stricken." La Vallière bent down her head and sighed. "It is positively unheard of," continued Montalais; "from M. Malicorne to M. de Saint-Aignan, every one wishes to get hold of our secret. Come, Louise, let us take counsel, you and I, together, in order that I may know what to do."

La Vallière lifted towards her companion her beautiful eyes, pure and deep as the azure of a spring sky, "And I," she said, "will ask you why we have been summoned to Madame's own room? Why have we slept close to her apartment, instead of sleeping as usual in our own? Why did you return so late, and whence are these measures of strict supervision which have been adopted since this morning, with respect to us both?"

"My dear Louise, you answer my question by another, or rather, by ten others, which is not answering me at all. I will tell you all you want to know later, and as it is of secondary importance, you can wait. What I ask you—for everything will depend upon that—is, whether there is or is not any secret?"

"I do not know if there is any secret," said La Vallière; "but I do know, for my part at least, that there has been great imprudence committed. Since the foolish remark I made, and my still more silly fainting yesterday, every one here is making remarks about us."

"Speak for yourself," said Montalais, laughing, "speak for yourself and for Tonnay-Charente; for both of you made your declarations of love to the skies, which unfortunately were intercepted."

La Vallière hung down her head. "Really you overwhelm me," she said.

"I?"

"Yes, you torture me with your jests."

"Listen to me, Louise. These are no jests, for nothing is more serious; on the contrary, I did not drag you out of the chateau; I did not miss attending mass; I did not pretend to have a cold, as Madame did, which she has no more than I have; and, lastly, I did not display ten times more diplomacy than M. Colbert inherited from M. de Mazarin, and makes use of with respect to M. Fouquet, in order to find means of confiding my perplexities to you, for the sole end and purpose that, when at last we were alone, with no one to listen to us, you should deal hypocritically with me. No, no; believe me, that when I ask you a question, it is not from curiosity alone, but really because the position is a critical one. What you said yesterday is now known,—it is a text on which every one is discoursing. Every one embellishes it to the utmost, and according to his own fancy; you had the honour last night, and you have it still to-day, of occupying the whole court, my dear Louise; and the number of tender and witty remarks which have been ascribed to you, would make Mademoiselle de Scudery and her brother burst from very spite, if they were faithfully reported."

"But, dearest Montalais," said the poor girl, "you know better than any one exactly what I said, since you were present when I said it."

"Yes, I know. But that is not the question. I have not forgotten a single syllable you uttered, but did you think what you were saying?"

Louise became confused. "What," she exclaimed, "more questions still! Oh, heavens! when I would give the world to forget what I did say, how does it happen that every one does all he possibly can to remind me of it? Oh, this is indeed terrible!"

"What is?"

"To have a friend who ought to spare me, who might advise me and help me to save myself, and yet who is undoing me—is killing me."

"There, there, that will do," said Montalais; "after having said too little, you now say too much. No one thinks of killing you, nor even of robbing you, even of your secret; I wish to have it voluntarily, and in no other way; for the question does not concern your own affairs only, but ours also; and Tonnay-Charente would tell you as I do, if she were here. For, the fact is, that last evening she wished to have some private conversation in our room, and I was going there after the Manicamp and Malicorne colloquies terminated, when I learned, on my return, rather late, it is true, that Madame had sequestered her maids of honour, and that we were to sleep in her apartments, instead of our own. Moreover, Madame has shut up her maids of honour in order that they should not have the time to concert any measures together, and this morning she was closeted with Tonnay-Charente with the same object. Tell me, then, to what extent Athenais and I can rely upon you, as we will tell you in what way you can rely upon us?"

"I do not clearly understand the question you have put," said Louise, much agitated.

"Hum! and yet, on the contrary, you seem to understand me very well. However, I will put my questions in a more precise manner, in order that you may not be able, in the slightest degree, to evade them. Listen to me: Do you love M. de Bragelonne? That is plain enough, is it not?"

At this question, which fell like the first bombshell of a besieging army into a doomed town, Louise started. "You ask me," she exclaimed, "if I love Raoul, the friend of my childhood,—my brother almost?"

"No, no, no! Again you evade me, or rather, you wish to escape me. I do not ask if you love Raoul, your childhood's friend,—your brother; but I ask if you love the Vicomte de Bragelonne, your affianced husband?"

"Good heavens! dear Montalais," said Louise, "how severe your tone is!"

"You deserve no indulgence,—I am neither more nor less severe than usual. I put a question to you, so answer it."

"You certainly do not," said Louise, in a choking voice, "speak to me like a friend; but I will answer you as a true friend."

"Well, do so."

"Very well; my heart is full of scruples and silly feelings of pride, with respect to everything that a woman ought to keep secret, and in this respect no one has ever read into the bottom of my soul."

"That I know very well. If I had read it, I should not interrogate you as I have done; I should simply say,—'My good Louise, you have the happiness of an acquaintance with M. de Bragelonne, who is an excellent young man, and an advantageous match for a girl without fortune. M. de la Fere will leave something like fifteen thousand livres a year to his son. At a future day, then, you, as this son's wife, will have fifteen thousand livres a year; which is not bad. Turn, then, neither to the right hand nor to the left, but go frankly to M. de Bragelonne; that is to say, to the altar to which he will lead you. Afterwards, why— afterwards, according to his disposition, you will be emancipated or enslaved; in other words, you will have a right to commit any piece of folly people commit who have either too much liberty or too little.' That is, my dear Louise, what I should have told you at first, if I had been able to read your heart."

"And I should have thanked you," stammered out Louise, "although the advice does not appear to me to be altogether sound."

"Wait, wait. But immediately after having given you that advice, I should have added,—'Louise, it is very dangerous to pass whole days with your head drooping, your hands unoccupied, your eyes restless and full of thought; it is dangerous to prefer the least frequented paths, and no longer be amused with such diversions as gladden young girls' hearts; it is dangerous, Louise, to scrawl with the point of your foot, as you do, upon the gravel, certain letters it is useless for you to efface, but which appear again under your heel, particularly when those letters rather resemble the letter L than the letter B; and, lastly, it is dangerous to allow the mind to dwell on a thousand wild fancies, the fruits of solitude and heartache; these fancies, while they sink into a young girl's mind, make her cheeks sink in also, so that it is not unusual, on such occasions, to find the most delightful persons in the world become the most disagreeable, and the wittiest to become the dullest.'"

"I thank you, dearest Aure," replied La Vallière, gently; "it is like you to speak to me in this manner, and I thank you for it."

"It was only for the benefit of wild dreamers, such as I have just described, that I spoke; do not take any of my words, then, to yourself, except such as you think you deserve. Stay, I hardly know what story recurs to my memory of some silly or melancholy girl, who was gradually pining away because she fancied that the prince, or the king, or the emperor, whoever it was—and it does not matter much which—had fallen in love with her; while on the contrary, the prince, or the king, or the emperor, whichever you please, was plainly in love with some one else, and—a singular circumstance, one, indeed, which she could not perceive, although every one around and about her perceived it clearly enough— made use of her as a screen for his own love affair. You laugh as I do, at this poor silly girl, do you not, Louise?"

"I?—oh! of course," stammered Louise, pale as death.

"And you are right, too, for the thing is amusing enough. The story, whether true or false, amused me, and so I remembered it and told it to you. Just imagine then, my good Louise, the mischief that such a melancholy would create in anybody's brain,—a melancholy, I mean, of that kind. For my own part, I resolved to tell you the story; for if such a thing were to happen to either of us, it would be most essential to be assured of its truth; to-day it is a snare, to-morrow it would become a jest and mockery, the next day it would mean death itself." La Vallière started again, and became, if possible, still paler.

"Whenever a king takes notice of us," continued Montalais, "he lets us see it easily enough, and, if we happen to be the object he covets, he knows very well how to gain his object. You see, then, Louise, that, in such circumstances, between young girls exposed to such a danger as the one in question, the most perfect confidence should exist, in order that those hearts which are not disposed towards melancholy may watch over those likely to become so."

"Silence, silence!" said La Vallière; "some one approaches."

"Some one is approaching fast, in fact," said Montalais; "but who can it possibly be? Everybody is away, either at mass with the king, or bathing with Monsieur."

At the end of the walk the young girls perceived almost immediately, beneath the arching trees, the graceful carriage and noble stature of a young man, who, with his sword under his arm and a cloak thrown across his shoulders, booted and spurred besides, saluted them from the distance with a gentle smile. "Raoul!" exclaimed Montalais.

"M. de Bragelonne!" murmured Louise.

"A very proper judge to decide upon our difference of opinion," said Montalais.

"Oh! Montalais, Montalais, for pity's sake," exclaimed La Vallière, "after having been so cruel, show me a little mercy." These words, uttered with all the fervor of a prayer, effaced all trace of irony, if not from Montalais's heart, at least from her face.

"Why, you are as handsome as Amadis, Monsieur de Bragelonne," she cried to Raoul, "and armed and booted like him."

"A thousand compliments, young ladies," replied Raoul, bowing.

"But why, I ask, are you booted in this manner?" repeated Montalais, whilst La Vallière, although she looked at Raoul with a surprise equal to that of her companion, nevertheless uttered not a word.

"Why?" inquired Raoul.

"Yes!" ventured Louise.

"Because I am about to set off," said Bragelonne, looking at Louise.

The young girl seemed as though smitten by some superstitious feeling of terror, and tottered. "You are going away, Raoul!" she cried; "and where are you going?"

"Dearest Louise," he replied, with that quiet, composed manner which was natural to him, "I am going to England."

"What are you going to do in England?"

"The king has sent me there."

"The king!" exclaimed Louise and Aure together, involuntarily exchanging glances, the conversation which had just been interrupted recurring to them both. Raoul intercepted the glance, but could not understand its meaning, and, naturally enough, attributed it to the interest both the young girls took in him.

"His majesty," he said, "has been good enough to remember that the Comte de la Fere is high in favour with King Charles II. This morning, as he was on his way to attend mass, the king, seeing me as he passed, signed to me to approach, which I accordingly did. 'Monsieur de Bragelonne,' he said to me, 'you will call upon M. Fouquet, who has received from me letters for the king of Great Britain; you will be the bearer of them.' I bowed. 'Ah! his majesty added, 'before you leave, you will be good enough to take any commissions which Madame may have for the king her brother.'"

"Gracious heaven!" murmured Louise, much agitated, and yet full of thought at the same time.

"So quickly! You are desired to set off in such haste!" said Montalais, almost paralyzed by this unforeseen event.

"Properly to obey those whom we respect," said Raoul, "it is necessary to obey quickly. Within ten minutes after I had received the order, I was ready. Madame, already informed, is writing the letter which she is good enough to do me the honour of intrusting to me. In the meantime, learning from Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente that it was likely you would be in this direction, I came here, and am happy to find you both."

"And both of us very sad, as you see," said Montalais, going to Louise's assistance, whose countenance was visibly altered.

"Suffering?" responded Raoul, pressing Louise's hand with a tender curiosity. "Your hand is like ice."

"It is nothing."

"This coldness does not reach your heart, Louise, does it?" inquired the young man, with a tender smile. Louise raised her head hastily, as if the question had been inspired by some suspicion, and had aroused a feeling of remorse.

"Oh! you know," she said, with an effort, "that my heart will never be cold towards a friend like yourself, Monsieur de Bragelonne."

"Thank you, Louise. I know both your heart and your mind; it is not by the touch of the hand that one can judge of an affection like yours. You know, Louise, how devotedly I love you, with what perfect and unreserved confidence I reserve my life for you; will you not forgive me, then, for speaking to you with something like the frankness of a child?"

"Speak, Monsieur Raoul," said Louise, trembling painfully, "I am listening."

"I cannot part from you, carrying away with me a thought that tortures me; absurd I know it to be, and yet one which rends my very heart."

"Are you going away, then, for any length of time?" inquired La Vallière, with faltering utterance, while Montalais turned her head aside.

"No; probably I shall not be absent more than a fortnight." La Vallière pressed her hand upon her heart, which felt as though it were breaking.

"It is strange," pursued Raoul, looking at the young girl with a melancholy expression; "I have often left you when setting off on adventures fraught with danger. Then I started joyously enough—my heart free, my mind intoxicated by thoughts of happiness in store for me, hopes of which the future was full; and yet I was about to face the Spanish cannon, or the halberds of the Walloons. To-day, without the existence of any danger or uneasiness, and by the sunniest path in the world, I am going in search of a glorious recompense, which this mark of the king's favour seems to indicate, for I am, perhaps, going to win you, Louise. What other favour, more precious than yourself, could the king confer upon me? Yet, Louise, in very truth I know not how or why, but this happiness and this future seem to vanish before my very eyes like mist—like an idle dream; and I feel here, here at the very bottom of my heart, a deep-seated grief, a dejection I cannot overcome— something heavy, passionless, death-like,—resembling a corpse. Oh! Louise, too well do I know why; it is because I have never loved you so truly as now. God help me!"

At this last exclamation, which issued as it were from a broken heart, Louise burst into tears, and threw herself into Montalais's arms. The latter, although she was not easily moved, felt the tears rush to her eyes. Raoul noted only the tears Louise shed; his look, however, did not penetrate—nay, sought not to penetrate—beyond those tears. He bent his knee before her, and tenderly kissed her hand; and it was evident that in that kiss he poured out his whole heart.

"Rise, rise," said Montalais to him, ready to cry, "for Athenais is coming."

Raoul rose, brushed his knee with the back of his hand, smiled again upon Louise, whose eyes were fixed on the ground, and, having pressed Montalais's hand gratefully, he turned round to salute Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, the sound of whose silken robe was already heard upon the gravel walk. "Has Madame finished her letter?" he inquired, when the young girl came within reach of his voice.

"Yes, the letter is finished, sealed, and her royal highness is ready to receive you."

Raoul, at this remark, hardly gave himself time to salute Athenais, cast one look at Louise, bowed to Montalais, and withdrew in the direction of the chateau. As he withdrew he again turned round, but at last, at the end of the grand walk, it was useless to do so again, as he could no longer see them. The three young girls, on their side, had, with widely different feelings, watched him disappear.

"At last," said Athenais, the first to interrupt the silence, "at last we are alone, free to talk of yesterday's great affair, and to come to an understanding upon the conduct it is advisable for us to pursue. Besides, if you will listen to me," she continued, looking round on all sides, "I will explain to you, as briefly as possible, in the first place, our own duty, such as I imagine it to be, and, if you do not understand a hint, what is Madame's desire on the subject." And Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente pronounced these words in such a tone as to leave no doubt, in her companion's minds, upon the official character with which she was invested.

"Madame's desire!" exclaimed Montalais and La Vallière together.

"Her ultimatum," replied Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, diplomatically.

"But," murmured La Vallière, "does Madame know, then—"

"Madame knows more about the matter than we said, even," said Athenais, in a formal, precise manner. "Therefore let us come to a proper understanding."

"Yes, indeed," said Montalais, "and I am listening in breathless attention."

"Gracious heavens!" murmured Louise, trembling, "shall I ever survive this cruel evening?"

"Oh! do not frighten yourself in that manner," said Athenais; "we have found a remedy." So, seating herself between her two companions, and taking each of them by the hand, which she held in her own, she began. The first words were hardly spoke, when they heard a horse galloping away over the stones of the public high-road, outside the gates of the chateau.

LV. Happy as a Prince.

At the very moment he was about entering the chateau, Bragelonne met De Guiche. But before having been met by Raoul, De Guiche had met Manicamp, who had met Malicorne. How was it that Malicorne had met Manicamp? Nothing more simple, for he had awaited his return from mass, where he had accompanied M. de Saint-Aignan. When they met, they congratulated each other upon their good fortune, and Manicamp availed himself of the circumstance to ask his friend if he had not a few crowns still remaining at the bottom of his pocket. The latter, without expressing any surprise at the question, which he perhaps expected, answered that every pocket which is always being drawn upon without anything ever being put in it, resembles those wells which supply water during the winter, but which gardeners render useless by exhausting during the summer; that his, Malicorne's, pocket certainly was deep, and that there would be a pleasure in drawing on it in times of plenty, but that, unhappily, abuse had produced barrenness. To this remark, Manicamp, deep in thought, had replied, "Quite true!"

"The question, then, is how to fill it?" Malicorne added.

"Of course; but in what way?"

"Nothing easier, my dear Monsieur Manicamp."

"So much the better. How?"

"A post in Monsieur's household, and the pocket is full again."

"You have the post?"

"That is, I have the promise of being nominated."

"Well!"

"Yes; but the promise of nomination, without the post itself, is like a purse with no money in it."

"Quite true," Manicamp replied a second time.

"Let us try for the post, then," the candidate had persisted.

"My dear fellow," sighed Manicamp, "an appointment in his royal highness's household is one of the gravest difficulties of our position."

"Oh! oh!"

"There is no question that, at the present moment, we cannot ask Monsieur for anything."

"Why so?" "Because we are not on good terms with him."

"A great absurdity, too," said Malicorne, promptly.

"Bah! and if we were to show Madame any attention," said Manicamp, "frankly speaking, do you think we should please Monsieur?"

"Precisely; if we show Madame any attention, and do it adroitly, Monsieur ought to adore us."

"Hum!"

"Either that or we are great fools. Make haste, therefore, M. Manicamp, you who are so able a politician, and make M. de Guiche and his royal highness friendly again."

"Tell me, what did M. de Saint-Aignan tell you, Malicorne?"

"Tell me? nothing; he asked me several questions, and that was all."

"Well, was he less discreet, then, with me."

"What did he tell you?"

"That the king is passionately in love with Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

"We knew that already," replied Malicorne, ironically, "and everybody talks about it loud enough for all to know it; but in the meantime, do what I advise you; speak to M. de Guiche, and endeavor to get him to make advances to Monsieur. Deuce take it! he owes his royal highness that, at least."

"But we must see De Guiche, then?"

"There does not seem to be any great difficulty in that; try to see him in the same way I tried to see you; wait for him; you know that he is naturally very fond of walking."

"Yes; but whereabouts does he walk?"

"What a question to ask! Do you not know that he is in love with Madame?"

"So it is said."

"Very well; you will find him walking about on the side of the chateau where her apartments are."

"Stay, my dear Malicorne, you were not mistaken, for here he is coming."

"Why should I be mistaken? Have you ever noticed that I am in the habit of making a mistake? Come, we only need to understand each other. Are you in want of money?"

"Ah!" exclaimed Manicamp, mournfully.

"Well, I want my appointment. Let Malicorne have the appointment, and Manicamp shall have the money. There is no greater difficulty in the way than that."

"Very well; in that case make yourself easy. I will do my best."

"Do."

De Guiche approached, Malicorne stepped aside, and Manicamp caught hold of De Guiche, who was thoughtful and melancholy. "Tell me, my dear comte, what rhyme you were trying to find," said Manicamp. "I have an excellent one to match yours, particularly if yours ends in ame."

De Guiche shook his head, and recognizing a friend, he took him by the arm. "My dear Manicamp," he said, "I am in search of something very different from a rhyme."

"What is it you are looking for?"

"You will help me to find what I am in search of," continued the comte: "you who are such an idle fellow, in other words, a man with a mind full of ingenious devices."

"I am getting my ingenuity ready, then, my dear comte."

"This is the state of the case, then: I wish to approach a particular house, where I have some business."

"You must get near the house, then," said Manicamp.

"Very good; but in this house dwells a husband who happens to be jealous."

"Is he more jealous than the dog Cerberus?"

"Not more, but quite as much so."

"Has he three mouths, as that obdurate guardian of the infernal regions had? Do not shrug your shoulders, my dear comte: I put the question to you with an excellent reason, since poets pretend that, in order to soften Monsieur Cerberus, the visitor must take something enticing with him—a cake, for instance. Therefore, I, who view the matter in a prosaic light, that is to say in the light of reality, I say: one cake is very little for three mouths. If your jealous husband has three mouths, comte, get three cakes."

"Manicamp, I can get such advice as that from M. de Beautru."

"In order to get better advice," said Manicamp, with a comical seriousness of expression, "you will be obliged to adopt a more precise formula than you have used towards me."

"If Raoul were here," said De Guiche, "he would be sure to understand me."

"So I think, particularly if you said to him: 'I should very much like to see Madame a little nearer, but I fear Monsieur, because he is jealous.'"

"Manicamp!" cried the comte, angrily, and endeavoring to overwhelm his tormentor by a look, who did not, however, appear to be in the slightest degree disturbed by it.

"What is the matter now, my dear comte?" inquired Manicamp.

"What! is it thus you blaspheme the most sacred of names?"

"What names?"

"Monsieur! Madame! the highest names in the kingdom."

"You are very strangely mistaken, my dear comte. I never mentioned the highest names in the kingdom. I merely answered you in reference to the subject of a jealous husband, whose name you did not tell me, and who, as a matter of course, has a wife. I therefore replied to you, in order to see Madame, you must get a little more intimate with Monsieur."

"Double-dealer that you are," said the comte, smiling; "was that what you said?"

"Nothing else."

"Very good; what then?"

"Now," added Manicamp, "let the question be regarding the Duchess—or the Duke—; very well, I shall say: Let us get into the house in some way or other, for that is a tactic which cannot in any case be unfavourable to your love affair."

"Ah! Manicamp, if you could but find me a pretext, a good pretext."

"A pretext; I can find you a hundred, nay, a thousand. If Malicorne were here, he would have already hit upon a thousand excellent pretexts."

"Who is Malicorne?" replied De Guiche, half-shutting his eyes, like a person reflecting, "I seem to know the name."

"Know him! I should think so: you owe his father thirty thousand crowns."

"Ah, indeed! so it's that worthy fellow from Orleans."

"Whom you promised an appointment in Monsieur's household; not the jealous husband, but the other."

"Well, then, since your friend Malicorne is such an inventive genius, let him find me a means of being adored by Monsieur, and a pretext to make my peace with him."

"Very good: I'll talk to him about it."

"But who is that coming?"

"The Vicomte de Bragelonne."

"Raoul! yes, it is he," said De Guiche, as he hastened forward to meet him. "You here, Raoul?" said De Guiche.

"Yes: I was looking for you to say farewell," replied Raoul, warmly, pressing the comte's hand. "How do you do, Monsieur Manicamp?"

"How is this, vicomte, you are leaving us?"

"Yes, a mission from the king."

"Where are you going?"

"To London. On leaving you, I am going to Madame; she has a letter to give me for his majesty, Charles II."

"You will find her alone, for Monsieur has gone out; gone to bathe, in fact."

"In that case, you, who are one of Monsieur's gentlemen in waiting, will undertake to make my excuses to him. I would have waited in order to receive any directions he might have to give me, if the desire for my immediate departure had not been intimated to me by M. Fouquet on behalf of his majesty."

Manicamp touched De Guiche's elbow, saying, "There's a pretext for you."

"What?"

"M. de Bragelonne's excuses."

"A weak pretext," said De Guiche.

"An excellent one, if Monsieur is not angry with you; but a paltry one if he bears you ill-will."

"You are right, Manicamp; a pretext, however poor it may be, is all I require. And so, a pleasant journey to you, Raoul!" And the two friends took a warm leave of each other.

Five minutes afterwards Raoul entered Madame's apartments, as Mademoiselle de Montalais had begged him to do. Madame was still seated at the table where she had written her letter. Before her was still burning the rose-coloured taper she had used to seal it. Only in her deep reflection, for Madame seemed to be buried in thought, she had forgotten to extinguish the light. Bragelonne was a very model of elegance in every way; it was impossible to see him once without always remembering him; and not only had Madame seen him once, but it will not be forgotten he was one of the very first who had gone to meet her, and had accompanied her from Le Havre to Paris. Madame preserved therefore an excellent recollection of him.

"Ah! M. de Bragelonne," she said to him, "you are going to see my brother, who will be delighted to pay to the son a portion of the debt of gratitude he contracted with the father."

"The Comte de la Fere, Madame, has been abundantly recompensed for the little service he had the happiness to render the king, by the kindness manifested towards him, and it is I who will have to convey to his majesty the assurance of the respect, devotion, and gratitude of both father and son."

"Do you know my brother?"

"No, your highness; I shall have the honour of seeing his majesty for the first time."

"You require no recommendation to him. At all events, however, if you have any doubt about your personal merit, take me unhesitatingly for your surety."

"Your royal highness overwhelms me with kindness."

"No! M. de Bragelonne, I well remember that we were fellow-travelers once, and that I remarked your extreme prudence in the midst of the extravagant absurdities committed, on both sides, by two of the greatest simpletons in the world,—M. de Guiche and the Duke of Buckingham. Let us not speak of them, however; but of yourself. Are you going to England to remain there permanently? Forgive my inquiry: it is not curiosity, but a desire to be of service to you in anything I can."

"No, Madame; I am going to England to fulfil a mission which his majesty has been kind enough to confide to me—nothing more."

"And you propose to return to France?"

"As soon as I have accomplished my mission; unless, indeed, his majesty, King Charles II., should have other orders for me."

"He well beg you, at the very least, I am sure, to remain near him as long as possible."

"In that case, as I shall not know how to refuse, I will now beforehand entreat your royal highness to have the goodness to remind the king of France that one of his devoted servants is far away from him."

"Take care that when you are recalled, you do not consider his command an abuse of power."

"I do not understand you, Madame."

"The court of France is not easily matched, I am aware, but yet we have some pretty women at the court of England also."

Raoul smiled.

"Oh!" said Madame, "yours is a smile which portends no good to my countrywomen. It is as though you were telling them, Monsieur de Bragelonne: 'I visit you, but I leave my heart on the other side of the Channel.' Did not your smile indicate that?"

"Your highness is gifted with the power of reading the inmost depths of the soul, and you will understand, therefore, why, at present, any prolonged residence at the court of England would be a matter of the deepest regret."

"And I need not inquire if so gallant a knight is recompensed in return?"

"I have been brought up, Madame, with her whom I love, and I believe our affection is mutual."

"In that case, do not delay your departure, Monsieur de Bragelonne, and delay not your return, for on your return we shall see two persons happy; for I hope no obstacle exists to your felicity."

"There is a great obstacle, Madame."

"Indeed! what is it?"

"The king's wishes on the subject."

"The king opposes your marriage?"

"He postpones it, at least. I solicited his majesty's consent through the Comte de la Fere, and, without absolutely refusing it, he positively said it must be deferred."

"Is the young lady whom you love unworthy of you, then?"

"She is worthy of a king's affection, Madame."

"I mean, she is not, perhaps, of birth equal to your own."

"Her family is excellent."

"Is she young, beautiful?"

"She is seventeen, and, in my opinion, exceedingly beautiful."

"Is she in the country, or at Paris?"

"She is here at Fontainebleau, Madame."

"At the court?"

"Yes."

"Do I know her?"

"She has the honour to form one of your highness's household."

"Her name?" inquired the princess, anxiously; "if indeed," she added, hastily, "her name is not a secret."

"No, Madame, my affection is too pure for me to make a secret of it to any one, and with still greater reason to your royal highness, whose kindness towards me has been so extreme. It is Mademoiselle Louise de la Vallière."

Madame could not restrain an exclamation, in which a feeling stronger than surprise might have been detected. "Ah!" she said, "La Vallière—she who yesterday—" she paused, and then continued, "she who was taken ill, I believe."

"Yes, Madame; it was only this morning that I heard of the accident that had befallen her."

"Did you see her before you came to me?"

"I had the honour of taking leave of her."

"And you say," resumed Madame, making a powerful effort over herself, "that the king has—deferred your marriage with this young girl."

"Yes, Madame, deferred it."

"Did he assign any reason for this postponement?"

"None."

"How long is it since the Comte de la Fere preferred his request to the king?"

"More than a month, Madame."

"It is very singular," said the princess, as something like a film clouded her eyes.

"A month?" she repeated.

"About a month."

"You are right, vicomte," said the princess, with a smile, in which De Bragelonne might have remarked a kind of restraint; "my brother must not keep you too long in England; set off at once, and in the first letter I write to England, I will claim you in the king's name." And Madame rose to place her letter in Bragelonne's hands. Raoul understood that his audience was at an end; he took the letter, bowed lowly to the princess, and left the room.

"A month!" murmured the princess; "could I have been blind, then, to so great an extent, and could he have loved her for this last month?" And as Madame had nothing to do, she sat down to begin a letter to her brother, the postscript of which was a summons for Bragelonne to return.

The Comte de Guiche, as we have seen, had yielded to the pressing persuasions of Manicamp, and allowed himself to be led to the stables, where they desired their horses to be got ready for them; then, by one of the side paths, a description of which has already been given, they advanced to meet Monsieur, who, having just finished bathing, was returning towards the chateau, wearing a woman's veil to protect his face from getting burnt by the sun, which was shining very brightly. Monsieur was in one of those fits of good humor to which the admiration of his own good looks sometimes gave occasion. As he was bathing he had been able to compare the whiteness of his body with that of the courtiers, and, thanks to the care which his royal highness took of himself, no one, not even the Chevalier de Lorraine, was able to stand the comparison. Monsieur, moreover, had been tolerably successful in swimming, and his muscles having been exercised by the healthy immersion in the cool water, he was in a light and cheerful state of mind and body. So that, at the sight of Guiche, who advanced to meet him at a hand gallop, mounted upon a magnificent white horse, the prince could not restrain an exclamation of delight.

"I think matters look well," said Manicamp, who fancied he could read this friendly disposition upon his royal highness's countenance.

"Good day, De Guiche, good day," exclaimed the prince.

"Long life to your royal highness!" replied De Guiche, encouraged by the tone of Philip's voice; "health, joy, happiness, and prosperity to your highness."

"Welcome, De Guiche, come on my right side, but keep your horse in hand, for I wish to return at a walking pace under the cool shade of these trees."

"As you please, my lord," said De Guiche, taking his place on the prince's right as he had been invited to do.

"Now, my dear De Guiche," said the prince, "give me a little news of that De Guiche whom I used to know formerly, and who used to pay attentions to my wife."

Guiche blushed to the very whites of his eyes, while Monsieur burst out laughing, as though he had made the wittiest remark in the world. The few privileged courtiers who surrounded Monsieur thought it their duty to follow his example, although they had not heard the remark, and a noisy burst of laughter immediately followed, beginning with the first courtier, passing on through the whole company, and only terminating with the last. De Guiche, although blushing scarlet, put a good countenance on the matter; Manicamp looked at him.

"Ah! my lord," replied De Guiche, "show a little charity towards such a miserable fellow as I am: do not hold me up to the ridicule of the Chevalier de Lorraine."

"How do you mean?"

"If he hears you ridicule me, he will go beyond your highness, and will show no pity."

"About your passion and the princess, do you mean?"

"For mercy's sake, my lord."

"Come, come, De Guiche, confess that you did get a little sweet upon Madame."

"I will never confess such a thing, my lord."

"Out of respect for me, I suppose; but I release you from your respect, De Guiche. Confess, as if it were simply a question about Mademoiselle de Chalais or Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

Then breaking off, he said, beginning to laugh again, "Comte, that wasn't at all bad!—a remark like a sword, which cuts two ways at once. I hit you and my brother at the same time, Chalais and La Vallière, your affianced bride and his future lady love."

"Really, my lord," said the comte, "you are in a most brilliant humor to-day."

"The fact is, I feel well, and then I am pleased to see you again. But you were angry with me, were you not?"

"I, my lord? Why should I have been so?"

"Because I interfered with your sarabands and your other Spanish amusements. Nay, do not deny it. On that day you left the princess's apartments with your eyes full of fury; that brought you ill-luck, for you danced in the ballet yesterday in a most wretched manner. Now don't get sulky, De Guiche, for it does you no good, but makes you look like a tame bear. If the princess did not look at you attentively yesterday, I am quite sure of one thing."

"What is that, my lord? Your highness alarms me."

"She has quite forsworn you now," said the prince, with a burst of loud laughter.

"Decidedly," thought Manicamp, "rank has nothing to do with it, and all men are alike."

The prince continued: "At all events, you have now returned, and it is to be hoped that the chevalier will become amiable again."

"How so, my lord: and by what miracle can I exercise such an influence over M. de Lorraine?"

"The matter is very simple, he is jealous of you."

"Bah! it is not possible."

"It is the case, though."

"He does me too much honour."

"The fact is, that when you are here, he is full of kindness and attention, but when you are gone he makes me suffer a perfect martyrdom. I am like a see-saw. Besides, you do not know the idea that has struck me?"

"I do not even suspect it."

"Well, then; when you were in exile—for you really were exiled, my poor De Guiche—"

"I should think so, indeed; but whose fault was it?" said De Guiche, pretending to speak in an angry tone.

"Not mine, certainly, my dear comte," replied his royal highness, "upon my honour, I did not ask for the king to exile you—"

"No, not you, my lord, I am well aware; but—"

"But Madame; well, as far as that goes, I do not say it was not the case. Why, what the deuce did you do or say to Madame?"

"Really, my lord—"

"Women, I know, have their grudges, and my wife is not free from caprices of that nature. But if she were the cause of your being exiled I bear you no ill-will."

"In that case, my lord," said De Guiche. "I am not altogether unhappy."

Manicamp, who was following closely behind De Guiche and who did not lose a word of what the prince was saying, bent down to his very shoulders over his horse's neck, in order to conceal the laughter he could not repress.

"Besides, your exile started a project in my head."

"Good."

"When the chevalier—finding you were no longer here, and sure of reigning undisturbed—began to bully me, I, observing that my wife, in the most perfect contrast to him, was most kind and amiable towards me who had neglected her so much, the idea occurred to me of becoming a model husband—a rarity, a curiosity, at the court; and I had an idea of getting very fond of my wife."

De Guiche looked at the prince with a stupefied expression of countenance, which was not assumed.

"Oh! my lord," De Guiche stammered out; "surely, that never seriously occurred to you."

"Indeed it did. I have some property that my brother gave me on my marriage; she has some money of her own, and not a little either, for she gets money from her brother and brother-in-law of England and France at the same time. Well! we should have left the court. I should have retired to my chateau at Villers-Cotterets, situated in the middle of a forest, in which we should have led a most sentimental life in the very same spot where my grandfather, Henry IV., sojourned with La Belle Gabrielle. What do you think of that idea, De Guiche?"

"Why, it is enough to make one shiver, my lord," replied De Guiche, who shuddered in reality.

"Ah! I see you would never be able to endure being exiled a second time."

"I, my lord?"

"I will not carry you off with us, as I had first intended."

"What, with you, my lord?"

"Yes; if the idea should occur to me again of taking a dislike to the court."

"Oh! do not let that make any difference, my lord; I would follow your highness to the end of the world."

"Clumsy fellow that you are!" said Manicamp, grumblingly, pushing his horse towards De Guiche, so as almost to unseat him, and then, as he passed close to him, as if he had lost command over the horse, he whispered, "For goodness' sake, think what you are saying."

"Well, it is agreed, then," said the prince; "since you are so devoted to me, I shall take you with me."

"Anywhere, my lord," replied De Guiche in a joyous tone, "whenever you like, and at once, too. Are you ready?"

And De Guiche, laughingly, gave his horse the rein, and galloped forward a few yards.

"One moment," said the prince. "Let us go to the chateau first."

"What for?"

"Why, to take my wife, of course."

"What for?" asked De Guiche.

"Why, since I tell you that it is a project of conjugal affection, it is necessary I should take my wife with me."

"In that case, my lord," replied the comte, "I am greatly concerned, but no De Guiche for you."

"Bah!"

"Yes.—Why do you take Madame with you?"

"Because I begin to fancy I love her," said the prince.

De Guiche turned slightly pale, but endeavored to preserve his seeming cheerfulness.

"If you love Madame, my lord," he said, "that ought to be quite enough for you, and you have no further need of your friends."

"Not bad, not bad," murmured Manicamp.

"There, your fear of Madame has begun again," replied the prince.

"Why, my lord, I have experienced that to my cost; a woman who was the cause of my being exiled!"

"What a revengeful disposition you have, De Guiche, how virulently you bear malice."

"I should like the case to be your own, my lord."

"Decidedly, then, that was the reason why you danced so badly yesterday; you wished to revenge yourself, I suppose, by trying to make Madame make a mistake in her dancing; ah! that is very paltry, De Guiche, and I will tell Madame of it."

"You may tell her whatever you please, my lord, for her highness cannot hate me more than she does."

"Nonsense, you are exaggerating; and this because merely of the fortnight's sojourn in the country she imposed on you."

"My lord, a fortnight is a fortnight; and when the time is passed in getting sick and tired of everything, a fortnight is an eternity."

"So that you will not forgive her?"

"Never!"

"Come, come, De Guiche, be a better disposed fellow than that. I wish to make your peace with her; you will find, in conversing with her, that she has no malice or unkindness in her nature, and that she is very talented."

"My lord—"

"You will see that she can receive her friends like a princess, and laugh like a citizen's wife; you will see that, when she pleases, she can make the pleasant hours pass like minutes. Come, De Guiche, you must really make up your differences with my wife."

"Upon my word," said Manicamp to himself, "the prince is a husband whose wife's name will bring him ill-luck, and King Candaules, of old, was a tiger beside his royal highness."

"At all events," added the prince, "I am sure you will make it up with my wife: I guarantee you will do so. Only, I must show you the way now. There is nothing commonplace about her: it is not every one who takes her fancy."

"My lord—"

"No resistance, De Guiche, or I shall get out of temper," replied the prince.

"Well, since he will have it so," murmured Manicamp, in Guiche's ear, "do as he wants you to do."

"Well, my lord," said the comte, "I obey."

"And to begin," resumed the prince, "there will be cards, this evening, in Madame's apartment; you will dine with me, and I will take you there with me."

"Oh! as for that, my lord," objected De Guiche, "you will allow me to object."

"What, again! this is positive rebellion."

"Madame received me too indifferently, yesterday, before the whole court."

"Really!" said the prince, laughing.

"Nay, so much so, indeed, that she did not even answer me when I addressed her; it may be a good thing to have no self-respect at all, but to have too little is not enough, as the saying is."

"Comte! after dinner, you will go to your own apartments and dress yourself, and then you will come to fetch me. I shall wait for you."

"Since your highness absolutely commands it."

"Positively."

"He will not lose his hold," said Manicamp; "these are the things to which husbands cling most obstinately. Ah! what a pity M. Moliere could not have heard this man; he would have turned him into verse if he had."

The prince and his court, chatting in this manner, returned to the coolest apartments of the chateau.

"By the by," said De Guiche, as they were standing by the door, "I had a commission for your royal highness."

"Execute it, then."

"M. de Bragelonne has, by the king's order, set off for London, and he charged me with his respects for you; my lord."

"A pleasant journey to the vicomte, whom I like very much. Go and dress yourself, De Guiche, and come back for me. If you don't come back—"

"What will happen, my lord?"

"I will have you sent to the Bastille."

"Well," said De Guiche, laughing, "his royal highness, my lord, is decidedly the counterpart of her royal highness, Madame. Madame gets me sent into exile, because she does not care for me sufficiently; and my lord gets me imprisoned, because he cares for me too much. I thank my lord, and I thank Madame."

"Come, come," said the prince, "you are a delightful companion, and you know I cannot do without you. Return as soon as you can."

"Very well; but I am in the humor to prove myself difficult to be pleased, in my turn, my lord."

"Bah!"

"So, I will not return to your royal highness, except upon one condition."

"Name it."

"I want to oblige the friend of one of my friends."

"What's his name?"

"Malicorne."

"An ugly name."

"But very well borne, my lord."

"That may be. Well?"

"Well, I owe M. Malicorne a place in your household, my lord."

"What kind of a place?"

"Any kind of a place; a supervision of some sort or another, for instance."

"That happens very fortunately, for yesterday I dismissed my chief usher of the apartments."

"That will do admirably. What are his duties?"

"Nothing, except to look about and make his report."

"A sort of interior police?"

"Exactly."

"Ah, how excellently that will suit Malicorne," Manicamp ventured to say.

"You know the person we are speaking of, M. Manicamp?" inquired the prince.

"Intimately, my lord. He is a friend of mine."

"And your opinion is?"

"That your highness could never get a better usher of the apartments than he will make."

"How much does the appointment bring in?" inquired the comte of the prince.

"I don't know at all, only I have always been told that he could make as much as he pleased when he was thoroughly in earnest."

"What do you call being thoroughly in earnest, prince?"

"It means, of course, when the functionary in question is a man who has his wits about him."

"In that case I think your highness will be content, for Malicorne is as sharp as the devil himself."

"Good! the appointment will be an expensive one for me, in that case," replied the prince, laughing. "You are making me a positive present, comte."

"I believe so, my lord."

"Well, go and announce to your M. Melicorne—"

"Malicorne, my lord."

"I shall never get hold of that name."

"You say Manicamp very well, my lord."

"Oh, I ought to say Malicorne very well, too. The alliteration will help me."

"Say what you like, my lord, I can promise you your inspector of apartments will not be annoyed; he has the very happiest disposition that can be met with."

"Well, then, my dear De Guiche, inform him of his nomination. But, stay—"

"What is it, my lord?"

"I wish to see him beforehand; if he be as ugly as his name, I retract every word I have said."

"Your highness knows him, for you have already seen him at the Palais Royal; nay, indeed, it was I who presented him to you."

"Ah, I remember now—not a bad-looking fellow."

"I know you must have noticed him, my lord."

"Yes, yes, yes. You see, De Guiche, I do not wish that either my wife or myself should have ugly faces before our eyes. My wife will have all her maids of honour pretty; I, all the gentlemen about me good-looking. In this way, De Guiche, you see, that any children we may have will run a good chance of being pretty, if my wife and myself have handsome models before us."

"Most magnificently argued, my lord," said Manicamp, showing his approval by look and voice at the same time.

As for De Guiche, he very probably did not find the argument so convincing, for he merely signified his opinion by a gesture, which, moreover, exhibited in a marked manner some indecision of mind on the subject. Manicamp went off to inform Malicorne of the good news he had just learned. De Guiche seemed very unwilling to take his departure for the purpose of dressing himself. Monsieur, singing, laughing, and admiring himself, passed away the time until the dinner-hour, in a frame of mind that justified the proverb of "Happy as a prince."

LVI. Story of a Dryad and a Naiad.

Every one had partaken of the banquet at the chateau, and afterwards assumed their full court dresses. The usual hour for the repast was five o'clock. If we say, then, that the repast occupied an hour, and the toilette two hours, everybody was ready about eight o'clock in the evening. Towards eight o'clock, then, the guests began to arrive at Madame's, for we have already intimated that it was Madame who "received" that evening. And at Madame's soirees no one failed to be present; for the evenings passed in her apartments always had that perfect charm about them which the queen, that pious and excellent princess, had not been able to confer upon her reunions. For, unfortunately, one of the advantages of goodness of disposition is that it is far less amusing than wit of an ill-natured character. And yet, let us hasten to add, that such a style of wit could not be assigned to Madame, for her disposition of mind, naturally of the very highest order, comprised too much true generosity, too many noble impulses and high-souled thoughts, to warrant her being termed ill-natured. But Madame was endowed with a spirit of resistance—a gift frequently fatal to its possessor, for it breaks where another disposition would have bent; the result was that that blows did not become deadened upon her as upon what might be termed the cotton-wadded feelings of Maria Theresa. Her heart rebounded at each attack, and therefore, whenever she was attacked, even in a manner that almost stunned her, she returned blow for blow to any one imprudent enough to tilt against her.

Was this really maliciousness of disposition or simply waywardness of character? We regard those rich and powerful natures as like the tree of knowledge, producing good and evil at the same time; a double branch, always blooming and fruitful, of which those who wish to eat know how to detect the good fruit, and from which the worthless and frivolous die who have eaten of it—a circumstance which is by no means to be regarded as a great misfortune. Madame, therefore, who had a well-disguised plan in her mind of constituting herself the second, if not even the principal, queen of the court, rendered her receptions delightful to all, from the conversation, the opportunities of meeting, and the perfect liberty she allowed every one of making any remark he pleased, on the condition, however, that the remark was amusing or sensible. And it will hardly be believed, that, by that means, there was less talking among the society Madame assembled together than elsewhere. Madame hated people who talked much, and took a remarkably cruel revenge upon them, for she allowed them to talk. She disliked pretension, too, and never overlooked that defect, even in the king himself. It was more than a weakness of Monsieur, and the princess had undertaken the amazing task of curing him of it. As for the rest, poets, wits, beautiful women, all were received by her with the air of a mistress superior to her slaves. Sufficiently meditative in her liveliest humors to make even poets meditate; sufficiently pretty to dazzle by her attractions, even among the prettiest; sufficiently witty for the most distinguished persons who were present, to be listened to with pleasure—it will easily be believed that the reunions held in Madame's apartments must naturally have proved very attractive. All who were young flocked there, and when the king himself happens to be young, everybody at court is so too. And so, the older ladies of the court, the strong-minded women of the regency, or of the last reign, pouted and sulked at their ease; but others only laughed at the fits of sulkiness in which these venerable individuals indulged, who had carried the love of authority so far as even to take command of bodies of soldiers in the wars of the Fronde, in order, as Madame asserted, not to lose their influence over men altogether. As eight o'clock struck her royal highness entered the great drawing-room accompanied by her ladies in attendance, and found several gentlemen belonging to the court already there, having been waiting for some minutes. Among those who had arrived before the hour fixed for the reception she looked round for one who, she thought, ought to have been first in attendance, but he was not there. However, almost at the very moment she completed her investigation, Monsieur was announced. Monsieur looked splendid. All the precious stones and jewels of Cardinal Mazarin, which of course that minister could not do otherwise than leave; all the queen-mother's jewels as well as a few belonging to his wife—Monsieur wore them all, and he was as dazzling as the rising sun. Behind him followed De Guiche, with hesitating steps and an air of contrition admirably assumed; De Guiche wore a costume of French-gray velvet, embroidered with silver, and trimmed with blue ribbons: he wore also Mechlin lace as rare and beautiful in its own way as the jewels of Monsieur in theirs. The plume in his hat was red. Madame, too, wore several colours, and preferred red for embroidery, gray for dress, and blue for flowers. M. de Guiche, dressed as we have described, looked so handsome that he excited every one's observation. An interesting pallor of complexion, a languid expression of the eyes, his white hands seen through the masses of lace that covered them, the melancholy expression of his mouth—it was only necessary, indeed, to see M. de Guiche to admit that few men at the court of France could hope to equal him. The consequence was that Monsieur, who was pretentious enough to fancy he could eclipse a star even, if a star had adorned itself in a similar manner to himself, was, on the contrary, completely eclipsed in all imaginations, which are silent judges certainly, but very positive and firm in their convictions. Madame looked at De Guiche lightly, but light as her look had been, it brought a delightful colour to his face. In fact, Madame found De Guiche so handsome and so admirably dressed, that she almost ceased regretting the royal conquest she felt she was on the point of escaping her. Her heart, therefore, sent the blood to her face. Monsieur approached her. He had not noticed the princess's blush, or if he had seen it, he was far from attributing it to its true cause.

"Madame," he said, kissing his wife's hand, "there is some one present here, who has fallen into disgrace, an unhappy exile whom I venture to recommend to your kindness. Do not forget, I beg, that he is one of my best friends, and that a gentle reception of him will please me greatly."

"What exile? what disgraced person are you speaking of?" inquired Madame, looking all round, and not permitting her glance to rest more on the count than on the others.

This was the moment to present De Guiche, and the prince drew aside and let De Guiche pass him, who, with a tolerably well-assumed awkwardness of manner, approached Madame and made his reverence to her.

"What!" exclaimed Madame, as if she were greatly surprised, "is M. de Guiche the disgraced individual you speak of, the exile in question?"

"Yes, certainly," returned the duke.

"Indeed," said Madame, "he seems almost the only person here!"

"You are unjust, Madame," said the prince.

"I?"

"Certainly. Come, forgive the poor fellow."

"Forgive him what? What have I to forgive M. de Guiche?"

"Come, explain yourself, De Guiche. What do you wish to be forgiven?" inquired the prince.

"Alas! her royal highness knows very well what it is," replied the latter, in a hypocritical tone.

"Come, come, give him your hand, Madame," said Philip.

"If it will give you any pleasure, Monsieur," and, with a movement of her eyes and shoulders, which it would be impossible to describe, Madame extended towards the young man her beautiful and perfumed hand, upon which he pressed his lips. It was evident that he did so for some little time, and that Madame did not withdraw her hand too quickly, for the duke added:

"De Guiche is not wickedly disposed, Madame; so do not be afraid, he will not bite you."

A pretext was given in the gallery by the duke's remark, which was not, perhaps, very laughable, for every one to laugh excessively. The situation was odd enough, and some kindly disposed persons had observed it. Monsieur was still enjoying the effect of his remark, when the king was announced. The appearance of the room at that moment was as follows:—in the center, before the fireplace, which was filled with flowers, Madame was standing up, with her maids of honour formed in two wings, on either side of her; around whom the butterflies of the court were fluttering. Several other groups were formed in the recesses of the windows, like soldiers stationed in their different towers who belong to the same garrison. From their respective places they could pick up the remarks which fell from the principal group. From one of these groups, the nearest to the fireplace, Malicorne, who had been at once raised to the dignity, through Manicamp and De Guiche, of the post of master of the apartments, and whose official costume had been ready for the last two months, was brilliant with gold lace, and shone upon Montalais, standing on Madame's extreme left, with all the fire of his eyes and splendor of his velvet. Madame was conversing with Mademoiselle de Chatillon and Mademoiselle de Crequy, who were next to her, and addressed a few words to Monsieur, who drew aside as soon as the king was announced. Mademoiselle de la Vallière, like Montalais, was on Madame's left hand, and the last but one on the line, Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente being on her right. She was stationed as certain bodies of troops are, whose weakness is suspected, and who are placed between two experienced regiments. Guarded in this manner by the companions who had shared her adventure, La Vallière, whether from regret at Raoul's departure, or still suffering from the emotion caused by recent events, which had begun to render her name familiar on the lips of the courtiers, La Vallière, we repeat, hid her eyes, red with weeping, behind her fan, and seemed to give the greatest attention to the remarks which Montalais and Athenais, alternately, whispered to her from time to time. As soon as the king's name was announced a general movement took place in the apartment. Madame, in her character as hostess, rose to receive the royal visitor; but as she rose, notwithstanding her preoccupation of mind, she glanced hastily towards her right; her glance, which the presumptuous De Guiche regarded as intended for himself, rested, as it swept over the whole circle, upon La Vallière, whose warm blush and restless emotion it instantly perceived.

The king advanced to the middle of the group, which had now become a general one, by a movement which took place from the circumference to the center. Every head bowed low before his majesty, the ladies bending like frail, magnificent lilies before King Aquilo. There was nothing very severe, we will even say, nothing very royal that evening about the king, except youth and good looks. He wore an air of animated jousouness and good-humor which set all imaginations at work, and, thereupon, all present promised themselves a delightful evening, for no other reason than from having remarked the desire his majesty had to amuse himself in Madame's apartments. If there was any one in particular whose high spirits and good-humor equalled the king's, it was M. de Saint-Aignan, who was dressed in a rose-coloured costume, with face and ribbons of the same colour, and, in addition, particularly rose-coloured in his ideas, for that evening M. de Saint-Aignan was prolific in jests. The circumstance which had given a new expansion to the numerous ideas germinating in his fertile brain was, that he had just perceived that Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente was, like himself, dressed in rose-colour. We would not wish to say, however, that the wily courtier had not know beforehand that the beautiful Athenais was to wear that particular colour; for he very well knew the art of unlocking the lips of a dress-maker or a lady's maid as to her mistress's intentions. He cast as many killing glances at Mademoiselle Athenais as he had bows of ribbons on his stockings and doublet; in other words he discharged a prodigious number. The king having paid Madame the customary compliments, and Madame having requested him to be seated, the circle was immediately formed. Louis inquired of Monsieur the particulars of the day's bathing; and stated, looking at the ladies present while he spoke, that certain poets were engaged turning into verse the enchanting diversion of the baths of Vulaines, and that one of them particularly, M. Loret, seemed to have been intrusted with the confidence of some water-nymph, as he had in his verses recounted many circumstances that were actually true—at which remark more than one lady present felt herself bound to blush. The king at this moment took the opportunity of looking round him at more leisure; Montalais was the only one who did not blush sufficiently to prevent her looking at the king, and she saw him fix his eyes devouringly on Mademoiselle de la Vallière. This undaunted maid of honour, Mademoiselle de Montalais, be it understood, forced the king to lower his gaze, and so saved Louise de la Vallière from a sympathetic warmth of feeling this gaze might possibly have conveyed. Louis was appropriated by Madame, who overwhelmed him with inquiries, and no one in the world knew how to ask questions better than she did. He tried, however, to render the conversation general, and, with the view of effecting this, he redoubled his attention and devotion to her. Madame coveted complimentary remarks, and, determined to procure them at any cost, she addressed herself to the king, saying:

"Sire, your majesty, who is aware of everything which occurs in your kingdom, ought to know beforehand the verses confided to M. Loret by this nymph; will your majesty kindly communicate them to us?"

"Madame," replied the king, with perfect grace of manner, "I dare not—you, personally, might be in no little degree confused at having to listen to certain details—but Saint-Aignan tells a story well, and has a perfect recollection of the verses. If he does not remember them, he will invent. I can certify he is almost a poet himself." Saint-Aignan, thus brought prominently forward, was compelled to introduce himself as advantageously as possible. Unfortunately, however, for Madame, he thought of his own personal affairs only; in other words, instead of paying Madame the compliments she so much desired and relished, his mind was fixed upon making as much display as possible of his own good fortune. Again glancing, therefore, for the hundredth time at the beautiful Athenais, who carried into practice her previous evening's theory of not even deigning to look at her adorer, he said:—

"Your majesty will perhaps pardon me for having too indifferently remembered the verses which the nymph dictated to Loret; but if the king has not retained any recollection of them, how could I possibly remember?"

Madame did not receive this shortcoming of the courtier very favourably.

"Ah! madame," added Saint-Aignan, "at present it is no longer a question what the water-nymphs have to say; and one would almost be tempted to believe that nothing of any interest now occurs in those liquid realms. It is upon earth, madame, important events happen. Ah! Madame, upon the earth, how many tales are there full of—"

"Well," said Madame, "and what is taking place upon the earth?"

"That question must be asked of the Dryads," replied the comte; "the Dryads inhabit the forest, as your royal highness is aware."

"I am aware also, that they are naturally very talkative, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan."

"Such is the case, Madame; but when they say such delightful things, it would be ungracious to accuse them of being too talkative."

"Do they talk so delightfully, then?" inquired the princess, indifferently. "Really, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan, you excite my curiosity; and, if I were the king, I would require you immediately to tell us what the delightful things are these Dryads have been saying, since you alone seem to understand their language."

"I am at his majesty's orders, Madame, in that respect," replied the comte, quickly.

"What a fortunate fellow this Saint-Aignan is to understand the language of the Dryads," said Monsieur.

"I understand it perfectly, my lord, as I do my own language."

"Tell us all about them, then," said Madame.

The king felt embarrassed, for his confidant was, in all probability, about to embark in a difficult matter. He felt that it would be so, from the general attention excited by Saint-Aignan's preamble, and aroused too by Madame's peculiar manner. The most reserved of those who were present seemed ready to devour every syllable the comte was about to pronounce. They coughed, drew closer together, looked curiously at some of the maids of honour, who, in order to support with greater propriety, or with more steadiness, the fixity of the inquisitorial looks bent upon them, adjusted their fans accordingly, and assumed the bearing of a duelist about to be exposed to his adversary's fire. At this epoch, the fashion of ingeniously constructed conversations, and hazardingly dangerous recitals, so prevailed, that, where, in modern times, a whole company assembled in a drawing-room would begin to suspect some scandal, or disclosure, or tragic event, and would hurry away in dismay, Madame's guests quietly settled themselves in their places, in order not to lose a word or gesture of the comedy composed by Monsieur de Saint-Aignan for their benefit, and the termination of which, whatever the style and the plot might be, must, as a matter of course, be marked by the most perfect propriety. The comte as known as a man of extreme refinement, and an admirable narrator. He courageously began, then, amidst a profound silence, which would have been formidable to any one but himself:—"Madame, by the king's permission, I address myself, in the first place, to your royal highness, since you admit yourself to be the person present possessing the greatest curiosity. I have the honour, therefore, to inform your royal highness that the Dryad more particularly inhabits the hollows of oaks; and, as Dryads are mythological creatures of great beauty, they inhabit the most beautiful trees, in other words, the largest to be found."

At this exordium, which recalled, under a transparent veil, the celebrated story of the royal oak, which had played so important a part in the last evening, so many hearts began to beat, both from joy and uneasiness, that, if Saint-Aignan had not had a good and sonorous voice, their throbbings might have been heard above the sound of his voice.

"There must surely be Dryads at Fontainebleau, then," said Madame, in a perfectly calm voice; "for I have never, in all my life, seen finer oaks than in the royal park." And as she spoke, she directed towards De Guiche a look of which he had no reason to complain, as he had of the one that preceded it; which, as we have already mentioned, had reserved a certain amount of indefiniteness most painful for so loving a heart as his.

"Precisely, Madame, it is of Fontainebleau I was about to speak to your royal highness," said Saint-Aignan; "for the Dryad whose story is engaging our attention, lives in the park belonging to the chateau of his majesty."

The affair was fairly embarked on; the action was begun, and it was no longer possible for auditory or narrator to draw back.

"It will be worth listening to," said Madame; "for the story not only appears to me to have all the interest of a national incident, but still more, seems to be a circumstance of very recent occurrence."

"I ought to begin at the beginning," said the comte. "In the first place, then, there lived at Fontainebleau, in a cottage of modest and unassuming appearance, two shepherds. The one was the shepherd Tyrcis, the owner of extensive domains transmitted to him from his parents, by right of inheritance. Tyrcis was young and handsome, and, from his many qualifications, he might be pronounced to be the first and foremost among the shepherds in the whole country; one might even boldly say he was the king of shepherds." A subdued murmur of approbation encouraged the narrator, who continued:—"His strength equals his courage; no one displays greater address in hunting wild beasts, nor greater wisdom in matters where judgment is required. Whenever he mounts and exercises his horse in the beautiful plains of his inheritance, or whenever he joins with the shepherds who owe him allegiance, in different games of skill and strength, one might say that it is the god Mars hurling his lance on the plains of Thrace, or, even better, that it was Apollo himself, the god of day, radiant upon earth, bearing his flaming darts in his hand." Every one understood that this allegorical portrait of the king was not the worst exordium the narrator could have chosen; and consequently it did not fail to produce its effect, either upon those who, from duty or inclination, applauded it to the very echo, or on the king himself, to whom flattery was very agreeable when delicately conveyed, and whom, indeed, it did not always displease, even when it was a little too broad. Saint-Aignan then continued:—"It is not in games of glory only, ladies, that the shepherd Tyrcis had acquired that reputation by which he was regarded as the king of the shepherds."

"Of the shepherds of Fontainebleau," said the king, smilingly, to Madame.

"Oh!" exclaimed Madame, "Fontainebleau is selected arbitrarily by the poet; but I should say, of the shepherds of the whole world." The king forgot his part of a passive auditor, and bowed.

"It is," paused Saint-Aignan, amidst a flattering murmur of applause, "it is with ladies fair especially that the qualities of this king of the shepherds are most prominently displayed. He is a shepherd with a mind as refined as his heart is pure; he can pay a compliment with a charm of manner whose fascination it is impossible to resist; and in his attachments he is so discreet, that beautiful and happy conquests may regard their lot as more than enviable. Never a syllable of disclosure, never a moment's forgetfulness. Whoever has seen and heard Tyrcis must love him; whoever loves and is beloved by him, has indeed found happiness." Saint-Aignan here paused; he was enjoying the pleasure of all these compliments; and the portrait he had drawn, however grotesquely inflated it might be, had found favour in certain ears, in which the perfections of the shepherd did not seem to have been exaggerated. Madame begged the orator to continue. "Tyrcis," said the comte, "had a faithful companion, or rather a devoted servant, whose name was—Amyntas."

"Ah!" said Madame, archly, "now for the portrait of Amyntas; you are such an excellent painter, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan."

"Madame—"

"Oh! comte, do not, I entreat you, sacrifice poor Amyntas; I should never forgive you."

"Madame, Amyntas is of too humble a position, particularly beside Tyrcis, for his person to be honoured by a parallel. There are certain friends who resemble those followers of ancient times, who caused themselves to be buried alive at their masters' feet. Amyntas's place, too, is at the feet of Tyrcis; he cares for no other; and if, sometimes, the illustrious hero—"

"Illustrious shepherd, you mean?" said Madame, pretending to correct M. de Saint-Aignan.

"Your royal highness is right; I was mistaken," returned the courtier; "if, I say, the shepherd Tyrcis deigns occasionally to call Amyntas his friend, and to open his heart to him, it is an unparalleled favour, which the latter regards as the most unbounded felicity."

"All that you say," interrupted Madame, "establishes the extreme devotion of Amyntas to Tyrcis, but does not furnish us with the portrait of Amyntas. Comte, do not flatter him, if you like; but describe him to us. I will have Amyntas's portrait." Saint-Aignan obeyed, after having bowed profoundly to his majesty's sister-in-law.

"Amyntas," he said, "is somewhat older than Tyrcis; he is not an ill-favoured shepherd; it is even said that the muses condescended to smile upon him at his birth, even as Hebe smiled upon youth. He is not ambitious of display, but he is ambitious of being loved; and he might not, perhaps, be found unworthy of it, if he were only sufficiently well-known."

This latter paragraph, strengthened by a killing glance, was directed straight to Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, who received them both unmoved. But the modesty and tact of the allusion had produced a good effect; Amyntas reaped the benefit of it in the applause bestowed upon him: Tyrcis's head even gave the signal for it by a consenting bow, full of good feeling.

"One evening," continued Saint-Aignan, "Tyrcis and Amyntas were walking together in the forest, talking of their love disappointments. Do not forget, ladies, that the story of the Dryad is now beginning, otherwise it would be easy to tell you what Tyrcis and Amyntas, the two most discreet shepherds of the whole earth, were talking about. They reached the thickest part of the forest, for the purpose of being quite alone, and of confiding their troubles more freely to each other, when suddenly the sound of voices struck upon their ears."

"Ah, ah!" said those who surrounded the narrator. "Nothing can be more interesting."

At this point, Madame, like a vigilant general inspecting his army, glanced at Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, who could not help wincing as they drew themselves up.

"These harmonious voices," resumed Saint-Aignan, "were those of certain shepherdesses, who had been likewise desirous of enjoying the coolness of the shade, and who, knowing the isolated and almost unapproachable situation of the place, had betaken themselves there to interchange their ideas upon—" A loud burst of laughter occasioned by this remark of Saint-Aignan, and an imperceptible smile of the king, as he looked at Tonnay-Charente, followed this sally.

"The Dryad affirms positively," continued Saint-Aignan, "that the shepherdesses were three in number, and that all three were young and beautiful."

"What were their names?" said Madame, quickly.

"Their names?" said Saint-Aignan, who hesitated from fear of committing an indiscretion.

"Of course; you call your shepherds Tyrcis and Amyntas; give your shepherdesses names in a similar manner."

"Oh! Madame, I am not an inventor; I relate simply what took place as the Dryad related it to me."

"What did your Dryad, then, call these shepherdesses? You have a very treacherous memory, I fear. This Dryad must have fallen out with the goddess Mnemosyne."

"These shepherdesses, Madame? Pray remember that it is a crime to betray a woman's name."

"From which a woman absolves you, comte, on the condition that you will reveal the names of the shepherdesses."

"Their names were Phyllis, Amaryllys, and Galatea."

"Exceedingly well!—they have not lost by the delay," said Madame, "and now we have three charming names. But now for their portraits."

Saint-Aignan again made a slight movement.

"Nay, comte, let us proceed in due order," returned Madame. "Ought we not, sire, to have the portraits of the shepherdesses?"

The king, who expected this determined perseverance, and who began to feel some uneasiness, did not think it safe to provoke so dangerous an interrogator. He thought, too, that Saint-Aignan, in drawing the portraits, would find a means of insinuating some flattering allusions which would be agreeable to the ears of one his majesty was interested in pleasing. It was with this hope and with this fear that Louis authorized Saint-Aignan to sketch the portraits of the shepherdesses, Phyllis, Amaryllis, and Galatea.

"Very well, then; be it so," said Saint-Aignan, like a man who has made up his mind, and he began.

LVIII. Conclusion of the Story of a Naiad and of a Dryad.

"Phyllis," said Saint-Aignan, with a glance of defiance at Montalais, such as a fencing-master would give who invites an antagonist worthy of him to place himself on guard, "Phyllis is neither fair nor dark, neither tall nor short, neither too grave nor too gay; though but a shepherdess, she is as witty as a princess, and as coquettish as the most finished flirt that ever lived. Nothing can equal her excellent vision. Her heart yearns for everything her gaze embraces. She is like a bird, which, always warbling, at one moment skims the ground, at the next rises fluttering in pursuit of a butterfly, then rests itself upon the topmost branch of a tree, where it defies the bird-catchers either to come and seize it or to entrap it in their nets." The portrait bore such a strong resemblance to Montalais, that all eyes were directed towards her; she, however, with her head raised, and with a steady, unmoved look, listened to Saint-Aignan, as if he were speaking of an utter stranger.

"Is that all, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan?" inquired the princess.

"Oh! your royal highness, the portrait is but a mere sketch, and many more additions could be made, but I fear to weary your patience, or offend the modesty of the shepherdess, and I shall therefore pass on to her companion, Amaryllis."

"Very well," said Madame, "pass on to Amaryllis, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan, we are all attention."

"Amaryllis is the eldest of the three, and yet," Saint-Aignan hastened to add, "this advanced age does not reach twenty years."

Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, who had slightly knitted her brows at the commencement of the description, unbent them with a smile.

"She is tall, with an astonishing abundance of beautiful hair, which she fastens in the manner of the Grecian statues; her walk is full of majesty, her attitude haughty; she has the air, therefore, rather of a goddess than a mere mortal, and among the goddesses, she most resembles Diana the huntress; with this sole difference, however, that the cruel shepherdess, having stolen the quiver of young love, while poor Cupid was sleeping in a thicket of roses, instead of directing her arrows against the inhabitants of the forest, discharges them pitilessly against all poor shepherds who pass within reach of her bow and of her eyes."

"Oh! what a wicked shepherdess!" said Madame. "She may some day wound herself with one of those arrows she discharges, as you say, so mercilessly on all sides."

"It is the hope of shepherds, one and all!" said Saint-Aignan.

"And that of the shepherd Amyntas in particular, I suppose?" said Madame.

"The shepherd Amyntas is so timid," said Saint-Aignan, with the most modest air he could assume, "that if he cherishes such a hope as that, no one has ever known anything about it, for he conceals it in the very depths of his heart." A flattering murmur of applause greeted this profession of faith on behalf of the shepherd.

"And Galatea?" inquired Madame. "I am impatient to see a hand so skillful as yours continue the portrait where Virgil left it, and finish it before our eyes."

"Madame," said Saint-Aignan, "I am indeed a poor dumb post beside the mighty Virgil. Still, encouraged by your desire, I will do my best."

Saint-Aignan extended his foot and hand, and thus began:—"White as milk, she casts upon the breeze the perfume of her fair hair tinged with golden hues, as are the ears of corn. One is tempted to inquire if she is not the beautiful Europa, who inspired Jupiter with a tender passion as she played with her companions in the flower-spangled meadows. From her exquisite eyes, blue as azure heaven on the clearest summer day, emanates a tender light, which reverie nurtures, and love dispenses. When she frowns, or bends her looks towards the ground, the sun is veiled in token of mourning. When she smiles, on the contrary, nature resumes her jollity, and the birds, for a brief moment silenced, recommence their songs amid the leafy covert of the trees. Galatea," said Saint-Aignan, in conclusion, "is worthy of the admiration of the whole world; and if she should ever bestow her heart upon another, happy will that man be to whom she consecrates her first affections."

Madame, who had attentively listened to the portrait Saint-Aignan had drawn, as, indeed, had all the others, contented herself with accentuating her approbation of the most poetic passage by occasional inclinations of her head; but it was impossible to say if these marks of assent were accorded to the ability of the narrator of the resemblance of the portrait. The consequence, therefore, was, that as Madame did not openly exhibit any approbation, no one felt authorized to applaud, not even Monsieur, who secretly thought that Saint-Aignan dwelt too much upon the portraits of the shepherdesses, and had somewhat slightly passed over the portraits of the shepherds. The whole assembly seemed suddenly chilled. Saint-Aignan, who had exhausted his rhetorical skill and his palette of artistic tints in sketching the portrait of Galatea, and who, after the favour with which his other descriptions had been received, already imagined he could hear the loudest applause allotted to this last one, was himself more disappointed than the king and the rest of the company. A moment's silence followed, which was at last broken by Madame.

"Well, sir," she inquired, "What is your majesty's opinion of these three portraits?"

The king, who wished to relieve Saint-Aignan's embarrassment without compromising himself, replied, "Why, Amaryllis, in my opinion, is beautiful."

"For my part," said Monsieur, "I prefer Phyllis; she is a capital girl, or rather a good-sort-of-fellow of a nymph."

A gentle laugh followed, and this time the looks were so direct, that Montalais felt herself blushing almost scarlet.

"Well," resumed Madame, "what were those shepherdesses saying to each other?"

Saint-Aignan, however, whose vanity had been wounded, did not feel himself in a position to sustain an attack of new and refreshed troops, and merely said, "Madame, the shepherdesses were confiding to one another their little preferences."

"Nay, nay! Monsieur de Saint-Aignan, you are a perfect stream of pastoral poesy," said Madame, with an amiable smile, which somewhat comforted the narrator.

"They confessed that love is a mighty peril, but that the absence of love is the heart's sentence of death."

"What was the conclusion they came to?" inquired Madame.

"They came to the conclusion that love was necessary."

"Very good! Did they lay down any conditions?"

"That of choice, simply," said Saint-Aignan. "I ought even to add,—remember it is the Dryad who is speaking,—that one of the shepherdesses, Amaryllis, I believe, was completely opposed to the necessity of loving, and yet she did not positively deny that she had allowed the image of a certain shepherd to take refuge in her heart."

"Was it Amyntas or Tyrcis?"

"Amyntas, Madame," said Saint-Aignan, modestly. "But Galatea, the gentle and soft-eyed Galatea, immediately replied, that neither Amyntas, nor Alpheisiboeus, nor Tityrus, nor indeed any of the handsomest shepherds of the country, were to be compared to Tyrcis; that Tyrcis was as superior to all other men, as the oak to all other trees, as the lily in its majesty to all other flowers. She drew even such a portrait of Tyrcis that Tyrcis himself, who was listening, must have felt truly flattered at it, notwithstanding his rank as a shepherd. Thus Tyrcis and Amyntas had been distinguished by Phyllis and Galatea; and thus had the secrets of two hearts revealed beneath the shades of evening, and amid the recesses of the woods. Such, Madame, is what the Dryad related to me; she who knows all that takes place in the hollows of oaks and grassy dells; she who knows the loves of the birds, and all they wish to convey by their songs; she who understands, in fact, the language of the wind among the branches, the humming of the insect with its gold and emerald wings in the corolla of the wild-flowers; it was she who related the particulars to me, and I have repeated them."

"And now you have finished, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan, have you not?" said Madame, with a smile that made the king tremble.

"Quite finished," replied Saint-Aignan, "and but too happy if I have been able to amuse your royal highness for a few moments."

"Moments which have been too brief," replied the princess; "for you have related most admirably all you know; but, my dear Monsieur de Saint-Aignan, you have been unfortunate enough to obtain your information from one Dryad only, I believe?"

"Yes, Madame, only from one, I confess."

"The fact was, that you passed by a little Naiad, who pretended to know nothing at all, and yet knew a great deal more than your Dryad, my dear comte."

"A Naiad!" repeated several voices, who began to suspect that the story had a continuation.

"Of course close beside the oak you are speaking of, which, if I am not mistaken, is called the royal oak—is it not so, Monsieur de Saint-Aignan?"

Saint-Aignan and the king exchanged glances.

"Yes, Madame," the former replied.

"Well, close beside the oak there is a pretty little spring, which runs murmuringly over the pebbles, between banks of forget-me-nots and daffodils."

"I believe you are correct," said the king, with some uneasiness, and listening with some anxiety to his sister-in-law's narrative.

"Oh! there is one, I can assure you," said Madame; "and the proof of it is, that the Naiad who resides in that little stream stopped me as I was about to come."

"Ah?" said Saint-Aignan.

"Yes, indeed," continued the princess, "and she did so in order to communicate to me many particulars Monsieur de Saint-Aignan has omitted in his recital."

"Pray relate them yourself, then," said Monsieur, "you can relate stories in such a charming manner." The princess bowed at the conjugal compliment paid her.

"I do not possess the poetical powers of the comte, nor his ability to bring to light the smallest details."

"You will not be listened to with less interest on that account," said the king, who already perceived that something hostile was intended in his sister-in-law's story.

"I speak, too," continued Madame, "in the name of that poor little Naiad, who is indeed the most charming creature I ever met. Moreover, she laughed so heartily while she was telling me her story, that, in pursuance of that medical axiom that laughter is the finest physic in the world, I ask permission to laugh a little myself when I recollect her words."

The king and Saint-Aignan, who noticed spreading over many of the faces present a distant and prophetic ripple of the laughter Madame announced, finished by looking at each other, as if asking themselves whether there was not some little conspiracy concealed beneath these words. But Madame was determined to turn the knife in the wound over and over again; she therefore resumed with the air of the most perfect candor, in other words, with the most dangerous of all her airs: "Well, then, I passed that way," she said, "and as I found beneath my steps many fresh flowers newly blown, no doubt Phyllis, Amaryllis, Galatea, and all your shepherdesses had passed the same way before me."

The king bit his lips, for the recital was becoming more and more threatening. "My little Naiad," continued Madame, "was cooing over her quaint song in the bed of the rivulet; as I perceived that she accosted me by touching the hem of my dress, I could not think of receiving her advances ungraciously, and more particularly so, since, after all, a divinity, even though she be of a second grade, is always of greater importance than a mortal, though a princess. I thereupon accosted the Naiad, and bursting into laughter, this is what she said to me:

"'Fancy, princess...' You understand, sire, it is the Naiad who is speaking?"

The king bowed assentingly; and Madame continued:—"Fancy, princess, the banks of my little stream have just witnessed a most amusing scene. Two shepherds, full of curiosity, even indiscreetly so, have allowed themselves to be mystified in a most amusing manner by three nymphs, or three shepherdesses,—I beg your pardon, but I do not now remember if it was nymphs or shepherdesses she said; but it does not much matter, so we will continue."

The king, at this opening, coloured visibly, and Saint-Aignan, completely losing countenance, began to open his eyes in the greatest possible anxiety.

"The two shepherds,' pursued my nymph, still laughing, 'followed in the wake of the three young ladies,'—no, I mean, of the three nymphs; forgive me, I ought to say, of the three shepherdesses. It is not always wise to do that, for it may be awkward for those who are followed. I appeal to all the ladies present, and not one of them, I am sure, will contradict me."

The king, who was much disturbed by what he suspected was about to follow, signified his assent by a gesture.

"'But,' continued the Naiad, 'the shepherdesses had noticed Tyrcis and Amyntas gliding into the wood, and, by the light of the moon, they had recognized them through the grove of the trees.' Ah, you laugh!" interrupted Madame; "wait, wait, you are not yet at the end."

The king turned pale; Saint-Aignan wiped his forehead, now dewed with perspiration. Among the groups of ladies present could be heard smothered laughter and stealthy whispers.

"The shepherdesses, I was saying, noticing how indiscreet the two shepherds were, proceeded to sit down at the foot of the royal oak; and, when they perceived that their over-curious listeners were sufficiently near, so that not a syllable of what they might say could be lost, they addressed towards them very innocently, in the most artless manner in the world indeed, a passionate declaration, which from the vanity natural to all men, and even to the most sentimental of shepherds, seemed to the two listeners as sweet as honey."

The king, at these words, which the assembly was unable to hear without laughing, could not restrain a flash of anger darting from his eyes. As for Saint-Aignan, he let his head fall upon his breast, and concealed, under a silly laugh, the extreme annoyance he felt.

"Oh," said the king, drawing himself up to his full height, "upon my word, that is a most amusing jest, certainly; but, really and truly, are you sure you quite understood the language of the Naiads?"

"The comte, sire, pretends to have perfectly understood that of the Dryads," retorted Madame, icily.

"No doubt," said the king; "but you know the comte has the weakness to aspire to become a member of the Academy, so that, with this object in view, he has learnt all sorts of things of which very happily you are ignorant; and it might possibly happen that the language of the Nymph of the Waters might be among the number of things you have not studied."

"Of course, sire," replied Madame, "for facts of that nature one does not altogether rely upon one's self alone; a woman's ear is not infallible, so says Saint Augustine; and I, therefore, wished to satisfy myself by other opinions beside my own, and as my Naiad, who, in her character of a goddess, is polyglot,—is not that the expression, M. de Saint-Aignan?"

"I believe so," said the latter, quite out of countenance.

"Well," continued the princess, "as my Naiad, who, in her character of a goddess, had, at first spoken to me in English, I feared, as you suggest, that I might have misunderstood her, and I requested Mesdemoiselles de Montalais, de Tonnay-Charente, and de la Vallière, to come to me, begging my Naiad to repeat to me in the French language, the recital she had already communicated to me in English."

"And did she do so?" inquired the king.

"Oh, she is the most polite divinity it is possible to imagine! Yes, sire, she did so; so that no doubt whatever remains on the subject. Is it not so, young ladies?" said the princess, turning towards the left of her army; "did not the Naiad say precisely what I have related, and have I, in any one particular, exceeded the truth, Phyllis? I beg your pardon, I mean Mademoiselle Aure de Montalais?"

"Precisely as you have stated, Madame," articulated Mademoiselle de Montalais, very distinctly.

"Is it true, Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente?"

"The perfect truth," replied Athenais, in a voice quite as firm, but not yet so distinct.

"And you, La Vallière?" asked Madame.

The poor girl felt the king's ardent look fixed upon her,—she dared not deny—she dared not tell a falsehood; she merely bowed her head; and everybody took it for a token of assent. Her head, however, was not raised again, chilled as she was by a coldness more bitter than that of death. This triple testimony overwhelmed the king. As for Saint-Aignan, he did not even attempt to dissemble his despair, and, hardly knowing what he said, he stammered out, "An excellent jest! admirably played!"

"A just punishment for curiosity," said the king, in a hoarse voice. "Oh! who would think, after the chastisement that Tyrcis and Amyntas had suffered, of endeavoring to surprise what is passing in the heart of shepherdesses? Assuredly I shall not, for one; and, you, gentlemen?"

"Nor ! nor !!" repeated, in a chorus, the group of courtiers.

Madame was filled with triumph at the king's annoyance; and was full of delight, thinking that her story had been, or was to be, the termination of the whole affair. As for Monsieur, who had laughed at the two stories without comprehending anything about them, he turned towards De Guiche, and said to him, "Well, comte, you say nothing; can you not find something to say? Do you pity M. Tyrcis and M. Amyntas, for instance?"

"I pity them with all my soul," replied De Guiche; "for, in very truth, love is so sweet a fancy, that to lose it, fancy though it may be, is to lose more than life itself. If, therefore, these two shepherds thought themselves beloved,—if they were happy in that idea, and if, instead of that happiness, they meet not only that empty void which resembles death, but jeers and jests at love itself, which is worse than a thousand deaths,—in that case, I say that Tyrcis and Amyntas are the two most unhappy men I know."

"And you are right, too, Monsieur de Guiche," said the king; "for, in fact, the injury in question is a very hard return for a little harmless curiosity."

"That is as much to say, then, that the story of my Naiad has displeased the king?" asked Madame, innocently.

"Nay, Madame, undeceive yourself," said Louis, taking the princess by the hand; "your Naiad, on the contrary, has pleased me, and the more so, because she was so truthful, and because her tale, I ought to add, is confirmed by the testimony of unimpeachable witnesses."

These words fell upon La Vallière, accompanied by a look that on one, from Socrates to Montaigne, could have exactly defined. The look and the king's remark succeeded in overpowering the unhappy girl, who, with her head upon Montalais's shoulder, seemed to have fainted away. The king rose, without remarking this circumstance, of which no one, moreover, took any notice, and, contrary to his usual custom, for generally he remained late in Madame's apartments, he took his leave, and retired to his own side of the palace. Saint-Aignan followed him, leaving the rooms in as much despair as he had entered them with delight. Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, less sensitive than La Vallière, was not much frightened, and did not faint. However, it may be that the last look of Saint-Aignan had hardly been so majestic as the king's.

LVIII. Royal Psychology.

The king returned to his apartments with hurried steps. The reason he walked as fast as he did was probably to avoid tottering in his gait. He seemed to leave behind him as he went along a trace of a mysterious sorrow. That gayety of manner, which every one had remarked in him on his arrival, and which they had been delighted to perceive, had not perhaps been understood in its true sense: but his stormy departure, his disordered countenance, all knew, or at least thought they could tell the reason of. Madame's levity of manner, her somewhat bitter jests,—bitter for persons of a sensitive disposition, and particularly for one of the king's character; the great resemblance which naturally existed between the king and an ordinary mortal, were among the reasons assigned for the precipitate and unexpected departure of his majesty. Madame, keen-sighted enough in other respects, did not, however, at first see anything extraordinary in it. It was quite sufficient for her to have inflicted some slight wound upon the vanity or self-esteem of one who, so soon forgetting the engagements he had contracted, seemed to have undertaken to disdain, without cause, the noblest and highest prize in France. It was not an unimportant matter for Madame, in the present position of affairs, to let the king perceive the difference which existed between the bestowal of his affections on one in a high station, and the running after each passing fancy, like a youth fresh from the provinces. With regard to those higher placed affections, recognizing their dignity and their illimitable influence, acknowledging in them a certain etiquette and display—a monarch not only did not act in a manner derogatory to his high position, but found even repose, security, mystery, and general respect therein. On the contrary, in the debasement of a common or humble attachment, he would encounter, even among his meanest subjects, carping and sarcastic remarks; he would forfeit his character of infallibility and inviolability. Having descended to the region of petty human miseries, he would be subjected to paltry contentions. In one word, to convert the royal divinity into a mere mortal by striking at his heart, or rather even at his face, like the meanest of his subjects, was to inflict a terrible blow upon the pride of that generous nature. Louis was more easily captivated by vanity than affection. Madame had wisely calculated her vengeance, and it has been seen, also, in what manner she carried it out. Let it not be supposed, however, that Madame possessed such terrible passions as the heroines of the middle ages, or that she regarded things from a pessimistic point of view; on the contrary, Madame, young, amiable, of cultivated intellect, coquettish, loving in her nature, but rather from fancy, or imagination, or ambition, than from her heart—Madame, we say, on the contrary, inaugurated that epoch of light and fleeting amusements, which distinguished the hundred and twenty years that intervened between the middle of the seventeenth century, and the last quarter of the eighteenth. Madame saw, therefore, or rather fancied she saw, things under their true aspect; she knew that the king, her august brother-in-law, had been the first to ridicule the humble La Vallière, and that, in accordance with his usual custom, it was hardly probable he would ever love the person who had excited his laughter, even had it been only for a moment. Moreover, was not her vanity ever present, that evil influence which plays so important a part in that comedy of dramatic incidents called the life of a woman? Did not her vanity tell her, aloud, in a subdued voice, in a whisper, in every variety of tone, that she could not, in reality, she a princess, young, beautiful, and rich, be compared to the poor La Vallière, as youthful as herself it is true, but far less pretty, certainly, and utterly without money, protectors, or position? And surprise need not be excited with respect to Madame; for it is known that the greatest characters are those who flatter themselves the most in the comparisons they draw between themselves and others, between others and themselves. It may perhaps be asked what was Madame's motive for an attack so skillfully conceived and executed. Why was there such a display of forces, if it were not seriously her intention to dislodge the king from a heart that had never been occupied before, in which he seemed disposed to take refuge? Was there any necessity, then, for Madame to attach so great an importance to La Vallière, if she did not fear her? Yet Madame did not fear La Vallière in that direction in which an historian, who knows everything, sees into the future, or rather, the past. Madame was neither a prophetess nor a sibyl; nor could she, any more than another, read what was written in that terrible and fatal book of the future, which records in its most secret pages the most serious events. No, Madame desired simply to punish the king for having availed himself of secret means altogether feminine in their nature; she wished to prove to him that if he made use of offensive weapons of that nature, she, a woman of ready wit and high descent, would assuredly discover in the arsenal of her imagination defensive weapons proof even against the thrusts of a monarch. Moreover, she wished him to learn that, in a war of that description, kings are held of no account, or, at all events, that kings who fight on their own behalf, like ordinary individuals, may witness the fall of their crown in the first encounter; and that, in fact, if he had expected to be adored by all the ladies of the court from the very first, from a confident reliance on his mere appearance, it was a pretension which was most preposterous and insulting even, for certain persons who filled a higher position than others, and that a lesson taught in season to this royal personage, who assumed too high and haughty a carriage, would be rendering him a great service. Such, indeed, were Madame's reflections with respect to the king. The sequel itself was not thought of. And in this manner, it will be seen that she had exercised all her influence over the minds of her maids of honour, and with all its accompanying details, had arranged the comedy which had just been acted. The king was completely bewildered by it; for the first time since he had escaped from the trammels of M. de Mazarin, he found himself treated as a man. Similar severity from any of his subjects would have been at once resisted by him. Strength comes with battle. But to match one's self with women, to be attacked by them, to have been imposed upon by mere girls from the country, who had come from Blois expressly for that purpose; it was the depth of dishonour for a young sovereign full of the pride his personal advantages and royal power inspired him with. There was nothing he could do—neither reproaches, nor exile—nor could he even show the annoyance he felt. To manifest vexation would have been to admit that he had been touched, like Hamlet, by a sword from which the button had been removed—the sword of ridicule. To show animosity against women—humiliation! especially when the women in question have laughter on their side, as a means of vengeance. If, instead of leaving all the responsibility of the affair to these women, one of the courtiers had had anything to do with the intrigue, how delightedly would Louis have seized the opportunity of turning the Bastille to personal account. But there, again, the king's anger paused, checked by reason. To be the master of armies, of prisons, of an almost divine authority, and to exert such majesty and might in the service of a petty grudge, would be unworthy not only of a monarch, but even of a man. It was necessary, therefore, simply to swallow the affront in silence, and to wear his usual gentleness and graciousness of expression. It was essential to treat Madame as a friend. As a friend!—Well, and why not? Either Madame had been the instigator of the affair, or the affair itself had found her passive. If she had been the instigator of it, it certainly was a bold measure on her part, but, at all events, it was but natural in her. Who was it that had sought her in the earliest moments of her married life to whisper words of love in her ear? Who was it that had dared to calculate the possibility of committing a crime against the marriage vow—a crime, too, still more deplorable on account of the relationship between them? Who was it that, shielded behind his royal authority, had said to this young creature: be not afraid, love but the king of France, who is above all, and a movement of whose sceptered hand will protect you against all attacks, even from your own remorse? And she had listened to and obeyed the royal voice, had been influenced by his ensnaring tones; and when, morally speaking, she had sacrificed her honour in listening to him, she saw herself repaid for her sacrifice by an infidelity the more humiliating, since it was occasioned by a woman far beneath her in the world.

Had Madame, therefore, been the instigator of the revenge, she would have been right. If, on the contrary, she had remained passive in the whole affair, what grounds had the king to be angry with her on that account? Was it for her to restrain, or rather could she restrain, the chattering of a few country girls? and was it for her, by an excess of zeal that might have been misinterpreted, to check, at the risk of increasing it, the impertinence of their conduct? All these various reasonings were like so many actual stings to the king's pride; but when he had carefully, in his own mind, gone over all the various causes of complaint, Louis was surprised, upon due reflection—in other words, after the wound has been dressed—to find that there were other causes of suffering, secret, unendurable, and unrevealed. There was one circumstance he dared not confess, even to himself; namely, that the acute pain from which he was suffering had its seat in his heart. The fact is, he had permitted his heart to be gratified by La Vallière's innocent confusion. He had dreamed of a pure affection—of an affection for Louis the man, and not the sovereign—of an affection free from all self-interest; and his heart, simpler and more youthful than he had imagined it to be, had to meet that other heart that had revealed itself to him by its aspirations. The commonest thing in the complicated history of love, is the double inoculation of love to which any two hearts are subjected; the one loves nearly always before the other, in the same way that the latter finishes nearly always by loving after the other. In this way, the electric current is established, in proportion to the intensity of the passion which is first kindled. The more Mademoiselle de la Vallière showed her affection, the more the king's affection had increased. And it was precisely that which had annoyed his majesty. For it was now fairly demonstrated to him, that no sympathetic current had been the means of hurrying his heart away in its course, because there had been no confession of love in the case—because the confession was, in fact, an insult towards the man and towards the sovereign; and finally, because—and the word, too, burnt like a hot iron—because, in fact, it was nothing but a mystification after all. This girl, therefore, who, in strictness, could not lay claim to beauty, or birth, or great intelligence—who had been selected by Madame herself, on account of her unpretending position, had not only aroused the king's regard, but had, moreover, treated him with disdain—he, the king, a man who, like an eastern potentate, had but to bestow a glance, to indicate with his finger, to throw his handkerchief. And, since the previous evening, his mind had been so absorbed with this girl that he could think and dream of nothing else. Since the previous evening his imagination had been occupied by clothing her image with charms to which she could not lay claim. In very truth, he whom such vast interests summoned, and whom so many women smiled upon invitingly, had, since the previous evening, consecrated every moment of his time, every throb of his heart, to this sole dream. It was, indeed, either too much, or not sufficient. The indignation of the king, making him forget everything, and, among others, that Saint-Aignan was present, was poured out in the most violent imprecations. True it is, that Saint-Aignan had taken refuge in a corner of the room; and from his corner, regarded the tempest passing over. His own personal disappointment seemed contemptible, in comparison with the anger of the king. He compared with his own petty vanity the prodigious pride of offended majesty; and, being well read in the hearts of kings in general, and in those of powerful kings in particular, he began to ask himself if this weight of anger, as yet held in suspense, would not soon terminate by falling upon his own head, for the very reason that others were guilty, and he innocent. In point of fact, the king, all at once, did arrest his hurried pace; and, fixing a look full of anger upon Saint-Aignan, suddenly cried out: "And you, Saint-Aignan?"

Saint-Aignan made a sign which was intended to signify, “Well, sire?”

“Yes; you have been as silly as myself, I think.”

“Sire,” stammered out Saint-Aignan.

“You permitted us to be deceived by this shameless trick.”

“Sire,” said Saint-Aignan, whose agitation was such as to make him tremble in every limb, “let me entreat your majesty not to exasperate yourself. Women, you know, are characters full of imperfections, created for the misfortune of mankind: to expect anything good from them is to require them to perform impossibilities.”

The king, who had the greatest consideration for himself, and who had begun to acquire over his emotions that command which he preserved over them all his life, perceived that he was doing an outrage to his own dignity in displaying so much animosity about so trifling an object. “No,” he said, hastily; “you are mistaken, Saint-Aignan; I am not angry; I can only wonder that we should have been turned into ridicule so cleverly and with such audacity by these young girls. I am particularly surprised that, although we might have informed ourselves accurately on the subject, we were silly enough to leave the matter for our own hearts to decide.”

“The heart, sire, is an organ which requires positively to be reduced to its material functions, but which, for the sake of humanity’s peace of mind, should be deprived of all its metaphysical inclinations. For my own part, I confess, when I saw that your majesty’s heart was so taken up by this little—”

“My heart taken up! I! My mind might, perhaps, have been so; but as for my heart, it was—” Louis again perceived that, in order to fill one gulf, he was about to dig another. “Besides,” he added, “I have no fault to find with the girl. I was quite aware that she was in love with some one else.”

“The Vicomte de Bragelonne. I informed your majesty of the circumstance.”

“You did so: but you were not the first who told me. The Comte de la Fere had solicited from me Mademoiselle de la Vallière’s hand for his son. And, on his return from England, the marriage shall be celebrated, since they love each other.”

“I recognize your majesty’s great generosity of disposition in that act.”

“So, Saint-Aignan, we will cease to occupy ourselves with these matters any longer,” said Louis.

“Yes, we will digest the affront, sire,” replied the courtier, with resignation.

“Besides, it will be an easy matter to do so,” said the king, checking a sigh.

“And, by way of a beginning, I will set about the composition of an epigram upon all three of them. I will call it ‘The Naiad and Dryad,’ which will please Madame.”

“Do so, Saint-Aignan, do so,” said the king, indifferently. “You shall read me your verses; they will amuse me. Ah! it does not signify, Saint-Aignan,” added the king, like a man breathing with difficulty, “the blow requires more than human strength to support in a dignified manner.” As the king thus spoke, assuming an air of the most angelic patience, one of the servants in attendance knocked gently at the door. Saint-Aignan drew aside, out of respect.

“Come in,” said the king. The servant partially opened the door. “What is it?” inquired Louis.

The servant held out a letter of a triangular shape. “For your majesty,” he said.

“From whom?”

“I do not know. One of the officers on duty gave it to me.”

The valet, in obedience to a gesture of the king, handed him the letter. The king advanced towards the candles, opened the note, read the signature, and uttered a loud cry. Saint-Aignan was sufficiently respectful not to look on; but, without looking on, he saw and heard all, and ran towards the king, who with a gesture dismissed the servant. “Oh, heavens!” said the king, as he read the note.

“Is your majesty unwell?” inquired Saint-Aignan, stretching forward his arms.

“No, no, Saint-Aignan—read!” and he handed him the note.

Saint-Aignan’s eyes fell upon the signature. “La Vallière!” he exclaimed. “Oh, sire!”

“Read, read!”

And Saint-Aignan read:

“Forgive my importunity, sire; and forgive, also, the absence of the formalities which may be wanting in this letter. A note seems to be more speedy and more urgent than a dispatch. I venture, therefore, to address this note to your majesty. I have retired to my own room, overcome with grief and fatigue, sire; and I implore your majesty to grant me the favour of an audience, which will enable me to confess the truth to my sovereign.

“LOUISE de la VALLIÈRE.”

“Well?” asked the king, taking the letter from Saint-Aignan’s hands, who was completely bewildered by what he had just read.

“Well!” repeated Saint-Aignan.

“What do you think of it?”

“I hardly know.”

“Still, what is your opinion?”

“Sire, the young lady must have heard the muttering of the thunder, and has got frightened.”

“Frightened at what?” asked Louis with dignity.

“Why, your majesty has a thousand reasons to be angry with the author or authors of so hazardous a joke; and, if your majesty’s memory were to be awakened in a disagreeable sense, it would be a perpetual menace hanging over the head of this imprudent girl.”

“Saint-Aignan, I do not think as you do.”

“Your majesty doubtless sees more clearly than myself.”

“Well! I see affliction and restraint in these lines; more particularly since I recall some of the details of the scene which took place this evening in Madame’s apartments—” The king suddenly stopped, leaving his meaning unexpressed.

“In fact,” resumed Saint-Aignan, “your majesty will grant an audience; nothing is clearer than that.”

“I will do better, Saint-Aignan.”

“What is that, sire?”

“Put on your cloak.”

“But, sire—”

“You know the suite of rooms where Madame’s maids of honour are lodged?”

“Certainly.”

“You know some means of obtaining an entrance there.”

“As far as that is concerned, I do not.”

“At all events, you must be acquainted with some one there.”

“Really, your majesty is the source of every good idea.”

“You do know some one, then. Who is it?”

“I know a certain gentleman, who is on very good terms with a certain young lady there.”

“One of the maids of honour?”

“Yes, sire.”

“With Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente, I suppose?” said the king, laughing.

“Fortunately, no, sire; with Montalais.”

“What is his name?”

“Malicorne.”

“And you can depend on him?”

“I believe so, sire. He ought to have a key of some sort in his possession; and if he should happen to have one, as I have done him a service, why, he will let us have it.”

“Nothing could be better. Let us set off immediately.”

The king threw his cloak over Saint-Aignan’s shoulders, asked him for his, and both went out into the vestibule.

LIX. Something That neither Naiad nor Dryad Foresaw.

Saint-Aignan stopped at the foot of the staircase leading to the entresol, where the maids of honour were lodged, and to the first floor, where Madame’s apartments were situated. Then, by means of one of the servants who was passing, he sent to apprise Malicorne, who was still with Monsieur. After having waited ten minutes, Malicorne arrived, full of self-importance. The king drew back towards the darkest part of the vestibule. Saint-Aignan, on the contrary, advanced to meet him, but at the first words, indicating his wish, Malicorne drew back abruptly.

“Oh, oh!” he said, “you want me to introduce you into the rooms of the maids of honour?”

“Yes.”

“You know very well that I cannot do anything of the kind, without being made acquainted with your object.”

“Unfortunately, my dear Monsieur Malicorne, it is quite impossible for me to give you any explanation; you must therefore confide in me as in a friend who got you out of a great difficulty yesterday, and who now begs you to draw him out of one to-day.”

“Yet I told you, monsieur, what my object was; which was, not to sleep out in the open air, and any man might express the same wish, whilst you, however, admit nothing.”

“Believe me, my dear Monsieur Malicorne,” Saint-Aignan persisted, “that if I were permitted to explain myself, I would do so.”

“In that case, my dear monsieur, it is impossible for me to allow you to enter Mademoiselle de Montalais’s apartment.”

“Why so?”

“You know why, better than any one else, since you caught me on the wall paying my addresses to Mademoiselle de Montalais; it would, therefore, be an excess of kindness on my part, you will admit, since I am paying my attentions to her, to open the door of her room to you.”

“But who told you it was on her account I asked you for the key?”

“For whom, then?”

“She does not lodge there alone, I suppose?”

“No, certainly; for Mademoiselle de la Vallière shares her rooms with her; but, really, you have nothing more to do with Mademoiselle de la Vallière than with Mademoiselle de Montalais, and there are only two men to whom I would give this key; to M. de Bragelonne, if he begged me to give it to him, and to the king, if he commanded me.”

“In that case, give me the key, monsieur: I order you to do so,” said the king, advancing from the obscurity, and partially opening his cloak. “Mademoiselle de Montalais will step down to talk with you, while we go up-stairs to Mademoiselle de la Vallière, for, in fact, it is she only whom we desire to see.”

“The king!” exclaimed Malicorne, bowing to the very ground.

“Yes, the king,” said Louis, smiling: “the king, who is as pleased with your resistance as with your capitulation. Rise, monsieur, and render us the service we request of you.”

“I obey, your majesty,” said Malicorne, leading the way up the staircase.

“Get Mademoiselle de Montalais to come down,” said the king, “and do not breathe a word to her of my visit.”

Malicorne bowed in token of obedience, and proceeded up the staircase. But the king, after a hasty reflection, followed him, and that, too, with such rapidity, that, although Malicorne was already more than half-way up the staircase, the king reached the room at the same moment. He then observed, by the door which remained half-opened behind Malicorne, La Vallière, sitting in an armchair with her head thrown back, and in the opposite corner Montalais, who, in her dressing-gown, was standing before a looking-glass, engaged in arranging her hair, and parleying the while with Malicorne. The king hurriedly opened the door and entered the room. Montalais called out at the noise made by the opening of the door, and, recognizing the king, made her escape. La Vallière rose from her seat, like a dead person galvanized, and then fell back in her armchair. The king advanced slowly towards her.

"You wished for an audience, I believe," he said coldly. "I am ready to hear you. Speak."

Saint-Aignan, faithful to his character of being deaf, blind, and dumb, had stationed himself in a corner of the door, upon a stool which by chance he found there. Concealed by the tapestry which covered the doorway, and leaning his back against the wall, he could thus listen without being seen; resigning himself to the post of a good watch-dog, who patiently waits and watches without ever getting in his master's way.

La Vallière, terror-stricken at the king's irritated aspect, rose a second time, and assuming a posture full of humility and entreaty, murmured, "Forgive me, sire."

"What need is there for my forgiveness?" asked Louis.

"Sire, I have been guilty of a great fault; nay, more than a great fault, a great crime."

"You?"

"Sire, I have offended your majesty."

"Not in the slightest degree in the world," replied Louis XIV.

"I implore you, sire, not to maintain towards me that terrible seriousness of manner which reveals your majesty's just anger. I feel I have offended you, sire; but I wish to explain to you how it was that I have not offended you of my own accord."

"In the first place," said the king, "in what way can you possibly have offended me? I cannot perceive how. Surely not on account of a young girl's harmless and very innocent jest? You turned the credulity of a young man into ridicule—it was very natural to do so: any other woman in your place would have done the same."

"Oh! your majesty overwhelms me by your remark."

"Why so?"

"Because, if I had been the author of the jest, it would not have been innocent."

"Well, is that all you had to say to me in soliciting an audience?" said the king, as though about to turn away.

Thereupon La Vallière, in an abrupt and a broken voice, her eyes dried up by the fire of her tears, made a step towards the king, and said, "Did your majesty hear everything?"

"Everything, what?"

"Everything I said beneath the royal oak."

"I did not lose a syllable."

"And now, after your majesty really heard all, are you able to think I abused your credibility?"

"Credulity; yes, indeed, you have selected the very word."

"And your majesty did not suppose that a poor girl like myself might possibly be compelled to submit to the will of others?"

"Forgive me," returned the king; "but I shall never be able to understand that she, who of her own free will could express herself so unreservedly beneath the royal oak, would allow herself to be influenced to such an extent by the direction of others."

"But the threat held out against me, sire."

"Threat! who threatened you—who dared to threaten you?"

"Those who have the right to do so, sire."

"I do not recognize any one as possessing the right to threaten the humblest of my subjects."

"Forgive me, sire, but near your majesty, even, there are persons sufficiently high in position to have, or to believe that they possess, the right of injuring a young girl, without fortune, and possessing only her reputation."

"In what way injure her?"

"In depriving her of her reputation, by disgracefully expelling her from the court."

"Oh! Mademoiselle de la Vallière," said the king bitterly, "I prefer those persons who exculpate themselves without incriminating others."

"Sire!"

"Yes; and I confess that I greatly regret to perceive, that an easy justification, as your own would have been, is now complicated in my presence by a tissue of reproaches and imputations against others."

"And which you do not believe?" exclaimed La Vallière. The king remained silent.

"Nay, but tell me!" repeated La Vallière, vehemently.

"I regret to confess it," repeated the king, bowing coldly.

The young girl uttered a deep groan, striking her hands together in despair. "You do not believe me, then," she said to the king, who still remained silent, while poor La Vallière's features became visibly changed at his continued silence. "Therefore, you believe," she said, "that I pre-arranged this ridiculous, this infamous plot, of trifling, in so shameless a manner, with your majesty."

"Nay," said the king, "it was neither ridiculous nor infamous; it was not even a plot; merely a jest, more or less amusing, and nothing more."

"Oh!" murmured the young girl, "the king does not, and will not believe me, then?"

"No, indeed, I will not believe you," said the king. "Besides, in point of fact, what can be more natural? The king, you argue, follows me, listens to me, watches me; the king wishes perhaps to amuse himself at my expense, I will amuse myself at his, and as the king is very tender-hearted, I will take his heart by storm."

La Vallière hid her face in her hands, as she stifled her sobs. The king continued pitilessly; he was revenging himself upon the poor victim before him for all he had himself suffered.

"Let us invent, then, this story of my loving him and preferring him to others. The king is so simple and so conceited that he will believe me; and then we can go and tell others how credulous the king is, and can enjoy a laugh at his expense."

"Oh!" exclaimed La Vallière, "you think that, you believe that!—it is frightful."

"And," pursued the king, "that is not all; if this self-conceited prince take our jest seriously, if he should be imprudent enough to exhibit before others anything like delight at it, well, in that case, the king will be humiliated before the whole court; and what a delightful story it will be, too, for him to whom I am really attached, in fact part of my dowry for my husband, to have the adventure to relate of the monarch who was so amusingly deceived by a young girl."

"Sire!" exclaimed La Vallière, her mind bewildered, almost wandering, indeed, "not another word, I implore you; do you not see that you are killing me?"

"A jest, nothing but a jest," murmured the king, who, however, began to be somewhat affected.

La Vallière fell upon her knees, and that so violently, that the sound could be heard upon the hard floor. "Sire," she said, "I prefer shame to disloyalty."

"What do you mean?" inquired the king, without moving a step to raise the young girl from her knees.

"Sire, when I shall have sacrificed my honour and my reason both to you, you will perhaps believe in my loyalty. The tale which was related to you in Madame's apartments, and by Madame herself, is utterly false; and that which I said beneath the great oak—"

"Well!"

"That is the only truth."

"What!" exclaimed the king.

"Sire," exclaimed La Vallière, hurried away by the violence of her emotions, "were I to die of shame on the very spot where my knees are fixed, I would repeat it until my latest breath; I said that I loved you, and it is true; I do love you."

"You!"

"I have loved you, sire, from the very first day I ever saw you; from the moment when at Blois, where I was pining away my existence, your royal looks, full of light and life, were first bent upon me. I love you still, sire; it is a crime of high treason, I know, that a poor girl like myself should love her sovereign, and should presume to tell him so. Punish me for my audacity, despise me for my shameless immodesty; but do not ever say, do not ever think, that I have jested with or deceived you. I belong to a family whose loyalty has been proved, sire, and I, too, love my king."

Suddenly her strength, voice, and respiration ceased, and she fell forward, like the flower Virgil alludes to, which the scythe of the reaper severed in the midst of the grass. The king, at these words, at this vehement entreaty, no longer retained any ill-will or doubt in his mind: his whole heart seemed to expand at the glowing breath of an affection which proclaimed itself in such noble and courageous language. When, therefore, he heard the passionate confession, his strength seemed to fail him, and he hid his face in his hands. But when he felt La Vallière's hands clinging to his own, when their warm pressure fired his blood, he bent forward, and passing his arm round La Vallière's waist, he raised her from the ground and pressed her against his heart. But she, her drooping head fallen forward on her bosom, seemed to have ceased to live. The king, terrified, called out for Saint-Aignan. Saint-Aignan, who had carried his discretion so far as to remain without stirring in his corner, pretending to wipe away a tear, ran forward at the king's summons. He then assisted Louis to seat the young girl upon a couch, slapped her hands, sprinkled some Hungary water over her face, calling out all the while, "Come, come, it is all over; the king believes you, and forgives you. There, there now! take care, or you will agitate his majesty too much; his majesty is so sensitive, so tender-hearted. Now, really, Mademoiselle de la Vallière, you must pay attention, for the king is very pale."

The fact was, the king was visibly losing colour. But La Vallière did not move.

"Do pray recover," continued Saint-Aignan. "I beg, I implore you; it is really time you should; think only of one thing, that if the king should become unwell, I should be obliged to summon his physician. What a state of things that would be! So do pray rouse yourself; make an effort, pray do, and do so at once, my dear."

It was difficult to display more persuasive eloquence than Saint-Aignan did, but something still more powerful, and of a more energetic nature than this eloquence, aroused La Vallière. The king, who was kneeling before her, covered the palms of her hands with those burning kisses which are to the hands what a kiss upon the lips is to the face. La Vallière's senses returned to her; she languidly opened her eyes and, with a dying look, murmured, "Oh! sire, has your majesty pardoned me, then?"

The king did not reply, for he was still too much overcome. Saint-Aignan thought it was his duty again to retire, for he observed the passionate devotion which was displayed in the king's gaze. La Vallière rose.

"And now, sire, that I have justified myself, at least I trust so, in your majesty's eyes, grant me leave to retire into a convent. I shall bless your majesty all my life, and I shall die thanking and loving Heaven for having granted me one hour of perfect happiness."

"No, no," replied the king, "you will live here blessing Heaven, on the contrary, but loving Louis, who will make your existence one of perfect felicity—Louis who loves you—Louis who swears it."

"Oh! sire, sire!"

And upon this doubt of La Vallière, the king's kisses became so warm that Saint-Aignan thought it was his duty to retire behind the tapestry. These kisses, however, which she had not the strength at first to resist, began to intimidate the young girl.

"Oh! sire," she exclaimed, "do not make me repeat my loyalty, for this would show me that your majesty despises me still."

"Mademoiselle de la Vallière," said the king, suddenly, drawing back with an air full of respect, "there is nothing in the world that I love and honour more than yourself, and nothing in my court, I call Heaven to witness, shall be so highly regarded as you shall be henceforward. I entreat your forgiveness for my transport; it arose from an excess of affection, but I can prove to you that I love you more than ever by respecting you as much as you can possibly desire or deserve." Then, bending before her, and taking her by the hand, he said to her, "Will you honour me by accepting the kiss I press upon your hand?" And the king's lips were pressed respectfully and lightly upon the young girl's trembling hand. "Henceforth," added Louis, rising and bending his glance upon La Vallière, "henceforth you are under my safeguard. Do not speak to any one of the injury I have done you, forgive others that which they may have attempted. For the future, you shall be so far above all those, that, far from inspiring you with fear, they shall be even beneath your pity." And he bowed as reverently as though he were leaving a place of worship. Then calling to Saint-Aignan, who approached with great humility, he said, "I hope, comte, that Mademoiselle de la Vallière will kindly confer a little of her friendship upon you, in return for that which I have vowed to her eternally."

Saint-Aignan bent his knee before La Vallière, saying, "How happy, indeed, would such an honour make me!"

"I will send your companion back to you," said the king. "Farewell! or, rather, adieu till we meet again; do not forget me in your prayers, I entreat."

"Oh!" cried La Vallière, "be assured that you and Heaven are in my heart together."

These words of Louise elated the king, who, full of happiness, hurried Saint-Aignan down the stairs. Madame had not anticipated this denouement; and neither the Naiad nor the Dryad had breathed a word about it.

LX. The New General of the Jesuits.

While La Vallière and the king were mingling, in their first confession of love, all the bitterness of the past, the happiness of the present, and hopes of the future, Fouquet had retired to the apartments which had been assigned to him in the chateau, and was conversing with Aramis precisely upon the very subjects which the king at that moment was forgetting.

"Now tell me," said Fouquet, after having installed his guest in an armchair and seated himself by his side, "tell me, Monsieur d'Herblay, what is our position with regard to the Belle-Isle affair, and whether you have received any news about it."

"Everything is going on in that direction as we wish," replied Aramis; "the expenses have been paid, and nothing has transpired of our designs."

"But what about the soldiers the king wished to send there?"

"I have received news this morning they arrived there fifteen days ago."

"And how have they been treated?"

"In the best manner possible."

"What has become of the former garrison?"

"The soldiers were landed at Sarzeau, and then transferred immediately to Quimper."

"And the new garrison?"

"Belongs to us from this very moment."

"Are you sure of what you say, my dear Monsieur de Vannes?"

"Quite sure, and, moreover, you will see by and by how matters have turned out."

"Still you are very well aware, that, of all the garrison towns, Belle-Isle is precisely the very worst."

"I know it, and have acted accordingly; no space to move about, no gayety, no cheerful society, no gambling permitted: well, it is a great pity," added Aramis, with one of those smiles so peculiar to him, "to see how much young people at the present day seek amusement, and how much, consequently, they incline to the man who procures and pays for their favourite pastimes."

"But if they amuse themselves at Bell-Isle?"

"If they amuse themselves through the king's means, they will attach themselves to the king; but if they get bored to death through the king's means, and amuse themselves through M. Fouquet, they will attach themselves to M. Fouquet."

"And you informed my intendant, of course?—so that immediately on their arrival—"

"By no means; they were left alone a whole week, to weary themselves at their ease; but, at the end of the week, they cried out, saying that former officers amused themselves much better. Whereupon they were told that the old officers had been able to make a friend of M. Fouquet, and that M. Fouquet, knowing them to be friends of his, had from that moment done all he possibly could to prevent their getting wearied or bored upon his estates. Upon this they began to reflect. Immediately afterwards, however, the intendant added, that without anticipating M. Fouquet's orders, he knew his master sufficiently well to be aware that he took an interest in every gentleman in the king's service, and that, although he did not know the new-comers, he would do as much for them as he had done for the others."

"Excellent! and I trust that the promises were followed up; I desire, as you know, that no promise should ever be made in my name without being kept."

"Without a moment's loss of time, our two privateers, and your own horses, were placed at the disposal of the officers; the keys of the principal mansion were handed over to them, so that they made up hunting-parties, and walking excursions with such ladies as are to be found in Belle-Isle; and such other as they are enabled to enlist from the neighborhood, who have no fear of sea-sickness."

"And there is a fair sprinkling to be met with at Sarzeau and Vannes, I believe, your eminence?"

"Yes; in fact all along the coast," said Aramis, quietly.

"And now, how about the soldiers?"

"Everything precisely the same, in a relative degree, you understand; the soldiers have plenty of wine, excellent provisions, and good pay."

"Very good; so that—"

"So that this garrison can be depended upon, and it is a better one than the last."

"Good."

"The result is, if Fortune favours us, so that the garrisons are changed in this manner, only every two months, that, at the end of every three years, the whole army will, in its turn, have been there; and, therefore, instead of having one regiment in our favour, we shall have fifty thousand men."

"Yes, yes; I knew perfectly well," said Fouquet, "that no friend could be more incomparable and invaluable than yourself, my dear Monsieur d'Herblay; but," he added, laughing, "all this time we are forgetting our friend, Du Vallon; what has become of him? During the three days I spent at Saint-Mande, I confess I have forgotten him completely."

"I do not forget him, however," returned Aramis. "Porthos is at Saint-Mande; his joints are kept well greased, the greatest care is being taken care of him with regard to the food he eats, and the wines he drinks; I advise him to take daily airings in the small park, which you have kept for your own use, and he makes us of it accordingly. He begins to walk again, he exercises his muscular powers by bending down young elm-trees, or making the old oaks fly into splinters, as Milo of Crotona used to do; and, as there are no lions in the park, it is not unlikely we shall find him alive. Porthos is a brave fellow."

"Yes, but in the mean time he will get bored to death."

"Oh, no; he never does that."

"He will be asking questions?"

"He sees no one."

"At all events, he is looking or hoping for something or another."

"I have inspired in him a hope which we will realize some fine morning, and on that he subsists."

"What is it?"

"That of being presented to the king."

"Oh! in what character?"

"As the engineer of Belle-Isle, of course."

"Is it possible?"

"Quite true."

"Shall we not be obliged, then, to send him back to Belle-Isle?"

"Most certainly; I am even thinking of sending him as soon as possible. Porthos is very fond of display; he is man whose weakness D'Artagnan, Athos, and myself are alone acquainted with; he never commits himself in any way; he is dignity himself; to the officers there, he would seem like a Paladin of the time of the Crusades. He would make the whole staff drunk, without getting tipsy in the least himself, and every one will regard him with admiration and sympathy; if, therefore, it should happen that we have any orders requiring to be carried out, Porthos is an incarnation of the order itself, and whatever he chose to do others would find themselves obliged to submit to."

"Send him back, then."

"That is what I intend to do; but only in a few days; for I must not omit to tell you one thing."

"What is it?"

"I begin to mistrust D'Artagnan. He is not at Fontainebleau, as you may have noticed, and D'Artagnan is never absent, or apparently idle, without some object in view. And now that my own affairs are settled, I am going to try and ascertain what the affairs are in which D'Artagnan is engaged."

"Your own affairs are settled, you say?"

"Yes."

"You are very fortunate in that case, then, and I should like to be able to say the same."

"I hope you do not make yourself uneasy."

"Hum!"

"Nothing could be better than the king's reception of you."

"True."

"And Colbert leaves you in peace."

"Nearly so."

"In that case," said Aramis, with that connection of ideas which marked him, "in that case, then, we can bestow a thought upon the young girl I was speaking to you about yesterday."

"Whom do you mean?"

"What, have you forgotten already? I mean La Vallière."

"Ah! of course, of course."

"Do you object, then, to try and make a conquest of her?"

"In one respect only; my heart is engaged in another direction, and I positively do not care about the girl in the least."

"Oh, oh!" said Aramis, "your heart is engaged, you say. The deuce! we must take care of that."

"Why?"

"Because it is terrible to have the heart occupied, when others, besides yourself, have so much need of the head."

"You are right. So you see, at your first summons, I left everything. But to return to this girl. What good do you see in my troubling myself about her?"

"This.—The king, it is said, has taken a fancy to her; at least, so it is supposed."

"But you, who know everything, know very differently."

"I know that the king is greatly and suddenly changed; that the day before yesterday he was crazy over Madame; that a few days ago, Monsieur complained of it, even to the queen-mother; and that some conjugal misunderstandings and maternal scoldings were the consequence."

"How do you know all that?"

"I do know it; at all events, since these misunderstandings and scoldings, the king has not addressed a word, has not paid the slightest attention, to her royal highness."

"Well, what next?"

"Since then, he has been taken up with Mademoiselle de la Vallière. Now, Mademoiselle de la Vallière is one of Madame's maids of honour. You happen to know, I suppose, what is called a chaperon in matters of love. Well, then, Mademoiselle de la Vallière is Madame's chaperon. It is for you to take advantage of this state of things. You have no occasion for me to tell you that. But, at all events, wounded vanity will render the conquest an easier one; the girl will get hold of the king, and Madame's secret, and you can scarcely predict what a man of intelligence can do with a secret."

"But how to get at her?"

"Nay, you, of all men, to ask me such a question!" said Aramis.

"Very true. I shall not have any time to take any notice of her."

"She is poor and unassuming, you will create a position for her, and whether she tames the king as his lady confessor, or his sweetheart, you will have enlisted a new and valuable ally."

"Very good," said Fouquet. "What is to be done, then, with regard to this girl?"

"Whenever you have taken a fancy to any lady, Monsieur Fouquet, what course have you generally pursued?"

"I have written to her, protesting my devotion to her. I have added, how happy I should be to render her any service in my power, and have signed 'Fouquet,' at the end of the letter."

"And has any one offered resistance?"

"One person only," replied Fouquet. "But, four days ago, she yielded, as the others had done."

"Will you take the trouble to write?" said Aramis, holding a pen towards him, which Fouquet took, saying:

"I will write at your dictation. My head is so taken up in another direction, that I should not be able to write a couple lines."

"Very well," said Aramis, "write."

And he dictated, as follows: "Mademoiselle—I have seen you—and you will not be surprised to learn, I think you very beautiful. But, for want of the position you merit at court, your presence there is a waste of time. The devotion of a man of honour, should ambition of any kind inspire you, might possibly serve as a means of display for your talent and beauty. I place my devotion at your feet; but, as an affection, however reserved and unpresuming it may be, might possibly compromise the object of its worship, it would ill become a person of your merit running the risk of being compromised, without her future being assured. If you would deign to accept, and reply to my affection, my affection shall prove its gratitude to you in making you free and independent forever."

Having finished writing, Fouquet looked at Aramis.

"Sign it," said the latter.

"Is it absolutely necessary?"

"Your signature at the foot of that letter is worth a million; you forget that." Fouquet signed.

"Now, by whom do you intend to send this letter?" asked Aramis.

"By an excellent servant of mine."

"Can you rely on him?"

"He is a man who has been with me all my life."

"Very well. Besides, in this case, we are not playing for very heavy stakes."

"How so? For if what you say be true of the accommodating disposition of this girl for the king and Madame, the king will give her all the money she can ask for."

"The king has money, then?" asked Aramis.

"I suppose so, for he has not asked me for any more."

"Be easy, he will ask for some, soon."

"Nay, more than that, I had thought he would have spoken to me about the fete at Vaux, but he never said a word about it."

"He will be sure to do so, though."

"You must think the king's disposition a very cruel one, Monsieur d'Herblay."

"It is not he who is so."

"He is young, and therefore his disposition is a kind one."

"He is young, and either he is weak, or his passions are strong; and Monsieur Colbert holds his weakness and his passions in his villainous grasp."

"You admit that you fear him?"

"I do not deny it."

"I that case I am lost."

"Why so?"

"My only influence with the king has been through the money I commanded, and now I am a ruined man."

"Not so."

"What do you mean by 'not so?' Do you know my affairs better than myself?"

"That is not unlikely."

"If he were to request this fete to be given?"

"You would give it, of course."

"But where is the money to come from?"

"Have you ever been in want of any?"

"Oh! if you only knew at what a cost I procured the last supply."

"The next shall cost you nothing."

"But who will give it me?"

"I will."

"What, give me six millions?"

"Ten, if necessary."

"Upon my word, D'Herblay," said Fouquet, "your confidence alarms me more than the king's displeasure. Who can you possibly be, after all?"

"You know me well enough, I should think."

"Of course; but what is it you are aiming at?"

"I wish to see upon the throne of France a king devoted to Monsieur Fouquet, and I wish Monsieur Fouquet to be devoted to me."

"Oh!" exclaimed Fouquet, pressing his hand,—“as for being devoted to you, I am yours, entirely; but believe me, my dear D'Herblay, you are deceiving yourself."

"In what respect?"

"The king will never become devoted to me."

"I do not remember to have said that King Louis would ever become devoted to you."

"Why, on the contrary, you have this moment said so."

"I did not say the king; I said a king."

"Is it not all the same?"

"No, on the contrary, it is altogether different."

"I do not understand you."

"You will do so, shortly, then; suppose, for instance, the king in question were to be a very different person to Louis XIV."

"Another person."

"Yes, who is indebted for everything to you."

"Impossible."

"His very throne, even."

"You are mad, D'Herblay. There is no man living besides Louis XIV. who can sit on the throne of France. I know of none, not one."

"But I know one."

"Unless it be Monsieur," said Fouquet, looking at Aramis uneasily; "yet Monsieur—"

"It is not Monsieur."

"But how can it be, that a prince not of the royal line, that a prince without any right—"

"My king, or rather your king, will be everything that is necessary, be assured of that."

"Be careful, Monsieur d'Herblay, you make my blood run cold, and my head swim."

Aramis smiled. "There is but little occasion for that," he replied.

"Again, I repeat, you terrify me," said Fouquet. Aramis smiled.

"You laugh," said Fouquet.

"The day will come when you will laugh too; only at the present moment I must laugh alone."

"But explain yourself."

"When the proper time comes, I will explain all. Fear nothing. Have faith in me, and doubt nothing."

"The fact is, I cannot but doubt, because I do not see clearly, or even at all."

"That is because of your blindness; but a day will come when you will be enlightened."

"Oh!" said Fouquet, "how willingly would I believe."

"You, without belief! you, who, through my means, have ten times crossed the abyss yawning at your feet, and in which, had you been alone, you would have been irretrievably swallowed; you, without belief; you, who from procureur-general attained the rank of intendant, from the rank of intendant, that of the first minister of the crown, and who from the rank of first minister will pass to that of mayor of the palace. But no," he said, with the same unaltered smile, "no, no, you cannot see, and consequently cannot believe—what I tell you." And Aramis rose to withdraw.

"One word more," said Fouquet; "you have never yet spoken to me in this manner, you have never yet shown yourself so confident, I should rather say so daring."

"Because it is necessary, in order to speak confidently, to have the lips unfettered."

"And that is now your case?"

"Yes."

"Since a very short time, then?"

"Since yesterday, only."

"Oh! Monsieur d'Herblay, take care, your confidence is becoming audacity."

"One can well be audacious when one is powerful."

"And you are powerful?"

"I have already offered you ten millions; I repeat the offer."

Fouquet rose, profoundly agitated.

"Come," he said, "come; you spoke of overthrowing kings and replacing them by others. If, indeed, I am not really out of my senses, is or is not that what you said just now?"

"You are by no means out of your senses, for it is perfectly true I did say all that just now."

"And why did you say so?"

"Because it is easy to speak in this manner of thrones being cast down, and kings being raised up, when one is, one's self, far above all kings and thrones, of this world at least."

"Your power is infinite, then?" cried Fouquet.

"I have told you so already, and I repeat it," replied Aramis, with glistening eyes and trembling lips.

Fouquet threw himself back in his chair, and buried his face in his hands. Aramis looked at him for a moment, as the angel of human destinies might have looked upon a simple mortal. "Adieu," he said to him, "sleep undisturbed, and send your letter to La Vallière. To-morrow we shall see each other again." "Yes, to-morrow," said Fouquet, shaking his hands like a man returning to his senses. "But where shall we see each other?" "At the king's promenade, if you like." "Agreed." And they separated.

LXI. The Storm.

The dawn of the following day was dark and gloomy, and as every one knew that the promenade was down in the royal programme, every one's gaze, as his eyes were opened, was directed towards the sky. Just above the tops of the trees a thick, suffocating vapor seemed to remain suspended, with barely sufficient power to rise thirty feet above the ground under the influence of the sun's rays, which was scarcely visible as a faint spot of lesser darkness through the veil of heavy mist. No dew had fallen in the morning; the turf was dried up for want of moisture, the flowers withered. The birds sang less inspiringly than usual upon the boughs, which remained motionless as the limbs of corpses. The strange confused and animated murmurs, which seemed born and to exist in virtue of the sun, that respiration of nature which is unceasingly heard amidst all other sounds, could not be heard now, and never had the silence been so profound.

The king had noticed the cheerless aspect of the heavens as he approached the window immediately upon rising. But as all the necessary directions had been given respecting the promenade, and every preparation had been made accordingly, and as, which was far more imperative than anything else, Louis relied upon this promenade to satisfy the cravings of his imagination, and we will even already say, the clamorous desires of his heart—the king unhesitatingly decided that the appearance of the heavens had nothing whatever to do with the matter; that the promenade was arranged, and that, whatever the state of the weather, the promenade should take place. Besides, there are certain terrestrial sovereigns who seem to have accorded them privileged existences, and there are certain times when it might almost be supposed that the expressed wish of an earthly monarch has its influence over the Divine will. It was Virgil who observed of Augustus: Nocte pluit tota redeunt spectacula mane. 10

Louis attended mass as usual, but it was evident that his attention was somewhat distracted from the presence of the Creator by the remembrance of the creature. His mind was occupied during the service in reckoning more than once the number of minutes, then of seconds, which separated him from the blissful moment when the promenade would begin, that is to say, the moment when Madame would set out with her maids of honour. Besides, as a matter of course, everybody at the chateau was ignorant of the interview which had taken place between La Vallière and the king. Montalais, perhaps, with her usual chattering propensity, might have been disposed to talk about it; but Montalais on this occasion was held in check by Malicorne, who had securely fastened on her pretty lips the golden padlock of mutual interest. As for Louis XIV., his happiness was so extreme that he had forgiven Madame, or nearly so, her little piece of malice of the previous evening. In fact, he had occasion to congratulate himself rather than to complain of it. Had it not been for her ill-natured action, he would not have received the letter from La Vallière; had it not been for the letter, he would have had no interview; and had it not been for the interview he would have remained undecided. His heart was filled with too much happiness for any ill-feeling to remain in it, at that moment at least. Instead, therefore, of knitting his brows into a frown when he perceived his sister-in-law, Louis resolved to receive her in a more friendly and gracious manner than usual. But on one condition only, that she would be ready to set out early. Such was the nature of Louis's thoughts during mass; which made him, during the ceremony, forget matters which, in his character of Most Christian King and of the eldest son of the Church, ought to have occupied his attention. He returned to the chateau, and as the promenade was fixed for midday, and it was at present just ten o'clock, he set to work desperately with Colbert and Lyonne. But even while he worked Louis went from the table to the window, inasmuch as the window looked out upon Madame's pavilion: he could see M. Fouquet in the courtyard, to whom the courtiers, since the favour shown towards him on the previous evening, paid greater attention than ever. The king, instinctively, on noticing Fouquet, turned towards Colbert, who was smiling, and seemed full of benevolence and delight, a state of feeling which had arisen from the very moment one of his secretaries had entered and handed him a pocket-book, which he had put unopened into his pocket. But, as there was always something sinister at the bottom of any delight expressed by Colbert, Louis preferred, of the smiles of the two men, that of Fouquet. He beckoned to the superintendent to come up, and turning towards Lyonne and Colbert, he said:—"Finish this matter, place it on my desk, and I will read it at my leisure." And he left the room. At the sign the king had made to him, Fouquet had hastened up the staircase, while Aramis, who was with the superintendent, quietly retired among the group of courtiers and disappeared without having been even observed by the king. The king and Fouquet met at the top of the staircase.

"Sire," said Fouquet, remarking the gracious manner in which Louis was about to receive him, "your majesty has overwhelmed me with kindness during the last few days. It is not a youthful monarch, but a being of higher order, who reigns over France, one whom pleasure, happiness, and love acknowledge as their master." The king coloured. The compliment, although flattering, was not the less somewhat pointed. Louis conducted Fouquet to a small room that divided his study from his sleeping-apartment.

"Do you know why I summoned you?" said the king as he seated himself upon the edge of the window, so as not to lose anything that might be passing in the gardens which fronted the opposite entrance to Madame's pavilion.

"No, sire," replied Fouquet, "but I am sure for something agreeable, if I am to judge from your majesty's gracious smile."

"You are mistaken, then."

"I, sire?"

"For I summoned you, on the contrary, to pick a quarrel with you."

"With me, sire?"

"Yes: and that a serious one."

"Your majesty alarms me—and yet I was most confident in your justice and goodness."

"Do you know I am told, Monsieur Fouquet, that you are preparing a grand fête at Vaux."

Fouquet smiled, as a sick man would do at the first shiver of a fever which has left him but returns again.

"And that you have not invited me!" continued the king.

"Sire," replied Fouquet, "I have not even thought of the fête you speak of, and it was only yesterday evening that one of my friends," Fouquet laid a stress upon the word, "was kind enough to make me think of it."

"Yet I saw you yesterday evening, Monsieur Fouquet, and you said nothing to me about it."

"How dared I hope that your majesty would so greatly descend from your own exalted station as to honour my dwelling with your royal presence?"

"Excuse me, Monsieur Fouquet, you did not speak to me about your fête."

"I did not allude to the fête to your majesty, I repeat, in the first place, because nothing had been decided with regard to it, and, secondly, because I feared a refusal."

"And something made you fear a refusal, Monsieur Fouquet? You see I am determined to push you hard."

"The profound wish I had that your majesty should accept my invitation—"

"Well, Monsieur Fouquet, nothing is easier, I perceive, than our coming to an understanding. Your wish is to invite me to your fête, my own is to be present at it; invite me and I will go."

"Is it possible that your majesty will deign to accept?" murmured the superintendent.

"Why, really, monsieur," said the king, laughing, "I think I do more than accept; I rather fancy I am inviting myself."

"Your majesty overwhelms me with honour and delight," exclaimed Fouquet, "but I shall be obliged to repeat what M. Vieuville said to your ancestor, Henry IV., Domine non sum dignus." 11

"To which I reply, Monsieur Fouquet, that if you give a fête, I will go, whether I am invited or not."

"I thank your majesty deeply," said Fouquet, as he raised his head beneath this favour, which he was convinced would be his ruin.

"But how could your majesty have been informed of it?"

"By a public rumor, Monsieur Fouquet, which says such wonderful things of yourself and the marvels of your house. Would you become proud, Monsieur Fouquet, if the king were to be jealous of you?"

"I should be the happiest man in the world, sire, since the very day on which your majesty were to be jealous of Vaux, I should possess something worthy of being offered to you."

"Very well, Monsieur Fouquet, prepare your fête, and open the door of your house as wide as possible."

"It is for your majesty to fix the day."

"This day month, then."

"Has your majesty any further commands?"

"Nothing, Monsieur Fouquet, except from the present moment until then to have you near me as much as possible."

"I have the honour to form one of your majesty's party for the promenade."

"Very good; indeed, I am now setting out; for there are the ladies, I see, who are going to start."

With this remark, the king, with all the eagerness, not only of a young man, but of a young man in love, withdrew from the window, in order to take his gloves and cane, which his valet held ready for him. The neighing of the horses and the crunching of the wheels on the gravel of the courtyard could be distinctly heard. The king descended the stairs, and at the moment he appeared upon the flight of steps, every one stopped. The king walked straight up to the young queen. The queen-mother, who was still suffering more than ever from the illness with which she was afflicted, did not wish to go out. Maria Theresa accompanied Madame in her carriage, and asked the king in what direction he wished the promenade to drive. The king, who had just seen La Vallière, still pale from the event of the previous evening, get into a carriage with three of her companions, told the queen that he had no preference, and wherever she would like to go, there would he be with her. The queen then desired that the outriders should proceed in the direction of Apremont. The outriders set off accordingly before the others. The king rode on horseback, and for a few minutes accompanied the carriage of the queen and Madame. The weather had cleared up a little, but a kind of veil of dust, like a thick gauze, was still spread over the surface of the heavens, and the sun made every atom glisten within the circuit of its rays. The heat was stifling; but, as the king did not seem to pay any attention to the appearance of the heavens, no one made himself uneasy about it, and the promenade, in obedience to the orders given by the queen, took its course in the direction of Apremont. The courtiers who followed were in the very highest spirits; it was evident that every one tried to forget, and to make others forget, the bitter discussions of the previous evening. Madame, particularly, was delightful. In fact, seeing the king at the door of her carriage, as she did not suppose he would be there for the queen's sake, she hoped that her prince had returned to her. Hardly, however, had they proceeded a quarter of a mile on the road, when the king, with a gracious smile, saluted them and drew up his horse, leaving the queen's carriage to pass on, then that of the principal ladies of honour, and then all the others in succession, who, seeing the king stop, wished in their turn to stop too; but the king made a sign to them to continue their progress. When La Vallière's carriage passed, the king approached it, saluted the ladies who were inside, and was preparing to accompany the carriage containing the maids of honour, in the same way he had followed that in which Madame was, when suddenly the whole file of carriages stopped. It was probable that Madame, uneasy at the king having left her, had just given directions for the performance of this maneuver, the direction in which the promenade was to take place having been left to her. The king, having sent to inquire what her object was in stopping the cavalcade, was informed in reply, that she wished to walk. She most likely hoped that the king, who was following the carriages of the maids of honour on horseback, would not venture to follow the maids of honour themselves on foot. They had arrived in the middle of the forest.

The promenade, in fact, was not ill-timed, especially for those who were dreamers or lovers. From the little open space where the halt had taken place, three beautiful long walks, shady and undulating, stretched out before them. These walks were covered with moss or with leaves that formed a carpet from the loom of nature; and each walk had its horizon in the distance, consisting of about a hand-breadth of sky, apparent through the interlacing of the branches of the trees. At the end of almost every walk, evidently in great tribulation and uneasiness, the startled deer were seen hurrying to and fro, first stopping for a moment in the middle of the path, and then raising their heads they fled with the speed of an arrow or bounded into the depths of the forest, where they disappeared from view; now and then a rabbit, of philosophical mien, might be noticed quietly sitting upright, rubbing his muzzle with his fore paws, and looking about inquiringly, as though wondering whether all these people, who were approaching in his direction, and who had just disturbed him in his meditations and his meal, were not followed by their dogs, or had not their guns under their arms. All alighted from their carriages as soon as they observed that the queen was doing so. Maria Theresa took the arm of one of her ladies of honour, and, with a side glance towards the king, who did not perceive that he was in the slightest degree the object of the queen's attention, entered the forest by the first path before her. Two of the outriders preceded her majesty with long poles, which they used for the purpose of putting the branches of the trees aside, or removing the bushes that might impede her progress. As soon as Madame alighted, she found the Comte de Guiche at her side, who bowed and placed himself at her disposal. Monsieur, delighted with his bath of the two previous days, had announced his preference for the river, and, having given De Guiche leave of absence, remained at the chateau with the Chevalier de Lorraine and Manicamp. He was not in the slightest degree jealous. He had been looked for to no purpose among those present; but as Monsieur was a man who thought a great deal of himself, and usually added very little to the general pleasure, his absence was rather a subject of satisfaction than regret. Every one had followed the example which the queen and Madame had set, doing just as they pleased, according as chance or fancy influenced them. The king, we have already observed, remained near La Vallière, and, throwing himself off his horse at the moment the door of her carriage was opened, he offered her his hand to alight. Montalais and Tonnay-Charente immediately drew back and kept at a distance; the former from calculated, the latter from natural motives. There was this difference, however, between the two, that the one had withdrawn from a wish to please the king, the other for a very opposite reason. During the last half-hour the weather also had undergone a change; the veil which had been spread over the sky, as if driven by a blast of heated air, had become massed together in the western part of the heavens; and afterwards, as if driven by a current of air from the opposite direction, was now advancing slowly and heavily towards them. The approach of the storm could be felt, but as the king did not perceive it, no one thought it proper to do so. The promenade was therefore continued; some of the company, with minds ill at ease on the subject, raised their eyes from time to time towards the sky; others, even more timid still, walked about without wandering too far from the carriages, where they relied upon taking shelter in case the storm burst. The greater number of these, however, observing that the king fearlessly entered the wood with La Vallière, followed his majesty. The king, noticing this, took La Vallière’s hand, and led her to a lateral forest-alley; where no one this time ventured to follow him.

LXII. The Shower of Rain.

At this moment, and in the same direction, too, that the king and La Vallière had taken, except that they were in the wood itself instead of following the path, two men were walking together, utterly indifferent to the appearance of the heavens. Their heads were bent down in the manner of people occupied with matters of great moment. They had not observed either De Guiche or Madame, the king or La Vallière. Suddenly something fell through the air like a colossal sheet of flame, followed by a loud but distant rumbling noise.

"Ah!" said one of them, raising his head, "here comes the storm. Let us reach our carriages, my dear D'Herblay."

Aramis looked inquiringly at the heavens. "There is no occasion to hurry yet," he said; and then resuming the conversation where it had doubtless been interrupted, he said, "You were observing that the letter we wrote last evening must by this time have reached its destination?"

"I was saying that she certainly has it."

"Whom did you send it by?"

"By my own servant, as I have already told you."

"Did he bring back an answer?"

"I have not seen him since; the young girl was probably in attendance on Madame, or was in her own room dressing, and he may have had to wait. Our time for leaving arrived, and we set off, of course; I cannot, therefore, know what is going on yonder."

"Did you see the king before leaving?"

"Yes."

"How did he seem?"

"Nothing could have passed off better, or worse; according as he be sincere or hypocritical."

"And the fête?"

"Will take place in a month."

"He invited himself, you say?"

"With a pertinacity in which I detected Colbert's influence. But has not last night removed your illusions?"

"What illusions?"

"With respect to the assistance you may be able to give me under these circumstances."

"No; I have passed the night writing, and all my orders are given."

"Do not conceal it from yourself, D'Herblay, but the fête will cost some millions."

"I will supply six; do you on your side get two or three."

"You are a wonderful man, my dear D'Herblay."

Aramis smiled.

"But," inquired Fouquet, with some remaining uneasiness, "how is it that while you are now squandering millions in this manner, a few days ago you did not pay the fifty thousand francs to Baisemeaux out of your own pocket?"

"Because a few days ago I was as poor as Job."

"And to-day?"

"To-day I am wealthier than the king himself."

"Very well," said Fouquet; "I understand men pretty well; I know you are incapable of forfeiting your word; I do not wish to wrest your secret from you, and so let us talk no more about it."

At this moment a dull, heavy rumbling was heard, which suddenly developed into a violent clap of thunder.

"Oh, oh!" said Fouquet, "I was quite right in what I said."

"Come," said Aramis, "let us rejoin the carriages."

"We shall not have time," said Fouquet, "for here comes the rain."

In fact, as he spoke, and as if the heavens were opened, a shower of large drops of rain was suddenly heard pattering on the leaves about them.

"We shall have time," said Aramis, "to reach the carriages before the foliage becomes saturated."

"It will be better," said Fouquet, "to take shelter somewhere—in a grotto, for instance."

"Yes, but where are we to find a grotto?" inquired Aramis.

"I know one," said Fouquet, smiling, "not ten paces from here." Then looking round him, he added: "Yes, we are quite right."

"You are very fortunate to have so good a memory," said Aramis, smiling in his turn, "but are you not afraid that your coachman, finding we do not return, will suppose we have taken another road back, and that he will not follow the carriages belonging to the court?"

"Oh, there is no fear of that," said Fouquet; "whenever I place my coachman and my carriage in any particular spot, nothing but an express order from the king could stir them; and more than that, too, it seems that we are not the only ones who have come so far, for I hear footsteps and the sound of voices."

As he spoke, Fouquet turned round, and opened with his cane a mass of foliage which hid the path from his view. Aramis's glance as well as his own plunged at the same moment through the aperture he had made.

"A woman," said Aramis.

"And a man," said Fouquet.

"It is La Vallière and the king," they both exclaimed together.

"Oh, oh!" said Aramis, "is his majesty aware of your cavern as well? I should not be astonished if he were, for he seems to be on very good terms with the dryads of Fontainebleau."

"Never mind," said Fouquet; "let us get there. If he is not aware of it, we shall see what he will do if he should know it, as it has two entrances, so that whilst he enters by one, we can leave by the other."

"Is it far?" asked Aramis, "for the rain is beginning to penetrate."

"We are there now," said Fouquet, as he pushed aside a few branches, and an excavation in the solid rock could be observed, hitherto concealed by heaths, ivy, and a thick covert of small shrubs.

Fouquet led the way, followed by Aramis; but as the latter entered the grotto, he turned round, saying: "Yes, they are entering the wood; and, see, they are bending their steps this way."

"Very well; let us make room for them," said Fouquet, smiling and pulling Aramis by his cloak; "but I do not think the king knows of my grotto."

"Yes," said Aramis, "they are looking about them, but it is only for a thicker tree."

Aramis was not mistaken, the king's looks were directed upward, and not around him. He held La Vallière's arm within his own, and held her hand in his. La Vallière's feet began to sleep on the damp grass. Louis again looked round him with greater attention than before, and perceiving an enormous oak with wide-spreading branches, he hurriedly drew La Vallière beneath its protecting shelter. The poor girl looked round her on all sides, and seemed half afraid, half desirous of being followed. The king made her lean back against the trunk of the tree, whose vast circumference, protected by the thickness of the foliage, was as dry as if at that moment the rain had not been falling in torrents. He himself remained standing before her with his head uncovered. After a few minutes, however, some drops of rain penetrated through the branches of the tree and fell on the king's forehead, who did not pay any attention to them.

"Oh, sire!" murmured La Vallière, pushing the king's hat towards him. But the king simply bowed, and determinedly refused to cover his head.

"Now or never is the time to offer your place," said Fouquet in Aramis's ear.

"Now or never is the time to listen, and not lose a syllable of what they may have to say to each other," replied Aramis in Fouquet's ear.

In fact they both remained perfectly silent, and the king's voice reached them where they were.

"Believe me," said the king, "I perceive, or rather I can imagine your uneasiness; believe me, I sincerely regret having isolated you from the rest of the company, and brought you, also, to a spot where you will be inconvenienced by the rain. You are wet already, and perhaps cold too?"

"No, sire."

"And yet you tremble?"

"I am afraid, sire, that my absence may be misinterpreted; at a moment, too, when all the others are reunited."

"I would not hesitate to propose returning to the carriages, Mademoiselle de la Vallière, but pray look and listen, and tell me if it be possible to attempt to make the slightest progress at present?"

In fact the thunder was still rolling, and the rain continued to fall in torrents.

"Besides," continued the king, "no possible interpretation can be made which would be to your discredit. Are you not with the king of France; in other words, with the first gentleman of the kingdom?"

"Certainly, sire," replied La Vallière, "and it is a very distinguished honour for me; it is not, therefore, for myself that I fear any interpretations that may be made."

"For whom, then?"

"For you, sire."

"For me?" said the king, smiling, "I do not understand you."

"Has your majesty already forgotten what took place yesterday evening in her royal highness's apartments?"

"Oh! forget that, I beg, or allow me to remember it for no other purpose than to thank you once more for your letter, and—"

"Sire," interrupted La Vallière, "the rain is falling, and your majesty's head is uncovered."

"I entreat you not to think of anything but yourself."

"Oh! I," said La Vallière, smiling, "I am a country girl, accustomed to roaming through the meadows of the Loire and the gardens of Blois, whatever the weather may be. And, as for my clothes," she added, looking at her simple muslin dress, "your majesty sees there is but little room for injury."

"Indeed, I have already noticed, more than once, that you owed nearly everything to yourself and nothing to your toilette. Your freedom from coquetry is one of your greatest charms in my eyes."

"Sire, do not make me out better than I am, and say merely, 'You cannot possibly be a coquette.'"

"Why so?"

"Because," said La Vallière, smiling, "I am not rich."

"You admit, then," said the king, quickly, "that you have a love for beautiful things?"

"Sire, I only regard those things as beautiful which are within my reach. Everything which is too highly placed for me—"

"You are indifferent to?"

"Is foreign to me, as being prohibited."

"And I," said the king, "do not find that you are at my court on the footing you should be. The services of your family have not been sufficiently brought under my notice. The advancement of your family was cruelly neglected by my uncle."

"On the contrary, sire. His royal highness, the Duke of Orleans, was always exceedingly kind towards M. de Saint-Remy, my step-father. The services rendered were humble, and, properly speaking, our services have been adequately recognized. It is not every one who is happy enough to find opportunities of serving his sovereign with distinction. I have no doubt at all, that, if ever opportunities had been met with, my family's actions would have been as lofty as their loyalty was firm: but that happiness was never ours."

"In that case, Mademoiselle de la Vallière, it belongs to kings to repair the want of opportunity, and most delightedly do I undertake to repair, in your instance, and with the least possible delay, the wrongs of fortune towards you."

"Nay, sire," cried La Vallière, eagerly; "leave things, I beg, as they are now."

"Is it possible! you refuse what I ought, and what I wish to do for you?"

"All I desired has been granted me, when the honour was conferred upon me of forming one of Madame's household."

"But if you refuse for yourself, at least accept for your family."

"Your generous intentions, sire, bewilder me and make me apprehensive, for, in doing for my family what your kindness urges you to do, your majesty will raise up enemies for us, and enemies for yourself, too. Leave me in the ranks of middle life, sire; of all the feelings and sentiments I experience, leave me to enjoy the pleasing instinct of disinterestedness."

"The sentiments you express," said the king, "are indeed admirable."

"Quite true," murmured Aramis in Fouquet's ear, "and he cannot be accustomed to them."

"But," replied Fouquet, "suppose she were to make a similar reply to my letter."

"True!" said Aramis, "let us not anticipate, but wait the conclusion."

"And then, dear Monsieur d'Herblay," added the superintendent, hardly able to appreciate the sentiments which La Vallière had just expressed, "it is very often sound calculation to seem disinterested with monarchs."

"Exactly what I was thinking this very minute," said Aramis. "Let us listen."

The king approached nearer to La Vallière, and as the rain dripped more and more through the foliage of the oak, he held his hat over the head of the young girl, who raised her beautiful blue eyes towards the royal hat which sheltered her, and shook her head, sighing deeply as she did so.

"What melancholy thought," said the king, "can possibly reach your heart when I place mine as a rampart before it?"

"I will tell you, sire. I had already once before broached this question, which is so difficult for a young girl of my age to discuss, but your majesty imposed silence on me. Your majesty belongs not to yourself alone: you are married; and every sentiment which would separate your majesty from the queen, in leading you to take notice of me, will be a source of profoundest sorrow for the queen." The king endeavored to interrupt the young girl, but she continued with a suppliant gesture. "The Queen Maria, with an attachment which can be well understood, follows with her eyes every step of your majesty which separates you from her. Happy enough in having had her fate united to your own, she weepingly implores Heaven to preserve you to her, and is jealous of the faintest thro of your heart bestowed elsewhere." The king again seemed anxious to speak, but again did La Vallière venture to prevent him.—"Would it not, therefore, be a most blamable action," she continued, "if your majesty, a witness of this anxious and disinterested affection, gave the queen any cause for jealousy? Forgive me, sire, for the expressions I have used. I well know it is impossible, or rather that it would be impossible, that the greatest queen of the whole world could be jealous of a poor girl like myself. But though a queen, she is still a woman, and her heart, like that of the rest of her sex, cannot close itself against the suspicions which such as are evilly disposed, insinuate. For Heaven's sake, sire, think no more of me; I am unworthy of your regard."

"Do you not know that in speaking as you have done, you change my esteem for you into the profoundest admiration?"

"Sire, you assume my words to be contrary to the truth; you suppose me to be better than I really am, and attach a greater merit to me than God ever intended should be the case. Spare me, sire; for, did I not know that your majesty was the most generous man in your kingdom, I should believe you were jesting."

"You do not, I know, fear such a thing; I am quite sure of that," exclaimed Louis.

"I shall be obliged to believe it, if your majesty continues to hold such language towards me."

"I am most unhappy, then," said the king, in a tone of regret which was not assumed; "I am the unhappiest prince in the Christian world, since I am powerless to induce belief in my words, in one whom I love the best in the wide world, and who almost breaks my heart by refusing to credit my regard for her."

"Oh, sire!" said La Vallière, gently putting the king aside, who had approached nearer to her, "I think the storm has passed away now, and the rain has ceased." At the very moment, however, as the poor girl, fleeing as it were from her own heart, which doubtless throbbed but too well in unison with the king's, uttered these words, the storm undertook to contradict her. A dead-white flash of lightning illumined the forest with a weird glare, and a peal of thunder, like a discharge of artillery, burst over their heads, as if the height of the oak that sheltered them had attracted the storm. The young girl could not repress a cry of terror. The king with one hand drew her towards his heart, and stretched the other above her head, as though to shield her from the lightning. A moment's silence ensued, as the group, delightful as everything young and loving is delightful, remained motionless, while Fouquet and Aramis contemplated it in attitudes as motionless as La Vallière and the king. "Oh, sire!" murmured La Vallière, "do you hear?" and her head fell upon his shoulder.

"Yes," said the king. "You see, the storm has not passed away."

"It is a warning, sire." The king smiled. "Sire, it is the voice of Heaven in anger."

"Be it so," said the king. "I agree to accept that peal of thunder as a warning, and even as a menace, if, in five minutes from the present moment, it is renewed with equal violence; but if not, permit me to think that the storm is a storm simply, and nothing more." And the king, at the same moment, raised his head, as if to interrogate the heavens. But, as if the remark had been heard and accepted, during the five minutes which elapsed after the burst of thunder which had alarmed them, no renewed peal was heard; and, when the thunder was again heard, it was passing as plainly as if, during those same five minutes, the storm, put to flight, had traversed the heavens with the wings of the wind. "Well, Louise," said the king, in a low tone of voice, "do you still threaten me with the anger of Heaven? and, since you wished to regard the storm as a warning, do you still believe it bodes misfortune?"

The young girl looked up, and saw that while they had been talking, the rain had penetrated the foliage above them, and was trickling down the king's face. "Oh, sire, sire!" she exclaimed, in accents of eager apprehensions, which greatly agitated the king. "Is it for me," she murmured, "that the king remains thus uncovered, and exposed to the rain? What am I, then?"

"You are, you perceive," said the king, "the divinity who dissipates the storm, and brings back fine weather." In fact, even as the king spoke, a ray of sunlight streamed through the forest, and caused the rain-drops which rested upon the leaves, or fell vertically among the openings in the branches of the trees, to glisten like diamonds.

"Sire," said La Vallière, almost overcome, but making a powerful effort over herself, "think of the anxieties your majesty will have to submit to on my account. At this very moment, they are seeking you in every direction. The queen must be full of uneasiness; and Madame—oh, Madame!" the young girl exclaimed, with an expression almost resembling terror.

This name had a certain effect upon the king. He started, and disengaged himself from La Vallière, whom he had, till that moment, held pressed against his heart. He then advanced towards the path, in order to look round, and returned, somewhat thoughtfully, to La Vallière. "Madame, did you say?" he remarked.

"Yes, Madame; she, too, is jealous," said La Vallière, with a marked tone of voice; and her eyes, so timorous in their expression, and so modestly fugitive in their glance, for a moment, ventured to look inquiringly into the king's.

"Still," returned Louis, making an effort over himself, "it seems to me that Madame has no reason, no right to be jealous of me."

"Alas!" murmured La Vallière.

"Are you, too," said the king, almost in a tone of reproach, "are you among those who think the sister has a right to be jealous of the brother?"

"It is not for me, sire, to seek to penetrate your majesty's secrets."

"You do believe it, then?" exclaimed the king.

"I believe Madame is jealous, sire," La Vallière replied, firmly.

"Is it possible," said the king with some anxiety, "that you have perceived it, then, from her conduct towards you? Have her manners in any way been such towards you that you can attribute them to the jealousy you speak of?"

"Not at all, sire; I am of so little importance."

"Oh! if it were really the case—" exclaimed Louis, violently.

"Sire," interrupted the young girl, "it has ceased raining; some one is coming, I think." And, forgetful of all etiquette, she had seized the king by the arm.

"Well," replied the king, "let them come. Who is there who would venture to think I had done wrong in remaining alone with Mademoiselle de la Vallière?"

"For pity's sake, sire! they will think it strange to see you wet through, in this manner, and that you should have run such risk for me."

"I have simply done my duty as a gentleman," said Louis; "and woe to him who may fail in his, in criticising his sovereign's conduct." In fact, at this moment a few eager and curious faces were seen in the walk, as if engaged in a search. Catching glimpses at last of the king and La Vallière, they seemed to have found what they were seeking. They were some of the courtiers who had been sent by the queen and Madame, and uncovered themselves, in token of having perceived his majesty. But Louis, notwithstanding La Vallière's confusion, did not quit his respectful and tender attitude. Then, when all the courtiers were assembled in the walk—when every one had been able to perceive the extraordinary mark of deference with which he had treated the young girl, by remaining standing and bare-headed during the storm—he offered her his arm, led her towards the group who were waiting, recognized by an inclination of the head the respectful salutations which were paid him on all sides; and, still holding his hat in his hand, he conducted her to her carriage. And, as a few sparse drops of rain continued to fall—a last adieu of the vanishing storm—the other ladies, whom respect had prevented from getting into their carriages before the king, remained altogether unprotected by hood or cloak, exposed to the rain from which the king was protecting, as well as he was able, the humblest among them. The queen and Madame must, like the others, have witnessed this exaggerated courtesy of the king. Madame was so disconcerted at it, that she touched the queen with her elbow, saying at the same time, "Look there, look there."

The queen closed her eyes as if she had been suddenly seized with a fainting-spell. She lifted her hands to her face and entered her carriage, Madame following her. The king again mounted his horse, and without showing a preference for any particular carriage door, he returned to Fontainebleau, the reins hanging over his horse's neck, absorbed in thought. As soon as the crowd had disappeared, and the sound of the horses and carriages grew fainter in the distance, and when they were certain, in fact, that no one could see them, Aramis and Fouquet came out of their grotto, and both of them in silence passed slowly on towards the walk. Aramis looked most narrowly not only at the whole extent of the open space stretching out before and behind him, but even into the very depth of the wood.

"Monsieur Fouquet," he said, when he had quite satisfied himself that they were alone, "we must get back, at any cost, that letter you wrote to La Vallière."

"That will be easy enough," said Fouquet, "if my servant has not given it to her."

"In any case it must be had, do you understand?"

"Yes. The king is in love with the girl, you mean?"

"Deeply, and what is worse is, that on her side, the girl is passionately attached to him."

"As much as to say that we must change our tactics, I suppose?"

"Not a doubt of it; you have no time to lose. You must see La Vallière, and, without thinking any more of becoming her lover, which is out of the question, must declare yourself her most devoted friend and her most humble servant."

"I will do so," replied Fouquet, "and without the slightest feeling of disinclination, for she seems a good-hearted girl."

"Or a very clever one," said Aramis; "but in that case, all the greater reason." Then he added, after a moment's pause, "If I am not mistaken, that girl will become the strongest passion of the king's life. Let us return to our carriage, and, as fast as possible, to the chateau."

LXIII. Toby.

Two hours after the superintendent's carriage had set off by Aramis's directions, conveying them both towards Fontainebleau with the fleetness of the clouds the last breath of the tempest was hurrying across the face of heaven, La Vallière was closeted in her own apartment, with a simple muslin wrapper round her, having just finished a slight repast, which was placed upon a marble table. Suddenly the door was opened, and a servant entered to announce M. Fouquet, who had called to request permission to pay his respects to her. She made him repeat the message twice over, for the poor girl only knew M. Fouquet by name, and could not conceive what business she could possibly have with a superintendent of finances. However, as he might represent the king—and, after the conversation we have recorded, it was very likely—she glanced at her mirror, drew out still more the ringlets of her hair, and desired him to be admitted. La Vallière could not, however, refrain from a certain feeling of uneasiness. A visit from the superintendent was not an ordinary event in the life of any woman attached to the court. Fouquet, so notorious for his generosity, his gallantry, and his sensitive delicacy of feeling with regard to women generally, had received more invitations than he had requested audiences. In many houses, the presence of the superintendent had been significant of fortune; in many hearts, of love. Fouquet entered the apartment with a manner full of respect, presenting himself with that ease and gracefulness of manner which was the distinctive characteristic of the men of eminence of that period, and which at the present day seems no longer to be understood, even through the interpretation of the portraits of the period, in which the painter has endeavored to recall them to being. La Vallière acknowledged the ceremonious salutation which Fouquet addressed to her by a gentle inclination of the head, and motioned him to a seat. But Fouquet, with a bow, said, "I will not sit down until you have pardoned me."

"I?" asked La Vallière, "pardon what?"

Fouquet fixed a most piercing look upon the young girl, and fancied he could perceive in her face nothing but the most unaffected surprise. "I observe," he said, "that you have as much generosity as intelligence, and I read in your eyes the forgiveness I solicit. A pardon pronounced by your lips is insufficient for me, and I need the forgiveness of your heart and mind."

"Upon my honour, monsieur," said La Vallière, "I assure you most positively I do not understand your meaning."

"Again, that is a delicacy on your part which charms me," replied Fouquet, "and I see you do not wish me to blush before you."

"Blush! blush before me! Why should you blush?"

"Can I have deceived myself," said Fouquet, "and can I have been happy enough not to have offended you by my conduct towards you?"

"Really, monsieur," said La Vallière, shrugging her shoulders, "you speak in enigmas, and I suppose I am too ignorant to understand you."

"Be it so," said Fouquet; "I will not insist. Tell me, only, I entreat you, that I may rely upon your full and complete forgiveness."

"I have but one reply to make to you, monsieur," said La Vallière, somewhat impatiently, "and I hope that will satisfy you. If I knew the wrong you have done me, I would forgive you, and I now do so with still greater reason since I am ignorant of the wrong you allude to."

Fouquet bit his lips, as Aramis would have done. "In that case," he said, "I may hope, that, notwithstanding what has happened, our good understanding will remain undisturbed, and that you will kindly confer the favour upon me of believing in my respectful friendship."

La Vallière fancied that she now began to understand, and said to herself, "I should not have believed M. Fouquet so eager to seek the source of a favour so very recent," and then added aloud, "Your friendship, monsieur! you offer me your friendship. The honour, on the contrary, is mine, and I feel overpowered by it."

"I am aware," replied Fouquet, "that the friendship of the master may appear more brilliant and desirable than that of the servant; but I assure you the latter will be quite as devoted, quite as faithful, and altogether disinterested."

La Vallière bowed, for, in fact, the voice of the superintendent seemed to convey both conviction and real devotion in its tone, and she held out her hand to him, saying, "I believe you."

Fouquet eagerly took hold of the young girl's hand. "You see no difficulty, therefore," he added, "in restoring me that unhappy letter."

"What letter?" inquired La Vallière.

Fouquet interrogated her with his most searching gaze, as he had already done before, but the same ingenious expressions, the same transparently candid look met his. "I am obliged to confess," he said, after this denial, "that your heart is the most delicate in the world, and I should not feel I was a man of honour and uprightness if I were to suspect anything from a woman so generous as yourself."

"Really, Monsieur Fouquet," replied La Vallière, "it is with profound regret I am obliged to repeat that I absolutely understand nothing of what you refer to."

"In fact, then, upon your honour, mademoiselle, you have not received any letter from me?"

"Upon my honour, none," replied La Vallière, firmly.

"Very well, that is quite sufficient; permit me, then, to renew the assurance of my utmost esteem and respect," said Fouquet. Then, bowing, he left the room to seek Aramis, who was waiting for him in his own apartment, and leaving La Vallière to ask herself whether the superintendent had not lost his senses.

"Well!" inquired Aramis, who was impatiently waiting Fouquet's return, "are you satisfied with the favourite?"

"Enchanted," replied Fouquet; "she is a woman full of intelligence and fine feeling."

"She did not get angry, then?"

"Far from that—she did not even seem to understand."

"To understand what?"

"To understand that I had written to her."

"She must, however, have understood you sufficiently to give the letter back to you, for I presume she returned it."

"Not at all."

"At least, you satisfied yourself that she had burnt it."

"My dear Monsieur d'Herblay, I have been playing at cross-purposes for more than an hour, and, however amusing it may be, I begin to have had enough of this game. So understand me thoroughly: the girl pretended not to understand what I was saying to her; she denied having received any letter; therefore, having positively denied its receipt, she was unable either to return or burn it."

"Oh, oh!" said Aramis, with uneasiness, "what is this you tell me?"

"I say that she swore most positively she had not received any letter."

"That is too much. And did you not insist?"

"On the contrary, I did insist, almost impertinently even."

"And she persisted in her denial?"

"Unhesitatingly."

"And did she not contradict herself?"

"Not once."

"But, in that case, then, you have left our letter in her hands?"

"How could I do otherwise?"

"Oh! it was a great mistake."

"What the deuce would you have done in my place?"

"One could not force her, certainly, but it is very embarrassing; such a letter ought not to remain in existence against us."

"Oh! the young girl's disposition is generosity itself; I looked at her eyes, and I can read eyes well."

"You think she can be relied upon?"

"From my heart I do."

"Well, I think we are mistaken."

"In what way?"

"I think that, in point of fact, as she herself told you, she did not receive the letter."

"What! do you suppose—"

"I suppose that, from some motive, of which we know nothing, your man did not deliver the letter to her."

Fouquet rang the bell. A servant appeared. "Send Toby here," he said. A moment afterwards a man made his appearance, with an anxious, restless look, shrewd expression of the mouth, with short arms, and his back somewhat bent. Aramis fixed a penetrating look upon him.

"Will you allow me to interrogate him myself?" inquired Aramis.

"Do so," said Fouquet.

Aramis was about to say something to the lackey, when he paused. "No," he said; "he would see that we attach too much importance to his answer; therefore question him yourself; I will pretend to be writing." Aramis accordingly placed himself at a table, his back turned towards the old attendant, whose every gesture and look he watched in a looking-glass opposite to him.

"Come here, Toby," said Fouquet to the valet, who approached with a tolerably firm step. "How did you execute my commission?" inquired Fouquet.

"In the usual way, my lord," replied the man.

"But how, tell me?"

"I succeeded in penetrating as far as Mademoiselle de la Vallière's apartment; but she was at mass, and so I placed the note on her toilette-table. Is not that what you told me to do?"

"Precisely; and is that all?"

"Absolutely all, my lord."

"No one was there?"

"No one."

"Did you conceal yourself as I told you?"

"Yes."

"And she returned?"

"Ten minutes afterwards."

"And no one could have taken the letter?"

"No one; for no one had entered the room."

"From the outside, but from the interior?"

"From the place where I was secreted, I could see to the very end of the room."

"Now listen to me," said Fouquet, looking fixedly at the lackey; "if this letter did not reach its proper destination, confess it; for, if a mistake has been made, your head shall be the forfeit."

Toby started, but immediately recovered himself. "My lord," he said, "I placed the letter on the very place I told you: and I ask only half an hour to prove to you that the letter is in Mademoiselle de la Vallière's hand, or to bring you back the letter itself."

Aramis looked at the valet scrutinizingly. Fouquet was ready in placing confidence in people, and for twenty years this man had served him faithfully. "Go," he said; "but bring me the proof you speak of." The lackey quitted the room.

"Well, what do you think of it?" inquired Fouquet of Aramis.

"I think that you must, by some means or another, assure yourself of the truth, either that the letter has, or has not, reached La Vallière; that, in the first case, La Vallière must return it to you, or satisfy you by burning it in your presence; that, in the second, you must have the letter back again, even were it to cost you a million. Come, is not that your opinion?"

"Yes; but still, my dear bishop, I believe you are exaggerating the importance of the affair."

"Blind, how blind you are!" murmured Aramis.

"La Vallière," returned Fouquet, "whom we assume to be a schemer of the first ability, is simply nothing more than a coquette, who hopes that I shall pay my court to her, because I have already done so, and who, now that she has received a confirmation of the king's regard, hopes to keep me in leading strings with the letter. It is natural enough."

Aramis shook his head.

"Is not that your opinion?" said Fouquet.

"She is not a coquette," he replied.

"Allow me to tell you—"

"Oh! I am well enough acquainted with women who are coquettes," said Aramis.

"My dear friend!"

"It is a long time ago since I finished my education, you mean. But women are the same, throughout the centuries."

"True; but men change, and you at the present day are far more suspicious than you formerly were." And then, beginning to laugh, he added, "Come, if La Vallière is willing to love me only to the extent of a third, and the king two-thirds, do you think the condition acceptable?"

Aramis rose impatiently. "La Vallière," he said, "has never loved, and never will love, any one but the king."

"At all events," said Fouquet, "what would you do?"

"Ask me rather what I would have done?"

"Well! what would you have done?"

"In the first place, I should not have allowed that man to depart."

"Toby?"

"Yes; Toby is a traitor. Nay, I am sure of it, and I would not have let him go until he had told me the truth."

"There is still time. I will recall him, and do you question him in your turn."

"Agreed."

"But I assure you it is useless. He has been with me for twenty years, and has never made the slightest mistake, and yet," added Fouquet, laughing, "it would have been easy enough for him to have done so."

"Still, call him back. This morning I fancy I saw that face, in earnest conversation with one of M. Colbert's men."

"Where was that?"

"Opposite the stables."

"Bah! all my people are at daggers drawn with that fellow."

"I saw him, I tell you, and his face, which should have been unknown to me when he entered just now, struck me as disagreeably familiar."

"Why did you not say something, then, while he was here?"

"Because it is only at this very minute that my memory is clear upon the subject."

"Really," said Fouquet, "you alarm me." And he again rang the bell.

"Provided that it is not already too late," said Aramis.

Fouquet once more rang impatiently. The valet usually in attendance appeared. "Toby!" said Fouquet, "send Toby." The valet again shut the door.

"You leave me at perfect liberty, I suppose?"

"Entirely so."

"I may employ all means, then, to ascertain the truth."

"All."

"Intimidation, even?"

"I constitute you public prosecutor in my place."

They waited ten minutes longer, but uselessly, and Fouquet, thoroughly out of patience, again rang loudly.

"Toby!" he exclaimed.

"My lord," said the valet, "they are looking for him."

"He cannot be far distant, I have not given him any commission to execute."

"I will go and see, my lord," replied the valet, as he closed the door. Aramis, during the interview, walked impatiently, but without a syllable, up and down the cabinet. They waited a further ten minutes. Fouquet rang in a manner to alarm the very dead. The valet again presented himself, trembling in a way to induce a belief that he was the bearer of bad news.

"My lord is mistaken," he said, before even Fouquet could interrogate him, "you must have given Toby some commission, for he has been to the stables and taken your lordship's swiftest horse, and saddled it himself."

"Well?"

"And he has gone off."

"Gone!" exclaimed Fouquet. "Let him be pursued, let him be captured."

"Nay, nay," whispered Aramis, taking him by the hand, "be calm, the evil is done."

The valet quietly went out.

"The evil is done, you say?"

"No doubt; I was sure of it. And now, let us give no cause for suspicion; we must calculate the result of the blow, and ward it off, if possible."

"After all," said Fouquet, "the evil is not great."

"You think so?" said Aramis.

"Of course. Surely a man is allowed to write a love-letter to a woman."

"A man, certainly; a subject, no; especially, too, when the woman in question is one with whom the king is in love."

"But the king was not in love with La Vallière a week ago! he was not in love with her yesterday, and the letter is dated yesterday; I could not guess the king was in love, when the king's affection was not even yet in existence."

"As you please," replied Aramis; "but unfortunately the letter is not dated, and it is that circumstance particularly which annoys me. If it had only been dated yesterday, I should not have the slightest shadow of uneasiness on your account."

Fouquet shrugged his shoulders.

"Am I not my own master," he said, "and is the king, then, king of my brain and of my flesh?"

"You are right," replied Aramis, "do not let us attach greater importance to matters than is necessary; and besides... Well! if we are menaced, we have means of defense."

"Oh! menaced!" said Fouquet, "you do not place this gnat bite, as it were, among the number of menaces which may compromise my fortune and my life, do you?"

"Do not forget, Monsieur Fouquet, that the bit of an insect can kill a giant, if the insect be venomous."

"But has this sovereign power you were speaking of, already vanished?"

"I am all-powerful, it is true, but I am not immortal."

"Come, then, the most pressing matter is to find Toby again, I suppose. Is not that your opinion?"

"Oh! as for that, you will not find him again," said Aramis, "and if he were of any great value to you, you must give him up for lost."

"At all events he is somewhere or another in the world," said Fouquet.

"You're right, let me act," replied Aramis.

LXIV. Madame's Four Chances.

Anne of Austria had begged the young queen to pay her a visit. For some time past suffering most acutely, and losing both her youth and beauty with that rapidity which signalizes the decline of women for whom life has been one long contest, Anne of Austria had, in addition to her physical sufferings, to experience the bitterness of being no longer held in any esteem, except as a surviving remembrance of the past, amidst the youthful beauties, wits, and influential forces of her court. Her physician's opinions, her mirror also, grieved her far less than the inexorable warnings which the society of the courtiers afforded, who, like rats in a ship, abandon the hold into which on the very next voyage the water will infallibly penetrate, owing to the ravages of decay. Anne of Austria did not feel satisfied with the time her eldest son devoted to her. The king, a good son, more from affectation than from affection, had at first been in the habit of passing an hour in the morning and one in the evening with his mother; but, since he had himself undertaken the conduct of state affairs, the duration of the morning and evening's visit had been reduced by one half; and then, by degrees, the morning visit had been suppressed altogether. They met at mass; the evening visit was replaced by a meeting, either at the king's assembly or at Madame's, which the queen attended obligingly enough, out of regard to her two sons.

The result of this was, that Madame gradually acquired an immense influence over the court, which made her apartments the true royal place of meeting. This, Anne of Austria perceived; knowing herself to be very ill, and condemned by her sufferings to frequent retirement, she was distressed at the idea that the greater part of her future days and evenings would pass away solitary, useless, and in despondency. She recalled with terror the isolation in which Cardinal Richelieu had formerly left her, those dreaded and insupportable evenings, during which, however, she had both youth and beauty, which are ever accompanied by hope, to console her. She next formed the project of transporting the court to her own apartments, and of attracting Madame, with her brilliant escort, to her gloomy and already sorrowful abode, where the widow of a king of France, and the mother of a king of France, was reduced to console, in her artificial widowhood, the weeping wife of a king of France. Anne began to reflect. She had intrigued a good deal in her life. In the good times past, when her youthful mind nursed projects that were, ultimately, invariably successful, she had by her side, to stimulate her ambition and her love, a friend of her own sex, more eager, more ambitious than herself,—a friend who had loved her, a rare circumstance at courts, and whom some petty considerations had removed from her forever. But for many years past—except Madame de Motteville, and La Molena, her Spanish nurse, a confidante in her character of countrywoman and woman too—who could boast of having given good advice to the queen? Who, too, among all the youthful heads there, could recall the past for her,—that past in which alone she lived? Anne of Austria remembered Madame de Chevreuse, in the first place exiled rather by her wish than the king's, and then dying in exile, the wife of a gentleman of obscure birth and position. She asked herself what Madame de Chevreuse would have advised her to do in similar circumstances, in their mutual difficulties arising from their intrigues; and after serious reflection, it seemed as if the clever, subtle mind of her friend, full of experience and sound judgment, answered her in the well-remembered ironical tones: "All the insignificant young people are poor and greedy of gain. They require gold and incomes to supply means of amusement; it is by interest you must gain them over." And Anne of Austria adopted this plan. Her purse was well filled, and she had at her disposal a considerable sum of money, which had been amassed by Mazarin for her, and lodged in a place of safety. She possessed the most magnificent jewels in France, and especially pearls of a size so large that they made the king sigh every time he saw them, because the pearls of his crown were like millet seed compared to them. Anne of Austria had neither beauty nor charms any longer at her disposal. She gave out, therefore, that her wealth was great, and as an inducement for others to visit her apartments she let it be known that there were good gold crowns to be won at play, or that handsome presents were likely to be made on days when all went well with her; or windfalls, in the shape of annuities which she had wrung from the king by entreaty, and thus she determined to maintain her credit. In the first place, she tried these means upon Madame; because to gain her consent was of more importance than anything else. Madame, notwithstanding the bold confidence which her wit and beauty inspired her, blindly ran head foremost into the net thus stretched out to catch her. Enriched by degrees by these presents and transfers of property, she took a fancy to inheritances by anticipation. Anne of Austria adopted the same means towards Monsieur, and even towards the king himself. She instituted lotteries in her apartments. The day on which the present opens, invitations had been issued for a late supper in the queen-mother's apartments, as she intended that two beautiful diamond bracelets of exquisite workmanship should be put into a lottery. The medallions were antique cameos of the greatest value; the diamonds, in point of intrinsic value, did not represent a very considerable amount, but the originality and rarity of the workmanship were such, that every one at court not only wished to possess the bracelets, but even to see the queen herself wear them; for, on the days she wore them, it was considered as a favour to be admitted to admire them in kissing her hands. The courtiers had, even with regard to this subject, adopted various expressions of gallantry to establish the aphorism, that the bracelets would have been priceless in value if they had not been unfortunate enough to be placed in contact with arms as beautiful as the queen's. This compliment had been honoured by a translation into all the languages of Europe, and numerous verses in Latin and French had been circulated on the subject. The day that Anne of Austria had selected for the lottery was a decisive moment; the king had not been near his mother for a couple of days; Madame, after the great scene of the Dryads and Naiads, was sulking by herself. It is true, the king's fit of resentment was over, but his mind was absorbingly occupied by a circumstance that raised him above the stormy disputes and giddy pleasures of the court.

Anne of Austria effected a diversion by the announcement of the famous lottery to take place in her apartments on the following evening. With this object in view, she saw the young queen, whom, as we have already seen, she had invited to pay her a visit in the morning. "I have good news to tell you," she said to her; "the king has been saying the most tender things about you. He is young, you know, and easily drawn away; but so long as you keep near me, he will not venture to keep away from you, to whom, besides, he is most warmly and affectionately attached. I intend to have a lottery this evening and shall expect to see you."

"I have heard," said the young queen, with a sort of timid reproach, "that your majesty intends to put in the lottery those lovely bracelets whose rarity is so great that we ought not to allow them to pass out of the custody of the crown, even were there no other reason than that they had once belonged to you."

"My daughter," said Anne of Austria, who read the young queen's thoughts, and wished to console her for not having received the bracelets as a present, "it is positively necessary that I should induce Madame to pass her time in my apartments."

"Madame!" said the young queen, blushing.

"Of course: would you not prefer to have a rival near you, whom you could watch and influence, to knowing the king is with her, always as ready to flirt as to be flirted with by her? The lottery I have proposed is my means of attraction for that purpose; do you blame me?"

"Oh, no!" returned Maria Theresa, clapping her hands with a childlike expression of delight.

"And you no longer regret, then, that I did not give you these bracelets, as I at first intended to do?"

"Oh, no, no!"

"Very well; make yourself look as beautiful as possible that our supper may be very brilliant; the gayer you seem, the more charming you appear, and you will eclipse all the ladies present as much by your brilliancy as by your rank."

Maria Theresa left full of delight. An hour afterwards, Anne of Austria received a visit from Madame, whom she covered with caresses, saying, "Excellent news! the king is charmed with my lottery."

"But I," replied Madame, "am not so greatly charmed: to see such beautiful bracelets on any one's arms but yours or mine, is what I cannot reconcile myself to."

"Well, well," said Anne of Austria, concealing by a smile a violent pang she had just experienced, "do not look at things in the worst light immediately."

"Ah, Madame, Fortune is blind, and I am told there are two hundred tickets."

"Quite as many as that; but you cannot surely forget that there can only be one winner."

"No doubt. But who will that be? Can you tell?" said Madame, in despair.

"You remind me that I had a dream last night; my dreams are always good,—I sleep so little."

"What was your dream?—but are you suffering?"

"No," said the queen, stifling with wonderful command the torture of a renewed attack of shooting pains in her bosom; "I dreamed that the king won the bracelets."

"The king!"

"You are going to ask me, I think, what the king could possibly do with the bracelets?"

"Yes."

"And you would not add, perhaps, that it would be very fortunate if the king were really to win, for he would be obliged to give the bracelets to some one else."

"To restore them to you, for instance."

"In which case I should immediately give them away; for you do not think, I suppose," said the queen, laughing, "that I have put these bracelets up to a lottery from necessity. My object was to give them without arousing any one's jealousy; but if Fortune will not get me out of my difficulty—well, I will teach Fortune a lesson—and I know very well to whom I intend to offer the bracelets." These words were accompanied by so expressive a smile, that Madame could not resist paying her by a grateful kiss.

"But," added Anne of Austria, "do you not know, as well as I do, that if the king were to win the bracelets, he would not restore them to me?"

"You mean he would give them to the queen?"

"No; and for the very same reason that he would not give them back again to me; since, if I had wished to make the queen a present of them, I had no need of him for that purpose."

Madame cast a side glance upon the bracelets, which, in their casket, were dazzlingly exposed to view upon a table close beside her.

"How beautiful they are," she said, sighing. "But stay," Madame continued, "we are quite forgetting that your majesty's dream was nothing but a dream."

"I should be very much surprised," returned Anne of Austria, "if my dream were to deceive me; that has happened to me very seldom."

"We may look upon you as a prophetess, then."

"I have already said, that I dream but very rarely; but the coincidence of my dream about this matter, with my own ideas, is extraordinary! it agrees so wonderfully with my own views and arrangements."

"What arrangements do you allude to?"

"That you will get the bracelets, for instance."

"In that case, it will not be the king."

"Oh!" said Anne of Austria, "there is not such a very great distance between his majesty's heart and your own; for, are you not his sister, for whom he has a great regard? There is not, I repeat, so very wide a distance, that my dream can be pronounced false on that account. Come, let us reckon up the chances in its favour."

"I will count them."

"In the first place, we will begin with the dream. If the king wins, he is sure to give you the bracelets."

"I admit that is one."

"If you win them, they are yours."

"Naturally; that may be admitted also."

"Lastly,—if Monsieur were to win them!"

"Oh!" said Madame, laughing heartily, "he would give them to the Chevalier de Lorraine."

Anne of Austria laughed as heartily as her daughter-in-law; so much so, indeed, that her sufferings again returned, and made her turn suddenly pale in the very midst of her enjoyment.

"What is the matter?" inquired Madame, terrified.

"Nothing, nothing; a pain in my side. I have been laughing too much. We were at the fourth chance, I think."

"I cannot see a fourth."

"I beg your pardon; I am not excluded from the chance of winning, and if I be the winner, you are sure of me."

"Oh! thank you, thank you!" exclaimed Madame.

"I hope that you look upon yourself as one whose chances are good, and that my dream now begins to assure the solid outlines of reality."

"Yes, indeed: you give me both hope and confidence," said Madame, "and the bracelets, won in this manner, will be a hundred times more precious to me."

"Well! then, good-bye, until this evening." And the two princesses separated. Anne of Austria, after her daughter-in-law had left her, said to herself, as she examined the bracelets, "They are, indeed, precious; since, by their means, this evening, I shall have won over a heart to my side, at the same time, fathomed an important secret."

Then turning towards the deserted recess in her room, she said, addressing vacancy,—"Is it not thus that you would have acted, my poor Chevreuse? Yes, yes; I know it is."

And, like a perfume of other, fairer days, her youth, her imagination, and her happiness seemed to be wafted towards the echo of this invocation.

LXV. The Lottery.

By eight o'clock in the evening, every one had assembled in the queen-mother's apartments. Anne of Austria, in full dress, beautiful still, from former loveliness, and from all the resources coquetry can command at the hands of clever assistants, concealed, or rather pretended to conceal, from the crowd of courtiers who surrounded her, and who still admired her, thanks to the combination of circumstances which we have indicated in the preceding chapter, the ravages, which were already visible, of the acute suffering to which she finally yielded a few years later. Madame, almost as great a coquette as Anne of Austria, and the queen, simple and natural as usual, were seated beside her, each contending for her good graces. The ladies of honour, united in a body, in order to resist with greater effect, and consequently with more success, the witty and lively conversations which the young men held about them, were enabled, like a battalion formed in a square, to offer each other the means of attack and defense which were thus at their command. Montalais, learned in that species of warfare which consists of sustained skirmishing, protected the whole line by a sort of rolling fire she directed against the enemy. Saint-Aignan, in utter despair at the rigor, which became almost insulting from the very fact of her persisting in it, Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente displayed, tried to turn his back upon her; but, overcome by the irresistible brilliancy of her eyes, he, every moment, returned to consecrate his defeat by new submissions, to which Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente did not fail to reply by fresh acts of impertinence. Saint-Aignan did not know which way to turn. La Vallière had about her, not exactly a court, but sprinklings of courtiers. Saint-Aignan, hoping by this maneuver to attract Athenais's attention towards him, approached the young girl, and saluted her with a respect that induced some to believe that he wished to balance Athenais by Louise. But these were persons who had neither been witnesses of the scene during the shower, nor had heard it spoken of. As the majority was already informed, and well informed, too, on the matter, the acknowledged favour with which she was regarded had attracted to her side some of the most astute, as well as the least sensible, members of the court. The former, because they said with Montaigne, "How do I know?" and the latter, who said with Rabelais, "Perhaps." The greatest number had followed in the wake of the latter, just as in hunting five or six of the best hounds alone follow the scent of the animal hunted, whilst the remainder of the pack follow only the scent of the hounds. The two queens and Madame examined with particular attention the toilettes of their ladies and maids of honour; and they condescended to forget they were queens in recollecting that they were women. In other words, they pitilessly picked to pieces every person present who wore a petticoat. The looks of both princesses simultaneously fell upon La Vallière, who, as we have just said, was completely surrounded at that moment. Madame knew not what pity was, and said to the queen-mother, as she turned towards her, "If Fortune were just, she would favour that poor La Vallière."

"That is not possible," said the queen-mother, smiling.

"Why not?"

"There are only two hundred tickets, so that it was not possible to inscribe every one's name on the list."

"And hers is not there, then?"

"No!"

"What a pity! she might have won them, and then sold them."

"Sold them!" exclaimed the queen.

"Yes; it would have been a dowry for her, and she would not have been obliged to marry without her trousseau, as will probably be the case."

"Really," answered the queen-mother, "poor little thing: has she no dresses, then?"

And she pronounced these words like a woman who has never been able to understand the inconveniences of a slenderly filled purse.

"Stay, look at her. Heaven forgive me, if she is not wearing the very same petticoat this evening that she had on this morning during the promenade, and which she managed to keep clean, thanks to the care the king took of her, in sheltering her from the rain."

At the very moment Madame uttered these words the king entered the room. The two queens would not perhaps have observed his arrival, so completely were they occupied in their ill-natured remarks, had not Madame noticed that, all at once, La Vallière, who was standing up facing the gallery, exhibited certain signs of confusion, and then said a few words to the courtiers who surrounded her, who immediately dispersed. This movement induced Madame to look towards the door, and at that moment, the captain of the guards announced the king. At this moment La Vallière, who had hitherto kept her eyes fixed upon the gallery, suddenly cast them down as the king entered. His majesty was dressed magnificently and in the most perfect taste; he was conversing with Monsieur and the Duc de Roquelaure, Monsieur on his right, and the Duc de Roquelaure on his left. The king advanced, in the first place, towards the queens, to whom he bowed with an air full of graceful respect. He took his mother's hand and kissed it, addressed a few compliments to Madame upon the beauty of her toilette, and then began to make the round of the assembly. La Vallière was saluted in the same manner as the others, but with neither more nor less attention. His majesty then returned to his mother and his wife. When the courtiers noticed that the king had only addressed some ordinary remark to the young girl who had been so particularly noticed in the morning, they immediately drew their own conclusion to account for this coldness of manner; this conclusion being, that although the king may have taken a sudden fancy to her, that fancy had already disappeared. One thing, however, must be remarked, that close beside La Vallière, among the number of the courtiers, M. Fouquet was to be seen; and his respectfully attentive manner served to sustain the young girl in the midst of the varied emotions that visibly agitated her.

M. Fouquet was just on the point, moreover, of speaking in a more friendly manner with Mademoiselle de la Vallière, when M. Colbert approached, and after having bowed to Fouquet with all the formality of respectful politeness, he seemed to take up a post beside La Vallière, for the purpose of entering into conversation with her. Fouquet immediately quitted his place. These proceedings were eagerly devoured by the eyes of Montalais and Malicorne, who mutually exchanged their observations on the subject. De Guiche, standing within the embrasure of one of the windows, saw no one but Madame. But as Madame, on her side, frequently glanced at La Vallière, De Guiche’s eyes, following Madame’s, were from time to time cast upon the young girl. La Vallière instinctively felt herself sinking beneath the weight of all these different looks, inspired, some by interest, others by envy. She had nothing to compensate her for her sufferings, not a kind word from her companions, nor a look of affection from the king. No one could possibly express the misery the poor girl was suffering. The queen-mother next directed the small table to be brought forward, on which the lottery-tickets were placed, two hundred in number, and begged Madame de Motteville to read the list of the names. It was a matter of course that this list had been drawn out in strict accordance with the laws of etiquette. The king’s name was first on the list, next the queen-mother, then the queen, Monsieur, Madame, and so on. All hearts throbbed anxiously as the list was read out; more than three hundred persons had been invited, and each of them was anxious to learn whether his or her name was to be found in the number of privileged names. The king listened with as much attention as the others, and when the last name had been pronounced, he noticed that La Vallière had been omitted from the list. Every one, of course, remarked this omission. The king flushed as if much annoyed; but La Vallière, gentle and resigned, as usual, exhibited nothing of the sort. While the list was being read, the king had not taken his eyes off the young girl, who seemed to expand, as it were, beneath the happy influence she felt was shed around her, and who was delighted and too pure in spirit for any other thought than that of love to find an entrance either to her mind or her heart. Acknowledging this touching self-denial by the fixity of his attention, the king showed La Vallière how much he appreciated its delicacy. When the list was finished, the different faces of those who had been omitted or forgotten fully expressed their disappointment. Malicorne was also left out from amongst the men; and the grimace he made plainly said to Montalais, who was also forgotten, “Cannot we contrive to arrange matters with Fortune in such a manner that she shall not forget us?” to which a smile full of intelligence from Mademoiselle Aure, replied: “Certainly we can.”

The tickets were distributed to each according to the number listed. The king received his first, next the queen-mother, then Monsieur, then the queen and Madame, and so on. After this, Anne of Austria opened a small Spanish leather bag, containing two hundred numbers engraved upon small balls of mother-of-pearl, and presented the open sack to the youngest of her maids of honour, for the purpose of taking one of the balls out of it. The eager expectation of the throng, amidst all the tediously slow preparations, was rather that of cupidity than curiosity. Saint-Aignan bent towards Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente to whisper to her, “Since we have each a number, let us unite our two chances. The bracelet shall be yours if I win, and if you are successful, deign to give me but one look of your beautiful eyes.”

“No,” said Athenais, “if you win the bracelet, keep it, every one for himself.”

“You are without any pity,” said Saint-Aignan, “and I will punish you by a quatrain:—

“Beautiful Iris, to my vows You are too opposed—”

“Silence,” said Athenais, “you will prevent me hearing the winning number.”

“Number one,” said the young girl who had drawn the mother-of-pearl from the Spanish leather bag.

“The king!” exclaimed the queen-mother.

“The king has won,” repeated the queen, delightedly.

“Oh! the king! your dream!” said Madame, joyously, in the ear of Anne of Austria.

The king was the only one who did not exhibit any satisfaction. He merely thanked Fortune for what she had done for him, in addressing a slight salutation to the young girl who had been chosen as her proxy. Then receiving from the hands of Anne of Austria, amid the eager desire of the whole assembly, the casket inclosing the bracelets, he said, “Are these bracelets really beautiful, then?”

“Look at them,” said Anne of Austria, “and judge for yourself.”

The king looked at them, and said, “Yes, indeed, an admirable medallion. What perfect finish!”

Queen Maria Theresa easily saw, and that, too at the very first glance, that the king would not offer the bracelets to her; but, as he did not seem the least degree in the world disposed to offer them to Madame, she felt almost satisfied, or nearly so. The king sat down. The most intimate among the courtiers approached, one by one, for the purpose of admiring more closely the beautiful piece of workmanship, which soon, with the king’s permission, was handed about from person to person. Immediately, every one, connoisseurs or not, uttered various exclamations of surprise, and overwhelmed the king with congratulations. There was, in fact, something for everybody to admire—the brilliance for some, and the cutting for others. The ladies present visibly displayed their impatience to see such a treasure monopolized by the gentlemen.

“Gentlemen, gentlemen,” said the king, who nothing escaped, “one would almost think that you wore bracelets as the Sabines used to do; hand them round for a while for the inspection of the ladies, who seem to have, and with far greater right, an excuse for understanding such matters!”

These words appeared to Madame the commencement of a decision she expected. She gathered, besides, this happy belief from the glances of the queen-mother. The courtier who held them at the moment the king made this remark, amidst the general agitation, hastened to place the bracelets in the hands of the queen, Maria Theresa, who, knowing too well, poor woman, that they were not designed for her, hardly looked at them, and almost immediately passed them on to Madame. The latter, and even more minutely, Monsieur, gave the bracelets a long look of anxious and almost covetous desire. She then handed the jewels to those ladies who were near her, pronouncing this single word, but with an accent which was worth a long phrase, “Magnificent!”

The ladies who had received the bracelets from Madame’s hands looked at them as long as they chose to examine them, and then made them circulate by passing them on towards the right. During this time the king was tranquilly conversing with De Guiche and Fouquet, rather passively letting them talk than himself listening. Accustomed to the set form of ordinary phrases, his ear, like that of all men who exercise an incontestable superiority over others, merely selected from the conversations held in various directions the indispensable word which requires reply. His attention, however, was now elsewhere, for it wandered as his eyes did.

Mademoiselle de Tonnay-Charente was the last of the ladies inscribed for tickets; and, as if she had ranked according to her name upon the list, she had only Montalais and La Vallière near her. When the bracelets reached these two latter, no one appeared to take any further notice of them. The humble hands which for a moment touched these jewels, deprived them, for the time, of their importance—a circumstance which did not, however, prevent Montalais from starting with joy, envy, and covetous desire, at the sight of the beautiful stones still more than at their magnificent workmanship. It is evident that if she were compelled to decide between the pecuniary value and the artistic beauty, Montalais would unhesitatingly have preferred diamonds to cameos, and her disinclination, therefore, to pass them on to her companion, La Vallière, was very great. La Vallière fixed a look almost of indifference upon the jewels.

“Oh, how beautiful, how magnificent these bracelets are!” exclaimed Montalais; “and yet you do not go into ecstasies about them, Louise! You are no true woman, I am sure.”

“Yes, I am, indeed,” replied the young girl, with an accent of the most charming melancholy, “but why desire that which can never, by any possibility, be ours?”

The king, his head bent forward, was listening to what Louise was saying. Hardly had the vibration of her voice reached his ear than he rose, radiant with delight, and passing across the whole assembly, from the place where he stood, to La Vallière, “You are mistaken, mademoiselle,” he said, “you are a woman, and every woman has a right to wear jewels, which are a woman’s appurtenance.”

“Oh, sire!” said La Vallière, “your majesty will not absolutely believe in my modesty?”

“I believe you possess every virtue, mademoiselle; frankness as well as every other, I entreat you, therefore, to say frankly what you think of these bracelets?”

“That they are beautiful, sire, and cannot be offered to any other than a queen.”

“I am delighted that such is your opinion, mademoiselle; the bracelets are yours, and the king begs your acceptance of them.”

And as, with a movement almost resembling terror, La Vallière eagerly held out the casket to the king, the king gently pushed back her trembling hand.

A silence of astonishment, more profound than that of death, reigned in the assembly.

And yet, from the side where the queens were, no one had heard what he had said, nor understood what he had done. A charitable friend, however, took upon herself to spread the news; it was Tonnay-Charente, to whom Madame had made a sign to approach.

“Good heavens!” explained Tonnay-Charente, “how happy that La Vallière is! the king has just given her the bracelets.”

Madame bit her lips to such a degree that the blood appeared upon the surface of the skin. The young queen looked first at La Vallière and then at Madame, and began to laugh. Anne of Austria rested her chin upon her beautiful white hand, and remained for a long time absorbed by a presentiment that disturbed her mind, and by a terrible pang which stung her heart. De Guiche, observing Madame turn pale, and guessing the cause of her change of colour, abruptly quitted the assembly and disappeared. Malicorne was then able to approach Montalais very quietly, and under cover of the general din of conversation, said to her:

“Aure, your fortune and our future are standing at your elbow.”

“Yes,” was her reply, as she tenderly embraced La Vallière, whom, inwardly, she was tempted to strangle.

Malaga.

During all these long and noisy debates between the opposite ambitions of politics and love, one of our characters, perhaps the one least deserving of neglect, was, however, very much neglected, very much forgotten, and exceedingly unhappy. In fact, D’Artagnan—D’Artagnan, we say, for we must call him by his name, to remind our readers of his existence—D’Artagnan, we repeat, had absolutely nothing whatever to do, amidst these brilliant butterflies of fashion. After following the king during two whole days at Fontainebleau, and critically observing the various pastoral fancies and heroi-comic transformations of his sovereign, the musketeer felt that he needed something more than this to satisfy the cravings of his nature. At every moment assailed by people asking him, “How do you think this costume suits me, Monsieur d’Artagnan?” he would reply to them in quiet, sarcastic tones, “Why, I think you are quite as well-dressed as the best-dressed monkey to be found in the fair at Saint-Laurent.” It was just such a compliment D’Artagnan would choose where he did not feel disposed to pay any other: and, whether agreeable or not, the inquirer was obliged to be satisfied with it. Whenever any one asked him, “How do you intend to dress yourself this evening?” he replied, “I shall undress myself;” at which the ladies all laughed, and a few of them blushed. But after a couple of days passed in this manner, the musketeer, perceiving that nothing serious was likely to arise which would concern him, and that the king had completely, or, at least, appeared to have completely forgotten Paris, Saint-Mande, and Belle-Ile—that M. Colbert’s mind was occupied with illuminations and fireworks—that for the next month, at least, the ladies had plenty of glances to bestow, and also to receive in exchange—D’Artagnan asked the king for leave of absence for a matter of private business. At the moment D’Artagnan made his request, his majesty was on the point of going to bed, quite exhausted from dancing.

“You wish to leave me, Monsieur d’Artagnan?” inquired the king, with an air of astonishment; for Louis XIV. could never understand why any one who had the distinguished honour of being near him could wish to leave him.

“Sire,” said D’Artagnan, “I leave you simply because I am not of the slightest service to you in anything. Ah! if I could only hold the balancing-pole while you were dancing, it would be a very different affair.”

“But, my dear Monsieur d’Artagnan,” said the king, gravely, “people dance without balancing-poles.”

“Ah! indeed,” said the musketeer, continuing his imperceptible tone of irony, “I had no idea such a thing was possible.”

“You have not seen me dance, then?” inquired the king.

“Yes; but I always thought dancers went from easy to difficult acrobatic feats. I was mistaken; all the more greater reason, therefore, that I should leave for a time. Sire, I repeat, you have no present occasion for my services; besides, if your majesty should have any need of me, you would know where to find me.”

“Very well,” said the king, and he granted him leave of absence.

We shall not look for D’Artagnan, therefore, at Fontainebleau, for to do so would be useless; but, with the permission of our readers, follow him to the Rue des Lombards, where he was located at the sign of the Pilon d’Or, in the house of our old friend Planchet. It was about eight o’clock in the evening, and the weather was exceedingly warm; there was only one window open, and that one belonging to a room on the entresol. A perfume of spices, mingled with another perfume less exotic, but more penetrating, namely, that which arose from the street, ascended to salute the nostrils of the musketeer. D’Artagnan, reclining in an immense straight-backed chair, with his legs not stretched out, but simply placed upon a stool, formed an angle of the most obtuse form that could possibly be seen. Both his arms were crossed over his head, his head reclining upon his left shoulder, like Alexander the Great. His eyes, usually so quick and intelligent in their expression, were now half-closed, and seemed fastened, as it were, upon a small corner of blue sky that was visible behind the opening of the chimneys; there was just enough blue, and no more, to fill one of the sacks of lentils, or haricots, which formed the principal furniture of the shop on the ground floor. Thus extended at his ease, and sheltered in his place of observation behind the window, D’Artagnan seemed as if he had ceased to be a soldier, as if he were no longer an officer belonging to the palace, but was, on the contrary, a quiet, easy-going citizen in a state of stagnation between his dinner and supper, or between his supper and his bed; one of those strong, ossified brains, which have no more room for a single idea, so fiercely does animal matter keep watch at the doors of intelligence, narrowly inspecting the contraband trade which might result from the introduction into the brain of a symptom of thought. We have already said night was closing in, the shops were being lighted, while the windows of the upper apartments were being closed, and the rhythmic steps of a patrol of soldiers forming the night watch could be heard retreating. D’Artagnan continued, however, to think of nothing, except the blue corner of the sky. A few paces from him, completely in the shade, lying on his stomach, upon a sack of Indian corn, was Planchet, with both his arms under his chin, and his eyes fixed on D'Artagnan, who was either thinking, dreaming, or sleeping, with his eyes open. Planchet had been watching him for a tolerably long time, and, by way of interruption, he began by exclaiming, "Hum! hum!" But D'Artagnan did not stir. Planchet then saw that it was necessary to have recourse to more effectual means still: after a prolonged reflection on the subject, the most ingenious means that suggested itself to him under the present circumstances, was to let himself roll off the sack on to the floor, murmuring, at the same time, against himself, the word "stupid." But, notwithstanding the noise produced by Planchet's fall, D'Artagnan, who had in the course of his existence heard many other, and very different falls, did not appear to pay the least attention to the present one. Besides, an enormous cart, laden with stones, passing from the Rue Saint-Mederic, absorbed, in the noise of its wheels, the noise of Planchet's tumble. And yet Planchet fancied that, in token of tacit approval, he saw him imperceptibly smile at the word "stupid." This emboldened him to say, "Are you asleep, Monsieur d'Artagnan?"

"No, Planchet, I am not even asleep," replied the musketeer.

"I am in despair," said Planchet, "to hear such a word as even."

"Well, and why not; is it not a grammatical word, Monsieur Planchet?"

"Of course, Monsieur d'Artagnan."

"Well!"

"Well, then, the word distresses me beyond measure."

"Tell me why you are distressed, Planchet," said D'Artagnan.

"If you say that you are not even asleep, it is as much as to say that you have not even the consolation of being able to sleep; or, better still, it is precisely the same as telling me that you are getting bored to death."

"Planchet, you know that I am never bored."

"Except to-day, and the day before yesterday."

"Bah!"

"Monsieur d'Artagnan, it is a week since you returned here from Fontainebleau; in other words, you have no longer your orders to issue, or your men to review and maneuver. You need the sound of guns, drums, and all that din and confusion; I, who have myself carried a musket, can easily believe that."

"Planchet," replied D'Artagnan, "I assure you I am not bored in the least in the world."

"In that case, what are you doing, lying there, as if you were dead?"

"My dear Planchet, there was, once upon a time, at the siege of La Rochelle, when I was there, when you were there, when we both were there, a certain Arab, who was celebrated for the manner in which he adjusted culverins. He was a clever fellow, although of a very odd complexion, which was the same colour as your olives. Well, this Arab, whenever he had done eating or working, used to sit down to rest himself, as I am resting myself now, and smoked I cannot tell you what sort of magical leaves, in a large amber-mouthed tube; and if any officers, happening to pass, reproached him for being always asleep, he used quietly to reply: 'Better to sit down than to stand up, to lie down than to sit down, to be dead than to lie down.' He was an acutely melancholy Arab, and I remember him perfectly well, form the colour of his skin, and the style of his conversation. He used to cut off the heads of Protestants with the most singular gusto!"

"Precisely; and then used to embalm them, when they were worth the trouble; and when he was thus engaged with his herbs and plants about him, he looked like a basket-maker making baskets."

"You are quite right, Planchet, he did."

"Oh! I can remember things very well, at times!"

"I have no doubt of it; but what do you think of his mode of reasoning?"

"I think it good in one sense, but very stupid in another."

"Expound your meaning, M. Planchet."

"Well, monsieur, in point of fact, then, 'better to sit down than to stand up,' is plain enough, especially when one may be fatigued," and Planchet smiled in a roguish way; "as for 'better to be lying down,' let that pass, but as for the last proposition, that it is 'better to be dead than alive,' it is, in my opinion, very absurd, my own undoubted preference being for my bed; and if you are not of my opinion, it is simply, as I have already had the honour of telling you, because you are boring yourself to death."

"Planchet, do you know M. La Fontaine?"

"The chemist at the corner of the Rue Saint-Mederic?"

"No, the writer of fables."

"Oh! Maitre Corbeau!"

"Exactly; well, then, I am like his hare."

"He has got a hare also, then?"

"He has all sorts of animals."

"Well, what does his hare do, then?"

"M. La Fontaine's hare thinks."

"Ah, ah!"

"Planchet, I am like that hare—I am thinking."

"You are thinking, you say?" said Planchet, uneasily.

"Yes; your house is dull enough to drive people to think; you will admit that, I hope."

"And yet, monsieur, you have a look-out upon the street."

"Yes; and wonderfully interesting that is, of course."

"But it is no less true, monsieur, that, if you were living at the back of the house, you would bore yourself—I mean, you would think—more than ever."

"Upon my word, Planchet, I hardly know that."

"Still," said the grocer, "if your reflections are at all like those which led you to restore King Charles II.—" and Planchet finished by a little laugh which was not without its meaning.

"Ah! Planchet, my friend," returned D'Artagnan, "you are getting ambitious."

"Is there no other king to be restored, M. d'Artagnan—no second Monk to be packed up, like a salted hog, in a deal box?"

"No, my dear Planchet; all the kings are seated on their respective thrones; less comfortably so, perhaps, than I am upon this chair; but, at all events, there they are." And D'Artagnan sighed deeply.

"Monsieur d'Artagnan," said Planchet, "you are making me very uneasy."

"You are very good, Planchet."

"I begin to suspect something."

"What is it?"

"Monsieur d'Artagnan, you are getting thin."

"Oh!" said D'Artagnan, striking his chest which sounded like an empty cuirass, "it is impossible, Planchet."

"Ah!" said Planchet, slightly overcome; "if you were to get thin in my house—"

"Well?"

"I should do something rash."

"What would you do? Tell me."

"I should look out for the man who was the cause of all your anxieties."

"Ah! according to your account, I am anxious now."

"Yes, you are anxious; and you are getting thin, visibly getting thin. Malaga! if you go on getting thin, in this way, I will take my sword in my hand, and go straight to M. d'Herblay, and have it out with him."

"What!" said M. d'Artagnan, starting in his chair; "what's that you say? And what has M. d'Herblay's name to do with your groceries?"

"Just as you please. Get angry if you like, or call me names, if you prefer it; but, the deuce is in it. I know what I know."

D'Artagnan had, during this second outburst of Planchet's, so placed himself as not to lose a single look of his face; that is, he sat with both his hands resting on both his knees, and his head stretched out towards the grocer. "Come, explain yourself," he said, "and tell me how you could possibly utter such a blasphemy. M. d'Herblay, your old master, my friend, an ecclesiastic, a musketeer turned bishop—do you mean to say you would raise your sword against him, Planchet?"

"I could raise my sword against my own father, when I see you in such a state as you are now."

"M. d'Herblay, a gentleman!"

"It's all the same to me whether he's a gentleman or not. He gives you the blue devils, that is all I know. And the blue devils make people get thin. Malaga! I have no notion of M. d'Artagnan leaving my house thinner than when he entered it."

"How does he give me the blue devils, as you call it? Come, explain, explain."

"You have had the nightmare during the last three nights."

"I?"

"Yes, you; and in your nightmare you called out, several times, 'Aramis, deceitful Aramis!'"

"Ah! I said that, did I?" murmured D'Artagnan, uneasily.

"Yes, those very words, upon my honour."

"Well, what else? You know the saying, Planchet, 'dreams go by contraries.'"

"Not so; for every time, during the last three days, when you went out, you have not once failed to ask me, on your return, 'Have you seen M. d'Herblay?' or else 'Have you received any letters for me from M. d'Herblay?'"

"Well, it is very natural I should take an interest in my old friend," said D'Artagnan.

"Of course; but not to such an extent as to get thin on that account."

"Planchet, I'll get fatter; I give you my word of honour I will."

"Very well, monsieur. I accept it; for I know that when you give your word of honour, it is sacred."

"I will not dream of Aramis any more; and I will never ask you again if there are any letters from M. d'Herblay; but on condition that you explain one thing to me."

"Tell me what it is, monsieur?"

"I am a great observer; and just now you made use of a very singular oath, which is unusual for you."

"You mean Malaga! I suppose?"

"Precisely."

"It is the oath I have used ever since I have been a grocer."

"Very proper, too; it is the name of a dried grape, or raisin, I believe?"

"It is my most ferocious oath; when I have once said Malaga! I am a man no longer."

"Still, I never knew you use that oath before."

"Very likely not, monsieur. I had a present made me of it," said Planchet; and, as he pronounced these words, he winked his eye with a cunning expression, which thoroughly awakened D'Artagnan's attention.

"Come, come, M. Planchet."

"Why, I am not like you, monsieur," said Planchet. "I don't pass my life in thinking."

"You do wrong, then."

"I mean in boring myself to death. We have but a very short time to live—why not make the best of it?"

"You are an Epicurean philosopher, I begin to think, Planchet."

"Why not? My hand is still as steady as ever; I can write, and can weigh out my sugar and spices; my foot is firm; I can dance and walk about; my stomach has its teeth still, for I eat and digest very well; my heart is not quite hardened. Well, monsieur?"

"Well, what, Planchet?"

"Why, you see—" said the grocer, rubbing his hands together.

D'Artagnan crossed one leg over the other, and said, "Planchet, my friend, I am unnerved with extreme surprise; for you are revealing yourself to me under a perfectly new light."

Planchet, flattered in the highest degree by this remark, continued to rub his hands very hard together. "Ah, ah," he said, "because I happen to be only slow, you think me, perhaps, a positive fool."

"Very good, Planchet; very well reasoned."

"Follow my idea, monsieur, if you please. I said to myself," continued Planchet, "that, without enjoyment, there is no happiness on this earth."

"Quite true, what you say, Planchet," interrupted D'Artagnan.

"At all events, if we cannot obtain pleasure—for pleasure is not so common a thing, after all—let us, at least, get consolations of some kind or another."

"And so you console yourself?"

"Exactly so."

"Tell me how you console yourself."

"I put on a buckler for the purpose of confronting ennui. I place my time at the direction of patience; and on the very eve of feeling I am going to get bored, I amuse myself."

"And you don't find any difficulty in that?"

"None."

"And you found it out quite by yourself?"

"Quite so."

"It is miraculous."

"What do you say?"

"I say, that your philosophy is not to be matched in the Christian or pagan world, in modern days or in antiquity!"

"You think so?—follow my example, then."

"It is a very tempting one."

"Do as I do."

"I could not wish for anything better; but all minds are not of the same stamp; and it might possibly happen that if I were required to amuse myself in the manner you do, I should bore myself horribly."

"Bah! at least try first."

"Well, tell me what you do."

"Have you observed that I leave home occasionally?"

"Yes."

"In any particular way?"

"Periodically."

"That's the very thing. You have noticed it, then?"

"My dear Planchet, you must understand that when people see each other every day, and one of the two absents himself, the other misses him. Do you not feel the want of my society when I am in the country?"

"Prodigiously; that is to say, I feel like a body without a soul."

"That being understood then, proceed."

"What are the periods when I absent myself?"

"On the fifteenth and thirtieth of every month."

"And I remain away?"

"Sometimes two, sometimes three, and sometimes four days at a time."

"Have you ever given it a thought, why I was absent?"

"To look after your debts, I suppose."

"And when I returned, how did you think I looked, as far as my face was concerned?"

"Exceedingly self-satisfied."

"You admit, you say, that I always look satisfied. And what have you attributed my satisfaction to?"

"That your business was going on very well; that your purchases of rice, prunes, raw sugar, dried apples, pears, and treacle were advantageous. You were always very picturesque in your notions and ideas, Planchet; and I was not in the slightest degree surprised to find you had selected grocery as an occupation, which is of all trades the most varied, and the very pleasantest, as far as the character is concerned; inasmuch as one handles so many natural and perfumed productions."

"Perfectly true, monsieur; but you are very greatly mistaken."

"In what way?"

"In thinking that I leave here every fortnight, to collect my money or to make purchases. Ho, ho! how could you possibly have thought such a thing? Ho, ho, ho!" And Planchet began to laugh in a manner that inspired D'Artagnan with very serious misgivings as to his sanity.

"I confess," said the musketeer, "that I do not precisely catch your meaning."

"Very true, monsieur."

"What do you mean by 'very true'?"

"It must be true, since you say it; but pray, be assured that it in no way lessens my opinion of you."

"Ah, that is lucky."

"No; you are a man of genius; and whenever the question happens to be of war, tactics, surprises, or good honest blows to be dealt with, why, kings are marionettes, compared to you. But for the consolations of the mind, the proper care of the body, the agreeable things of like, if one may say so—ah! monsieur, don't talk to me about men of genius; they are nothing short of executioners."

"Good," said D'Artagnan, really fidgety with curiosity, "upon my word you interest me in the highest degree."

"You feel already less bored than you did just now, do you not?"

"I was not bored; yet since you have been talking to me, I feel more animated."

"Very good, then; that is not a bad beginning. I will cure you, rely upon that."

"There is nothing I should like better."

"Will you let me try, then?"

"Immediately, if you like."

"Very well. Have you any horses here?"

"Yes; ten, twenty, thirty."

"Oh, there is no occasion for so many as that, two will be quite sufficient."

"They are quite at your disposal, Planchet."

"Very good; then I shall carry you off with me."

"When?"

"To-morrow."

"Where?"

"Ah, you are asking too much."

"You will admit, however, that it is important I should know where I am going."

"Do you like the country?"

"Only moderately, Planchet."

"In that case you like town better?"

"That is as may be."

"Very well; I am going to take you to a place, half town and half country."

"Good."

"To a place where I am sure you will amuse yourself."

"Is it possible?"

"Yes; and more wonderful still, to a place from which you have just returned for the purpose only, it would seem, of getting bored here."

"It is to Fontainebleau you are going, then?"

"Exactly; to Fontainebleau."

"And, in Heaven's name, what are you going to do at Fontainebleau?"

Planchet answered D'Artagnan by a wink full of sly humor.

"You have some property there, you rascal."

"Oh, a very paltry affair; a little bit of a house—nothing more."

"I understand you."

"But it is tolerable enough, after all."

"I am going to Planchet's country-seat!" exclaimed D'Artagnan.

"Whenever you like."

"Did we not fix to-morrow?"

"Let us say to-morrow, if you like; and then, besides, to-morrow is the 14th, that is to say, the day before the one when I am afraid of getting bored; so we will look upon it as an understood thing."

"Agreed, by all means."

"You will lend me one of your horses?"

"The best I have."

"No; I prefer the gentlest of all; I never was a very good rider, as you know, and in my grocery business I have got more awkward than ever; besides—"

"Besides what?"

"Why," added Planchet, "I do not wish to fatigue myself."

"Why so?" D'Artagnan ventured to ask.

"Because I should lose half the pleasure I expect to enjoy," replied Planchet. And thereupon he rose from his sack of Indian corn, stretching himself, and making all his bones crack, one after the other, with a sort of harmony.

"Planchet! Planchet!" exclaimed D'Artagnan, "I do declare that there is no sybarite upon the face of the globe who can for a moment be compared to you. Oh, Planchet, it is very clear that we have never yet eaten a ton of salt together."

"Why so, monsieur?"

"Because, even now I can scarcely say I know you," said D'Artagnan, "and because, in point of fact, I return to the opinion which, for a moment, I had formed of you that day at Boulogne, when you strangled, or did so as nearly as possible, M. de Wardes's valet, Lubin; in plain language, Planchet, that you are a man of great resources."

Planchet began to laugh with a laugh full of self-conceit; bade the musketeer good-night, and went down to his back shop, which he used as a bedroom. D'Artagnan resumed his original position upon his chair, and his brow, which had been unruffled for a moment, became more pensive than ever. He had already forgotten the whims and dreams of Planchet. "Yes," said he, taking up again the thread of his thoughts, which had been broken by the whimsical conversation in which we have just permitted our readers to participate. "Yes, yes, those three points include everything: First, to ascertain what Baisemeaux wanted with Aramis; secondly, to learn why Aramis does not let me hear from him; and thirdly, to ascertain where Porthos is. The whole mystery lies in these three points. Since, therefore," continued D'Artagnan, "our friends tell us nothing, we must have recourse to our own poor intelligence. I must do what I can, mordieux, or rather Malaga, as Planchet would say."

II. A Letter from M. Baisemeaux.

D'Artagnan, faithful to his plan, went the very next morning to pay a visit to M. de Baisemeaux. It was cleaning up or tidying day at the Bastille; the cannons were refurbished up, the staircases scraped and cleaned; and the jailers seemed to be carefully engaged in polishing the very keys. As for the soldiers belonging to the garrison, they were walking about in different courtyards, under the pretense that they were clean enough. The governor, Baisemeaux, received D'Artagnan with more than ordinary politeness, but he behaved towards him with so marked a reserve of manner, that all D'Artagnan's tact and cleverness could not get a syllable out of him. The more he kept himself within bounds, the more D'Artagnan's suspicion increased. The latter even fancied he remarked that the governor was acting under the influence of a recent recommendation. Baisemeaux had not been at the Palais Royal with D'Artagnan the same cold and impenetrable man which the latter now found in the Baisemeaux of the Bastille. When D'Artagnan wished to make him talk about the urgent money matters which had brought Baisemeaux in search of D'Artagnan, and had rendered him expansive, notwithstanding what had passed on that evening, Baisemeaux pretended that he had some orders to give in the prison, and left D'Artagnan so long alone waiting for him, that our musketeer, feeling sure that he should not get another syllable out of him, left the Bastille without waiting until Baisemeaux returned from his inspection. But D'Artagnan's suspicions were aroused, and when once that was the case, D'Artagnan could not sleep or remain quiet for a moment. He was among men what the cat is among quadrupeds, the emblem of anxiety and impatience, at the same moment. A restless cat can no more remain the same place than a silk thread wafted idly to and fro with every breath of air. A cat on the watch is as motionless as death stationed at its place of observation, and neither hunger nor thirst can draw it from its meditations. D'Artagnan, who was burning with impatience, suddenly threw aside the feeling, like a cloak which he felt too heavy on his shoulders, and said to himself that that which they were concealing from him was the very thing it was important he should know; and, consequently, he reasoned that Baisemeaux would not fail to put Aramis on his guard, if Aramis had given him any particular recommendation, and this was, in fact, the very thing that happened.

Baisemeaux had hardly had time to return from the donjon, than D'Artagnan placed himself in ambuscade close to the Rue de Petit-Musc, so as to see every one who might leave the gates of the Bastille. After he had spent an hour on the look-out from the "Golden Portcullis," under the pent-house of which he could keep himself a little in the shade, D'Artagnan observed a soldier leave the Bastille. This was, indeed, the surest indication he could possibly have wished for, as every jailer or warder has certain days, and even certain hours, for leaving the Bastille, since all are alike prohibited from having either wives or lodgings in the castle, and can accordingly leave without exciting any curiosity; but a soldier once in barracks is kept there for four and twenty hours when on duty,—and no one knew this better than D'Artagnan. The guardsman in question, therefore, was not likely to leave his regimentals, except on an express and urgent order. The soldier, we were saying, left the Bastille at a slow and lounging pace, like a happy mortal, in fact, who, instead of mounting sentry before a wearisome guard-house, or upon a bastion no less wearisome, has the good luck to get a little liberty, in addition to a walk—both pleasures being luckily reckoned as part of his time on duty. He bent his steps towards the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, enjoying the fresh air and the warmth of the sun, and looking at all the pretty faces he passed. D'Artagnan followed him at a distance; he had not yet arranged his ideas as what was to be done. "I must, first of all," he thought, "see the fellow's face. A man seen is a man judged." D'Artagnan increased his pace, and, which was not very difficult, by the by, soon got in advance of the soldier. Not only did he observe that his face showed a tolerable amount of intelligence and resolution, but he noticed also that his nose was a little red. "He has a weakness for brandy, I see," said D'Artagnan to himself. At the same moment that he remarked his red nose, he saw that the soldier had a white paper in his belt.

"Good, he has a letter," added D'Artagnan. The only difficulty was to get hold of the letter. But a common soldier would, of course, be only too delighted at having been selected by M. de Baisemeaux as a special messenger, and would not be likely to sell his message. As D'Artagnan was biting his nails, the soldier continued to advance more and more into the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. "He is certainly going to Saint-Mande," he said to himself, "and I shall not be able to learn what the letter contains." It was enough to drive him wild. "If I were in uniform," said D'Artagnan to himself, "I would have this fellow seized, and his letter with him. I could easily get assistance at the very first guard-house; but the devil take me if I mention my name in an affair of this kind. If I were to treat him to something to drink, his suspicions would be roused; and besides, he might drink me drunk. Mordieux! my wits seem to have left me," said D'Artagnan; "it is all over with me. Yet, supposing I were to attack this poor devil, make him draw his sword and kill him for the sake of his letter? No harm in that, if it were a question of a letter from a queen to a nobleman, or a letter from a cardinal to a queen; but what miserable intrigues are those of Messieurs Aramis and Fouquet with M. Colbert. A man's life for the what? No, no, indeed; not even ten crowns." As he philosophized in this manner, biting first his nails, and then his mustaches, he perceived a group of archers and a commissary of the police engaged in carrying away a man of very gentlemanly exterior, who was struggling with all his might against them. The archers had torn his clothes, and were dragging him roughly away. He begged they would lead him along more respectfully, asserting that he was a gentleman and a soldier. And observing our soldier walking in the street, he called out, "Help, comrade."

The soldier walked on with the same step towards the man who had called out to him, followed by the crowd. An idea suddenly occurred to D'Artagnan; it was his first one, and we shall find it was not a bad one either. During the time the gentleman was relating to the soldier that he had just been seized in a house as a thief, when the truth was he was only there as a lover; and while the soldier was pitying him, and offering him consolation and advice with that gravity which a French soldier has always ready whenever his vanity or his esprit de corps is concerned, D'Artagnan glided behind the soldier, who was closely hemmed in by the crowd, and with a rapid sweep, like a sabre slash, snatched the letter from his belt. As at this moment the gentleman with the torn clothes was pulling about the soldier, to show how the commissary of police had pulled him about, D'Artagnan effected his pillage of the letter without the slightest interference. He stationed himself about ten paces distant, behind the pillar of an adjoining house, and read on the address, "To Monsieur du Vallon, at Monsieur Fouquet's, Saint-Mande."

"Good!" he said, and then he unsealed, without tearing the letter, drew out the paper, which was folded in four, from the inside; which contained only these words:

"DEAR MONSIEUR DU VALLON,—Will you be good enough to tell Monsieur d'Herblay that he has been to the Bastille, and has been making inquiries.

"Your devoted

"DE BAISEMEAUX."

"Very good! all right!" exclaimed D'Artagnan; "it is clear enough now. Porthos is engaged in it." Being now satisfied of what he wished to know: "Mordieux!" thought the musketeer, "what is to be done with that poor devil of a soldier? That hot-headed, cunning fellow, De Baisemeaux, will make him pay dearly for my trick,—if he returns without the letter, what will they do to him? Besides, I don't want the letter; when the egg has been sucked, what is the good of the shell?" D'Artagnan perceived that the commissary and the archers had succeeded in convincing the soldier, and went on their way with the prisoner, the latter being still surrounded by the crowd, and continuing his complaints. D'Artagnan advanced into the very middle of the crowd, let the letter fall, without any one having observed him, and then retreated rapidly. The soldier resumed his route towards Saint-Mande, his mind occupied with the gentleman who had implored his protection. Suddenly he thought of his letter, and, looking at his belt, saw that it was no longer there. D'Artagnan derived no little satisfaction from his sudden, terrified cry. The poor soldier in the greatest anguish of mind looked round him on every side, and at last, about twenty paces behind him, he perceived the lucky envelope. He pounced on it like a falcon on its prey. The envelope was certainly a little dirty, and rather crumpled, but at all events the letter itself was found. D'Artagnan observed that the broken seal attracted the soldier's attention a good deal, but he finished apparently by consoling himself, and returned the letter to his belt. "Go on," said D'Artagnan, "I have plenty of time before me, so you may precede me. It appears that Aramis is not in Paris, since Baisemeaux writes to Porthos. Dear Porthos, how delighted I shall be to see him again, and to have some conversation with him!" said the Gascon. And, regulating his pace according to that of the soldier, he promised himself to arrive a quarter of an hour after him at M. Fouquet's.

III. In Which the Reader will be Delighted to Find that Porthos Has Lost Nothing of His Muscularity.

D'Artagnan had, according to his usual style, calculated that every hour is worth sixty minutes, and every minute worth sixty seconds. Thanks to this perfectly exact calculation of minutes and seconds, he reached the superintendent's door at the very moment the soldier was leaving it with his belt empty. D'Artagnan presented himself at the door, which a porter with a profusely embroidered livery held half opened for him. D'Artagnan would very much have liked to enter without giving his name, but this was impossible, and so he gave it. Notwithstanding this concession, which ought to have removed every difficulty in the way, at least D'Artagnan thought so, the conciergerie hesitated; however, at the second repetition of the title, captain of the king's guards, the conciergerie, without quite leaving the passage clear for him, ceased to bar it completely. D'Artagnan understood that orders of the most positive character had been given. He decided, therefore, to tell a falsehood,—a circumstance, moreover, which did not seriously affect his peace of mind, when he saw that beyond the falsehood the safety of the state itself, or even purely and simply his own individual personal interest, might be at stake. He moreover added to the declarations he had already made, that the soldier sent to M. du Vallon was his own messenger, and that the only object that letter had in view was to announce his intended arrival. From that moment, no one opposed D'Artagnan's entrance any further, and he entered accordingly. A valet wished to accompany him, but he answered that it was useless to take that trouble on his account, inasmuch as he knew perfectly well where M. du Vallon was. There was nothing, of course, to say to a man so thoroughly and completely informed on all points, and D'Artagnan was permitted, therefore, to do as he liked. The terraces, the magnificent apartments, the gardens, were all reviewed and narrowly inspected by the musketeer. He walked for a quarter of an hour in this more than royal residence, which included as many wonders as articles of furniture, and as many servants as there were columns and doors. "Decidedly," he said to himself, "this mansion has no other limits than the pillars of the habitable world. Is it probable Porthos has taken it into his head to go back to Pierrefonds without even leaving M. Fouquet's house?" He finally reached a remote part of the chateau inclosed by a stone wall, which was covered with a profusion of thick plants, luxuriant in blossoms as large and solid as fruit. At equal distances on the top of this wall were placed various statues in timid or mysterious attitudes. These were vestals hidden beneath the long Greek peplum, with its thick, sinuous folds; agile nymphs, covered with their marble veils, and guarding the palace with their fugitive glances. A statue of Hermes, with his finger on his lips; one of Iris, with extended wings; another of Night, sprinkled all over with poppies, dominated the gardens and outbuildings, which could be seen through the trees. All these statues threw in white relief their profiles upon the dark ground of the tall cypresses, which darted their somber summits towards the sky. Around these cypresses were entwined climbing roses, whose flowering rings were fastened to every fork of the branches, and spread over the lower boughs and the various statues, showers of flowers of the rarest fragrance. These enchantments seemed to the musketeer the result of the greatest efforts of the human mind. He felt in a dreamy, almost poetical, frame of mind. The idea that Porthos was living in so perfect an Eden gave him a higher idea of Porthos, showing how tremendously true it is, that even the very highest orders of minds are not quite exempt from the influence of surroundings. D'Artagnan found the door, and on, or rather in the door, a kind of spring which he detected; having touched it, the door flew open. D'Artagnan entered, closed the door behind him, and advanced into a pavilion built in a circular form, in which no other sound could be heard but cascades and the songs of birds. At the door of the pavilion he met a lackey.

"It is here, I believe," said D'Artagnan, without hesitation, "that M. le Baron du Vallon is staying?"

"Yes, monsieur," answered the lackey.

"Have the goodness to tell him that M. le Chevalier d'Artagnan, captain of the king's musketeers, is waiting to see him."

D'Artagnan was introduced into the salon, and had not long to remain in expectation: a well-remembered step shook the floor of the adjoining room, a door opened, or rather flew open, and Porthos appeared and threw himself into his friend's arms with a sort of embarrassment which did not ill become him. "You here?" he exclaimed.

"And you?" replied D'Artagnan. "Ah, you sly fellow!"

"Yes," said Porthos, with a somewhat embarrassed smile; "yes, you see I am staying in M. Fouquet's house, at which you are not a little surprised, I suppose?"

"Not at all; why should you not be one of M. Fouquet's friends? M. Fouquet has a very large number, particularly among clever men."

Porthos had the modesty not to take the compliment to himself. "Besides," he added, "you saw me at Belle-Isle."

"A greater reason for my believing you to be one of M. Fouquet's friends."

"The fact is, I am acquainted with him," said Porthos, with a certain embarrassment of manner.

"Ah, friend Porthos," said D'Artagnan, "how treacherously you have behaved towards me."

"In what way?" exclaimed Porthos.

"What! you complete so admirable a work as the fortifications of Belle-Isle, and you did not tell me of it!" Porthos coloured. "Nay, more than that," continued D'Artagnan, "you saw me out yonder, you know I am in the king's service, and yet you could not guess that the king, jealously desirous of learning the name of the man whose abilities had wrought a work of which he heard the most wonderful accounts,—you could not guess, I say, that the king sent me to learn who this man was?"

"What! the king sent you to learn—"

"Of course; but don't let us speak of that any more."

"Not speak of it!" said Porthos; "on the contrary, we will speak of it; and so the king knew that we were fortifying Belle-Isle?"

"Of course; does not the king know everything?"

"But he did not know who was fortifying it?"

"No, he only suspected, from what he had been told of the nature of the works, that it was some celebrated soldier or another."

"The devil!" said Porthos, "if I had only known that!"

"You would not have run away from Vannes as you did, perhaps?"

"No; what did you say when you couldn't find me?"

"My dear fellow, I reflected."

"Ah, indeed; you reflect, do you? Well, and what did that reflection lead to?"

"It led me to guess the whole truth."

"Come, then, tell me what did you guess after all?" said Porthos, settling himself into an armchair, and assuming the airs of a sphinx.

"I guessed, in the first place, that you were fortifying Belle-Isle."

"There was no great difficulty in that, for you saw me at work."

"Wait a minute; I also guessed something else,—that you were fortifying Belle-Isle by M. Fouquet's orders."

"That's true."

"But even that is not all. Whenever I feel myself in trim for guessing, I do not stop on my road; and so I guessed that M. Fouquet wished to preserve the most absolute secrecy respecting these fortifications."

"I believe that was his intention, in fact," said Porthos.

"Yes, but do you know why he wished to keep it secret?"

"In order it should not become known, perhaps," said Porthos.

"That was his principal reason. But his wish was subservient to a bit of generosity—"

"In fact," said Porthos, "I have heard it said that M. Fouquet was a very generous man."

"To a bit of generosity he wished to exhibit towards the king."

"Oh, oh!"

"You seem surprised at that?"

"Yes."

"And you didn't guess?"

"No."

"Well, I know it, then."

"You are a wizard."

"Not at all, I assure you."

"How do you know it, then?"

"By a very simple means. I heard M. Fouquet himself say so to the king."

"Say what to the king?"

"That he fortified Belle-Isle on his majesty's account, and that he had made him a present of Belle Isle."

"And you heard M. Fouquet say that to the king?"

"In those very words. He even added: 'Belle-Isle has been fortified by an engineer, one of my friends, a man of a great deal of merit, whom I shall ask your majesty's permission to present to you.'

"What is his name?" said the king.

"The Baron du Vallon," M. Fouquet replied.

"Very well," returned his majesty, 'you will present him to me.'

"The king said that?"

"Upon the word of a D'Artagnan!"

"Oh, oh!" said Porthos. "Why have I not been presented, then?"

"Have they not spoken to you about this presentation?"

"Yes, certainly; but I am always kept waiting for it."

"Be easy, it will be sure to come."

"Humph! humph!" grumbled Porthos, which D'Artagnan pretended not to hear; and, changing the conversation, he said, "You seem to be living in a very solitary place here, my dear fellow?"

"I always preferred retirement. I am of a melancholy disposition," replied Porthos, with a sigh.

"Really, that is odd," said D'Artagnan, "I never remarked that before."

"It is only since I have taken to reading," said Porthos, with a thoughtful air.

"But the labors of the mind have not affected the health of the body, I trust?"

"Not in the slightest degree."

"Your strength is as great as ever?"

"Too great, my friend, too great."

"Ah! I had heard that, for a short time after your arrival—"

"That I could hardly move a limb, I suppose?"

"How was it?" said D'Artagnan, smiling, "and why was it you could not move?"

Porthos, perceiving that he had made a mistake, wished to correct it. "Yes, I came from Belle-Isle upon very hard horses," he said, "and that fatigued me."

"I am no longer astonished, then, since I, who followed you, found seven or eight lying dead on the road."

"I am very heavy, you know," said Porthos.

"So that you were bruised all over."

"My marrow melted, and that made me very ill."

"Poor Porthos! But how did Aramis act towards you under those circumstances?"

"Very well, indeed. He had me attended to by M. Fouquet's own doctor. But just imagine, at the end of a week I could not breathe any longer."

"What do you mean?"

"The room was too small; I had absorbed every atom of air."

"Indeed?"

"I was told so, at least; and so I was removed into another apartment."

"Where you were able to breathe, I hope and trust?"

"Yes, more freely; but no exercise—nothing to do. The doctor pretended that I was not to stir; I, on the contrary, felt that I was stronger than ever; that was the cause of a very serious accident."

"What accident?"

"Fancy, my dear fellow, that I revolted against the directions of that ass of a doctor, and I resolved to go out, whether it suited him or not: and, consequently, I told the valet who waited on me to bring me my clothes."

"You were quite naked, then?"

"Oh, no! on the contrary, I had a magnificent dressing-gown to wear. The lackey obeyed; I dressed myself in my own clothes, which had become too large for me; but a strange circumstance had happened,—my feet had become too large."

"Yes, I quite understand."

"And my boots too small."

"You mean your feet were still swollen?"

"Exactly; you have hit it."

"Pardieu! And is that the accident you were going to tell me about?"

"Oh, yes; I did not make the same reflection you have done. I said to myself: 'Since my feet have entered my boots ten times, there is no reason why they should not go in the eleventh.'"

"Allow me to tell you, my dear Porthos, that on this occasion you failed in your logic."

"In short, then, they placed me opposite to a part of the room which was partitioned; I tried to get my boot on; I pulled it with my hands, I pushed with all the strength of the muscles of my leg, making the most unheard-of efforts, when suddenly the two tags of my boot remained in my hands, and my foot struck out like a ballista."

"How learned you are in fortification, dear Porthos."

"My foot darted out like a ballista, and came against the partition, which it broke in; I really thought that, like Samson, I had demolished the temple. And the number of pictures, the quantity of china, vases of flowers, carpets, and window-panes that fell down were really wonderful."

"Indeed!"

"Without reckoning that on the other side of the partition was a small table laden with porcelain—"

"Which you knocked over?"

"Which I dashed to the other side of the room," said Porthos, laughing.

"Upon my word, it is, as you say, astonishing," replied D'Artagnan, beginning to laugh also; whereupon Porthos laughed louder than ever.

"I broke," said Porthos, in a voice half-choked from his increasing mirth, "more than three thousand francs worth of china—ha, ha, ha!"

"Good!" said D'Artagnan.

"I smashed more than four thousand francs worth of glass!—ho, ho, ho!"

"Excellent."

"Without counting a luster, which fell on my head and was broken into a thousand pieces—ha, ha, ha!"

"Upon your head?" said D'Artagnan, holding his sides.

"On top."

"But your head was broken, I suppose?"

"No, since I tell you, on the contrary, my dear fellow, that it was the luster which was broken, like glass, which, in point of fact, it was."

"Ah! the luster was glass, you say."

"Venetian glass! a perfect curiosity, quite matchless, indeed, and weighed two hundred pounds."

"And it fell upon your head!"

"Upon my head. Just imagine, a globe of crystal, gilded all over, the lower part beautifully encrusted, perfumes burning at the top, with jets from which flame issued when they were lighted."

"I quite understand, but they were not lighted at the time, I suppose?"

"Happily not, or I should have been grilled prematurely."

"And you were only knocked down flat, instead?"

"Not at all."

"How, 'not at all?'"

"Why, the luster fell on my skull. It appears that we have upon the top of our heads an exceedingly thick crust."

"Who told you that, Porthos?"

"The doctor. A sort of dome which would bear Notre-Dame."

"Bah!"

"Yes, it seems that our skulls are made in that manner."

"Speak for yourself, my dear fellow, it is your own skull that is made in that manner, and not the skulls of other people."

"Well, that may be so," said Porthos, conceitedly, "so much, however, was that the case, in my instance, that no sooner did the luster fall upon the dome which we have at the top of our head, than there was a report like a cannon, the crystal was broken to pieces, and I fell, covered from head to foot."

"With blood, poor Porthos!"

"Not at all; with perfumes, which smelt like rich creams; it was delicious, but the odor was too strong, and I felt quite giddy from it; perhaps you have experienced it sometimes yourself, D'Artagnan?"

"Yes, in inhaling the scent of the lily of the valley; so that, my poor friend, you were knocked over by the shock and overpowered by the perfumes?"

"Yes; but what is very remarkable, for the doctor told me he had never seen anything like it—"

"You had a bump on your head I suppose?" interrupted D'Artagnan.

"I had five."

"Why five?"

"I will tell you; the luster had, at its lower extremity, five gilt ornaments; excessively sharp."

"Oh!"

"Well, these five ornaments penetrated my hair, which, as you see, I wear very thick."

"Fortunately so."

"And they made a mark on my skin. But just notice the singularity of it, these things seem really only to happen to me! Instead of making indentations, they made bumps. The doctor could never succeed in explaining that to me satisfactorily."

"Well, then, I will explain it to you."

"You will do me a great service if you will," said Porthos, winking his eyes, which, with him, was sign of the profoundest attention.

"Since you have been employing your brain in studies of an exalted character, in important calculations, and so on, the head has gained a certain advantage, so that your head is now too full of science."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure of it. The result is, that, instead of allowing any foreign matter to penetrate the interior of the head, your bony box or skull, which is already too full, avails itself of the openings which are made in allowing this excess to escape."

"Ah!" said Porthos, to whom this explanation appeared clearer than that of the doctor.

"The five protuberances, caused by the five ornaments of the luster, must certainly have been scientific globules, brought to the surface by the force of circumstances."

"In fact," said Porthos, "the real truth is, that I felt far worse outside my head than inside. I will even confess, that when I put my hat upon my head, clapping it on my head with that graceful energy which we gentlemen of the sword possess, if my fist was not very gently applied, I experienced the most painful sensations."

"I quite believe you, Porthos."

"Therefore, my friend," said the giant, "M. Fouquet decided, seeing how slightly built the house was, to give me another lodging, and so they brought me here."

"It is the private park, I think, is it not?"

"Yes."

"Where the rendezvous are made; that park, indeed, which is so celebrated in some of those mysterious stories about the superintendent?"

"I don't know; I have had no rendezvous or heard mysterious stories myself, but they have authorized me to exercise my muscles, and I take advantage of the permission by rooting up some of the trees."

"What for?"

"To keep my hand in, and also to take some birds' nests; I find it more convenient than climbing."

"You are as pastoral as Tyrcis, my dear Porthos."

"Yes, I like the small eggs; I like them very much better than larger ones. You have no idea how delicate an omelette is, if made of four or five hundred eggs of linnets, chaffinches, starlings, blackbirds, and thrushes."

"But five hundred eggs is perfectly monstrous!"

"A salad-bowl will hold them easily enough," said Porthos.

D'Artagnan looked at Porthos admiringly for full five minutes, as if he had seen him for the first time, while Porthos spread his chest out joyously and proudly. They remained in this state several minutes, Porthos smiling, and D'Artagnan looking at him. D'Artagnan was evidently trying to give the conversation a new turn. "Do you amuse yourself much here, Porthos?" he asked at last, very likely after he had found out what he was searching for.

"Not always."

"I can imagine that; but when you get thoroughly bored, by and by, what do you intend to do?"

"Oh! I shall not be here for any length of time. Aramis is waiting until the last bump on my head disappears, in order to present me to the king, who I am told cannot endure the sight of a bump."

"Aramis is still in Paris, then?"

"No."

"Whereabouts is he, then?"

"At Fontainebleau."

"Alone?"

"With M. Fouquet."

"Very good. But do you happen to know one thing?"

"No, tell it me, and then I shall know."

"Well, then, I think Aramis is forgetting you."

"Do you really think so?"

"Yes; for at Fontainebleau yonder, you must know, they are laughing, dancing, banqueting, and drawing the corks of M. de Mazarin's wine in fine style. Are you aware that they have a ballet every evening there?"

"The deuce they have!"

"I assure you that your dear Aramis is forgetting you."

"Well, that is not at all unlikely, and I have myself thought so sometimes."

"Unless he is playing you a trick, the sly fellow!"

"Oh!"

"You know that Aramis is as sly as a fox."

"Yes, but to play me a trick—"

"Listen: in the first place, he puts you under a sort of sequestration."

"He sequestrates me! Do you mean to say I am sequestrated?"

"I think so."

"I wish you would have the goodness to prove that to me."

"Nothing easier. Do you ever go out?"

"Never."

"Do you ever ride on horseback?"

"Never."

"Are your friends allowed to come and see you?"

"Never."

"Very well, then; never to go out, never to ride on horseback, never to be allowed to see your friends, that is called being sequestrated."

"But why should Aramis sequestrate me?" inquired Porthos.

"Come," said D'Artagnan, "be frank, Porthos."

"As gold."

"It was Aramis who drew the plan of the fortifications at Belle-Isle, was it not?"

Porthos coloured as he said, "Yes; but that was all he did."

"Exactly, and my own opinion is that it was no very great affair after all."

"That is mine, too."

"Very good; I am delighted we are of the same opinion."

"He never even came to Belle-Isle," said Porthos.

"There now, you see."

"It was I who went to Vannes, as you may have seen."

"Say rather, as I did see. Well, that is precisely the state of the case, my dear Porthos. Aramis, who only drew the plans, wishes to pass himself off as the engineer, whilst you, who, stone by stone, built the wall, the citadel, and the bastions, he wishes to reduce to the rank of a mere builder."

"By builder, you mean mason, perhaps?"

"Mason; the very word."

"Plasterer, in fact?"

"Hodman?"

"Exactly."

"Oh, oh! my dear Aramis, you seem to think you are only five and twenty years of age still."

"Yes, and that is not all, for he believes you are fifty."

"I should have amazingly liked to have seen him at work."

"Yes, indeed."

"A fellow who has got the gout?"

"Yes."

"Who has lost three of his teeth?"

"Four."

"While I, look at mine." And Porthos, opening his large mouth very wide, displayed two rows of teeth not quite as white as snow, but even, hard, and sound as ivory.

"You can hardly believe, Porthos," said D'Artagnan, "what a fancy the king has for good teeth. Yours decide me; I will present you to the king myself."

"You?"

"Why not? Do you think I have less credit at court than Aramis?"

"Oh, no!"

"Do you think I have the slightest pretensions upon the fortifications at Belle-Isle?"

"Certainly not."

"It is your own interest alone which would induce me to do it."

"I don't doubt it in the least."

"Well, I am the intimate friend of the king; and a proof of that is, that whenever there is anything disagreeable to tell him, it is I who have to do it."

"But, dear D'Artagnan, if you present me—"

"Well!"

"Aramis will be angry."

"With me?"

"No, with me."

"Bah! whether he or I present you, since you are to be presented, what does it matter?"

"They were going to get me some clothes made."

"Your own are splendid."

"Oh! those I had ordered were far more beautiful."

"Take care: the king likes simplicity."

"In that case, I will be simple. But what will M. Fouquet say, when he learns that I have left?"

"Are you a prisoner, then, on parole?"

"No, not quite that. But I promised him I would not leave without letting him know."

"Wait a minute, we shall return to that presently. Have you anything to do here?"

"I, nothing: nothing of any importance, at least."

"Unless, indeed, you are Aramis's representative for something of importance."

"By no means."

"What I tell you—pray, understand that—is out of interest for you. I suppose, for instance, that you are commissioned to send messages and letters to him?"

"Ah! letters—yes. I send certain letters to him."

"Where?"

"To Fontainebleau."

"Have you any letters, then?"

"But—"

"Nay, let me speak. Have you any letters, I say?"

"I have just received one for him."

"Interesting?"

"I suppose so."

"You do not read them, then?"

"I am not at all curious," said Porthos, as he drew out of his pocket the soldier's letter which Porthos had not read, but D'Artagnan had.

"Do you know what to do with it?" said D'Artagnan.

"Of course; do as I always do, send it to him."

"Not so."

"Why not? Keep it, then?"

"Did they not tell you that this letter was important?"

"Very important."

"Well, you must take it yourself to Fontainebleau."

"To Aramis?"

"Yes."

"Very good."

"And since the king is there—"

"You will profit by that."

"I shall profit by the opportunity to present you to the king."

"Ah! D'Artagnan, there is no one like you for expedients."

"Therefore, instead of forwarding to our friend any messages, which may or may not be faithfully delivered, we will ourselves be the bearers of the letter."

"I had never even thought of that, and yet it is simple enough."

"And therefore, because it is urgent, Porthos, we ought to set off at once."

"In fact," said Porthos, "the sooner we set off the less chance there is of Aramis's letter being delayed."

"Porthos, your reasoning is always accurate, and, in your case, logic seems to serve as an auxiliary to the imagination."

"Do you think so?" said Porthos.

"It is the result of your hard reading," replied D'Artagnan. "So come along, let us be off."

"But," said Porthos, "my promise to M. Fouquet?"

"Which?"

"Not to leave Saint-Mande without telling him of it."

"Ah! Porthos," said D'Artagnan, "how very young you still are."

"In what way?"

"You are going to Fontainebleau, are you not, where you will find M. Fouquet?"

"Yes."

"Probably in the king's palace?"

"Yes," repeated Porthos, with an air full of majesty.

"Well, you will accost him with these words: 'M. Fouquet, I have the honour to inform you that I have just left Saint-Mande.'"

"And," said Porthos, with the same majestic mien, "seeing me at Fontainebleau at the king's, M. Fouquet will not be able to tell me I am not speaking the truth."

"My dear Porthos, I was just on the point of opening my lips to make the same remark, but you anticipate me in everything. Oh! Porthos, how fortunately you are gifted! Years have made not the slightest impression on you."

"Not over-much, certainly."

"Then there is nothing more to say?"

"I think not."

"All your scruples are removed?"

"Quite so."

"In that case I shall carry you off with me."

"Exactly; and I will go and get my horse saddled."

"You have horses here, then?"

"I have five."

"You had them sent from Pierrefonds, I suppose?"

"No, M. Fouquet gave them to me."

"My dear Porthos, we shall not want five horses for two persons; besides, I have already three in Paris, which would make eight, and that will be too many."

"It would not be too many if I had some of my servants here; but, alas! I have not got them."

"Do you regret them, then?"

"I regret Mousqueton; I miss Mousqueton."

"What a good-hearted fellow you are, Porthos," said D'Artagnan; "but the best thing you can do is to leave your horses here, as you have left Mousqueton out yonder."

"Why so?"

"Because, by and by, it might turn out a very good thing if M. Fouquet had never given you anything at all."

"I don't understand you," said Porthos.

"It is not necessary you should understand."

"But yet—"

"I will explain to you later, Porthos."

"I'll wager it is some piece of policy or other."

"And of the most subtle character," returned D'Artagnan.

Porthos nodded his head at this word policy; then, after a moment's reflection, he added, "I confess, D'Artagnan, that I am no politician."

"I know that well."

"Oh! no one knows what you told me yourself, you, the bravest of the brave."

"What did I tell you, Porthos?"

"That every man has his day. You told me so, and I have experienced it myself. There are certain days when one feels less pleasure than others in exposing one's self to a bullet or a sword-thrust."

"Exactly my own idea."

"And mine, too, although I can hardly believe in blows or thrusts that kill outright."

"The deuce! and yet you have killed a few in your time."

"Yes; but I have never been killed."

"Your reason is a very good one."

"Therefore, I do not believe I shall ever die from a thrust of a sword or a gun-shot."

"In that case, then, you are afraid of nothing. Ah! water, perhaps?"

"Oh! I swim like an otter."

"Of a quartan fever, then?"

"I have never had one yet, and I don't believe I ever shall; but there is one thing I will admit," and Porthos dropped his voice.

"What is that?" asked D'Artagnan, adopting the same tone of voice as Porthos.

"I must confess," repeated Porthos, "that I am horribly afraid of politics."

"Ah, bah!" exclaimed D'Artagnan.

"Upon my word, it's true," said Porthos, in a stentorian voice. "I have seen his eminence Monsieur le Cardinal de Richelieu, and his eminence Monsieur le Cardinal de Mazarin; the one was a red politician, the other a black politician; I never felt very much more satisfied with the one than with the other; the first struck off the heads of M. de Marillac, M. de Thou, M. de Cinq-Mars, M. Chalais, M. de Bouteville, and M. de Montmorency; the second got a whole crowd of Frondeurs cut in pieces, and we belonged to them."

"On the contrary, we did not belong to them," said D'Artagnan.

"Oh! indeed, yes; for if I unsheathed my sword for the cardinal, I struck it for the king."

"My good Porthos!"

"Well, I have done. My dread of politics is such, that if there is any question of politics in the matter, I should greatly prefer to return to Pierrefonds."

"You would be quite right, if that were the case. But with me, my dear Porthos, no politics at all, that is quite clear. You have labored hard in fortifying Belle-Isle; the king wished to know the name of the clever engineer under whose directions the works were carried out; you are modest, as all men of true genius are; perhaps Aramis wishes to put you under a bushel. But I happen to seize hold of you; I make it known who you are; I produce you; the king rewards you; and that is the only policy I have to do with."

"And the only one I will have to do with either," said Porthos, holding out his hand to D'Artagnan.

But D'Artagnan knew Porthos's grasp; he knew that, once imprisoned within the baron's five fingers, no hand ever left it without being half-crushed. He therefore held out, not his hand, but his fist, and Porthos did not even perceive the difference. The servants talked a little with each other in an undertone, and whispered a few words, which D'Artagnan understood, but which he took very good care not to let Porthos understand. "Our friend," he said to himself, "was really and truly Aramis's prisoner. Let us now see what the result will be of the liberation of the captive."

IV. The Rat and the Cheese.

D'Artagnan and Porthos returned on foot, as D'Artagnan had set out. When D'Artagnan, as he entered the shop of the Pilon d'Or, announced to Planchet that M. du Vallon would be one of the privileged travelers, and as the plume in Porthos's hat made the wooden candles suspended over the front jingle together, a melancholy presentiment seemed to eclipse the delight Planchet had promised himself for the morrow. But the grocer had a heart of gold, ever mindful of the good old times—a trait that carries youth into old age. So Planchet, notwithstanding a sort of internal shiver, checked as soon as experienced, received Porthos with respect, mingled with the tenderest cordiality. Porthos, who was a little cold and stiff in his manners at first, on account of the social difference existing at that period between a baron and a grocer, soon began to soften when he perceived so much good-feeling and so many kind attentions in Planchet. He was particularly touched by the liberty which was permitted him to plunge his great palms into the boxes of dried fruits and preserves, into the sacks of nuts and almonds, and into the drawers full of sweetmeats. So that, notwithstanding Planchet's pressing invitations to go upstairs to the entresol, he chose as his favourite seat, during the evening which he had to spend at Planchet's house, the shop itself, where his fingers could always fish up whatever his nose detected. The delicious figs from Provence, filberts from the forest, Tours plums, were subjects of his uninterrupted attention for five consecutive hours. His teeth, like millstones, cracked heaps of nuts, the shells of which were scattered all over the floor, where they were trampled by every one who went in and out of the shop; Porthos pulled from the stalk with his lips, at one mouthful, bunches of the rich Muscatel raisins with their beautiful bloom, half a pound of which passed at one gulp from his mouth to his stomach. In one of the corners of the shop, Planchet's assistants, huddled together, looked at each other without venturing to open their lips. They did not know who Porthos was, for they had never seen him before. The race of those Titans who had worn the cuirasses of Hugh Capet, Philip Augustus, and Francis I. had already begun to disappear. They could hardly help thinking he might be the ogre of the fairy tale, who was going to turn the whole contents of Planchet's shop into his insatiable stomach, and that, too, without in the slightest degree displacing the barrels and chests that were in it. Cracking, munching, chewing, nibbling, sucking, and swallowing, Porthos occasionally said to the grocer:

"You do a very good business here, friend Planchet."

"He will very soon have none at all to do, if this sort of thing continues," grumbled the foreman, who had Planchet's word that he should be his successor. In the midst of his despair, he approached Porthos, who blocked up the whole of the passage leading from the back shop to the shop itself. He hoped that Porthos would rise and that this movement would distract his devouring ideas.

"What do you want, my man?" asked Porthos, affably.

"I should like to pass you, monsieur, if it is not troubling you too much."

"Very well," said Porthos, "it does not trouble me in the least."

At the same moment he took hold of the young fellow by the waistband, lifted him off the ground, and placed him very gently on the other side, smiling all the while with the same affable expression. As soon as Porthos had placed him on the ground, the lad's legs so shook under him that he fell back upon some sacks of corks. But noticing the giant's gentleness of manner, he ventured again, and said:

"Ah, monsieur! pray be careful."

"What about?" inquired Porthos.

"You are positively putting a fiery furnace into your body."

"How is that, my good fellow?"

"All those things are very heating to the system!"

"Which?"

"Raisins, nuts, and almonds."

"Yes; but if raisins, nuts, and almonds are heating—"

"There is no doubt at all of it, monsieur."

"Honey is very cooling," said Porthos, stretching out his hand toward a small barrel of honey which was open, and he plunged the scoop with which the wants of the customers were supplied into it, and swallowed a good half-pound at one gulp.

"I must trouble you for some water now, my man," said Porthos.

"In a pail, monsieur?" asked the lad, simply.

"No, in a water-bottle; that will be quite enough;" and raising the bottle to his mouth, as a trumpeter does his trumpet, he emptied the bottle at a single draught.

Planchet was agitated in every fibre of propriety and self-esteem. However, a worthy representative of the hospitality which prevailed in early days, he feigned to be talking very earnestly with D'Artagnan, and incessantly repeated:—"Ah! monsieur, what a happiness! what an honour!"

"What time shall we have supper, Planchet?" inquired Porthos, "I feel hungry."

The foreman clasped his hands together. The two others got under the counters, fearing Porthos might have a taste for human flesh.

"We shall only take a sort of snack here," said D'Artagnan; "and when we get to Planchet's country-seat, we will have supper."

"Ah, ah! so we are going to your country-house, Planchet," said Porthos; "so much the better."

"You overwhelm me, monsieur le baron."

The "monsieur le baron" had a great effect upon the men, who detected a personage of the highest quality in an appetite of that kind. This title, too, reassured them. They had never heard that an ogre was ever called "monsieur le baron".

"I will take a few biscuits to eat on the road," said Porthos, carelessly; and he emptied a whole jar of aniseed biscuits into the huge pocket of his doublet.

"My shop is saved!" exclaimed Planchet.

"Yes, as the cheese was," whispered the foreman.

"What cheese?"

"The Dutch cheese, inside which a rat had made his way, and we found only the rind left."

Planchet looked all round his shop, and observing the different articles which had escaped Porthos's teeth, he found the comparison somewhat exaggerated. The foreman, who remarked what was passing in his master's mind, said, "Take care; he is not gone yet."

"Have you any fruit here?" said Porthos, as he went upstairs to the entresol, where it had just been announced that some refreshment was prepared.

"Alas!" thought the grocer, addressing a look at D'Artagnan full of entreaty, which the latter half understood.

As soon as they had finished eating they set off. It was late when the three riders, who had left Paris about six in the evening, arrived at Fontainebleau. The journey passed very agreeably. Porthos took a fancy to Planchet's society, because the latter was very respectful in his manners, and seemed delighted to talk to him about his meadows, his woods, and his rabbit-warrens. Porthos had all the taste and pride of a landed proprietor. When D'Artagnan saw his two companions in earnest conversation, he took the opposite side of the road, and letting his bridle drop upon his horse's neck, separated himself from the whole world, as he had done from Porthos and from Planchet. The moon shone softly through the foliage of the forest. The breezes of the open country rose deliciously perfumed to the horse's nostrils, and they snorted and pranced along delightedly. Porthos and Planchet began to talk about hay-crops. Planchet admitted to Porthos that in the advanced years of his life, he had certainly neglected agricultural pursuits for commerce, but that his childhood had been passed in Picardy in the beautiful meadows where the grass grew as high as the knees, and where he had played under the green apple-trees covered with red-cheeked fruit; he went on to say, that he had solemnly promised himself that as soon as he should have made his fortune, he would return to nature, and end his days, as he had begun them, as near as he possibly could to the earth itself, where all men must sleep at last.

"Eh, eh!" said Porthos; "in that case, my dear Monsieur Planchet, your retirement is not far distant."

"How so?"

"Why, you seem to be in the way of making your fortune very soon."

"Well, we are getting on pretty well, I must admit," replied Planchet.

"Come, tell me what is the extent of your ambition, and what is the amount you intend to retire upon?"

"There is one circumstance, monsieur," said Planchet, without answering the question, "which occasions me a good deal of anxiety."

"What is it?" inquired Porthos, looking all round him as if in search of the circumstance that annoyed Planchet, and desirous of freeing him from it.

"Why, formerly," said the grocer, "you used to call me Planchet quite short, and you would have spoken to me then in a much more familiar manner than you do now."

"Certainly, certainly, I should have said so formerly," replied the good-natured Porthos, with an embarrassment full of delicacy; "but formerly—"

"Formerly I was M. d'Artagnan's lackey; is not that what you mean?"

"Yes."

"Well if I am not quite his lackey, I am as much as ever I was his devoted servant; and more than that, since that time—"

"Well, Planchet?"

"Since that time, I have had the honour of being in partnership with him."

"Oh, oh!" said Porthos. "What, has D'Artagnan gone into the grocery business?"

"No, no," said D'Artagnan, whom these words had drawn out of his reverie, and who entered into the conversation with that readiness and rapidity which distinguished every operation of his mind and body. "It was not D'Artagnan who entered into the grocery business, but Planchet who entered into a political affair with me."

"Yes," said Planchet, with mingled pride and satisfaction, "we transacted a little business which brought me in a hundred thousand francs and M. d'Artagnan two hundred thousand."

"Oh, oh!" said Porthos, with admiration.

"So that, monsieur le baron," continued the grocer, "I again beg you to be kind enough to call me Planchet, as you used to do; and to speak to me as familiarly as in old times. You cannot possibly imagine the pleasure it would give me."

"If that be the case, my dear Planchet, I will do so, certainly," replied Porthos. And as he was quite close to Planchet, he raised his hand, as if to strike him on the shoulder, in token of friendly cordiality; but a fortunate movement of the horse made him miss his aim, so that his hand fell on the crupper of Planchet's horse, instead; which made the animal's legs almost give way.

D'Artagnan burst out laughing, as he said, "Take care, Planchet; for if Porthos begins to like you so much, he will caress you, and if he caresses you he will knock you as flat as a pancake. Porthos is still as strong as ever, you know."

"Oh," said Planchet, "Mousqueton is not dead, and yet monsieur le baron is very fond of him."

"Certainly," said Porthos, with a sigh which made all the three horses rear; "and I was only saying, this very morning, to D'Artagnan, how much I regretted him. But tell me, Planchet?"

"Thank you, monsieur le baron, thank you."

"Good lad, good lad! How many acres of park have you got?"

"Of park?"

"Yes; we will reckon up the meadows presently, and the woods afterwards."

"Whereabouts, monsieur?" "At your chateau."

"Oh, monsieur le baron, I have neither chateau, nor park, nor meadows, nor woods."

"What have you got, then?" inquired Porthos, "and why do you call it a country-seat?"

"I did not call it a country-seat, monsieur le baron," replied Planchet, somewhat humiliated, "but a country-box."

"Ah, ah! I understand. You are modest."

"No, monsieur le baron, I speak the plain truth. I have rooms for a couple of friends, that's all."

"But in that case, whereabouts do your friends walk?"

"In the first place, they can walk about the king's forest, which is very beautiful."

"Yes, I know the forest is very fine," said Porthos; "nearly as beautiful as my forest at Berry."

Planchet opened his eyes very wide. "Have you a forest of the same kind as the forest at Fontainebleau, monsieur le baron?" he stammered out.

"Yes; I have two, indeed, but the one at Berry is my favourite."

"Why so?" asked Planchet.

"Because I don't know where it ends; and, also, because it is full of poachers."

"How can the poachers make the forest so agreeable to you?"

"Because they hunt my game, and I hunt them—which, in these peaceful times, is for me a sufficiently pleasing picture of war on a small scale."

They had reached this turn of conversation, when Planchet, looking up, perceived the houses at the commencement of Fontainebleau, the lofty outlines of which stood out strongly against the misty visage of the heavens; whilst, rising above the compact and irregularly formed mass of buildings, the pointed roofs of the chateau were clearly visible, the slates of which glistened beneath the light of the moon, like the scales of an immense fish. "Gentlemen," said Planchet, "I have the honour to inform you that we have arrived at Fontainebleau."

V. Planchet's Country-House.

The cavaliers looked up, and saw that what Planchet had announced to them was true. Ten minutes afterwards they were in the street called the Rue de Lyon, on the opposite side of the hostelry of the Beau Paon. A high hedge of bushy elders, hawthorn, and wild hops formed an impenetrable fence, behind which rose a white house, with a high tiled roof. Two of the windows, which were quite dark, looked upon the street. Between the two, a small door, with a porch supported by a couple of pillars, formed the entrance to the house. The door was gained by a step raised a little from the ground. Planchet got off his horse, as if he intended to knock at the door; but, on second thoughts, he took hold of his horse by the bridle, and led it about thirty paces further on, his two companions following him. He then advanced about another thirty paces, until he arrived at the door of a cart-house, lighted by an iron grating; and, lifting up a wooden latch, pushed open one of the folding-doors. He entered first, leading his horse after him by the bridle, into a small courtyard, where an odor met them which revealed their close vicinity to a stable. "That smells all right," said Porthos, loudly, getting off his horse, "and I almost begin to think I am near my own cows at Pierrefonds."

"I have only one cow," Planchet hastened to say modestly.

"And I have thirty," said Porthos; "or rather, I don't exactly know how many I have."

When the two cavaliers had entered, Planchet fastened the door behind them. In the meantime, D'Artagnan, who had dismounted with his usual agility, inhaled the fresh perfumed air with the delight a Parisian feels at the sight of green fields and fresh foliage, plucked a piece of honeysuckle with one hand, and of sweet-briar with the other. Porthos clawed hold of some peas which were twined round poles stuck into the ground, and ate, or rather browsed upon them, shells and all: and Planchet was busily engaged trying to wake up an old and infirm peasant, who was fast asleep in a shed, lying on a bed of moss, and dressed in an old stable suit of clothes. The peasant, recognizing Planchet, called him "the master," to the grocer's great satisfaction. "Stable the horses well, old fellow, and you shall have something good for yourself," said Planchet.

"Yes, yes; fine animals they are too," said the peasant. "Oh! they shall have as much as they like."

"Gently, gently, my man," said D'Artagnan, "we are getting on a little too fast. A few oats and a good bed—nothing more."

"Some bran and water for my horse," said Porthos, "for it is very warm, I think."

"Don't be afraid, gentlemen," replied Planchet; "Daddy Celestin is an old gendarme, who fought at Ivry. He knows all about horses; so come into the house." And he led the way along a well-sheltered walk, which crossed a kitchen-garden, then a small paddock, and came out into a little garden behind the house, the principal front of which, as we have already noticed, faced the street. As they approached, they could see, through two open windows on the ground floor, which led into a sitting-room, the interior of Planchet's residence. This room, softly lighted by a lamp placed on the table, seemed, from the end of the garden, like a smiling image of repose, comfort, and happiness. In every direction where the rays of light fell, whether upon a piece of old china, or upon an article of furniture shining from excessive neatness, or upon the weapons hanging against the wall, the soft light was softly reflected; and its rays seemed to linger everywhere upon something or another, agreeable to the eye. The lamp which lighted the room, whilst the foliage of jasmine and climbing roses hung in masses from the window-frames, splendidly illuminated a damask table-cloth as white as snow. The table was laid for two persons. Amber-coloured wine sparkled in a long cut-glass bottle; and a large jug of blue china, with a silver lid, was filled with foaming cider. Near the table, in a high-backed armchair, reclined, fast asleep, a woman of about thirty years of age, her face the very picture of health and freshness. Upon her knees lay a large cat, with her paws folded under her, and her eyes half-closed, purring in that significant manner which, according to feline habits, indicates perfect contentment. The two friends paused before the window in complete amazement, while Planchet, perceiving their astonishment, was in no little degree secretly delighted at it.

"Ah! Planchet, you rascal," said D'Artagnan, "I now understand your absences."

"Oh, oh! there is some white linen!" said Porthos, in his turn, in a voice of thunder. At the sound of this gigantic voice, the cat took flight, the housekeeper woke up with a start, and Planchet, assuming a gracious air, introduced his two companions into the room, where the table was already laid.

"Permit me, my dear," he said, "to present to you Monsieur le Chevalier d'Artagnan, my patron." D'Artagnan took the lady's hand in his in the most courteous manner, and with precisely the same chivalrous air as he would have taken Madame's.

"Monsieur le Baron du Vallon de Bracieux de Pierrefonds," added Planchet. Porthos bowed with a reverence which Anne of Austria would have approved of.

It was then Planchet's turn, and he unhesitatingly embraced the lady in question, not, however, until he had made a sign as if requesting D'Artagnan's and Porthos's permission, a permission as a matter of course frankly conceded. D'Artagnan complimented Planchet, and said, "You are indeed a man who knows how to make life agreeable."

"Life, monsieur," said Planchet, laughing, "is capital which a man ought to invest as sensibly as he possibly can."

"And you get very good interest for yours," said Porthos, with a burst of laughter like a peal of thunder.

Planchet turned to his housekeeper. "You have before you," he said to her, "the two gentlemen who influenced the greatest, gayest, grandest portion of my life. I have spoken to you about them both very frequently."

"And about two others as well," said the lady, with a very decided Flemish accent.

"Madame is Dutch?" inquired D'Artagnan. Porthos curled his mustache, a circumstance which was not lost upon D'Artagnan, who noticed everything.

"I am from Antwerp," said the lady.

"And her name is Madame Getcher," said Planchet.

"You should not call her madame," said D'Artagnan.

"Why not?" asked Planchet.

"Because it would make her seem older every time you call her so."

"Well, I call her Truchen."

"And a very pretty name too," said Porthos.

"Truchen," said Planchet, "came to me from Flanders with her virtue and two thousand florins. She ran away from a brute of a husband who was in the habit of beating her. Being myself a Picard born, I was always very fond of the Artesian women, and it is only a step from Artois to Flanders; she came crying bitterly to her godfather, my predecessor in the Rue des Lombards; she placed her two thousand florins in my establishment, which I have turned to very good account, and which have brought her in ten thousand."

"Bravo, Planchet."

"She is free and well off; she has a cow, a maid servant and old Celestin at her orders; she mends my linen, knits my winter stockings; she only sees me every fortnight, and seems to make herself in all things tolerably happy.

"And indeed, gentlemen, I am very happy and comfortable," said Truchen, with perfect ingenuousness.

Porthos began to curl the other side of his mustache. "The deuce," thought D'Artagnan, "can Porthos have any intentions in that quarter?"

In the meantime Truchen had set her cook to work, had laid the table for two more, and covered it with every possible delicacy that could convert a light supper into a substantial meal, a meal into a regular feast. Fresh butter, salt beef, anchovies, tunny, a shopful of Planchet's commodities, fowls, vegetables, salad, fish from the pond and the river, game from the forest—all the produce, in fact, of the province. Moreover, Planchet returned from the cellar, laden with ten bottles of wine, the glass of which could hardly be seen for the thick coating of dust which covered them. Porthos's heart began to expand as he said, "I am hungry," and he sat himself beside Madame Truchen, whom he looked at in the most killing manner. D'Artagnan seated himself on the other side of her, while Planchet, discreetly and full of delight, took his seat opposite.

"Do not trouble yourselves," he said, "if Truchen should leave the table now and then during supper; for she will have to look after your bedrooms."

In fact, the housekeeper made her escape quite frequently, and they could hear, on the first floor above them, the creaking of the wooden bedsteads and the rolling of the castors on the floor. While this was going on, the three men, Porthos especially, ate and drank gloriously,—it was wonderful to see them. The ten full bottles were ten empty ones by the time Truchen returned with the cheese. D'Artagnan still preserved his dignity and self-possession, but Porthos had lost a portion of his; and the mirth soon began to grow somewhat uproarious. D'Artagnan recommended a new descent into the cellar, and, as Planchet no longer walked with the steadiness of a well-trained foot-soldier, the captain of the musketeers proposed to accompany him. They set off, humming songs wild enough to frighten anybody who might be listening. Truchen remained behind at table with Porthos. While the two wine-bibbers were looking behind the firewood for what they wanted, a sharp report was heard like the impact of a pair of lips on a lady's cheek.

"Porthos fancies himself at La Rochelle," thought D'Artagnan, as they returned freighted with bottles. Planchet was singing so loudly that he was incapable of noticing anything. D'Artagnan, whom nothing ever escaped, remarked how much redder Truchen's left cheek was than her right. Porthos was sitting on Truchen's left, and was curling with both his hands both sides of his mustache at once, and Truchen was looking at him with a most bewitching smile. The sparkling wine of Anjou very soon produced a remarkable effect upon the three companions. D'Artagnan had hardly strength enough left to take a candlestick to light Planchet up his own staircase. Planchet was pulling Porthos along, who was following Truchen, who was herself jovial enough. It was D'Artagnan who found out the rooms and the beds. Porthos threw himself into the one destined for him, after his friend had undressed him. D'Artagnan got into his own bed, saying to himself, "Mordieux! I had made up my mind never to touch that light-coloured wine, which brings my early camp days back again. Fie! fie! if my musketeers were only to see their captain in such a state." And drawing the curtains of his bed, he added, "Fortunately enough, though, they will not see me."

"The country is very amusing," said Porthos, stretching out his legs, which passed through the wooden footboard, and made a tremendous crash, of which, however, no one in the house was capable of taking the slightest notice. By two o'clock in the morning every one was fast asleep.

VI. Showing What Could Be Seen from Planchet's House.

The next morning found the three heroes sleeping soundly. Truchen had closed the outside blinds to keep the first rays of the sun from the leaden-lidded eyes of her guests, like a kind, good housekeeper. It was still perfectly dark, then, beneath Porthos's curtains and under Planchet's canopy, when D'Artagnan, awakened by an indiscreet ray of light which made its way through a peek-hole in the shutters, jumped hastily out of bed, as if he wished to be the first at a forlorn hope. He took by assault Porthos's room, which was next to his own. The worthy Porthos was sleeping with a noise like distant thunder; in the dim obscurity of the room his gigantic frame was prominently displayed, and his swollen fist hung down outside the bed upon the carpet. D'Artagnan awoke Porthos, who rubbed his eyes in a tolerably good humor. In the meantime Planchet was dressing himself, and met at their bedroom doors his two guests, who were still somewhat unsteady from their previous evening's entertainment. Although it was yet very early, the whole household was already up. The cook was mercilessly slaughtering in the poultry-yard; Celestin was gathering white cherries in the garden. Porthos, brisk and lively as ever, held out his hand to Planchet's, and D'Artagnan requested permission to embrace Madame Truchen. The latter, to show that she bore no ill-will, approached Porthos, upon whom she conferred the same favour. Porthos embraced Madame Truchen, heaving an enormous sigh. Planchet took both his friends by the hand.

"I am going to show you over the house," he said; "when we arrived last night it was as dark as an oven, and we were unable to see anything; but in broad daylight, everything looks different, and you will be satisfied, I hope."

"If we begin by the view you have here," said D'Artagnan, "that charms me beyond everything; I have always lived in royal mansions, you know, and royal personages have tolerably sound ideas upon the selection of points of view."

"I am a great stickler for a good view myself," said Porthos. "At my Chateau de Pierrefonds, I have had four avenues laid out, and at the end of each is a landscape of an altogether different character from the others."

"You shall see my prospect," said Planchet; and he led his two guests to a window.

"Ah!" said D'Artagnan, "this is the Rue de Lyon."

"Yes, I have two windows on this side, a paltry, insignificant view, for there is always that bustling and noisy inn, which is a very disagreeable neighbor. I had four windows here, but I bricked up two."

"Let us go on," said D'Artagnan.

They entered a corridor leading to the bedrooms, and Planchet pushed open the outside blinds.

"Hollo! what is that out yonder?" said Porthos.

"The forest," said Planchet. "It is the horizon,—a thick line of green, which is yellow in the spring, green in the summer, red in the autumn, and white in the winter."

"All very well, but it is like a curtain, which prevents one seeing a greater distance."

"Yes," said Planchet; "still, one can see, at all events, everything that intervenes."

"Ah, the open country," said Porthos. "But what is that I see out there,—crosses and stones?"

"Ah, that is the cemetery," exclaimed D'Artagnan.

"Precisely," said Planchet; "I assure you it is very curious. Hardly a day passes that some one is not buried there; for Fontainebleau is by no means an inconsiderable place. Sometimes we see young girls clothed in white carrying banners; at others, some of the town-council, or rich citizens, with choristers and all the parish authorities; and then, too, we see some of the officers of the king's household."

"I should not like that," said Porthos.

"There is not much amusement in it, at all events," said D'Artagnan.

"I assure you it encourages religious thoughts," replied Planchet.

"Oh, I don't deny that."

"But," continued Planchet, "we must all die one day or another, and I once met with a maxim somewhere which I have remembered, that the thought of death is a thought that will do us all good."

"I am far from saying the contrary," said Porthos.

"But," objected D'Artagnan, "the thought of green fields, flowers, rivers, blue horizons, extensive and boundless plains, is not likely to do us good."

"If I had any, I should be far from rejecting them," said Planchet; "but possessing only this little cemetery, full of flowers, so moss-grown, shady, and quiet, I am contented with it, and I think of those who live in town, in the Rue des Lombards, for instance, and who have to listen to the rumbling of a couple of thousand vehicles every day, and to the soulless tramp, tramp, tramp of a hundred and fifty thousand foot-passengers."

"But living," said Porthos; "living, remember that."

"That is exactly the reason," said Planchet, timidly, "why I feel it does me good to contemplate a few dead."

"Upon my word," said D'Artagnan, "that fellow Planchet is born a philosopher as well as a grocer."

"Monsieur," said Planchet, "I am one of those good-humored sort of men whom Heaven created for the purpose of living a certain span of days, and of considering all good they meet with during their transitory stay on earth."

D'Artagnan sat down close to the window, and as there seemed to be something substantial in Planchet's philosophy, he mused over it.

"Ah, ah!" exclaimed Planchet, "if I am not mistaken, we are going to have a representation now, for I think I heard something like chanting."

"Yes," said D'Artagnan, "I hear singing too."

"Oh, it is only a burial of a very poor description," said Planchet, disdainfully; "the officiating priest, the beadle, and only one chorister boy, nothing more. You observe, messieurs, that the defunct lady or gentleman could not have been of very high rank."

"No; no one seems to be following the coffin."

"Yes," said Porthos; "I see a man."

"You are right; a man wrapped in a cloak," said D'Artagnan.

"It's not worth looking at," said Planchet.

"I find it interesting," said D'Artagnan, leaning on the window-sill.

"Come, come, you are beginning to take a fancy to the place already," said Planchet, delightedly; "it is exactly my own case. I was so melancholy at first that I could do nothing but make the sign of the cross all day, and the chants were like so many nails being driven into my head; but now, they lull me to sleep, and no bird I have ever seen or heard can sing better than those which are to be met with in this cemetery."

"Well," said Porthos, "this is beginning to get a little dull for me, and I prefer going downstairs."

Planchet with one bound was beside his guest, whom he offered to lead into the garden.

"What!" said Porthos to D'Artagnan, as he turned round, "are you going to remain here?"

"Yes, I will join you presently."

"Well, M. D'Artagnan is right, after all," said Planchet: "are they beginning to bury yet?"

"Not yet."

"Ah! yes, the grave-digger is waiting until the cords are fastened round the bier. But, see, a woman has just entered the cemetery at the other end."

"Yes, yes, my dear Planchet," said D'Artagnan, quickly, "leave me, leave me; I feel I am beginning already to be much comforted by my meditations, so do not interrupt me."

Planchet left, and D'Artagnan remained, devouring with his eager gaze from behind the half-closed blinds what was taking place just before him. The two bearers of the corpse had unfastened the straps by which they carried the litter, and were letting their burden glide gently into the open grave. At a few paces distant, the man with the cloak wrapped round him, the only spectator of this melancholy scene, was leaning with his back against a large cypress-tree, and kept his face and person entirely concealed from the grave-diggers and the priests; the corpse was buried in five minutes. The grave having been filled up, the priests turned away, and the grave-digger having addressed a few words to them, followed them as they moved away. The man in the mantle bowed as they passed him, and put a piece of gold into the grave-digger's hand.

"Mordieux!" murmured D'Artagnan; "it is Aramis himself."

Aramis, in fact, remained alone, on that side at least; for hardly had he turned his head when a woman's footsteps, and the rustling of her dress, were heard in the path close to him. He immediately turned round, and took off his hat with the most ceremonious respect; he led the lady under the shelter of some walnut and lime trees, which overshadowed a magnificent tomb.

"Ah! who would have thought it," said D'Artagnan; "the bishop of Vannes at a rendezvous! He is still the same Abbe Aramis as he was at Noisy-le-Sec. Yes," he added, after a pause; "but as it is in a cemetery, the rendezvous is sacred." But he almost laughed.

The conversation lasted for fully half an hour. D'Artagnan could not see the lady's face, for she kept her back turned towards him; but he saw perfectly well, by the erect attitude of both the speakers, by their gestures, by the measured and careful manner with which they glanced at each other, either by way of attack or defense, that they must be conversing about any other subject than of love. At the end of the conversation the lady rose, and bowed profoundly to Aramis.

"Oh, oh," said D'Artagnan; "this rendezvous finishes like one of a very tender nature though. The cavalier kneels at the beginning, the young lady by and by gets tamed down, and then it is she who has to supplicate. Who is this lady? I would give anything to ascertain."

This seemed impossible, however, for Aramis was the first to leave; the lady carefully concealed her head and face, and then immediately departed. D'Artagnan could hold out no longer; he ran to the window which looked out on the Rue de Lyon, and saw Aramis entering the inn. The lady was proceeding in quite an opposite direction, and seemed, in fact, to be about to rejoin an equipage, consisting of two led horses and a carriage, which he could see standing close to the borders of the forest. She was walking slowly, her head bent down, absorbed in the deepest meditation.

"Mordioux! Mordioux! I must and will learn who that woman is," said the musketeer again; and then, without further deliberation, he set off in pursuit of her. As he was going along, he tried to think how he could possibly contrive to make her raise her veil. "She is not young," he said, "and is a woman of high rank in society. I ought to know that figure and peculiar style of walk." As he ran, the sound of his spurs and of his boots upon the hard ground of the street made a strange jingling noise; a fortunate circumstance in itself, which he was far from reckoning upon. The noise disturbed the lady; she seemed to fancy she was being either followed or pursued, which was indeed the case, and turned round. D'Artagnan started as if he had received a charge of small shot in his legs, and then turning suddenly round as if he were going back the same way he had come, he murmured, "Madame de Chevreuse!" D'Artagnan would not go home until he had learnt everything. He asked Celestin to inquire of the grave-digger whose body it was they had buried that morning.

"A poor Franciscan mendicant friar," replied the latter, "who had not even a dog to love him in this world, and to accompany him to his last resting-place."

"If that were really the case," thought D'Artagnan, "we should not have found Aramis present at his funeral. The bishop of Vannes is not precisely a dog as far as devotion goes: his scent, however, is quite as keen, I admit."

VII. How Porthos, Truchen, and Planchet Parted with Each Other on Friendly Terms, Thanks to D'Artagnan.

There was good living in Planchet's house. Porthos broke a ladder and two cherry-trees, stripped the raspberry-bushes, and was only unable to succeed in reaching the strawberry-beds on account, as he said, of his belt. Truchen, who had become quite sociable with the giant, said that it was not the belt so much as his corporation; and Porthos, in a state of the highest delight, embraced Truchen, who gathered him a painful of the strawberries, and made him eat them out of her hands. D'Artagnan, who arrived in the midst of these little innocent flirtations, scolded Porthos for his indolence, and silently pitied Planchet. Porthos breakfasted with a very good appetite, and when he had finished, he said, looking at Truchen, "I could make myself very happy here." Truchen smiled at his remark, and so did Planchet, but not without embarrassment.

D'Artagnan then addressed Porthos: "You must not let the delights of Capua make you forget the real object of our journey to Fontainebleau."

"My presentation to the king?"

"Certainly. I am going to take a turn in the town to get everything ready for that. Do not think of leaving the house, I beg."

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Porthos.

Planchet looked at D'Artagnan nervously.

"Will you be away long?" he inquired.

"No, my friend; and this very evening I will release you from two troublesome guests."

"Oh! Monsieur d'Artagnan! can you say—"

"No, no; you are a noble-hearted fellow, but your house is very small. Such a house, with half a dozen acres of land, would be fit for a king, and make him very happy, too. But you were not born a great lord."

"No more was M. Porthos," murmured Planchet.

"But he has become so, my good fellow; his income has been a hundred thousand francs a year for the last twenty years, and for the last fifty years Porthos has been the owner of a couple of fists and a backbone, which are not to be matched throughout the whole realm of France. Porthos is a man of the very greatest consequence compared to you, and... well, I need say no more, for I know you are an intelligent fellow."

"No, no, monsieur, explain what you mean."

"Look at your orchard, how stripped it is, how empty your larder, your bedstead broken, your cellar almost exhausted, look too... at Madame Truchen—"

"Oh! my goodness gracious!" said Planchet.

"Madame Truchen is an excellent person," continued D'Artagnan, "but keep her for yourself, do you understand?" and he slapped him on the shoulder.

Planchet at this moment perceived Porthos and Truchen sitting close together in an arbor; Truchen, with a grace of manner peculiarly Flemish, was making a pair of earrings for Porthos out of a double cherry, while Porthos was laughing as amorously as Samson in the company of Delilah. Planchet pressed D'Artagnan's hand, and ran towards the arbor. We must do Porthos the justice to say that he did not move as they approached, and, very likely, he did not think he was doing any harm. Nor indeed did Truchen move either, which rather put Planchet out; but he, too, had been so accustomed to see fashionable folk in his shop, that he found no difficulty in putting a good countenance on what seemed disagreeable or rude. Planchet seized Porthos by the arm, and proposed to go and look at the horses, but Porthos pretended he was tired. Planchet then suggested that the Baron du Vallon should taste some noyau of his own manufacture, which was not to be equaled anywhere; an offer the baron immediately accepted; and, in this way, Planchet managed to engage his enemy's attention during the whole of the day, by dint of sacrificing his cellar, in preference to his amour propre. Two hours afterwards D'Artagnan returned.

"Everything is arranged," he said; "I saw his majesty at the very moment he was setting off for the chase; the king expects us this evening."

"The king expects me!" cried Porthos, drawing himself up. It is a sad thing to have to confess, but a man's heart is like an ocean billow; for, from that very moment Porthos ceased to look at Madame Truchen in that touching manner which had so softened her heart. Planchet encouraged these ambitious leanings as best as he could. He talked over, or rather gave exaggerated accounts of all the splendors of the last reign, its battles, sieges, and grand court ceremonies. He spoke of the luxurious display which the English made; the prizes the three brave companions carried off; and how D'Artagnan, who at the beginning had been the humblest of the four, finished by becoming the leader. He fired Porthos with a generous feeling of enthusiasm by reminding him of his early youth now passed away; he boasted as much as he could of the moral life this great lord had led, and how religiously he respected the ties of friendship; he was eloquent, and skillful in his choice of subjects. He tickled Porthos, frightened Truchen, and made D'Artagnan think. At six o'clock, the musketeer ordered the horses to be brought round, and told Porthos to get ready. He thanked Planchet for his kind hospitality, whispered a few words about a post he might succeed in obtaining for him at court, which immediately raised Planchet in Truchen's estimation, where the poor grocer—so good, so generous, so devoted—had become much lowered ever since the appearance and comparison with him of the two great gentlemen. Such, however, is a woman's nature; they are anxious to possess what they have not got, and disdain it as soon as it is acquired. After having rendered this service to his friend Planchet, D'Artagnan said in a low tone of voice to Porthos: "That is a very beautiful ring you have on your finger."

"It is worth three hundred pistoles," said Porthos.

"Madame Truchen will remember you better if you leave her that ring," replied D'Artagnan, a suggestion which Porthos seemed to hesitate to adopt.

"You think it is not beautiful enough, perhaps," said the musketeer. "I understand your feelings; a great lord such as you would not think of accepting the hospitality of an old servant without paying him most handsomely for it: but I am sure that Planchet is too good-hearted a fellow to remember that you have an income of a hundred thousand francs a year."

"I have more than half a mind," said Porthos, flattered by the remark, "to make Madame Truchen a present of my little farm at Bracieux; it has twelve acres."

"It is too much, my good Porthos, too much just at present... Keep it for a future occasion." He then took the ring off Porthos's finger, and approaching Truchen, said to her:—"Madame, monsieur le baron hardly knows how to entreat you, out of your regard for him, to accept this little ring. M. du Vallon is one of the most generous and discreet men of my acquaintance. He wished to offer you a farm that he has at Bracieux, but I dissuaded him from it."

"Oh!" said Truchen, looking eagerly at the diamond.

"Monsieur le baron!" exclaimed Planchet, quite overcome.

"My good friend," stammered out Porthos, delighted at having been so well represented by D'Artagnan. These several exclamations, uttered at the same moment, made quite a pathetic winding-up of a day which might have finished in a very ridiculous manner. But D'Artagnan was there, and, on every occasion, wheresoever D'Artagnan exercised any control, matters ended only just in the very way he wished and willed. There were general embracings; Truchen, whom the baron's munificence had restored to her proper position, very timidly, and blushing all the while, presented her forehead to the great lord with whom she had been on such very pretty terms the evening before. Planchet himself was overcome by a feeling of genuine humility. Still, in the same generosity of disposition, Porthos would have emptied his pockets into the hands of the cook and of Celestin; but D'Artagnan stopped him.

"No," he said, "it is now my turn." And he gave one pistole to the woman and two to the man; and the benedictions which were showered down upon them would have rejoiced the heart of Harpagon himself, and have rendered even him a prodigal.

D'Artagnan made Planchet lead them to the chateau, and introduced Porthos into his own apartment, where he arrived safely without having been perceived by those he was afraid of meeting.

VIII. The Presentation of Porthos at Court.

At seven o'clock the same evening, the king gave an audience to an ambassador from the United Provinces, in the grand reception-room. The audience lasted a quarter of an hour. His majesty afterwards received those who had been recently presented, together with a few ladies, who paid their respects first. In one corner of the salon, concealed behind a column, Porthos and D'Artagnan were conversing together, waiting until their turn arrived.

"Have you heard the news?" inquired the musketeer of his friend.

"No!"

"Well, look, then." Porthos raised himself on tiptoe, and saw M. Fouquet in full court dress, leading Aramis towards the king.

"Aramis!" said Porthos.

"Presented to the king by M. Fouquet."

"Ah!" ejaculated Porthos.

"For having fortified Belle-Isle," continued D'Artagnan.

"And I?"

"You—oh, you! as I have already had the honour of telling you, are the good-natured, kind-hearted Porthos; and so they begged you to take care of Saint-Mande a little."

"Ah!" repeated Porthos.

"But, happily, I was there," said D'Artagnan, "and presently it will be my turn."

At this moment Fouquet addressed the king.

"Sire," he said, "I have a favour to solicit of your majesty. M. d'Herblay is not ambitious, but he knows when he can be of service. Your majesty needs a representative at Rome, who would be able to exercise a powerful influence there; may I request a cardinal's hat for M. d'Herblay?" The king started. "I do not often solicit anything of your majesty," said Fouquet.

"That is a reason, certainly," replied the king, who always expressed any hesitation he might have in that manner, and to which remark there was nothing to say in reply.

Fouquet and Aramis looked at each other. The king resumed: "M. d'Herblay can serve us equally well in France; an archbishopric, for instance."

"Sire," objected Fouquet, with a grace of manner peculiarly his own, "your majesty overwhelms M. d'Herblay; the archbishopric may, in your majesty's extreme kindness, be conferred in addition to the hat; the one does not exclude the other."

The king admired the readiness which he displayed, and smiled, saying: "D'Artagnan himself could not have answered better." He had no sooner pronounced the name than D'Artagnan appeared.

"Did your majesty call me?" he said.

Aramis and Fouquet drew back a step, as if they were about to retire.

"Will your majesty allow me," said D'Artagnan quickly, as he led forward Porthos, "to present to your majesty M. le Baron du Vallon, one of the bravest gentlemen of France?"

As soon as Aramis saw Porthos, he turned as pale as death, while Fouquet clenched his hands under his ruffles. D'Artagnan smiled blandly at both of them, while Porthos bowed, visibly overcome before the royal presence.

"Porthos here?" murmured Fouquet in Aramis's ear.

"Hush! deep treachery at work," hissed the latter.

"Sire," said D'Artagnan, "it is more than six years ago I ought to have presented M. du Vallon to your majesty; but certain men resemble stars, they move not one inch unless their satellites accompany them. The Pleiades are never disunited, and that is the reason I have selected, for the purpose of presenting him to you, the very moment when you would see M. d'Herblay by his side."

Aramis almost lost countenance. He looked at D'Artagnan with a proud, haughty air, as though willing to accept the defiance the latter seemed to throw down.

"Ah! these gentlemen are good friends, then?" said the king.

"Excellent friends, sire; the one can answer for the other. Ask M. de Vannes now in what manner Belle-Isle was fortified?" Fouquet moved back a step.

"Belle-Isle," said Aramis, coldly, "was fortified by that gentleman," and he indicated Porthos with his hand, who bowed a second time. Louis could not withhold his admiration, though at the same time his suspicions were aroused.

"Yes," said D'Artagnan, "but ask monsieur le baron whose assistance he had in carrying the works out?"

"Aramis's," said Porthos, frankly; and he pointed to the bishop.

"What the deuce does all this mean?" thought the bishop, "and what sort of a termination are we to expect to this comedy?"

"What!" exclaimed the king, "is the cardinal's, I mean this bishop's, name Aramis?"

"His nom de guerre," said D'Artagnan.

"My nickname," said Aramis.

"A truce to modesty!" exclaimed D'Artagnan; "beneath the priest's robe, sire, is concealed the most brilliant officer, a gentleman of the most unparalleled intrepidity, and the wisest theologian in your kingdom."

Louis raised his head. "And an engineer, also, it appears," he said, admiring Aramis's calm, imperturbable self-possession.

"An engineer for a particular purpose, sire," said the latter.

"My companion in the musketeers, sire," said D'Artagnan, with great warmth of manner, "the man who has more than a hundred times aided your father's ministers by his advice—M. d'Herblay, in a word, who, with M. du Vallon, myself, and M. le Comte de la Fere, who is known to your majesty, formed that quartette which was a good deal talked about during the late king's reign, and during your majesty's minority."

"And who fortified Belle-Isle?" the king repeated, in a significant tone.

Aramis advanced and bowed: "In order to serve the son as I served the father."

D'Artagnan looked very narrowly at Aramis while he uttered these words, which displayed so much true respect, so much warm devotion, such entire frankness and sincerity, that even he, D'Artagnan, the eternal doubter, he, the almost infallible in judgment, was deceived by it. "A man who lies cannot speak in such a tone as that," he said.

Louis was overcome by it. "In that case," he said to Fouquet, who anxiously awaited the result of this proof, "the cardinal's hat is promised. Monsieur d'Herblay, I pledge you my honour that the first promotion shall be yours. Thank M. Fouquet for it." Colbert overheard these words; they stung him to the quick, and he left the salon abruptly. "And you, Monsieur du Vallon," said the king, "what have you to ask? I am truly pleased to have it in my power to acknowledge the services of those who were faithful to my father."

"Sire—" began Porthos, but he was unable to proceed with what he was going to say.

"Sire," exclaimed D'Artagnan, "this worthy gentleman is utterly overpowered by your majesty's presence, he who so valiantly sustained the looks and the fire of a thousand foes. But, knowing what his thoughts are, I—who am more accustomed to gaze upon the sun—can translate them: he needs nothing, absolutely nothing; his sole desire is to have the happiness of gazing upon your majesty for a quarter of an hour."

"You shall sup with me this evening," said the king, saluting Porthos with a gracious smile.

Porthos became crimson from delight and pride. The king dismissed him, and D'Artagnan pushed him into the adjoining apartment, after he had embraced him warmly.

"Sit next to me at table," said Porthos in his ear.

"Yes, my friend."

"Aramis is annoyed with me, I think."

"Aramis has never liked you so much as he does now. Fancy, it was I who was the means of his getting the cardinal's hat."

"Of course," said Porthos. "By the by, does the king like his guests to eat much at his table?"

"It is a compliment to himself if you do," said D'Artagnan, "for he himself possesses a royal appetite."

IX. Explanations.

Aramis cleverly managed to effect a diversion for the purpose of finding D'Artagnan and Porthos. He came up to the latter, behind one of the columns, and, as he pressed his hand, said, "So you have escaped from my prison?"

"Do not scold him," said D'Artagnan; "it was I, dear Aramis, who set him free."

"Ah! my friend," replied Aramis, looking at Porthos, "could you not have waited with a little more patience?"

D'Artagnan came to the assistance of Porthos, who already began to breathe hard, in sore perplexity.

"You see, you members of the Church are great politicians; we mere soldiers come at once to the point. The facts are these: I went to pay Baisemeaux a visit—"

Aramis pricked up his ears at this announcement.

"Stay!" said Porthos; "you make me remember that I have a letter from Baisemeaux for you, Aramis." And Porthos held out the bishop the letter we have already seen. Aramis begged to be allowed to read it, and read it without D'Artagnan feeling in the slightest degree embarrassed by the circumstance that he was so well acquainted with the contents of it. Besides, Aramis's face was so impenetrable, that D'Artagnan could not but admire him more than ever; after he had read it, he put the letter into his pocket with the calmest possible air.

"You were saying, captain?" he observed.

"I was saying," continued the musketeer, "that I had gone to pay Baisemeaux a visit on his majesty's service."

"On his majesty's service?" said Aramis.

"Yes," said D'Artagnan, "and, naturally enough, we talked about you and our friends. I must say that Baisemeaux received me coldly; so I soon took my leave of him. As I was returning, a soldier accosted me, and said (no doubt as he recognized me, notwithstanding I was in private clothes), 'Captain, will you be good enough to read me the name written on this envelope?' and I read, 'To Monsieur du Vallon, at M. Fouquet's house, Saint-Mande.' The deuce, I said to myself, Porthos has not returned, then, as I fancied, to Bell-Isle, or to Pierrefonds, but is at M. Fouquet's house, at Saint-Mande; and as M. Fouquet is not at Saint-Mande, Porthos must be quite alone, or, at all events, with Aramis; I will go and see Porthos, and I accordingly went to see Porthos."

"Very good," said Aramis, thoughtfully.

"You never told me that," said Porthos.

"I had no time, my friend."

"And you brought back Porthos with you to Fontainebleau?"

"Yes, to Planchet's house."

"Does Planchet live at Fontainebleau?" inquired Aramis.

"Yes, near the cemetery," said Porthos, thoughtlessly.

"What do you mean by 'near the cemetery?'" said Aramis, suspiciously.

"Come," thought the musketeer, "since there is to be a squabble, let us take advantage of it."

"Yes, the cemetery," said Porthos. "Planchet is a very excellent fellow, who makes very excellent preserves; but his house has windows which look out upon the cemetery. And a confoundedly melancholy prospect it is! So this morning—"

"This morning?" said Aramis, more and more excited.

D'Artagnan turned his back to them, and walked to the window, where he began to play a march upon one of the panes of glass.

"Yes, this morning we saw a man buried there."

"Ah!"

"Very depressing, was it not? I should never be able to live in a house where burials can always be seen from the window. D'Artagnan, on the contrary, seems to like it very much."

"So D'Artagnan saw it as well?"

"Not simply saw it; he literally never took his eyes off the whole time."

Aramis started, and turned to look at the musketeer, but the latter was engaged in earnest conversation with Saint-Aignan. Aramis continued to question Porthos, and when he had squeezed all the juice out of this enormous lemon, he threw the peel aside. He turned towards his friend D'Artagnan, and clapping him on the shoulder, when Saint-Aignan had left him, the king's supper having been announced, said, "D'Artagnan."

"Yes, my dear fellow," he replied.

"We do not sup with his majesty, I believe?"

"Well?—we do."

"Can you give me ten minutes' conversation?"

"Twenty, if you like. His majesty will take quite that time to get properly seated at table."

"Where shall we talk, then?"

"Here, upon these seats if you like; the king has left, we can sit down, and the apartment is empty."

"Let us sit down, then."

They sat down, and Aramis took one of D'Artagnan's hands in his.

"Tell me, candidly, my dear friend, whether you have not counseled Porthos to distrust me a little?"

"I admit, I have, but not as you understand it. I saw that Porthos was bored to death, and I wished, by presenting him to the king, to do for him, and for you, what you would never do for yourselves."

"What is that?"

"Speak in your own praise."

"And you have done it most nobly; I thank you."

"And I brought the cardinal's hat a little nearer, just as it seemed to be retreating from you."

"Ah! I admit that," said Aramis, with a singular smile, "you are, indeed, not to be matched for making your friends' fortunes for them."

"You see, then, that I only acted with the view of making Porthos's fortune for him."

"I meant to have done that myself; but your arm reaches farther than ours."

It was now D'Artagnan's turn to smile.

"Come," said Aramis, "we ought to deal truthfully with each other. Do you still love me, D'Artagnan?"

"The same as I used to do," replied D'Artagnan, without compromising himself too much by this reply.

"In that case, thanks; and now, for the most perfect frankness," said Aramis; "you visited Belle-Isle on behalf of the king?"

"Pardieu!"

"You wished to deprive us of the pleasure of offering Bell-Isle completely fortified to the king."

"But before I could deprive you of that pleasure, I ought to have been made acquainted with your intention of doing so."

"You came to Belle-Isle without knowing anything?"

"Of you! yes. How the devil could I imagine that Aramis had become so clever an engineer as to be able to fortify like Polybius, or Archimedes?"

"True. And yet you smelt me out over yonder?"

"Oh! yes."

"And Porthos, too?"

"I did not divine that Aramis was an engineer. I was only able to guess that Porthos might have become one. There is a saying, one becomes an orator, one is born a poet; but it has never been said, one is born Porthos, and one becomes an engineer."

"Your wit is always amusing," said Aramis, coldly.

"Well, I will go on."

"Do. When you found out our secret, you made all the haste you could to communicate it to the king."

"I certainly made as much haste as I could, since I saw that you were making still more. When a man weighing two hundred and fifty pounds, as Porthos does, rides post; when a gouty prelate—I beg your pardon, but you yourself told me you were so—when a prelate scours the highway—I naturally suppose that my two friends, who did not wish to be communicative with me, had certain matters of the highest importance to conceal from me, and so I made as much haste as my leanness and the absence of gout would allow."

"Did it not occur to you, my dear friend, that you might be rendering Porthos and myself a very sad service?"

"Yes, I thought it not unlikely; but you and Porthos made me play a very ridiculous part at Belle-Isle."

"I beg your pardon," said Aramis.

"Excuse me," said D'Artagnan.

"So that," pursued Aramis, "you now know everything?"

"No, indeed."

"You know I was obliged to inform M. Fouquet of what had happened, in order that he would be able to anticipate what you might have to tell the king?"

"That is rather obscure."

"Not at all: M. Fouquet has his enemies—you will admit that, I suppose."

"Certainly."

"And one in particular."

"A dangerous one?"

"A mortal enemy. Well, in order to counteract that man's influence, it was necessary that M. Fouquet should give the king a proof of his great devotion to him, and of his readiness to make the greatest sacrifices. He surprised his majesty by offering him Belle-Isle. If you had been the first to reach Paris, the surprise would have been destroyed, it would have looked as if we had yielded to fear."

"I understand."

"That is the whole mystery," said Aramis, satisfied that he had at last quite convinced the musketeer.

"Only," said the latter, "it would have been more simple to have taken me aside, and said to me, 'My dear D'Artagnan, we are fortifying Belle-Isle, and intend to offer it to the king. Tell us frankly, for whom you are acting. Are you a friend of M. Colbert, or of M. Fouquet?' Perhaps I should not have answered you, but you would have added,—'Are you my friend?' I should have said 'Yes.'" Aramis hung down his head. "In this way," continued D'Artagnan, "you would have paralyzed my movements, and I should have gone to the king, and said, 'Sire, M. Fouquet is fortifying Belle-Isle, and exceedingly well, too; but here is a note, which the governor of Belle-Isle gave me for your majesty;' or, 'M. Fouquet is about to wait upon your majesty to explain his intentions with regard to it.' I should not have been placed in an absurd position; you would have enjoyed the surprise so long planned, and we should not have had any occasion to look askant at each other when we met."

"While, on the contrary," replied Aramis, "you have acted altogether as one friendly to M. Colbert. And you really are a friend of his, I suppose?"

"Certainly not, indeed!" exclaimed the captain. "M. Colbert is a mean fellow, and I hate him as I used to hate Mazarin, but without fearing him."

"Well, then," said Aramis, "I love M. Fouquet, and his interests are mine. You know my position. I have no property or means whatever. M. Fouquet gave me several livings, a bishopric as well; M. Fouquet has served and obliged me like the generous-hearted man he is, and I know the world sufficiently well to appreciate a kindness when I meet with one. M. Fouquet has won my regard, and I have devoted myself to his service."

"You could not possibly do better. You will find him a very liberal master."

Aramis bit his lips; and then said, "The best a man could possibly have." He then paused for a minute, D'Artagnan taking good care not to interrupt him.

"I suppose you know how Porthos got mixed up in all this?"

"No," said D'Artagnan; "I am curious, of course, but I never question a friend when he wishes to keep a secret from me."

"Well, then, I will tell you."

"It is hardly worth the trouble, if the confidence is to bind me in any way."

"Oh! do not be afraid.; there is no man whom I love better than Porthos, because he is so simple-minded and good-natured. Porthos is so straightforward in everything. Since I have become a bishop, I have looked for these primeval natures, which make me love truth and hate intrigue."

D'Artagnan stroked his mustache, but said nothing.

"I saw Porthos and again cultivated his acquaintance; his own time hanging idly on his hands, his presence recalled my earlier and better days without engaging me in any present evil. I sent for Porthos to come to Vannes. M. Fouquet, whose regard for me is very great, having learnt that Porthos and I were attached to each other by old ties of friendship, promised him increase of rank at the earliest promotion, and that is the whole secret."

"I shall not abuse your confidence," said D'Artagnan.

"I am sure of that, my dear friend; no one has a finer sense of honour than yourself."

"I flatter myself that you are right, Aramis."

"And now"—and here the prelate looked searchingly and scrutinizingly at his friend—"now let us talk of ourselves and for ourselves; will you become one of M. Fouquet's friends? Do not interrupt me until you know what that means."

"Well, I am listening."

"Will you become a marechal of France, peer, duke, and the possessor of a duchy, with a million of francs?"

"But, my friend," replied D'Artagnan, "what must one do to get all that?"

"Belong to M. Fouquet."

"But I already belong to the king."

"Not exclusively, I suppose."

"Oh! a D'Artagnan cannot be divided."

"You have, I presume, ambitions, as noble hearts like yours have."

"Yes, certainly I have."

"Well?"

"Well! I wish to be a marechal; the king will make me marechal, duke, peer; the king will make me all that."

Aramis fixed a searching look upon D'Artagnan.

"Is not the king master?" said D'Artagnan.

"No one disputes it; but Louis XIII. was master also."

"Oh! my dear friend, between Richelieu and Louis XIII. stood no D'Artagnan," said the musketeer, very quietly.

"There are many stumbling-blocks round the king," said Aramis.

"Not for the king's feet."

"Very likely not; still—"

"One moment, Aramis; I observe that every one thinks of himself, and never of his poor prince; I will maintain myself maintaining him."

"And if you meet with ingratitude?"

"The weak alone are afraid of that."

"You are quite certain of yourself?"

"I think so."

"Still, the king may some day have no further need for you!"

"On the contrary, I think his need of me will soon be greater than ever; and hearken, my dear fellow, if it became necessary to arrest a new Conde, who would do it? This—this alone in France!" and D'Artagnan struck his sword, which clanked sullenly on the tessellated floor.

"You are right," said Aramis, turning very pale; and then he rose and pressed D'Artagnan's hand.

"That is the last summons for supper," said the captain of the musketeers; "will you excuse me?"

Aramis threw his arm round the musketeer's neck, and said, "A friend like you is the brightest jewel in the royal crown." And they immediately separated.

"I was right," mused D'Artagnan; "there is, indeed, something strangely serious stirring."

"We must hasten the explosion," breathed the coming cardinal, "for D'Artagnan has discovered the existence of a plot."

X. Madame and De Guiche.

It will not be forgotten how Comte de Guiche left the queen-mother's apartments on the day when Louis XIV. presented La Vallière with the beautiful bracelets he had won in the lottery. The comte walked to and fro for some time outside the palace, in the greatest distress, from a thousand suspicions and anxieties with which his mind was beset. Presently he stopped and waited on the terrace opposite the grove of trees, watching for Madame's departure. More than half an hour passed away; and as he was at that moment quite alone, the comte could hardly have had any very diverting ideas at his command. He drew his tables from his pocket, and, after hesitating over and over again, determined to write these words:—"Madame, I implore you to grant me one moment's conversation. Do not be alarmed at this request, which contains nothing in any way opposed to the profound respect with which I subscribe myself, etc., etc." He had signed and folded this singular love-letter, when he suddenly observed several ladies leaving the chateau, and afterwards several courtiers too; in fact, almost every one that formed the queen's circle. He saw La Vallière herself, then Montalais talking with Malicorne; he watched the departure of the very last of the numerous guests that had a short time before thronged the queen-mother's cabinet.

Madame herself had not yet passed; she would be obliged, however, to cross the courtyard in order to enter her own apartments; and, from the terrace where he was standing, De Guiche could see all that was going on in the courtyard. At last he saw Madame leave, attended by a couple of pages, who were carrying torches before her. She was walking very quickly; as soon as she reached the door, she said:

"Let some one go and look for De Guiche: he has to render an account of a mission he had to discharge for me; if he should be disengaged, request him to be good enough to come to my apartment."

De Guiche remained silent, hidden in the shade; but as soon as Madame had withdrawn, he darted from the terrace down the steps and assumed a most indifferent air, so that the pages who were hurrying towards his rooms might meet him.

“Ah! it is Madame, then, who is seeking me!” he said to himself, quite overcome; and he crushed in his hand the now worse than useless letter.

“M. le comte,” said one of the pages, approaching him, “we are indeed most fortunate in meeting you.”

“Why so, messieurs?”

“A command from Madame.”

“From Madame!” said De Guiche, looking surprised.

“Yes, M. le comte, her royal highness has been asking for you; she expects to hear, she told us, the result of a commission you had to execute for her. Are you at liberty?”

“I am quite at her royal highness’s orders.”

“Will you have the goodness to follow us, then?”

When De Guiche entered the princess’s apartments, he found her pale and agitated. Montalais was standing at the door, evidently uneasy about what was passing in her mistress’s mind. De Guiche appeared.

“Ah! is that you, Monsieur de Guiche?” said Madame; “come in, I beg. Mademoiselle de Montalais, I do not require your attendance any longer.”

Montalais, more puzzled than ever, courtesied and withdrew. De Guiche and the princess were left alone. The comte had every advantage in his favour; it was Madame who had summoned him to a rendezvous. But how was it possible for the comte to make use of this advantage? Madame was so whimsical, and her disposition so changeable. She soon allowed this to be perceived, for, suddenly, opening the conversation, she said: “Well! have you nothing to say to me?”

He imagined she must have guessed his thoughts; he fancied (for those who are in love are thus constituted, being as credulous and blind as poets or prophets), he fancied she knew how ardent was his desire to see her, and also the subject uppermost in his mind.

“Yes, Madame,” he said, “and I think it very singular.”

“The affair of the bracelets,” she exclaimed, eagerly, “you mean that, I suppose?”

“Yes, Madame.”

“And you think the king is in love; do you not?”

Guiche looked at her for some time; her eyes sank under his gaze, which seemed to read her very heart.

“I think,” he said, “that the king may possibly have had an idea of annoying some one; were it not for that, the king would hardly show himself so earnest in his attentions as he is; he would not run the risk of compromising, from mere thoughtlessness of disposition, a young girl against whom no one has been hitherto able to say a word.”

“Indeed! the bold, shameless girl,” said the princess, haughtily.

“I can positively assure your royal highness,” said De Guiche, with a firmness marked by great respect, “that Mademoiselle de la Vallière is beloved by a man who merits every respect, for he is a brave and honourable gentleman.”

“Bragelonne?”

“My friend; yes, Madame.”

“Well, and though he is your friend, what does that matter to the king?”

“The king knows that Bragelonne is affianced to Mademoiselle de la Vallière; and as Raoul has served the king most valiantly, the king will not inflict an irreparable injury upon him.”

Madame began to laugh in a manner that produced a sinister impression upon De Guiche.

“I repeat, Madame, I do not believe the king is in love with Mademoiselle de la Vallière; and the proof that I do not believe it is, that I was about to ask you whose amour propre it is likely the king is desirous of wounding? You, who are well acquainted with the whole court, can perhaps assist me in ascertaining that; and assuredly, with greater certainty, since it is everywhere said that your royal highness is on very friendly terms with the king.”

Madame bit her lips, and, unable to assign any good and sufficient reasons, changed the conversation. “Prove to me,” she said, fixing on him one of those looks in which the whole soul seems to pass into the eyes, “prove to me, I say, that you intended to interrogate me at the very moment I sent for you.”

De Guiche gravely drew from his pocket the now crumpled note that he had written, and showed it to her.

“Sympathy,” she said.

“Yes,” said the comte, with an indescribable tenderness of tone, “sympathy. I have explained to you how and why I sought you; you, however, have yet to tell me, Madame, why you sent for me.”

“True,” replied the princess. She hesitated, and then suddenly exclaimed, “Those bracelets will drive me mad.”

“You expected the king would offer them to you,” replied De Guiche.

“Why not?”

“But before you, Madame, before you, his sister-in-law, was there not the queen herself to whom the king should have offered them?”

“Before La Vallière,” cried the princess, wounded to the quick, “could he not have presented them to me? Was there not the whole court, indeed, to choose from?”

“I assure you, Madame,” said the comte, respectfully, “that if any one heard you speak in this manner, if any one were to see how red your eyes are, and, Heaven forgive me, to see, too, that tear trembling on your eyelids, it would be said that your royal highness was jealous.”

“Jealous!” said the princess, haughtily, “jealous of La Vallière!”

She expected to see De Guiche yield beneath her scornful gesture and her proud tone; but he simply and boldly replied, “Jealous of La Vallière; yes, Madame.”

“Am I to suppose, monsieur,” she stammered out, “that your object is to insult me?”

“It is not possible, Madame,” replied the comte, slightly agitated, but resolved to master that fiery nature.

“Leave the room!” said the princess, thoroughly exasperated, De Guiche’s coolness and silent respect having made her completely lose her temper.

De Guiche fell back a step, bowed slowly, but with great respect, drew himself up, looking as white as his lace cuffs, and, in a voice slightly trembling, said, “It was hardly worth while to have hurried here to be subjected to this unmerited disgrace.” And he turned away with hasty steps.

He had scarcely gone half a dozen paces when Madame darted like a tigress after him, seized him by the cuff, and making him turn round again, said, trembling with passion as she did so, “The respect you pretend to have is more insulting than the insult itself. Insult me, if you please, but at least speak.”

“Madame,” said the comte, gently, as he drew his sword, “thrust this blade into my heart, rather than kill me by degrees.”

At the look he fixed upon her,—a look full of love, resolution, and despair, even,—she knew how readily the comte, so outwardly calm in appearance, would pass his sword through his own breast if she added another word. She tore the blade from his hands, and, pressing his arm with a feverish impatience, which might pass for tenderness, said, “Do not be too hard upon me, comte. You see how I am suffering, and yet you have no pity for me.”

Tears, the cries of this strange attack, stifled her voice. As soon as De Guiche saw her weep, he took her in his arms and carried her to an armchair; in another moment she would have been suffocated. “Oh, why,” he murmured, as he knelt by her side, “why do you conceal your troubles from me? Do you love any one—tell me? It would kill me, I know, but not until I should have comforted, consoled, and served you even.”

“And do you love me to that extent?” she replied, completely conquered.

“I do indeed love you to that extent, Madame.”

She placed both her hands in his. “My heart is indeed another’s,” she murmured in so low a tone that her voice could hardly be heard; but he heard it, and said, “Is it the king you love?”

She gently shook her head, and her smile was like a clear bright streak in the clouds, through which after the tempest has passed one almost fancies Paradise is opening. “But,” she added, “there are other passions in a high-born heart. Love is poetry; but the real life of the heart is pride. Comte, I was born on a throne, I am proud and jealous of my rank. Why does the king gather such unworthy objects round him?”

“Once more, I repeat,” said the comte, “you are acting unjustly towards that poor girl, who will one day be my friend’s wife.”

“Are you simple enough to believe that, comte?”

“If I did not believe it,” he said, turning very pale, “Bragelonne should be informed of it to-morrow; indeed he should, if I thought that poor La Vallière had forgotten the vows she had exchanged with Raoul. But no, it would be cowardly to betray a woman’s secret; it would be criminal to disturb a friend’s peace of mind.”

“You think, then,” said the princess, with a wild burst of laughter, “that ignorance is happiness?”

“I believe it,” he replied.

“Prove it to me, then,” she said, hurriedly.

“It is easily done, Madame. It is reported through the whole court that the king loves you, and that you return his affection.”

“Well?” she said, breathing with difficulty.

“Well; admit for a moment that Raoul, my friend, had come and said to me, ‘Yes, the king loves Madame, and has made an impression upon her heart,’ I possibly should have slain Raoul.”

“It would have been necessary,” said the princess, with the obstinacy of a woman who feels herself not easily overcome, “for M. de Bragelonne to have had proofs before he ventured to speak to you in that manner.”

“Such, however, is the case,” replied De Guiche, with a deep sigh, “that, not having been warned, I have never examined into the matter seriously; and I now find that my ignorance has saved my life.”

“So, then, you drive selfishness and coldness to that extent,” said Madame, “that you would let this unhappy young man continue to love La Vallière?”

“I would, until La Vallière’s guilt were revealed.”

“But the bracelets?”

“Well, Madame, since you yourself expected to receive them from the king, what can I possibly say?”

The argument was a telling one, and the princess was overwhelmed by it, and from that moment her defeat was assured. But as her heart and mind were instinct with noble and generous feelings, she understood De Guiche’s extreme delicacy. She saw that in his heart he really suspected that the king was in love with La Vallière, and that he did not wish to resort to the common expedient of ruining a rival in the mind of a woman, by giving the latter the assurance and certainty that this rival’s affections were transferred to another woman. She guessed that his suspicions of La Vallière were aroused, and that, in order to leave himself time for his convictions to undergo a change, so as not to ruin Louise utterly, he was determined to pursue a certain straightforward line of conduct. She could read so much real greatness of character, and such true generosity of disposition in her lover, that her heart really warmed with affection towards him, whose passion for her was so pure and delicate. Despite his fear of incurring her displeasure, De Guiche, by retaining his position as a man of proud independence of feeling and deep devotion, became almost a hero in her estimation, and reduced her to the state of a jealous and little-minded woman. She loved him for this so tenderly, that she could not refuse to give him a proof of her affection.

“See how many words we have wasted,” she said, taking his hand, “suspicions, anxieties, mistrust, sufferings—I think we have enumerated all those words.”

“Alas! Madame, yes.”

“Efface them from your heart as I drive them from mine. Whether La Vallière does or does not love the king, and whether the king does or does not love La Vallière—from this moment you and I will draw a distinction in the two characters I have to perform. You open your eyes so wide that I am sure you hardly understand me.”

“You are so impetuous, Madame, that I always tremble at the fear of displeasing you.”

“And see how he trembles now, poor fellow,” she said, with the most charming playfulness of manner. “Yes, monsieur, I have two characters to perform. I am the sister of the king, the sister-in-law of the king’s wife. In this character ought I not to take an interest in these domestic intrigues? Come, tell me what you think?”

“As little as possible, Madame.”

“Agreed, monsieur; but it is a question of dignity; and then, you know, I am the wife of the king’s brother.” De Guiche sighed. “A circumstance,” she added, with an expression of great tenderness, “which will remind you that I am always to be treated with the profoundest respect.” De Guiche fell at her feet, which he kissed, with the religious fervor of a worshipper. “And I begin to think that, really and truly, I have another character to perform. I was almost forgetting it.”

“Name it, oh! name it,” said De Guiche.

"I am a woman," she said, in a voice lower than ever, "and I love." He rose, she opened her arms, and their lips met. A footstep was heard behind the tapestry, and Mademoiselle de Montalais appeared. "What do you want?" said Madame.

"M. de Guiche is wanted," replied Montalais, who was just in time to see the agitation of the actors of these four characters; for De Guiche had consistently carried out his part with heroism.

XI. Montalais and Malicorne.

Montalais was right. M. de Guiche, thus summoned in every direction, was very much exposed, from such a multiplication of business, to the risk of not attending to any. It so happened that, considering the awkwardness of the interruption, Madame, notwithstanding her wounded pride, and secret anger, could not, for the moment at least, reproach Montalais for having violated, in so bold a manner, the semi-royal order with which she had been dismissed on De Guiche's entrance. De Guiche, also, lost his presence of mind, or, it would be more correct to say, had already lost it, before Montalais's arrival, for, scarcely had he heard the young girl's voice, than, without taking leave of Madame, as the most ordinary politeness required, even between persons equal in rank and station, he fled from her presence, his heart tumultuously throbbing, and his brain on fire, leaving the princess with one hand raised, as though to bid him adieu. Montalais was at no loss, therefore, to perceive the agitation of the two lovers—the one who fled was agitated, and the one who remained was equally so.

"Well," murmured the young girl, as she glanced inquisitively round her, "this time, at least, I think I know as much as the most curious woman could possibly wish to know." Madame felt so embarrassed by this inquisitorial look, that, as if she heard Montalais's muttered side remark, she did not speak a word to her maid of honour, but, casting down her eyes, retired at once to her bedroom. Montalais, observing this, stood listening for a moment, and then heard Madame lock and bolt her door. By this she knew that the rest of the evening was at her own disposal; and making, behind the door which had just been closed, a gesture which indicated but little real respect for the princess, she went down the staircase in search of Malicorne, who was very busily engaged at that moment in watching a courier, who, covered with dust, had just left the Comte de Guiche's apartments. Montalais knew that Malicorne was engaged in a matter of some importance; she therefore allowed him to look and stretch out his neck as much as he pleased; and it was only when Malicorne had resumed his natural position, that she touched him on the shoulder. "Well," said Montalais, "what is the latest intelligence you have?"

"M. de Guiche is in love with Madame."

"Fine news, truly! I know something more recent than that."

"Well, what do you know?"

"That Madame is in love with M. de Guiche."

"The one is the consequence of the other."

"Not always, my good monsieur."

"Is that remark intended for me?"

"Present company always excepted."

"Thank you," said Malicorne. "Well, and in the other direction, what is stirring?"

"The king wished, this evening, after the lottery, to see Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

"Well, and he has seen her?"

"No, indeed!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"The door was shut and locked."

"So that—"

"So that the king was obliged to go back again, looking very sheepish, like a thief who has forgotten his crowbar."

"Good."

"And in the third place?" inquired Montalais.

"The courier who has just arrived for De Guiche came from M. de Bragelonne."

"Excellent," said Montalais, clapping her hands together.

"Why so?"

"Because we have work to do. If we get weary now, something unlucky will be sure to happen."

"We must divide the work, then," said Malicorne, "in order to avoid confusion."

"Nothing easier," replied Montalais. "Three intrigues, carefully nursed, and carefully encouraged, will produce, one with another, and taking a low average, three love letters a day."

"Oh!" exclaimed Malicorne, shrugging his shoulders, "you cannot mean what you say, darling; three letters a day, that may do for sentimental common people. A musketeer on duty, a young girl in a convent, may exchange letters with their lovers once a day, perhaps, from the top of a ladder, or through a hole in the wall. A letter contains all the poetry their poor little hearts have to boast of. But the cases we have in hand require to be dealt with very differently."

"Well, finish," said Montalais, out of patience with him. "Some one may come."

"Finish! Why, I am only at the beginning. I have still three points as yet untouched."

"Upon my word, he will be the death of me, with his Flemish indifference," exclaimed Montalais.

"And you will drive me mad with your Italian vivacity. I was going to say that our lovers here will be writing volumes to each other. But what are you driving at?"

"At this. Not one of our lady correspondents will be able to keep the letters they may receive."

"Very likely."

"M. de Guiche will not be able to keep his either."

"That is probable."

"Very well, then; I will take care of all that."

"That is the very thing that is impossible," said Malicorne.

"Why so?"

"Because you are not your own mistress; your room is as much La Vallière's as yours; and there are certain persons who will think nothing of visiting and searching a maid of honour's room; so that I am terribly afraid of the queen, who is as jealous as a Spaniard; of the queen-mother, who is as jealous as a couple of Spaniards; and, last of all, of Madame herself, who has jealousy enough for ten Spaniards."

"You forgot some one else."

"Who?"

"Monsieur."

"I was only speaking of the women. Let us add them up, then: we will call Monsieur, No. 1."

"De Guiche?"

"No. 2."

"The Vicomte de Bragelonne?"

"No. 3."

"And the king, the king?"

"No. 4. Of course the king, who not only will be more jealous, but more powerful than all the rest put together. Ah, my dear!"

"Well?"

"Into what a wasp's nest you have thrust yourself!"

"And as yet not quite far enough, if you will follow me into it."

"Most certainly I will follow you where you like. Yet—"

"Well, yet—"

"While we have time, I think it will be prudent to turn back."

"But I, on the contrary, think the wisest course to take is to put ourselves at once at the head of all these intrigues."

"You will never be able to do it."

"With you, I could superintend ten of them. I am in my element, you must know. I was born to live at the court, as the salamander is made to live in the fire."

"Your comparison does not reassure me in the slightest degree in the world, my dear Montalais. I have heard it said, and by learned men too, that, in the first place, there are no salamanders at all, and that, if there had been any, they would have been infallibly baked or roasted on leaving the fire."

"Your learned men may be very wise as far as salamanders are concerned, but they would never tell you what I can tell you; namely, that Aure de Montalais is destined, before a month is over, to become the first diplomatist in the court of France."

"Be it so, but on condition that I shall be the second."

"Agreed; an offensive and defensive alliance, of course."

"Only be very careful of any letters."

"I will hand them to you as I receive them."

"What shall we tell the king about Madame?"

"That Madame is still in love with his majesty."

"What shall we tell Madame about the king?"

"That she would be exceedingly wrong not to humor him."

"What shall we tell La Vallière about Madame?"

"Whatever we choose, for La Vallière is in our power."

"How so?"

"Every way."

"What do you mean?"

"In the first place, through the Vicomte de Bragelonne."

"Explain yourself."

"You do not forget, I hope, that Monsieur de Bragelonne has written many letters to Mademoiselle de la Vallière."

"I forget nothing."

"Well, then, it was I who received, and I who intercepted those letters."

"And, consequently, it is you who have them still?"

"Yes."

"Where,—here?"

"Oh, no; I have them safe at Blois, in the little room you know well enough."

"That dear little room,—that darling little room, the ante-chamber of the palace I intend you to live in one of these days. But, I beg your pardon, you said that all those letters are in that little room?"

“Yes.”

“Did you not put them in a box?”

“Of course; in the same box where I put all the letters I received from you, and where I put mine also when your business or your amusements prevented you from coming to our rendezvous.”

“Ah, very good,” said Malicorne.

“Why are you satisfied?”

“Because I see there is a possibility of not having to run to Blois after the letters, for I have them here.”

“You have brought the box away?”

“It was very dear to me, because it belonged to you.”

“Be sure and take care of it, for it contains original documents that will be of priceless value by and by.”

“I am perfectly well aware of that indeed, and that is the very reason why I laugh as I do, and with all my heart, too.”

“And now, one last word.”

“Why last?”

“Do we need any one to assist us?”

“No one.”

“Valets or maid-servants?”

“Bad policy. You will give the letters,—you will receive them. Oh! we must have no pride in this affair, otherwise M. Malicorne and Mademoiselle Aure, not transacting their own affairs themselves, will have to make up their minds to see them done by others.”

“You are quite right; but what is going on yonder in M. de Guiche’s room?”

“Nothing; he is only opening his window.”

“Let us be gone.” And they both immediately disappeared, all the terms of the contract being agreed on.

The window just opened was, in fact, that of the Comte de Guiche. It was not alone with the hope of catching a glimpse of Madame through her curtains that he seated himself by the open window for his preoccupation of mind had at that time a different origin. He had just received, as we have already stated, the courier who had been dispatched to him by Bragelonne, the latter having written to De Guiche a letter which had made the deepest impression upon him, and which he had read over and over again. “Strange, strange!” he murmured. “How irresponsible are the means by which destiny hurries men onward to their fate!” Leaving the window in order to approach nearer to the light, he once more read the letter he had just received:—

“CALAIS.

“MY DEAR COUNT,—I found M. de Wardes at Calais; he has been seriously wounded in an affair with the Duke of Buckingham. De Wardes is, as you know, unquestionably brave, but full of malevolent and wicked feelings. He conversed with me about yourself, for whom, he says, he has a warm regard, also about Madame, whom he considers a beautiful and amiable woman. He has guessed your affection for a certain person. He also talked to me about the lady for whom I have so ardent a regard, and showed the greatest interest on my behalf in expressing a deep pity for me, accompanied, however, by dark hints which alarmed me at first, but which I at last looked upon as the result of his usual love of mystery. These are the facts: he had received news of the court; you will understand, however, that it was only through M. de Lorraine. The report goes, so says the news, that a change has taken place in the king’s affections. You know whom that concerns. Afterwards, the news continues, people are talking about one of the maids of honour, respecting whom various slanderous reports are being circulated. These vague phrases have not allowed me to sleep. I have been deploring, ever since yesterday, that my diffidence and vacillation of purpose, notwithstanding a certain obstinacy of character I may possess, have left me unable to reply to these insinuations. In a word, M. de Wardes was setting off for Paris, and I did not delay his departure with explanations; for it seemed rather hard, I confess, to cross-examine a man whose wounds are hardly yet closed. In short, he travelled by short stages, as he was anxious to leave, he said, in order to be present at a curious spectacle the court cannot fail to offer within a short time. He added a few congratulatory words accompanied by vague sympathizing expressions. I could not understand the one any more than the other. I was bewildered by my own thoughts, and tormented by a mistrust of this man,—a mistrust which, you know better than any one else, I have never been able to overcome. As soon as he left, my perceptions seemed to become clearer. It is hardly possible that a man of De Wardes’s character should not have communicated something of his own malicious nature to the statements he made to me. It is not unlikely, therefore, that in the strange hints De Wardes threw out in my presence, there may be a mysterious signification, which I might have some difficulty in applying either to myself or to some one with whom you are acquainted. Being compelled to leave as soon as possible, in obedience to the king’s commands, the idea did not occur to me of running after De Wardes in order to ask him to explain his reserve; but I have dispatched a courier to you with this letter, which will explain in detail my various doubts. I regard you as myself; you have reflected and observed; it will be for you to act. M. de Wardes will arrive very shortly; endeavor to learn what he meant, if you do not already know. M. de Wardes, moreover, pretended that the Duke of Buckingham left Paris on the very best of terms with Madame. This was an affair which would have unhesitatingly made me draw my sword, had I not felt that I was under the necessity of dispatching the king’s mission before undertaking any quarrel whatsoever. Burn this letter, which Olivain will hand you. Whatever Olivain says, you may confidently rely on. Will you have the goodness, my dear comte, to recall me to the remembrance of Mademoiselle de la Vallière, whose hands I kiss with the greatest respect.

“Your devoted

“DE BRAGELONNE.

“P. S.—If anything serious should happen—we should be prepared for everything, dispatch a courier to me with this one single word, ‘come,’ and I will be in Paris within six and thirty hours after the receipt of your letter.”

De Guiche sighed, folded up the letter a third time, and, instead of burning it, as Raoul had recommended him to do, placed it in his pocket. He felt it needed reading over and over again.

“How much distress of mind, yet what sublime confidence, he shows!” murmured the comte; “he has poured out his whole soul in this letter. He says nothing of the Comte de la Fere, and speaks of his respect for Louise. He cautions me on my own account, and entreats me on his. Ah!” continued De Guiche, with a threatening gesture, “you interfere in my affairs, Monsieur de Wardes, do you? Very well, then; I will shortly occupy myself with yours. As for you, poor Raoul,—you who intrust your heart to my keeping, be assured I will watch over it.”

With this promise, De Guiche begged Malicorne to come immediately to his apartments, if possible. Malicorne acknowledged the invitation with an activity which was the first result of his conversation with Montalais. And while De Guiche, who thought that his motive was undiscovered, cross-examined Malicorne, the latter, who appeared to be working in the dark, soon guessed his questioner’s motives. The consequence was, that, after a quarter of an hour’s conversation, during which De Guiche thought he had ascertained the whole truth with regard to La Vallière and the king, he had learned absolutely nothing more than his own eyes had already acquainted him with, while Malicorne learned, or guessed, that Raoul, who was absent, was fast becoming suspicious, and that De Guiche intended to watch over the treasure of the Hesperides. Malicorne accepted the office of dragon. De Guiche fancied he had done everything for his friend, and soon began to think of nothing but his personal affairs. The next evening, De Wardes’s return and first appearance at the king’s reception were announced. When that visit had been paid, the convalescent waited on Monsieur; De Guiche taking care, however, to be at Monsieur’s apartments before the visit took place.

XII. How De Wardes Was Received at Court.

Monsieur had received De Wardes with that marked favour light and frivolous minds bestow on every novelty that comes in their way. De Wardes, who had been absent for a month, was like fresh fruit to him. To treat him with marked kindness was an infidelity to old friends, and there is always something fascinating in that; moreover, it was a sort of reparation to De Wardes himself. Nothing, consequently, could exceed the favourable notice Monsieur took of him. The Chevalier de Lorraine, who feared this rival but a little, but who respected a character and disposition only too parallel to his own in every particular, with the addition of a bull-dog courage he did not himself possess, received De Wardes with a greater display of regard and affection than even Monsieur had done. De Guiche, as we have said, was there also, but kept in the background, waiting very patiently until all these interchanges were over. De Wardes, while talking to the others, and even to Monsieur himself, had not for a moment lost sight of De Guiche, who, he instinctively felt, was there on his account. As soon as he had finished with the others, he went up to De Guiche. They exchanged the most courteous compliments, after which De Wardes returned to Monsieur and the other gentlemen.
